Thoſe, who, by all means, would maintain, that I am miſtaken, might ſuppoſe that Spinoza rejected only the name of ſubſtance given to Beings that depend upon another cauſe, as to their production, preſervation, and operation, in fieri, in eſſe, & in operari, as they ſpeak in the ſchools. They might ſay that tho' he retained all the reality of the thing, he avoided the word, becauſe he believed that a Being ſo dependent upon its cauſe, could not be called ens per ſe ſubſiſtens, ſubſiſting by itſelf, which is the definition of ſubſtance. I anſwer, as I have done above, that if it be ſo, there is only a diſpute about words between him and other Philoſophers, and that I ſhall willingly confeſs my miſtake, if it appears that Spinoza was indeed a Carteſian; but only that he has been more nice than Des Cartes in the application of the word ſubſtance, and that all the impiety laid to his charge, lies only in a miſunderſtanding. He only meant (will they add) what is to be found in the books of Divines, viz. That the immenſity of God fills up heaven and earth, and all imaginary ſpaces in infinitum (168), and conſequently that his eſſence penetrates and locally ſurrounds all other Beings, ſo that it is in him we have life and motion (169), and that he has produced nothing out of himſelf; for ſince he fills up all ſpaces, he could not place any thing but in himſelf, there being nothing out of him. Beſides, it is well known, that no Being can exiſt without him; and therefore it is true, that the properties of the Carteſian modes agree with what is called created ſubſtances. Thoſe ſubſtances are in God, and cannot exiſt out of him and without him. It is therefore no wonder if Spinoza called them modifications; but on the other hand, he did not deny that there was a real diſtincon between them, and that each of them conſtituted a particular principle of actions or paſſions, in ſuch a manner, that one of them does what the other does not; and that when one denies of one of them what is affirmed of the other, it is according to the rules of Logic, and no body can object to Spinoza, that it follows from his principles, that two contradictory propoſitions are true of one and the ſame ſubject at the ſame time.

All this ſignifies nothing; and in order to come directly to the point, a plain anſwer ſhould be given to this preciſe queſtion: does the true and proper character of modification agree to matter with reſpect to God; or does it not agree to it? Before you anſwer it, let me explain by ſome examples, what the proper character of modification is. It is to be in a ſubject in the ſame manner as motion is in matter, and thought in the ſoul of a man, and the form of a porrenger in the veſſel called a porrenger. A thing cannot be a modification of the Divine ſubſtance, only becauſe it ſubſiſts in the immenſity of God, becauſe it is penetrated by, and ſurrounded with it on all ſides, becauſe it exiſts by the power of God, and cannot exiſt without him, nor out of him; it is further requiſite, that the Divine Subſtance ſhould be its ſubject of inherence, juſt as, according to the common opinion, the human ſoul is the ſubject of inherence of ſenſe and deſire; pewter is the ſubject of inherence of the form of a porrenger, and matter is the ſubject of inherence of motion, reſt, and figure. Anſwer now: and if you ſay that, according to Spinoza, the ſubſtance of God is not in ſuch a manner the ſubject of inherence of that extenſion, of that motion, and of thoſe human thoughts; I will confeſs that you make an orthodox Philoſopher of him, that there was no ground to raiſe ſo many objections againſt him, and that he is only to blame for taking great pains to perplex a doctrine which every body knew, and to forge a new ſyſtem built only upon the ambiguity of a word. If you ſay, that he believed that the ſubſtance of God is the ſubject of inherency of matter, and of all the varieties of extenſion and of thought, in the ſame ſenſe as Des Cartes ſays that extenſion is the ſubject of inherency of motion, and the ſoul of man the ſubject of inherency of ſenſations and paſſions, you grant all that I deſire: It is in this ſenſe I underſtood Spinoza, and all my objections are grounded upon it.

The reſult of what has been ſaid, is a queſtion of fact concerning the true ſenſe of the word modification in the ſyſtem of Spinoza. Muſt it be taken for the ſame thing, that is commonly called created ſubſtance, or muſt it be taken in the ſenſe it has in the ſyſtem of Des Cartes? I believe the laſt ſenſe is the right; for in the other ſenſe, Spinoza would have acknowledged ſome creatures diſtinct from the Divine Subſtance, and made either of nothing, or of a matter diſtinct from God. But it were an eaſy thing to prove by a great many paſſages of his books, that he admits neither of thoſe two things. Extenſion, according to him, is an attribute of God; from whence it follows, that God is eſſentially, eternally, and neceſſarily, an extended ſubſtance, and that extenſion belongs to him as much as exiſtence. The reſult of which is, that the particular varieties of extenſion, which make the ſun, the earth, trees, the bodies of brutes, the bodies of men, &c. are in God, as the School-Philoſophers ſuppoſe they are in the materia prima, or firſt matter. But if thoſe Philoſophers ſuppoſed that the firſt matter is a ſimple and one only ſubſtance, they would conclude that the ſun and the earth are really the ſame ſubſtance. And therefore Spinoza muſt needs draw the ſame concluſion. If he does not ſay that the ſun is compoſed of God's extenſion, he muſt acknowledge that the extenſion of the ſun was made out of nothing; but he denies creation; and therefore he muſt ſay that the ſubſtance of God is the material cauſe of the ſun, is what compoſes the ſun, ſubjectum ex quo, and conſequently that the ſun is not diſtinct from God (170); but God himſelf, God entirely, ſince, according to his notion, God is not a Being compoſed of parts.

Let us ſuppoſe for a moment, that a maſs of gold has the power to convert itſelf into plates, diſhes, candleſticks, porrengers, &c. it will not be diſtinct from thoſe plates, and diſhes; and if it be further ſuppoſed, that this maſs is ſimple and not made up of parts, it muſt certainly be entire in each plate, and in each candleſtick; for if it was not entire in each of them, it would have divided itſelf into ſeveral pieces, and therefore it would be compoſed of parts, which is contrary to the ſuppoſition. Theſe reciprocal and convertible propoſitions would then be true, the candleſtick is the maſs of gold, the maſs of gold is the candleſtick. The candleſtick is the whole maſs of gold, the whole maſs of gold is the candleſtick. This is an image of the God of Spinoza: He has the power to convert or to modify himſelf into an earth, a moon, a ſea, a tree, &c. and he is abſolutely one, and without any compoſition of parts; and therefore it may be affirmed that the earth is God, that the moon is God; that the earth is God entire, that the moon is ſo too; that God is the earth, that God is the moon; that God entire is the earth, that God entire is the moon.

There can be but three ways, according to which, the modifications of Spinoza are in God: but none of thoſe ways is what the other Philoſophers ſay of the created ſubſtance. It is in God, ſay they, as in its efficient and tranſitive cauſe; and conſequently it is really and wholly diſtinct from God. But according to Spinoza, the creatures are in God, either as an effect in its material cauſe, or as an accident in its ſubject of inheſion, or as the form of a candleſtick in the pewter it is made of. The ſun, the moon, the trees, as they are things that have three dimenſions, are in God as in the material cauſe of which their extenſion is compoſed; and therefore there is an Identity between God and the ſun, &c. The ſame trees, as they have a form, whereby they are diſtinguiſhed from a ſtone, are in God, as the form of a candleſtick is in pewter. To be a candleſtick is only a manner of being of the pewter. The motion of bodies, and the thoughts of men, are in God, as the accidents of the Peripatetics are in the created ſubſtance; they are entities inherent in their ſubject, which are not compoſed of it, and which make no part of it. See the margin (171).

---

(168) Note, that the Carteſian Divines explain God's immenſity in another manner.

(169) Ἐν αὐτῷ γὰρ ζώμεν, καὶ κινούμεθα, καὶ ἐσμέν. In ipſo enim vivimus, & movemur, & ſumus. Act. Apoſtol. ch. xvii, ver. 28.

(170) Matter, as Ariſtotle ſays, Phyſic. lib. i, cap. ix, remains in the effect it produces, λέγω γὰρ ὕλην τὸ πρῶτον ὑποκείμενον ἑκάστῳ, ἐξ οὗ γίνεταί τι ἐνυπάρχοντος. Dico enim materiam quod rei cujuſque ſubjectum eſt primum ex quo inexiſtente fit aliquid.

(171) Obſerve this difference, that the accidents of the Peripatetics are really diſtinct from their ſubject of inheſion, and that Spinoza cannot ſay ſo of the modifications of the Divine ſubſtance; for if they were diſtinct from it, without being compoſed of it, they would be made out of nothing. Spinoza would own it: he would not cavil about it, as the Peripatetics do, when they are told that accidents would be created, if they were diſtinct from the ſubſtance. See Journ. de Trev. June 1702, pag. 480, edition of Amſterdam.

in all appearance the word modification. But whatever ſignification he takes it in, he cannot avoid being confounded, as may be ſeen in a remark of this article (a). Thoſe who will carefully examine the objections I have propoſed, will eaſily perceive that I have taken the word modification in the ſenſe it ought to have, and that the conſequences I have drawn, and the principles I have laid down to confute thoſe conſequences, do perfectly agree with the rules of reaſoning. I do not know whether it be neceſſary to obſerve, that the ſide which I attack, and which always appeared to me very weak, is that which the Spinoziſts take the leaſt care to defend [EE]. I ſhall conclude with this obſervation, that ſeveral perſons have aſſured me that his doctrine, even conſidered without a relation to religion, appears very contemptible to the greateſt Mathematicians of our days (b). This may be eaſily believed, if theſe two things be conſidered: firſt, that no man ought to be more fully perſuaded of the multiplicity of ſubſtances, than thoſe, who apply themſelves to the conſideration of extenſion; ſecondly, that moſt of thoſe gentlemen admit a vacuum. But there is nothing more contrary to Spinoza's hypotheſis, than to aſſert that all bodies do not touch one another; and there never were two ſyſtems more oppoſite than his and that of the Atomiſts. He agrees with Epicurus in rejecting Providence, but in all other things their ſyſtems are like fire and water.

I have juſt now been reading a letter (c) where it is ſaid that he lived for ſome time in the city of Ulm, that the magiſtrates made him depart from thence, becauſe he there diſperſed his pernicious doctrine, and becauſe it was there alſo that he began to write his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. I very much queſtion all this. The author of the letter adds that his father, whilſt he continued a Proteſtant, was Spinoſa's great friend, and that it was chiefly by his means that excellent genius renounced the ſect of the Jews.

I am not ignorant, that an apologiſt of Spinoza (172) maintains that this Philoſopher does not aſcribe a material extenſion to GOD, but only an intelligible extenſion, and ſuch as falls not under our imagination. But if the extenſion of the bodies we ſee and imagine, is not the extenſion of GOD, whence comes it? How has it been made? If it has been produced out of nothing, Spinoza is an orthodox man, his new ſyſtem ſignifies nothing. If it has been produced out of the intelligible extenſion of GOD, it is ſtill a true creation; for the intelligible extenſion being but an idea, and not having really the three dimenſions, cannot form the matter of the extenſion, which formally exiſts out of the underſtanding. Beſides, if we diſtinguiſh two ſorts of extenſion, one intelligible belonging to GOD, the other imaginable belonging to matter, we muſt alſo admit two ſubjects of thoſe extenſions diſtinct one from another; and then the unity of ſubſtance will be deſtroyed, and the whole ſtructure of Spinoza falls to the ground. We may therefore ſay, that his apologiſt does not reſolve the difficulty, and raiſes greater ones.

The Spinoziſts may take advantage of the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation; for if they conſult the writings of the Spaniſh ſchool-men, they will find many ſubtilties to anſwer ſomething to the arguments of thoſe, who ſay, that one and the ſame man cannot be a Mahometan in Turky, and a Chriſtian in France, ſick at Rome, and well at Vienna; but perhaps they will at laſt find themſelves obliged to compare their ſyſtem with the myſtery of the Trinity, to clear themſelves from the contradictions that are objected to them. If they do not ſay that the modifications of the divine ſubſtance, Plato, Ariſtotle, that horſe, that ape, this tree, this ſtone, are as many perſonalities, which tho' identified with the ſame ſubſtance, may be, each of them a particular and determined principle, and diſtinct from the other modifications; they will never be able to anſwer the objection grounded upon their overthrowing this principle, Two contradictory terms cannot belong to the ſame ſubject at the ſame time. Perhaps they will ſay ſome time or other, that as the three perſons of the Trinity, without being diſtinct from the divine ſubſtance, as Divines teach, and without having any abſolute attribute that is not the ſame in number in each of them, have nevertheleſs each of them ſome properties that may be denied of the others; ſo Spinoza may have admitted in the divine ſubſtance an infinite number of modalities or perſonalties, one of which does a thing, which the others do not. This will not be a true contradiction, ſince Divines acknowledge a virtual diſtinction, in ordine ad ſuſcipienda duo prædicata contradictoria, with reſpect to the ſuſceptibility of two terms that contradict one another. But, as the ſubtle Arriaga judiciouſly obſerves, ſpeaking of Metaphyſical degrees (173), which ſome will have to be ſuſceptible of two contradictory oppoſitions, that would be entirely to deſtroy Philoſophy, to transfer to natural things what Revelation teaches us concerning the nature of GOD; for it would make way to prove that there is no real diſtinction between the creatures (174). Dices quartò, dari diſtinctionem virtualem inter animalitatem, & rationalitatem, æquivalentem reali, quatenus, etiamſi à parte rei ſint idem, una tamen poteſt terminare cognitionem, altera verò non, quod eſt æquivalere duabus rebus diſtinctis; ſicut, licet eſſentia divina ſit idem realiter cum Paternitate, tamen eſſentiæ convenit communicari tribus perſonis, Paternitati verò non convenit ea communicatio. Reſpondeo . . . . . explicare res creatas per hoc adeò difficile exemplum, eſt res faciles per difficillimas intelligere, præterquam quòd, ſi ex divinis liceret argumentari ad creata, etiam poſſet inferri, animalitatem poſſe produci, quin producatur rationalitas. . . . . . (175) Imò etiam poſſet inferri res omnes creatas eſſe idem realiter inter ſe, & virtualiter, ſolùm diſtinctas, & quando una illarum perit, altera producitur, una movetur, altera quieſcit, id fieri ſecundùm diverſas formalitates ejuſdem entitatis. . . . . Cùm ergo Deus ex una parte propter ſuam infinitatem neceſſariò careat compoſitione phyſica, & ex alia parte non poſſit natura divina eſſe multiplex, ſed unica tantum in tribus perſonis, quæ omnia non poſſunt intelligi ſine virtuali diſtinctione in ordine ad ea duo prædicata contradictoria, non licet ponere in creaturis ſimilem diſtinctionem, cùm neque creaturarum perfectio, neque ulla ratio efficax poſſit eſſe ad illam ponendam: imo potiùs (ut jam dixi) ſi ſemel poneretur, non eſſet ullum fundamentum ad diſtinguendas inter ſe realiter creaturas; & conſequenter deſtrueretur tota Philoſophia. How much are we beholden to Spinoza! He deprives us as much as in him lies, of the moſt neceſſary of all principles; for if it was not certain that one and the ſame thing cannot be at the ſame time, ſuch as it is, and not ſuch as it is, all our meditations and reaſonings would be inſignificant. See what Averroës ſaid (176).

[EE] The ſide which I attack . . . . . is that which the Spinoziſts take the leaſt care to defend.] I have attacked Spinoza's ſuppoſition, that extenſion is not a compounded Being, but one numerical ſubſtance; and I have pitched upon that part of his ſyſtem, becauſe I knew the Spinoziſts ſay the difficulties do not lie in that. They think they are much more perplexed, when they are aſked how thought and extenſion can be united in one and the ſame ſubſtance. There is ſomething odd in this; for if it be certain, according to our ideas, that thought and extenſion have no affinity one with another, it is ſtill more evident that extenſion conſiſts of parts really diſtinct one from another; and yet they are more ſenſible of the firſt difficulty than of the ſecond, and call the latter a trifle if compared

(a) The remark [DD].

(b) They have named to me among others, Meſſieurs Huygens, Leibniz, Newton, Bernoulli, & Fatio.

(c) It is inſerted in the Mercure Galant, for the month of September 1702, and was written by an officer in the army of the Elector of Bavaria. That officer ſays, that he will ſpeedily give in medals, the Hiſtory of the Ottoman Empire, from it's foundation, that it is a work wherein he has laboured two and twenty years, and that he will have it printed at Geneva. He alſo ſays that he deſigns to tranſlate Quintus Curtius, into the Turkiſh language, which he has been deſired to do by ſome perſons at Adrianople.

(172) Kuffelaer, Specim. Artis ratiocinandi, pag. 222. Note, that he is very angry with Blyenburg, who ſaid that Spinoza aſcribed a material extenſion to God. Note alſo, that pag. 230, & ſeq. He confutes one Adrian Verwer, who had ſaid ſomething againſt the ſyſtem of Spinoza.

(173) So they call the attributes ens, ſubſtantia, corpus, vivens, animal, rationalis, which conſtitute the nature of a man. It is agreed that they are not diſtinct one from another, but that they really are one and the ſame entity.

(174) Arriaga, Diſput. V Logica, §. ii, num. 29, pag. m. 83.

(175) Id. ibid. pag. 84.

(176) Quo fit ut merito dicat Averrois hoc loco ſine hoc pronunciato non modo poſſibile non eſſe philoſophari, ſed ne diſputare quidem aut ratiocinari. Fonſeca in Mtaphyſ. Ariſtotel. lib. iv, cap. iii, pag. m. 655.

pared with the other. I thought therefore it was neceſſary to give them occaſion to argue thus: if that ſide of our ſyſtem can hardly be defended, which we took to be proof againſt all attacks, how ſhall we defend the weak ſides of it?

SPON (CHARLES) a Phyſician of Lyons. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (a).

SPON (JACOB) a Phyſician of Lyons, and an Antiquarian, ſon of the foregoing. See the ſame Nouvelles (a).

SPONDANUS (JOHN DE) ſon of a counſeller and ſecretary of Joan of Albret Queen of Navarre, was born at Mauleon de Soule in the country of Biſcay in the year 1557 (a). He made ſo ſpeedy a progreſs in the Belles Lettres, that he undertook to comment on Homer's Iliad and Odyſſey, when he was twenty years of age [A]. He enjoyed conſiderable poſts, that of Lieutenant-General to the Preſidial of Rochelle, and afterwards that of Maſter of the Requeſts to King Henry the IVth. He abjured the Reformed Religion in the year 1593, and immediately after publiſhed the declaration of his motives to that change [B]. A great many ſlanders were ſpread about againſt him [C]. He left the court a little after he had forſaken the Proteſtants, and hid himſelf among the mountains of Biſcay. There he undertook to write a book of controverſy, but,

[A] He made ſo ſpeedy a progreſs: . . . that he undertook to comment on the Iliad and Odyſſey, when he was twenty years of age.] This is what Frizonius obſerves; he adds, that Spondanus was the firſt who publiſhed ſuch a commentary in Latin, ‘Joannes Spondanus ſummo à naturâ inſtructus ingenio vir literatiſſimus, qui annos natus viginti Iliadem & Odyſſeam Homeri . . . Latine PRIMUS MORTALIUM commentatus (1). - - - John Spondanus, a man of great genius and learning, was the firſt who ever commented in Latin on the Iliad and Odyſſey of Homer, at twenty years of age’. If by this he meant, that when Spondanus was twenty years of age, he publiſhed that commentary, it would be a miſtake, for the firſt edition was publiſhed at Baſil in the year 1583, in folio. He dated the Epiſtle Dedicatory at Baſil the twelfth of June in the ſame year. He had taken care of that edition himſelf (2), and was then twenty-ſix years old, but we may believe that he was only twenty when he began that work. He dedicated it to his Mecænas the King of Navarre, who was afterwards King of France. The ſecond edition was alſo dedicated to that Prince by Sebaſtian Henric Petri, Bookſeller at Baſil in the year 1606. Florimond de Remond cannot be ſo eaſily excuſed as Frizonius, ſince he ſays that Spondanus publiſhed his Commentary on Homer when he was nineteen years of age. Here are his words, In order to finiſh his work, he retired to the fartheſt extremity of this kingdom, to the mountains of Biſcay, the place of his birth. There, amidſt deſarts and ſolitudes, moved by the incredible zeal which he had, to bring back to the way of ſalvation thoſe whom he had left in the paths of perdition, he undertook to anſwer a book which Theod. Beza had juſt publiſhed (as his maſterpiece) concerning the Marks of the Church. For that purpoſe he employed the moſt ſerious hours of three or four months, beſtowing the reſt, as it were for his amuſement, in finiſhing his tranſlation of Seneca, which will ſoon be publiſhed, and in reviſing his Heſiod and Homer, whom that rare genius had commented upon and publiſhed, when he was nineteen years of age (3). Mr Moreri juſtly ſays that Spondanus's Commentaries on Homer are not eſteemed (4). The author whom he quotes ſpeaks of them with contempt; Notæ nullius momenti, quaſque Caſaubonus futiles vocavit (5). Notes of no importance, and ſuch as Caſaubon called trifling. Notwithſtanding we may admire how ſo young an author acquired the learning which appears in that commentary.

Let us note, that in the year 1583 he publiſhed at Baſil in 8*vo.* Ariſtotle's Logic in Greek and Latin with marginal notes. The Greek text was corrected in ſome places, and the Latin Verſion joined with it was new (6).

[B] Immediately after he publiſhed the declaration of his motives to that change.] He ſays in his Epiſtle Dedicatory to Henry the IV, that though he had imitated that prince in changing his religion, yet that example was not his motive: he acquaints us in his preface that he retired from the court, before his book was printed, that having put it in the hands of the Printer of Melun, he was obliged to go to his own country, on account of his father's death, and in order to place his affairs on a better footing. During that time adds he, I have heard the reports which went concerning me. Some were ſorry for me; becauſe I loſt myſelf ſo unreaſonably, and withdrew from my advancement near the King's perſon. Others laughed at me, as if my boaſted converſion had only procured me a ſhameful retreat . . . . They afflicted me moſt, who publiſhed that I was going again to change, and to reſume my former errors, that the Sorbonne of Paris had cauſed my declaration to be burnt, becauſe ſaid they, it contained ſeveral Mahometan impieties; and all the mountains reſounded with this report. For my part, I know that the moſt conſiderable Doctors of that faculty had ſeen it, and approved it under their hand. However, I was very deſirous to find a copy of it, that I might more clearly prove this report to be falſe (7). At laſt he recovered one, he reviſed the work, and gave it to be printed. The Antwerp edition of it by Arnault Coninx 1595 in 8*vo*, is that which I have uſed. I have not ſeen that of the year 1597 (8). Florimond de Remond is not exact, when he affirms that Spondanus, after he had publiſhed the reaſons of his happy converſion . . . . took the reſolution to leave the court (9).

[C] A great many ſlanders were ſpread about againſt him.] You need only ſee the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Confeſſion of Sanci, and the notes added to it in the Amſterdam edition 1699: but as the book I am going to quote is much more ſcarce than that I have juſt mentioned, I ſhall give a long paſſage of it. ‘His death, which was ſo happy and ſo peaceable, could not eſcape the malice of thoſe, who, bearing his converſion impatiently, have dared to publiſh that he died in a miſerable and deſperate condition, and that his death, which followed his converſion, was the ſentence of his condemnation, and a judgment of GOD upon him. This is entring very far into the ſecrets of the council of GOD . . . . It is truly a judgment of GOD, not upon Spondanus, but upon us. For it is a great ſign of the wrath of GOD, when he takes off thoſe who are uſeful and neceſſary to us, and who may promote the good and profit of the publick. And perhaps it was a particular providence of heaven which called him from among us, before he was encompaſſed with the torrents of abuſe, which gathered on all hands to pour upon him. For let a man be ever ſo well armed with confidence; calumny will often ſtrike home, and even innocence trembles at the approach of that monſter, which Apelles repreſented in ſo lively a manner to the ſhame of the calumniator Antiphilus. While he lived a Catholic, he looked on all theſe ſlanders with contempt: now he is in heaven, he pities and compaſſionates thoſe who are the authors of them. I remember that one day when ſome perſon had ſhewn him on purpoſe the defamatory letters which were written againſt him: truly, ſaid he, ſmiling, the author of them ſays not enough, if you conſider his cuſtom, but indeed too much, if you conſider my innocence. It is his temper to revile with animoſity, and it is mine to bear it with patience. Let him attack me, like an Huguenot, with but wanting ſeveral helps, he removed to Bourdeaux, where he applied himſelf, with all his might, to compoſe that work (b), though the bad ſtate of his health ſhould have induced him to interrupt his labour. He died before he had finiſhed it, on the eighteenth of March 1595. He was buried at Bourdeaux in the Cathedral Church of

---

(a) For July 1684, Art. V.

(a) For February 1686, Art. IX.

(a) Petrus Frizonius in Vita Henrici Spondani, initio.

(1) Petrus Frizonius in Vita Henrici Spondani, initio.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 3, cap. v.

(3) Florimond de Remond (or Ræmound, as he calls himſelf before his preface) Préface de la Reponſe du Sr. de Sponde au Traicte des Marques de l'Egliſe.

(4) Moreri knew not that he was brother to Henry Spondanus, Biſhop of Pamiers.

(5) Bibliogr. Hiſtoric. Philologica-Curioſa, folio D.

(6) See the Epitome of Geſner's Biblioth. pag. 498.

(7) Jean de Sponde, preface to his Declaration, pag. m. 7, 8.

(8) The author of the Notes on the Confeſſion of Sanci, ſpeaks of it, pag. 18, in the edition of 1699.

(9) Florimond de Remond, Preface, ubi ſupra.

St Andrew

'with abuſe, and I will defend myſelf, like a 'Catholic, with modeſty (10)'.

REFLEXIONS on the ſlanders publiſhed againſt thoſe who change their religion.

There is a great miſtake in theſe laſt words; for they ſuppoſe that the ſpirit of modeſty was peculiar to the Roman Catholics, and the ſpirit of ſatire to the Proteſtants. We muſt own that on both ſides there prevailed a cruel cuſtom of loading with infamy thoſe who changed their Religion, and of employing all manner of abuſe for that purpoſe (11). Their whole life was ſifted, even back to their infancy; all the ſins of their youth were brought together, every part of their behaviour was pried into; looſe reports, facts which might be true, and ſuch as could admit of a bad conſtruction were all aſſembled and blended together, when minds full of ſuſpicion and diſtruſt examined them without mercy: and an infinite number of ſatires compoſed after this manner were dealt about in the world. We need not aſk cui bono, to what purpoſe. For it is manifeſt enough that both ſides propoſed two or three conſiderable advantages by this proceeding. They hoped that the conduct of deſerters would give no ſcandal, provided they repreſented theſe deſerters as perſons who had ſold themſelves to iniquity, and were void both of honour and conſcience. By this they would prevent its being believed, that the uncertainty of the doctrines which they maintained, and the reaſons alledged by the other ſide had prevailed with thoſe deſerters to abjure their religion. They would leſſen the triumph of their adverſaries, by maintaining that they had only gained proſelytes who were ruined and infamous in their character. In ſhort, by expoſing to infamy thoſe who had revolted, they propoſed to raiſe a greater horror againſt revolting; and to frighten any who ſhould think of apoſtatizing: it being probable that thoſe who were afraid of ſatire, would not dare to lay themſelves open to it by changing their Religion, when ſo many formidable examples might teach them that their party would fully execute this threatning.

> Quid me commorit (melius non tangere clamo)
> Flebit & inſignis tota cantabitur urbe (12).
>
> For if he does, he ſhall repent the wrong:
> The warning's fair, his vices ſhall be ſhewn,
> And life expos'd to all the cens'ring town.
>
> Creech.

But if the advantage was viſible in thoſe reſpects, the loſs was not leſs viſible on other accounts; and thus it is ſurpriſing that the foreſight of the bad conſequences of this reſentment, did not temper it. Nothing could harden the adverſe party in their errors more than the laſh of theſe perſonal ſatires. Each ſide imagines that the followers of the other are ſlaves to a blind prejudice, and a paſſionate obſtinacy. And does not each confirm the other in ſuch an opinion, when they blacken the character of the man who has left them, and employ againſt him, not a modeſt, a civil, and charitable anſwer to the motives which he publiſhes, but a violent anſwer, and perſonal defaming invectives. That ſide which has won a proſelyte gives no credit to the ſtories publiſhed by the ſide which he has left; but looks upon them as baſe calumnies, and thus they perſuade themſelves more and more, that nothing prevails on the other ſide but paſſion and obſtinacy, without the leaſt mixture of an evangelical temper. Surely to perſecute a convert with libels, is the way to alienate him wholly. Perhaps he would have returned into the pale of the Church, had he been calmly and civilly admoniſhed of his fault: his return would have been a triumph which might have been advantageouſly oppoſed to the victory which their enemies boaſted of. But that advantage is loſt, if they irritate this weak brother. He cannot but be very ſenſible of his innocence with regard to ſome points in the ſatires which defame him (13). From thence forward he conceives a bad opinion of his antient brethren, and of the motive by which they act. If the truths which they divulge make him uneaſy, the lies ſerve not a little to make him more ſo: he contracts a hatred againſt their perſons, which diſpoſes him to hate their opinions; ſo that he who was at firſt only an outward convert, now becomes one inwardly. Anger produces this effect. It is probable that Spondanus, poſſeſſed with this paſſion, by reaſon of the terrible calumnies which were ſpread about againſt him, baniſhed every idea which might recommend to him his former religion. He grew a ſtanch Catholic out of a reſentment againſt the Proteſtants (14). Du Perron's diſcourſes could not ſo much confirm him in the Romiſh Religion as his own reſentment.

It will be in vain to object to me in the words of the Pſalmiſt, Imple faciem eorum ignominia, quærent nomen tuum Domine, --- Lord cover their face with reproach, and they will ſeek thy name (15): I will anſwer, that when we make this prayer, we ought to leave the iſſue of it to Providence, and not aſſign it to the pens of ſatirical writers. They are very unfit perſons to bring back into the way of truth, thoſe whom they defame for having turned aſide from it. They have not well underſtood that an evangelical ſpirit is a fire which ought to enlighten and warm, but not to burn, calcinate, and ſtigmatize. We muſt ſay the ſame thing of this fire, that a Spaniſh author ſaid of the fire of virtuous love, Arde y no quema; alumbra y no danna; quema y no conſume, reſplende y no laſtima, purifica y no abraſa; y aun calienta y no congoxa (16).---- It glows, but ſcorches not; it enlightens, but hurts not; it burns, but conſumes not; it glitters, but dazzles not; it refines, without deſtroying; and though it be hot, yet it is not painful.

As to the profit which may ariſe from the art of being formidable by ſatire, it is a diſputable point. I would not deny that when people obſerve that their failings are ſupported, while they appear zealous for their religion, but that, if they leave it, theſe failings will furniſh matter for defamatory libels, they may be reſtrained from abjuring, by the fear of ſlander. A Satiriſt may ſtrike with terror thoſe who are not conſcious of their innocence.

> Enſe velut ſtricto, quoties Lucillius ardens
> Infremuit, rubet auditor cui frigida mens eſt
> Criminibus, tacita ſudant præcordia culpa (17).
>
> But when Lucillius brandiſhes his pen,
> And flaſhes in the face of guilty men,
> A cold ſweat ſtands in drops on every part.
> And pain and anguiſh ſeize the vitious heart.

He may even alarm the mind of a good man, who is deſirous of an honeſt fame. We know too well the power of calumny. The teſtimony of a good conſcience does not ſecure us againſt the credulity of mankind. But after all, is it not a conſiderable advantage to keep weak members within the pale of the Church; and ſhould we not imagine that the fear of ſlander will be but a weak barrier to thoſe whom other paſſions animate to revolt, and who may depend upon being cordially received by the oppoſite party, and on being reputed by them as virtuous perſons, and undeſervedly caluminated (18). The change of Religion is a marvellous waſh in the eye of converters. They may be ſaid to claim the right of promiſing what God promiſes in the Bible: Though your ſins be as ſcarlet, they ſhall be as white as ſnow; though they be red like crimſon, they ſhall be as wool (19). Note, that in order to weaken the ſtrength of ſatires, the adverſe party made them paſs for an artifice, and at laſt pretended that this mine having taken air, had no effect. Let us quote a modern author.

'This declamation . . . . . . is not more ſerviceable 'to this author's (20) deſign, which is to blacken the 'reputation of all thoſe who are converted, to the 'end, that the fear of being ranked among defamed 'perſons might hinder others from turning Catholics. 'I own that when the Proteſtant party bethought 'themſelves of this ſtratagem, ſome people at firſt 'were ſimple enough to be deceived by it, and to be 'kept in their errors for fear of loſing their reputation. But that artifice is become entirely uſeleſs, 'becauſe

---

(b) See the remark [D].

(10) Idem.

(11) Compare with this the remark of the article WEIDNERUS.

(12) Horace, Sat. I, lib. ii, ver. 45.

(13) They contain hearſays, conjectures, and the additions of Tale-tellers, &c.

(14) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, September 1686, p. 1096.

(15) See the ſame Nouvelles, February 1685, Art. II, p. 151, of the ſecond edition.

(16) Guevarra. See the preface of Scuderi, before the Poem of Alaric.

(17) Juven. Sat. I, ver. 165.

(18) See remark [M], of the article CAYET, at the end, and the words of Mr Daillé to Father Adam: As ſoon as that man (Mr Cottiby) whom you have for ſome years continually blackened with the baſeſt crimes, preſented himſelf to you, he was cordially received. In a moment he is become whiter than the ſnow. Daillé, Replique au Pere Adam, Part. iii.

(19) Iſaiah i. 18.

(20) That is Mr Jurieu.

St Andrew and his book of Controverſy was publiſhed imperfect [D]. There was ſubjoined to it a ſmall book, intituled Tumulus Joannis Spondani, from whence I have taken ſome of the particulars which I have juſt mentioned. That author declares (c) that Spondanus paſſed his days, with great fatigue and miſery, both in his ſtudies, and in all his other public and private occupations; and (d) that his impriſonment at Orleans was the fourth which GOD had ſent him during the Civil Wars. He was elder brother to HENRY SPONDANUS, who has continued the annals of Baronius.

(c) Jean de Sponde, Declaration des Motifs, &c. pag. m. 25.

(d) Id. ibid. pag. 28.

'becauſe all the world knows at this time that reaſonable people, whether they be Catholics or Proteſtants, give no longer any credit to calumnies of this nature, ſince they have become general, and ſpare no body. Every body knows that he who returns to the Catholic religion thereby loſes with the Proteſtants the character of a good man, and is as much deſpiſed by them as he was formerly valued (21). So that they who declaim on this head have the misfortune of being minded by no body, and of having loſt their time in whetting ſatirical weapons which wound no body, and return upon themſelves (22).'

There was ſomething very odd in the affair we ſpeak of; for before a man abjured his religion, he met with marks of eſteem from his own party, and was defamed by the other; but whenever he had abjured, things took another turn. He was ſatiriſed by his antient brethren, and extolled by his new ones. Father Adam reproached the Proteſtants with this conduct, with regard to the late Miniſter Cottiby; but Mr Daillé very well returned the charge (23): he ſhewed him that the Catholics who had defamed the Miniſter Cottiby by ſongs and printed books (24), beſtowed great encomiums on him after his converſion.

Mr Brueys has made an obſervation which has a relation to that of Father Adam. 'I will not juſtify myſelf in this place, ſays he (25), againſt what one of theſe authors charges me with, viz. that I have ſpent all my life in gaming and debauchery, that I have no piety, and hardly any religion. I know that the Proteſtants have not always had ſuch thoughts of me; at leaſt, they had not when all the Miniſters of Montpelier did me the honour frequently to paſs whole days in my houſe, both in town and in the country; when the Proteſtants of Languedoc truſted me with their moſt ſecret and moſt important affairs; when they deputed me to Toulouſe, and to their ſynods; and, in ſhort, when they cauſed the book which, when I was of their party, I compoſed in defence of their religion, to be tranſlated and printed at Geneva, at Saumur, and Amſterdam.'

The late Capuchin, Father Baſile, who having turned Proteſtant, was defamed by the Catholics (26), defended himſelf among other means, by the eſteem which had been always paid him in his order. See his Menteur confondu, printed at Sedan in the year 1639.

[D] His book of Controverſy was publiſhed imperfect.] It is intituled, Reſponſe au Traicté des Marques de l'Egliſe faict par Th. de Beze. It contains 317 pages in 8*vo*, and was printed at Bourdeaux by Simon Millanges in the year 1595, by the care of Florimond de Remond, who prefixed a preface to it, out of which I have already given ſome paſſages. Here are a few more; hardly had the author arrived at the middle of his work, 'when he found that he wanted ſeveral good books which were neceſſary to him. To have theſe books, and to converſe with the learned, for he had there no converſation but with himſelf, he came to this town of Bourdeaux. As he laboured day and night with a marvellous ardor, and more than his health allowed. (For he had a weak and crazy body, but a ſtrong and vigorous mind) the length of his watching, his aſſiduous bent upon books amidſt the rigour and unuſual ſeverities of laſt winter, impaired his health; yet for all that he did not give over his undertaking. And when his friends told him the prejudice he did himſelf, by thus conſtantly poring upon books, and in a cold and rugged ſtudy, without giving any reſpite either to his body, or his mind; I muſt make haſte, ſaid he, for I forſee that the evening approaches, and that I muſt ſoon depart from my ſtation. If I die, it will be honourably, with ſword in hand, as a brave Chriſtian champion ought to die. In ſhort, his indiſpoſition and his diſeaſe increaſing with his labour, he was ſeized with a pleuriſy, which ſoon conquered his weak and emaciated body .... His diſeaſe..... laſted only nine days'. Towards the end of the preface we find the following words. 'Now reader, here thou haſt his book: a book imperfect indeed, but which, however, ſhews the perfection of its writer. It is a great pity that it was not compleated: and that what we have of it is not fully corrected, ſince it is only the plan of his firſt conceptions, which promiſed that the work would be divided into three books, and contain a ſeries of arguments ſtronger and in a better order: to ſay nothing of the ſtile, which is the laſt thing that is poliſhed in a book. GOD knows whether Spondanus was ill furniſhed with ſtile, for the embelliſhing what he had undertaken, he who ſeemed accompliſhed with all the ornaments of a perfect eloquence, as his writings teſtify, and who had a marvellous facility in giving a lively picture of his conceptions, ſo that hardly were there three words daſhed out in three leaves of this work. I believe that in this reſpect he was inimitable. His capacity would have fully diſcovered itſelf in the book intituled l'Idée des Religions, which he deſigned to write; but death interrupted that, and ſeveral others of his projects for the defence of the Church (27).'

(21) You will ſee in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Auguſt 1689, pag. 879, that he has changed ſomething in that reflexion. See alſo Cottiby's Reply, pag. 209, 210, and what Mr Daillé anſwers him in chap. xxii, of Part. ii.

(22) Brueys, Réfutation des Réponſes faites à ſon Examen, pag. 299, 300, Dutch edition 1686.

(23) Daillé, Réponſe à Adam & Cottiby, Part. iii, ch. iv, vi, vii.

(24) Idem. pag. 144, 145.

(25) Brueys Refutation, &c. pag. 312.

(26) See Father Veron, in the book intituled l'Apoſtat vicieux.

(27) Florimond de Remond, Préface de la Reſponſe de Sponde au Traité des Marques de l'Egliſe.

STANCARUS (FRANCIS) a native of Mantua, lived in the XVIth century. He was one of thoſe, whoſe endeavours to eſtabliſh the Reformed Religion in Poland proved moſt ſucceſsful. He had been called to Cracow [A], to teach the Hebrew tongue (a); but when it was obſerved that he inſinuated the doctrines of the Proteſtants in his lectures, he was complained of to the Biſhop of Cracow (b), who had procured him that place; the Biſhop being informed that he was a Heretic, had him impriſoned (c). He was releaſed by the addreſs or intereſt of ſome lords, and found a good place of refuge in the houſe of Nicolas Oleſnicki (d), a gentleman, whoſe quality, merit, and courage, conſpired to make him conſiderable (e). He propoſed to him to put an end to the Romiſh worſhip, and to throw down the images; but Oleſnicki having conſulted

(a) Lætus, Compend. Hiſt. Univerſ. pag. m. 389.

(b) His name was Samuel Maciejowſki.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) Staniſlaus Lubieniecius, Hiſt. Reform. Polonicæ, lib. i, cap. v, pag. 31.

(e) Id. ibib. pag. 32.

[A] He had been called to Cracow.] John Lætus affirms that the Biſhop of Cracow himſelf called him thither to be profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue. A Maciejovio Epiſcopo Cracovienſi: evocatus erat ut linguam S. Cracoviæ doceret (1). But others (2) ſay, that having been expelled from Italy as an Heretic, and not being able to ſettle in Germany, he went into Poland, where he was permitted to teach Hebrew in the college of Cracow, becauſe they knew not what he was; they only knew that he underſtood that language. Thoſe, who ſay this, being both his enemies, and the Biſhop of Cracow's friends, may have omitted ſome circumſtances. However, I believe that biſhop did not ſend for him out of Italy, and that he knew nothing of his being qualified to teach Hebrew, till he ſaw him in Poland. See the remark [N].

[B] Oleſnicki

(1) Jo. Lætus Compend. Hiſt. Univ. pag. m. 389.

(2) Staniſlaus Orichovius, in Chimæra, fol. 4, & 23.

conſulted his friends, did not think it proper to be ſo haſty [B], and was contented to have the Sacrament adminiſtred in his caſtle with ſuch ceremonies as Stancarus ſhould think fit to appoint. Some time after, the firſt deſign of that Reformer was put in execution; the Monks, who officiated in the church of that place, were expelled, and the images were broke, and burnt to aſhes (f). Oleſnicki founded a Reformed Church at Pinczovia in the year 1550, whither he called ſeveral perſons illuſtrious for their piety and learning (g). Stancarus ſet up there a noble ſchool (h), and drew up fifty rules of Reformation for the Churches of Poland [C]. He was ſent into Pruſſia ſome time after, and was Hebrew profeſſor for a year at Koningſberg (i). There aroſe violent quarrels between him and Oſiander, the conſequences whereof proved fatal for orthodoxy. Oſiander taught that man is juſtified by the eſſential righteouſneſs of GOD, and that JESUS CHRIST is our righteouſneſs according to his divine nature. Stancarus being too eager to contradict, and departing from that error with too great a vehemence, run into the oppoſite extreme; for he maintained that JESUS CHRIST is our Mediator only according to his humane nature (k). It is ſaid that he learned this doctrine from Peter Lombard, an author whom he much admired [D]. He attempted to eſtabliſh it in Poland, but he met with ſome obſtacles which he could not overcome. It

[B] Oleſnicki . . . . did not think it proper to be ſo haſty.] A Roman Catholic gives the following account of it. ‘ Cæpit errorem (Stancarus) inſtaurare Zwinglii, in idque operam dare, ut abduceret Oleſnicium ‘ à religione paterna & perſuaderet illi religionem ‘ externam. Cujus ad præſcriptum imagines è fano tolli, cœnam pro uſitata peregrinam inſtitui, Sacra ‘ quæ Monachi in ejus oppidi fano religionibus vetuſtis adminiſtrabant, explodi jubet. Erat hoc fanum ‘ cum adjuncta Monachorum domo, munificentiâ ‘ Sbignei Oleſnicii operosè extructum ac liberaliter ditatum, quod profanare Stancarus properabat, cujus ‘ conſilium cum Oleſnicio videretur periculoſum eſſe, ‘ ne quid inconſiderate faceret, vocat amicos ac in ‘ conſilium adhibet, in quo, variatis ſententiis, illa ‘ poſtremo vicit, ut imagines cum reliqua ſupellectili ſalvæ in fano manerent: Monachi etiam veteri ‘ inſtituto ſacra facerent: quod nihil earum rerum ‘ mutari tùm poſſet impunè: adeſſe Regem in proximo, Epiſcopum etiam Cracoviâ nondum diſceſſiſſe, ‘ fore hiſce rebus mutandis aliud tempus magis idoneum. In præſentia placere cœnam inſtitui, idque ‘ fieret in Arce privatim non in fano publicè, quod in ‘ oppido ſubjectum eſt arci. Secundùm hanc ſententiam permittunt Stancaro novæ cœnæ modum preſcribere, ac illius uſum docere (3). - - - He began to renew the error of Zwinglius, and to labour to withdraw ‘ Oleſnicki from the religion of his anceſtors, and perſuade him to embrace an extraneous religion. Accordingly he ordered the images to be taken out of the church, ‘ a foreign communion to be adminiſtred inſtead of the ‘ uſual, and the religious worſhip, which the Monks performed in the church of that town after the antient ‘ manner, to be abrogated. That church, with the ‘ neighbouring houſe of the Monks, which Stancarus ‘ haſtened to profane, was built with much labour, and ‘ liberally endowed by the munificence of Sbigneus Oleſnicki. Oleſnicki having thought his advice dangerous, ‘ that he might do nothing raſhly, conſulted his friends, ‘ who being of different opinions, it was reſolved, at laſt, ‘ that the images, and other ornaments, ſhould remain in ‘ the church untouched; that the Monks likewiſe ſhould perform their religious worſhip after the antient manner, becauſe it was not ſafe at that time to change any of thoſe ‘ things. That the king was at hand, and the biſhop ſtill in ‘ Cracow, and they hoped there would be a more convenient ‘ time to make a change in thoſe things. For the preſent it ‘ was agreed that the communion ſhould be adminiſtred ‘ privately in the caſtle, and not publickly in the church. ‘ According to this reſolution, they allowed Stancarus to ‘ appoint the ceremonies which ſhould be uſed in the new ‘ communion, and to teach the uſe of them.’ Stancarus's temper may be known from theſe words. If he had not the gift of perſeverance, it ought not to be aſcribed to any lukewarmneſs: he was a very fiery man; his patron, who was a ſword's-man, threw water upon that great fire by the advice of ſome lay perſons, who examined that affair. Take notice of a negligence of the Socinian writer, whom I have quoted. He relates the whole Latin paſſage to prove by the teſtimony of a Poliſh Annaliſt, that Stancarus cauſed the Monks to be turned out, and images to be thrown down; and yet it appears from the words of that Annaliſt, that no ſuch thing was done: Lubienietſki betrays therefore his want of judgment. He might have found in Spondanus what he ſhould have quoted. (4) ‘ Adverſus Stancarum prodiit Orichovii Roxolani elegans ‘ libellus titulo Chimæra . . . . ubi ait . . . . (5) ‘ eum Pinczoviam Cracovienſis municipii oppidum ſe ‘ contuliſſe, ibique punico incitatum furore in templa ‘ irruiſſe, imagines ſanctorum ſuſtuliſſe, memorias ‘ Martyrum deleviſſe, altaria evertiſſe, ſacra profanaſſe, gazam eccleſiaſticam diripuiſſe, denique ſacerdotes ex oppido exterminaſſe. - - - - There appeared ‘ againſt Stancarus, a little book of Orichovius Roxolanus, intituled Chimæra . . . . where ſays . . . that ‘ he went to Pinczovia, a town in the diſtrict of Cracow, ‘ where, being incited with a furious rage, he ruſhed into ‘ the churches, threw down the images, defaced the monuments of the martyrs, overthrew the altars, profaned the holy things, laid violent hands on the eccleſiaſtical treaſury, and, in ſhort, baniſhed the prieſts out ‘ of the town.’ See the remark [O].

[C] He drew up fifty rules of Reformation for the Churches of Poland.] We ſhould wrong him ſhould we ſuppoſe that he was a ſedentary Reformer, who keeping in his ſchool at Pinczovia, ſent his orders and his counſels every where. It is certain that he travelled into ſeveral parts to perform the work of the Reformation. Stancarus Eccleſias à papatu reformavit. L. Canones inſtaurandarum Eccleſiarum conſcripſit (6). This proof being too weak, do not mind it, but hold by this. ‘ Stancarus . . . . ad reformandas Eccleſias ab ‘ Anno 1553, magno ſtudio incubuerat: in quam rem ‘ hortatu Jacobi Comitis Oſtrorogii libros conſcripſerat. Cum enim ei, tùm Felici Crucigero & aliis ‘ piis viris, motâ in ditione Cracovienſi perſecutione ‘ . . . . aliæ ſedes quietæ quærendæ eſſent, in majorem Poloniam conceſſerat & Oſtrorogii protectu tutus ‘ permanſerat. A quo Anno 1553, dimiſſus in minorem Poloniam cum eodem illo Crucigero reverterat, ‘ & reformandis ab idololatria eccleſiis pro tempore ‘ operam dederat, favore Staniſlai Stadnicii, Hieronymi Philipovii, Nicolai Oleſnicii & aliorum Patronorum Virorum Nobiliſſimorum & Generoſiſſimorum ‘ fretus (7). - - - Stancarus laboured with great pains ‘ to reform the church, in the year 1553: and for this ‘ purpoſe he wrote ſome books at the perſuaſion of James ‘ Count Oſtroroſke. For a perſecution having ariſen in ‘ the diſtrict of Cracow, and he, with Felix Cruciger, ‘ and other pious men, being obliged to ſettle in ſome ſafer ‘ place, came into the Greater Poland, and continued ſafe ‘ under the protection of Oſtroroſke. In the ſame year ‘ having been ſent into the Leſſer Poland, he came ‘ back with Cruciger, and endeavoured to reform the ‘ church from idolatry, being ſupported by the favour ‘ of Staniſlaus Stadnicki, Jerom Philipowſki, Nicolaus ‘ Oleſnicki, and other moſt noble, and moſt generous ‘ patrons.’

[D] It is ſaid that he learned this doctrine from Peter Lombard, an author, whom he much admired.] I have read the following paſſage long ago in Micrælius. ‘ Hic homo tanti fecit Magiſtrum ſententiarum ex cujus ‘ lacunis hauſerat errorem, ut dicere non ſit veritus, ‘ unum Petrum Lombardum plus valere, quam C. ‘ Lutheros, CC. Melanchthones, CCC. Bullingeros, ‘ CCCC. Martyres & Iↄ. Calvinos: ex quibus omnibus, ſi in mortario contunderentur, non exprimeretur una uncia veræ theologiæ (8). - - - This man ſo ‘ much eſteemed Peter Lombard, from whom he had im- ‘ bibed

(f) De hinc Monachos cœnobio & imagines templo ejecit, quin & has frangi & comburi fecit (Oleſnicius.) Id. ibid. pag. 31.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 33.

(h) Lætus, ubi ſupra.

(i) Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. m. 866, 870.

(k) Id. ibid. pag. 866.

(3) Orichovius, Annal. III, apud Staniſlaum Lubieniecium, Hiſt. Reformat. Polonicæ, lib. i, cap. v, pag 31, 32.

(4) Spondanus, ad ann. 1551, num. 22, pag. 538.

(5) Orichovius, in Chimæra, fol. m. 24, verſo.

(6) Lætus, Compend. Hiſt. Univ. pag. m. 389.

(7) Staniſlaus Lubieniecius, ubi ſupra, lib. ii, cap. vi, p. 116, 117.

(8) Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 890.

It was condemned in ſome ſynods (l) [E], and that condemnation was confirmed in the ſynod of Xian, at which fifty miniſters aſſiſted, with moſt of the great lords of the Proteſtant party, and many gentlemen, in the year 1560. Nevertheleſs, the Churches of Poland were troubled with that diſpute during Stancarus's life [F]. He died at Stobnitz in the houſe of Peter Zborow (m), and then that diſpute was over; but it appeared that Arianiſm had accidentally got new ſtrength by it [G]. It is a ſubject ‘ bibed his error, that he was not afraid to ſay that Peter Lombard alone was worth more than one hundred Luthers, two hundred Melanchthons, three hundred Bullingers, four hundred Martyrs, and five hundred Calvins. Out of all whom, if they were pounded together in a mortar, there would not be extracted one ounce of true Divinity.’ Florimond de Remond (9), who mentions part of thoſe things, and ſome others, quotes Stancarus's apology againſt the Divines of Zurich. I have conſulted it, and in it found (10) Micrælius's words. Note, The author boaſts that he took his doctrine from the holy Fathers, and not from Peter Lombard, who has only collected, ſays he, the authorities of the Fathers, and the doctrines of the Church.

[E] It was condemned in ſome ſynods.] John Lætus (11) names three, that of Sendomir, that of Vladiſlavia, and that of Pinczovia. But Lubienietſki affirms, that Stancarus's opinion was ſo carefully diſcuſſed (12) in the ſynod of Pinczovia in November 1558, and ſo well defended and attacked, that both parties broke up without without coming to any concluſion, and neither gaining the victory. Æquo tunc Marte ab utrinque diſceſſum eſt, quoque cum ſua Sententia ad ſua, Stancaro Dubietzcum ad Patronum Staniſlaum Stadnicium revertente (13).

[F] The Churches of Poland were troubled with that diſpute during Stancarus's life.] We have juſt now ſeen that he had ſome partizans in the ſynods. We need not wonder at it: he underſtood the Languages and the Fathers, he was a man of parts, he could ſpeak and write well, he was full of his own opinion, and diſputed about a very difficult ſubject, which afforded too much matter to the boldneſs of a Logician; and therefore had he had no followers, one might well wonder at it. Stancarus ut multa erat non tantum linguarum ſcientia ſed & eruditione, ex ſcripturis & antiquitate ſententiam ſuam ratione profecto ſuffragante probabat (14). John Laſcus, Liſmaninus, Gonezius, Crovicius, Blandrata, and ſeveral others, could never make him change his opinion (15). The churches of Poland being alarmed at thoſe diviſions, and perplexed with the ſubtilties of that man, conſulted the Conſiſtory of Geneva, who ſent them a ſhort and good inſtruction, drawn up by Calvin in the year 1560 (16). They were obliged to ſupport it by another very accurate piece, that is to be found among Calvin's letters (17). There are no perſonal reflexions on Stancarus in that piece, Calvin complains of his paſſion againſt Melanchthon. The latter, and Peter Martyr, publiſhed ſomething againſt his doctrine. Melanchthon did it with great moderation, knowing that he had to do with a paſſionate man (18). Stancarus refuſed to ſubmit to the ſynods, which condemned him. It appears from the letter, which the miniſters of Poland writ to the church of Straſbourg, in the year 1562 (19), that he charged them with Arianiſm, and introduced a kind of Sabellianiſm. He inſtantly demanded a new conference; but it was denied him, and his books were condemned and burnt. ‘ Pincovienſes, rejectâ cum Stancaro, quam multum expetebat, diſputatione, in dubium vel in diſputationem trahi communem Eccleſiæ ſententiam, in gratiam unius inquieti, & arrogantis hominis indignum exiſtimantes, libros ejus condemnaſſe, & tradidiſſe rogo, lego apud Staniſlaum Hoſium, in Judicio de Cenſura Heidelbergenſium, ac Tigurinorum de dogmate contra Trinitatem in Poloniâ tum ſparſo (20). - - - I find in a book of Staniſlaus Hoſius, that the ſynod of Pinczovia having refuſed to enter into a diſpute with Stancarus, which he ſo much deſired, and judging it an unworthy thing, that the common opinion of the Church ſhould be brought into queſtion or diſpute for the ſake of one turbulent and arrogant man, condemned his books, and ordered them to be burnt.’ The ſchiſm laſted ſtill in the year 1568, as it appears from a letter of Beza, wherein he exhorts the Schiſmatics, and Stancarus by name, to ſubmit to a confeſſion, not doubting that if they do it, they will be reſtored to the communion of the Church. I ſhall ſet down his words the more willingly, becauſe they contain a curious circumſtance, viz. That Stancarus offered ſome formularies of faith full of ambiguous expreſſions. ‘ Omnes illos qui à vobis diſceſſionem fecerunt, totque conſequutis malis aditum patefecerunt, ipſumque adeò Stancarum, precor & obteſtor per viſcera miſericordiæ Dei noſtri, ut & ſui & pacis Eccleſiarum majorem habeant rationem, iſtaque abjecta in defendendo ſemel arrepto dogmate pertinacia, in animum inducant cum Eccleſiis in verè fraternam gratiam, abolitis prioribus omnibus, redire, & ſynceris omnium Eccleſiarum orthodoxarum confeſſionibus apertè potiùs acquieſcere, quàm novas & ambiguas conciliationum formulas ſcribendo, ſuſpicionem præbere, quaſi fucare potius manifeſtè defenſos errores, quàm ſemel abjectis illis veram cum fratribus concordiam inire velint. Id verò ſi fecerint, non dubito quin dextram illis ultro præbeatis, exultent in cœlis Angeli, applaudant omnes Eccleſiæ (21). I beſeech and obteſt, by the bowels of the mercy of our God, all thoſe who have ſeparated from you, and have opened a door to the many evils which have followed, and even Stancarus, to have more regard for their own peace, and for the peace of the Churches; and laying aſide that obſtinacy in defending an opinion too haſtily taken, to reſolve to come back into the true brotherly favour of the Churches, and rather to acquieſce in the ſincere confeſſion of faith of all the orthodox Churches, than by writing new and ambiguous forms of reconciliation, to raiſe a ſuſpicion that they would rather ſet off their errors, which they have openly defended, than lay them aſide, and enter into a true concord with their brethren. If they would do this, I doubt not but you would chearfully receive them, angels would rejoice at it in Heaven, and all the Churches applaud it.’ We ſhall ſee hereafter (22) what he ſaid of the perſecutions he had ſuffered.

[G] Arianiſm had accidentally got new ſtrength by it.] The chief argument of Stancarus was this: If CHRIST is our mediator as he is GOD, he is inferior to his Father as to the divine nature; and therefore he is not coeſſential with GOD the Father; and conſequently thoſe who ſay he is a Mediator as he is GOD, revive the Hereſy of the Arians. He urged this conquence with all the ſubtilties his wit and the nature of the ſubject could afford him: which occaſioned a third party; ſome being moved on the one hand with his reaſons, and on the other with the arguments of his adverſaries, laid down that JESUS CHRIST was a Mediator, both with reſpect to his human nature, and with reſpect to a divine nature inferior to that of his Father. Blandrata, and ſome others, who had fled from Geneva for ſome errors concerning the Trinity, took advantage of Stancarus's objections, and pretended that ſince his adverſaries could not reſolve them, it was neceſſary to think of another ſyſtem. This gave birth to Tritheiſm and Arianiſm in Poland, and at laſt to Socinianiſm. Lubienietſki ſays, that the ſynod of Pinczovia, wherein Stancarus's cauſe was thoroughly diſcuſſed, and both parties had an equal advantage, made way for the deſtruction of the doctrine of the Trinity. ‘ Hæc mox, ut & illa Serveti de præeminentia Patris, Viros pios & doctos ad hoc argumentum diſcutiendum haud leviter incitavit. Itaque meritò illam Synodum Pinczoviæ Anno 1558, celebratam Andreas Lubieniecius Senior in M. S. de Synodis magnum ingreſſum ad demoliendum dogma Trinitatis feciſſe dixit . . . & certè ex his, quæ ſecuta ſunt in illa Pinczoviana Synodo portam ad diſcutienda vulgò recepta dogmata apertam eſſe, nemo non videbit. Hoc enim ipſo anno cum veniſſet Pinczoviam Blandrata, quem invidia Calvini Geneva expulerat, habitis Pinczoviæ cum Liſmanino, multis de hoc argumento ſermonibus, & videns Stancari adverſarios ei non ſatisfeciſſe, tantùm effecit, ut & ille de dogmate Trinitatis dubitare incæperit. Hinc Liſmaninus in ſuſpicionem Arianiſmi apud Miniſtros inolitis erroribus tenacius adhærentes

‘ incidit

(l) Lætus, Compend. Hiſt. Univ. pag. 411.

(m) Id. ibid.

(9) Flor. de Remond, Hiſt. de la Naiſſ. & Progrés de l'Hereſie, book ii, ch. xv, pag. m. 222.

(10) Folio k 5, Edit. Cracovienſ. 1562, in 8vo.

(11) Lætus, ubi ſupra, pag. 411.

(12) Acriter diſcuſſa fuit. Staniſl. Lubieniecius, ubi ſupra, pag. 117.

(13) Id. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 118.

(16) It is among Calvin's Tracts, pag. m. 682.

(17) It is the 352d letter.

(18) Reſponſionem de Stancari controverſia perſcripſi quæ multo eſt & brevior & ſummiſſior quam poſtulat magnitudo cauſæ. Sed hominem iracundum & bilioſum non volui accendere. Melancht. Epiſtola dcccix, lib. iv, pag. m. 925: It is dated in the year 1553.

(19) It is the firſt among thoſe of Zanchius. See Hoornbeeck, in Apparatu ad Controv. Socinianas, pag. 29.

(20) Hoornbeeck, ibid.

(21) Theod. Beza, Epiſt. xxviii, pag. 241, Tom. iii, Operum. It is dated the firſt of September 1568.

(22) In the remark [L].

ſubject, that might afford many reflexions [H]. Stancarus loſt all the glory of his firſt actions incidit (23). - - - - Soon after, this opinion, as likewiſe that of Servetus, concerning the ſuperiority of the Father, did not a little induce pious and learned men to examine this argument. Wherefore Andreas Lubieniecius, ſenior, in his manuſcript, de Synodis, had juſt reaſon to ſay, that the ſynod of Pinczovia, held in the year 1558, made way for the deſtruction of the doctrine of the Trinity . . . . And, indeed, it will evidently appear to every body, that by what followed in this ſynod of Pinczovia, a door was opened for the examining of opinions which had been commonly received. For in that ſame year Blandrata, being driven out of Geneva by the influence of Calvin, came to Pinczovia; where having had much diſcourſe with Liſmaninus upon this ſubject, and perceiving that the enemies of Stancarus had not been able to anſwer him, he ſo wrought upon him, that he alſo began to call the doctrine of the Trinity in queſtion. For this reaſon Liſmaninus came to be ſuſpected of Arianiſm by the miniſters, who ſtiffly maintained their inveterate errors.’ Calvin had been all along afraid that Stancarus's adverſaries would run into another extreme, and ſaw, to his great grief, that his fear was not groundleſs. Here follows what he writ to the brethren of that country. ‘Tabulam nuper in Polonia editam, quæ Chriſtum & Spiritum ſanctum alios à Patre deos facit, non ſine acerbiſſimo mœrore inſpexi. Pridem me hæc cura, non abs re anxium tenuit, ne fratres minus in Scriptura exercitatos abriperet Stancari importunitas, ut vitandæ unius abſurditatis cauſa, in aliam fœdiorem laberentur. Accidit ergo quod timui, ac triſti exemplo patefactum eſt quam noxia ſit peſtis contentio, ubi magis propoſitum eſt, adverſarium vincere, quàm bonam cauſam ſimpliciter tueri. Craſſum Stancari delirium meritò à fratribus Polonicis repudiatum eſt. Sed dum ſibi ab una diaboli aſtutia cavent, obrepſit alter impoſtor Blandrata Stancaro deterior: & hac occaſione abuſus eſt ad errorem non minus deteſtabilem ſpargendum (24). - - - It gave me great grief to find that there had been a treatiſe publiſhed in Poland, which makes Jeſus Chriſt and the Holy Ghoſt two diſtinct Gods from the Father. I was along ago in pain, and, not without reaſon, apprehenſive, leſt the troubleſome ſpirit of Stancarus ſhould pervert ſuch brethren as were not well enough verſed in the Scripture, and ſo far work upon them, that in order to avoid a leſs abſurdity they ſhould fall into a greater. What I feared is come to paſs, and we have a melancholy proof how pernicious the plague of contention is, where people ſtudy more how to get the better of an adverſary, than ſimply to defend a good cauſe. The groſs conceit of Stancarus was juſtly rejected by the brethren in Poland. But while they were guarding themſelves againſt one trick of the Devil, Blandrata, another impoſtor, worſe than Stancarus, ſurpriſed them, and took hold of this opportunity to propagate an error no leſs deteſtable.’ I ſhall ſet down a very fine paſſage of another letter he wrote to them in 1563, which ſhews the pernicious effects of diſputes, and that God ſends a curſe upon the work of thoſe, who diſpute rather to triumph over their enemies, than for the ſake of truth. (25) Porrò te terrimus hic error, qui apud vos graſſatur, favorem obtinuit ex immodico contentionis fervore. Nam cùm Stancarus inſulſus Sophiſta, & rabula improbiſſimus commenta ſua ingereret, Chriſtum Mediatorem duntaxat eſſe, quatenus homo eſt, ideoque apud totam Trinitatem intercedere, optimum compendium quidam eſſe duxerunt, ſi reſponderent ſolum Patrem verè & propriè eſſe Deum. Ita effugium illud nimis cupidè multi arripuerunt, quòd ita putarent nullo negocio refutari Stancari ineptias. Sic ut veteri proverbio dicitur, nimium altercando veritas amiſſa fuit. Equidem non dubito quoſdam inſcitia vel inconſiderata facilitate lapſos eſſe: verùm conjicere ſimul licet, nonnullos (26) aſtutè captaſſe occaſionem, ut execrabile delirium, quod plauſibile fore ſperabant, ſimplicibus impunè obtruderent. That is, ‘Furthermore, this pernicious error, that is ſpread among you, proceeds from too great a contention. For when Stancarus, that ſilly Sophiſt, and wicked babbler, maintained that Christ is our Mediator only as he is man, and that therefore he intercedes with the whole Trinity; ſome were of opinion that the beſt way was to ſay, that the Father only is truly and properly God. Many were too fond of this ſubterfuge, becauſe they fancied the abſurd notions of Stancarus would be eaſily confuted by that means. Thus, as the proverb has it, Truth has been loſt by too much contending. I do not doubt that ſome have been miſled through ignorance and inconſiderateneſs; but it is very likely others have cunningly waited for an occaſion to ſet forth ſuch an execrable doctrine without any danger, hoping it would be acceptable to the ignorant.’ Beza does alſo acknowledge, that Tritheiſm and Arianiſm, which then revived in Poland, were occaſioned by Stancarus's diſputes (27).

Examination of the complaints against the multitude of univerſities and profeſſors.

[H] It is a ſubject that might afford many reflexions.] I ſhall only make a few, and will begin with the complaints ſome make againſt learning. Were it not better to ſuppreſs the univerſities than to maintain ſo many profeſſors in all faculties? They are the men, who give birth to Hereſies, or bring up thoſe, who ſpread and multiply erroneous doctrines. The people, that is, all thoſe who are not called to explain matters of religion, preſerve the faith, imparted to them, ſound and undefiled. Teach them that they muſt believe the Trinity, the Unity of the Divine Nature, the Incarnation, Christ's Mediation, &c. they will believe all thoſe myſteries, without altering the purity of them, and raiſing any diſturbance about them. But the Doctors take a contrary courſe: ſome are willing to diſtinguiſh themſelves by ſubtile interpretations, and others will not ſuffer it. Which occaſions diſputes, that trouble the ſpring, and divide it into ſeveral muddy ſtreams. The firſt diviſion is quickly followed by a ſecond, and ſo on: that fecundity, or rather contagion, is very ſurpriſing. In a little time you will hear of many ſectaries, Apollinariſts, Arians, Eutychians, Macedonians, Monothelites, Neſtorians, Sabellians, &c (28). If any one drew the genealogy of Hereſies, it would appear that their deſcent is chiefly grounded upon theſe two cauſes. 1. The diſputants are willing to keep at too great a diſtance from their adverſaries; and therefore they run into another extreme. 2. The deſire of getting the victory, makes them carry their objections ſo far, that they may be retorted againſt them, or favour a third party. What do they do to remedy that inconveniency? They yield the ground they are not able to defend, and have recourſe to ſome new invention. This produces a quite different ſyſtem, which another doctor will reform a-new, not finding it ſo exact as it ſhould be, and ſo on. Another, who fancies that both parties have the advantage, and are worſted by turns, as they act offenſively, or ſtand upon the defenſive, thinks himſelf obliged to pitch upon another hypotheſis. All theſe diſorders appeared in the caſe of Stancarus. He fell out with his colleague Oſiander in the univerſity of Konigſberg; and the better to oppoſe him, he aſcribed to Christ's humanity what the other aſcribed to the Divine Nature. When he removed from Konigſberg to Francfort upon the Oder (29), he found there an antagoniſt (30), who run into a new extreme, that he might the better contradict him; for it is ſaid (31), that he taught that Jesus Christ, our juſtification and our mediator as he is God and man, died according to his divine nature. Stancarus returning into Poland maintained his opinion ſo warmly, and accuſed his adverſaries ſo violently of favouring Arianiſm, that he gave many perſons occaſion to revive the ſect of the Arians, and then that of the Samoſatenians. I believe they went upon this: 1. That the objections of the other miniſters proved, that the ſole humanity of Christ was not our mediation. 2. That his objections proved that a co-eſſential Son of God could not be a Mediator. They therefore took a medium between thoſe extremes: they ſaid that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, not co-eſſential, and cloathed with our nature, was our Mediator as to his human nature, and as to the ſpiritual nature he had before he was born. Theſe are the unhappy effects of Theological diſputes, and Profeſſors chairs.

There is another thing to be conſidered. If a profeſſor advances a new opinion, and gives ground to believe that he does it to get ſome reputation, an antagoniſt immediately ſtarts up, who maintains that it is an ill opinion. They grow hot by degrees, and at laſt hate one another in earneſt. To colour their proceedings, which are ſo like human paſſions, the aggreſ-

(23) Staniſl. Lubieniecius, ubi ſupra, pag. 118.

(24) Calvin. in Admonitione ad Fratres Polonos ne triplicem in Deo Eſſentiam pro tribus Perſonis imaginando tres ſibi Deos fabricent. init. pag. 683. Tractatuum Theolog.

(25) Idem. pag. 686.

(26) He means Blandrata, Gentilis, John Paul Alciatus, whom he names ſoon after.

(27) Beza, in Apologia altera ad Claudium de Xainctes, pag. 345, Tom. ii, Operum. See alſo what he ſays in Calvin's Life, ad ann. 1560, pag. 381, Tom. iii, Operum.

(28) I follow an alphabetical order and not a chronological one.

(29) Melch. Adam. in Vit. Theol German. pag. 234.

(30) Called Andreas Muſculus.

(31) Staphylus, apud Prateolum, Voce Stancarini, pag. m. 458.

actions by the troubles he raiſed afterwards, indulging too much his vanity and ſubtilty (n). He publiſhed ſeveral pieces [I]. Some are ſtrangely miſtaken about the nature of his opinions, as I ſhall make it appear, when I obſerve Moreri's faults [K]. The books for muſt ſay that the queſtion is about a thing of great moment to the Church. He that is attacked muſt ſay the ſame, and ſhew that the opinion he has altered gives a great advantage to the enemies. When things are come to this paſs, there is no going back; the ſuperiors muſt intervene. But what is the uſual effect of their deciſions? an actual and virtual ſchiſm. No ſuch thing would happen, if men were not over-fond of their own thoughts. For example, had Stancarus confeſſed, as he ſhould have done, that his opinion was of little importance for the good of the Church, he would not have thought himſelf obliged in honour to maintain it; he would have been ſilent, as ſoon as he perceived that his aſſertion occaſioned troubles. How many diſorders might have been avoided in the world, if men had been contented to diſpute about things neceſſary to ſalvation? At this rate Oſiander and Stancarus had never writ two pages one againſt another. Is there any body among the people that follows either of thoſe doctrines, when they put their truſt in the death of CHRIST? Nay, do not thoſe very Divines, who have moſt diſputed about thoſe queſtions, worſhip him without thinking of theſe diſtinctions between the human and Divine Nature?

Here is another conſideration. In all countries where many perſons are paid to explain a body of Divinity, ſome will doubtleſs be ſo raſh as to ſtart queſtions, which it were better to let alone (32), as land-marks that divide inheritances. The example of ſuch men is much to be feared; for every body thinks he may do what is done by others, that have not more authority than himſelf: hence it is, that new diſputes never ariſe more eaſily, than when they have been lately preceded by many others. This is what ſome ſay againſt the great number of univerſities.

I ſhall anſwer all thoſe complaints in a few words, It is a moſt certain maxim that good things ought not to be ſuppreſſed, becauſe ſome make an ill uſe them: and therefore ſince the improving of one's mind is very worthy of man, and the appointing of maſters for that end is a good thing, it ought not to be aboliſhed under pretence, that ſome learned men make an ill uſe of their knowledge to raiſe Theological diſputes. To which I add, that the ill conſequences of ignorance are ſtill more to be feared. Ignorance would not prevent diviſions: ſome men leſs ignorant than others, tho' they had never been in an univerſity, would be ſo preſumptuous and ſo vain as to ſow new doctrines, and might eſtabliſh them the more eaſily, becauſe their hearers would be ſilly and ignorant.

I ſhall conclude with deploring the miſerable condition of mankind. They cannot avoid one evil but by running into another: if you cure them of their ignorance, you expoſe them to ſcandalous diſputes, and ſuch as frequently ſhake and even overthrow the government.

[I] He publiſhed ſeveral pieces.] An Hebrew Grammar at Baſil, 1546. An Expoſition of St James's Epiſtle, with the conciliation of ſome paſſages of the Scripture, at Baſil, 1547. This conciliation was taken almoſt word for word from Bullinger's commentaries (33); and therefore Stancarus may be placed in the catalogue of Plagiaries. De decem captivitatibus Judæorum: De ſanguine Zachariæ, and ſeveral other tracts, the titles whereof may be ſeen in the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque. I ſhall only tranſcribe what follows: De Trinitate, & Mediatore Domino noſtro Jeſu Chriſto, adverſus Henricum Bullingerum, Petrum Martyrem, & Joannem Calvinum, & reliquos Tigurinæ ac Genevenſis Eccleſiæ Miniſtros, Eccleſiæ Dei perturbatores. De Trinitate, & Unitate Dei, deque Incarnatione & Mediatione Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti adverſus Tritheitas, Arrianos, Eutychianos, Macharianos, Cerinthianos, Ebionitas, & Photinianos. Opus novum de reformatione tum Doctrinæ Chriſtianæ, tum veræ intelligentiæ Sacramentorum, cum matura conſideratione & fundamento Scripturæ ſanctæ & conſilio SS. Patrum, at Baſil, 1547, in 8vo (34). It is obſerved in the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, that Stancarus's book againſt the miniſters of Zurich and Geneva is full of injurious words, and that it was confuted by Joſias Simler. Here is an apoſtrophe of Stancarus: 'Concluſum eſt, ô Calvine, 'doctrinam tuam de filio Dei eſſe plane Arrianam, à 'qua reſilias quam primum te oro atque obſecro, & 'has hæreſes quam citius fieri poteſt retractes, & 'liberes Eccleſiam Dei ab iſtis blaſphemiis quibus eam 'contaminaſti (35). - - - It is agreed, O Calvin, that 'your doctrine concerning the Son of GOD is plainly 'Arian, which I therefore beſeech you to renounce as ſoon 'as poſſible. Make haſte to abjure ſuch hereſies, and 'free the Church of GOD from thoſe blaſphemies with 'which you have defiled it.' He ſays, in another place, that he has demonſtrated, that the Churches, called Reformed, were Arian and Eutychian. Omnes Eccleſiæ quas vos appellatis reformatas per Evangelium filii Dei, Arrianæ & Eutychianæ ſunt, nec hoc negari poteſt, ut ſupra demonſtrativè probavi (36). Andrew Jurgiewſki, canon of Vilna, alledges thoſe two paſſages in his Bellum quinti Evangelii (37). From whence it appears that Calvin and Stancarus gave one another the ſame hard words; each of them accuſed the other of being a blaſphemer, and a diſturber of the Church; and if Calvin blamed Stancarus's vanity, I make no doubt that the latter charged him with the ſame fault. 'Eſt 'illud non abſurdum modò, ſed exitiale commentum, 'quo vir ille faſtu turgidus & novitatis nimium cupi'dus orthodoxæ fidei principia labefactare conatus eſt. 'Dolendum ſanè eſt, quòd hominem qui prodeſſe alio'qui poterat, mater hæreſeôn ambitio ad nocendum 'impulit. Adeò enim frivolæ ſunt quas obtendit ra'tiones, ut ſatis appareat, nihil aliud quàm acuti in'genii famam ab aliis diſſentiendo captaſſe (38) . . . . 'Utinam his moveatur Stancarus: quod tunc demum 'fore ſperandum eſt, ubi ingenium, quod ſua vanitate 'nimis in ſublime elatum eſt, ad manſuetudinem & 'modeſtiam ſe flexerit (39). - - - That is not only an 'abſurd but a pernicious invention, by which this writer, 'puffed up with pride, and extravagantly fond of new 'opinions, has endeavoured to ſap the fundamental prin'ciples of Orthodoxy. It is truly a pity that a man who 'was capable of doing good, ſhould have been induced by 'ambition, the mother of Hereſies, to do miſchief. The 'reaſons which he offers are ſo frivolous, that it is plain 'enough that in differing from other people he only 'hunted after the reputation of a penetrating wit . . . . 'I wiſh Stancarus could be prevailed upon by theſe things. 'Which we may then hope for, when his temper, too 'much ſwoln with ſelf-conceit, ſhall be reduced to a 'due pitch of modeſty and meekneſs.'

[K] Taking notice of Moreri's faults.] He ſays, 'That Stancarus being willing to oppoſe the errors of 'Oſiander, who taught that the human nature of 'CHRIST is the cauſe of our juſtification, run into 'the contrary extream, and wrote againſt the Divinity 'of CHRIST like an Arian.' He quotes Florimond de Remond, Bellarmin, Onuphrius, and Gualtherius. The firſt miſtake of Moreri, is his ſaying that Oſiander taught that the humanity of CHRIST is the cauſe of our juſtification; on the contrary, he ſhould have ſaid that Oſiander believed that the eſſential juſtice of GOD, and that CHRIST, as he is GOD, are our juſtification. The ſecond miſtake, which unavoidably follows from the firſt, is his ſaying, that Stancarus taught that the Divinity of CHRIST is the cauſe of our juſtification; whereas his doctrine was diametrically oppoſite to that. Thirdly, Stancarus was ſo far from oppoſing the Divinity of CHRIST, like an Arian, that, on the contrary, the only reaſon why he grew ſo fond of his doctrine, was, becauſe he pretended that the oppoſite opinion neceſſarily introduced Arianiſm. Sandius, who put into his catalogue of Antitrinitarians, as many men as ever he could, and ſometimes under equivocal pretences, has omitted Stancarus; which plainly ſhews, that he did not in the leaſt oppoſe the co-eſſential Divinity of CHRIST. Moreri is therefore groſſly miſtaken in point of fact. His wrong conſequence is his fourth miſtake. He falſly believed that Oſiander aſcribed our juſtification to the humanity of CHRIST. How then could he ſay, that Stancarus, contradicting Oſiander, ſo far as to run into another extreme, oppoſed the Divinity of the Meſſias? For it is a natural conſequence of the direct oppoſition, which Moreri ſuppoſes between thoſe two men, that Stancarus rigidly maintained the Divine Nature of the Mediator, as he did. Fifthly, The authors quoted by Moreri ſay the contrary to what he aſcribes to them concerning Oſiander's

(n) See the remark [I].

(32) Μὴ κίνει Καμαρίναν, ἀκίνητος γὰρ ἀμείνων. Ne move Camarinam, immota enim melior. Stephan. Byzant. Voce Καμαρίνα.

(33) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, pag. 245.

(34) Taken from the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca, ibid.

(35) Stancarus contra Miniſtros Genevenſes ac Tigurinos, folio 118, 123, apud Jurgiewicium, ubi infra.

(36) Id. ibid. folio 94, 95, apud eund.

(37) Andreas Jurgiewicius, Bellum quinti Evangelii, pag. 161, 162. Colon. 1595.

(38) Calvinus, in Reſponſo ad Fratres Polonos, pag. 682, Tractat. Theolog.

(39) Id. ibid. pag. 683.

books he writ againſt his antagoniſts are full of injurious words: he alledged for his juſtification the law of retaliation, the importance of the hereſies he oppoſed, and even the example of the apoſtles (o). He gloried that he had been perſecuted and condemned, as Oſiander's error. I ſhall only prove it as to Father Gaulterius, who has miſled Moreri. ‘ Franciſcus Stancarus Mantuanus, ſays he (40), tueri cupiens, ut ‘ Oſiandro (41) obſiſteret, Jeſu Chriſti humanitatem eſſe ‘ noſtræ juſtificationis cauſam, in oppoſitum extremum ‘ eodem circiter tempore ſe præcipitem egit, Jeſu ‘ Chriſti nimirùm divinitatem Arianorum more impugnando: ejus enim erat opinio, Chriſtum dominum ‘ eſſe juſtificatorem noſtrum ſecundum ſolam humanitatem excluſa divina natura. - - - - - About the ſame ‘ time Francis Stancarus of Mantua ſtriving to maintain, ‘ in oppoſition to Oſiander, that the human nature of ‘ JESUS CHRIST was the cauſe of our juſtification, fell into the contrary extreme, and attacked his ‘ Divinity like an Arian: for it was his opinion that ‘ our Lord JESUS CHRIST is the author of our ‘ juſtification only, as he is man, not as he is GOD.’ You may plainly ſee in thoſe words three miſtakes of Moreri, and another near as bad as the fourth. For though a man aſſerts, that JESUS CHRIST is our Mediator, and our juſtification, as he is man, and not as he is GOD, it does not follow that he favours Arianiſm: And therefore Gaulterius made uſe of an enim, for, unworthy of an author, who ſhould pretend to argue right. The greateſt over-ſight lies in the matter of fact, that is, in his being ignorant that Stancarus aſcribed the mediation of CHRIST to the human nature, becauſe he believed that the contrary opinion favoured Arianiſm. If Gaulterius had ſaid that Stancarus revived the doctrine of Neſtorius, there had been ſome appearance of truth in it, and he would have been a little more faithful in his quotation; for Florimond de Remond, quoted by that Jeſuit, touches upon Neſtorianiſm. Thus this author wrongly ſtates the matter of fact, draws wrong conſequences, and is not right in his quotation. He is more faithful in what he quotes out of Prateolus, for what he advances, is to be found in that author; but becauſe the words of Prateolus are taken from Lindanus, it had been better to quote Lindanus, though an author of no authority, who had read nothing of Stancarus, and only goes upon the teſtimony of one Palladius (42). I dare ſay that there are few books that caſt a greater blot upon the Church of Rome, than thoſe which contain a catalogue of the hereſies of the XVIth century. There are two great faults in thoſe catalogues: The firſt is, That they are ſtuffed with a vaſt number of imaginary ſects (43); the ſecond is, That the authors of thoſe libels tranſcribe one another, and it does not appear that any of them has read the books of the Hereſiarchs they ſpeak of. But though they be never ſo abſurd in what they ſay of other pretended party leaders, I think their account of Stancarus ſhews their ignorance more than any other; ſince, on the one hand, they aſcribe to him an hereſy which he oppoſed, and wherewith he continually charged his adverſaries; and, on the other hand, the opinion, whereby he got many enemies among the Proteſtants, is a doctrine which the Roman Catholics maintain againſt the Proteſtant Divines. Read theſe words of the famous Turretin. ‘ An Chriſtus ſit mediator ſecundum utramque naturam? affir. cont. Pontificios & Stancarum. Quæſtio ‘ hæc nobis intercedit cum Pontificiis qui ut facilius ‘ obtineant plures dari poſſe Mediatores, pertendunt ‘ Chriſtum Mediatorem fuiſſe ſecundum naturam humanam tantùm, ut poſt Lombar. lib. 3. diſt. q. 19. ‘ l. 9. Thom. p. 3. q. 26. art. 2. Bell. contro 1. de ‘ Chriſto lib. 5. c. 3. Becanus in Manu. lib. 3. cap. ‘ 2. & alii aſſerunt. Quos hîc Stancarus ſequitur (44). ‘ Whether CHRIST be Mediator both as GOD and ‘ man? We affirm it againſt the Roman Catholics ‘ and Stancarus. This is a diſpute between us and the ‘ Roman Catholics, who, in order to pave the way for ‘ the ſuppoſition of ſeveral mediators, pretend that ‘ JESUS CHRIST was mediator with reſpect to his ‘ human nature only, as Lombard . . . . St Thomas, Bellaron, Becanus, and others affirm: whom Stancarus ‘ follows here.’ I have juſt now conſulted the Summa Theologica of the Jeſuit Becanus, and I find theſe words in it. ‘ Secunda concluſio. Chriſtus ſecundum humanitatem eſt Mediator non ſecundum divinitatem. Eſt contra Lutheranos & Calviniſtas qui ‘ docent Mediatorem eſſe ſecundum utramque naturam (45). - - - - - The ſecond concluſion. CHRIST is ‘ mediator with reſpect to his human, not with reſpect to his Divine nature: It is againſt the Lutherans and Calviniſts, who maintain that he is mediator with reſpect to both.’ He confutes their arguments; he quotes the Fathers for his opininon, and refers the reader to Vaſques and Bellarmin.

WHETHER Stancarus was an Heretic.

Perhaps it will be aſked whether the particular opinions of Stancarus ought to be accounted heretical. It is none of my buſineſs to decide the caſe. I ſhall only ſay, that in order to judge of the nature of a doctrine, one ought to know the principles and deſign of its author: For inſtance, Stancarus ought to be aſked whether he denies the mediation of CHRIST, according to the Divine Nature, becauſe he does not believe that he is both GOD and man; or whether he denies it, becauſe he will acknowledge no inferiority in the Divine Nature of CHRIST, and is afraid it will make way for Arianiſm? If he alledges the firſt reaſon, he is a Samoſatenian and a Socinian; but if he alledges only the ſecond, it is quite another thing; he is an orthodox man as to the co-eſſential and conſubſtantial Divinity of CHRIST; and his error, at the worſt, conſiſts only in his ſuppoſing that the Mediation implies an inferiority inconſiſtent with the Divinity of the Eternal Word. Perhaps, the circumſtances of the time, and that man's haughtineſs, were the true reaſon why the miniſters of Swiſſerland and Geneva exclaimed ſo much againſt him. The churches of Poland were then in ſuch a condition, that nothing could be more prejudicial to them than ſuch a diſpute; and it was thought that Stancarus acted more out of vanity than out of zeal. Perhaps, his doctrine would not appear ſo pernicious at this preſent time; for ſince the objections of the Socinians have obliged ſome Proteſtant Divines to ſay, that CHRIST is not adorable, as he is Mediator; one would think they believe he is not Mediator, as he is GOD. He is certainly adorable, as he is GOD; and therefore if he ought not to be worſhipped, as he is Mediator, it is becauſe he is not Mediator, as he is GOD. - - - - ‘ Hinc nata quæſtio de ‘ adoratione Chriſti qua mediatoris, circa quam in ‘ partes itum eſt aliis affirmantibus aliis negantibus . . . ‘ licet fatendum ſit quæſtionem hanc prout inter orthodoxos agitatur problematicam eſſe, & minus principalem, de qua utrinque diſputari poteſt ſalva fidei ‘ compage, imo & multum logomachiæ involvat (46). ‘ - - - - Hence ſprung the queſtion about the adoration of ‘ CHRIST as Mediator, upon which people have been ‘ divided, ſome chuſing the affirmative, others the negative . . . . although it muſt be confeſſed that the queſtion, ‘ as it is handled by orthodox Divines, is problematical, ‘ and not of the higheſt importance, becauſe one may diſpute on either ſide with a ſafe conſcience, and after all ‘ it is little more than a meer contention about words.’ As for the letter of the Miniſters of Poland to the Divines of Straſburg (47), I think it ought to be obſerved that it was written by men, who had excommunicated Stancarus, and diſputed with him upon ſeveral occaſions. It is an uſual thing to aſcribe to a man the conſequences which are thought to ariſe from his Doctrine, whether he owns them or not; for it is ſuppoſed he does not fairly diſown them. And therefore prudence requires we ſhould judge of the doctrine of that writer not by that letter, but by his own writings: I do not think they contain Sabellianiſm. However, read the following paſſage (48). ‘ Neque in ‘ eo ſolo ſubſtitit Stancari intemperies, quod doceret, ‘ Chriſtum Mediatorem eſſe juxta humanam tantum ‘ naturam; ſed ultra progreſſus, quoque veram Perſonarum Trinitatem ſuſtulit, unum Deum confusâ ‘ Trinitate, apud quem Chriſtus homo mediatorem ‘ ageret, Trinomium, cum Sabellio imaginans, cæteras Eccleſias ut Arianas traduxit: quod patet ex ‘ litteris Miniſtrorum Polonorum, è Synodo Pincovienſi ſcriptis A. MDLXII. ad Theologos Argentinenſes, (quæ extat prima inter epiſtolas Zanchii) ‘ (49) . . . . . Præterquam de Deo & Chriſto, etiam ‘ alia in cæteros fidei articulos movit Stancarus non ‘ ſana,

(o) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory to his anſwer to the Divines of Zurich and Geneva.

(40) Gualterus, in Tab. Chronogr. Sæc. xvi, cap. xxi, pag. m. 797. He quotes Prateol. V. Stancariani Florim. lib. ii, de orig. hæreſ. cap. xv, num. 1.

(41) He had juſt before faithfully explained the doctrine of Oſiander.

(42) Lindanus, in Dubitantio, Dial. ii, pag. m. 127.

(43) See the article BEZANITES.

(44) Franciſcus Turrettinus, Inſtitut. Theol. Elencticæ, Part. ii, Loco xiv, pag. 411, Edit. Genev. 1682.

(45) Martinus, Becanus, Summa Theolog. Part. iii, cap. 21, pag. 716, Edit. Pariſ. 1634.

(46) Turretin. ubi ſupra, Quæſt. xviii, pag. 539. See alſo Mr Saurin, Examen de la Theologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. 749, & ſeq.

(47) See the remark [F].

(48) Hoornbeeck in Appar. ad Diſput. Socinian. pag. 29.

(49) Id. ibid. pag. 30.

as St Athanaſius was [L]. I know that he taught with great zeal, in Tranſylvania, but I do not know certainly, at what time (p). The book, intituled Chimæra (q), which Staniſlaus Orichovius wrote againſt him, contains many reaſons and hard words: as for his reaſons, the only deſign of them is to prove, that his Poliſh Majeſty ought to deſtroy that man, and all thoſe who ſow new opinions in the kingdom. Thus he thinks the arguments of Sectaries ought to be refuted. He confeſſes that he had married a wife being a prieſt, but he is ſilent with reſpect to the apoſtacy which Stancarus reproaches him with [M].

I ſhall

‘ ſana, de Juſtificatione, &c. quod video ex Reſponſione Melanthonis, de controverſiis Stancari ſcriptâ, A. MDLIII. atque extat inter Melanthonis Declamationes, Tom. iv. --- Neither did the fury of Stancarus ſtop here, viz. In teaching that CHRIST was mediator with reſpect to his Human Nature only. He went further, and took away the real Trinity of Perſons; for, according to the confuſſed notion of Sabellius, he imagined one GOD under three different names, with whom CHRIST, as man, acted the part of mediator. He accuſed the other Churches of Arianiſm; as it appears by a letter of the Poliſh Miniſters, written from the Synod of Pinczovia in the year 1562, to the Divines of Straſburg. (This letter is the firſt among the Epiſtles of Zanchius)..... Beſides his notions about GOD and JESUS CHRIST, Stancarus had other heterodox opinions, concerning Juſtification, &c. as I find by an anſwer of Melanchthon's concerning the controverſies of Stancarus, written in the year 1553. It is extant among tke declamations of Melanchthon, vol. iv. Mind theſe words of Melchior Adam (50); ‘ ita diſſeruit (Stancarus) de duabus naturis ut non diſtinguere, verum ſeparare pleriſque ſit viſus. ---- Stancarus diſcourſed in ſuch a manner upon the two Natures, that, in the opinion of moſt people, he ſeemed not to diſtinguiſh but to divide them.’ They plainly intimate that Stancarus's enemies took the liberty to impute to him a doctrine which he did not teach. Many thought that he divided the two Natures of CHRIST. Which ſhews that he did not actually divide them, and even that ſuch a diviſion did not neceſſarily reſult from his principles; for in both caſes all his adverſaries would have accuſed him of Neſtorius's hereſy. We may therefore ſay, that Melchior Adam means the ſenſe which many put upon Stancarus's doctrine. But there is nothing more fallacious than to judge of a man's doctrine by the interpretations of his adverſaries. For a confirmation of what I ſay, I ſhall quote Stancarus himſelf. The Divines of Zurich made uſe of theſe words: ‘ Videat Stancarus qui noſtram ſententiam vult gravare ſuſpicione hæreſeos, ne ipſe interea jure convincatur Neſtorianus à quo tam parum abeſt ut difficillimum ſit eum ab illo internoſcere. ---- Let Stancarus, who ſtudies to brand our opinion with the imputation of Hereſy, take care leaſt we convict him of being a Neſtorian; for he comes ſo near it, that it is hard to make any diſtinction.’ His anſwer was, ‘ Cum Tigurini non affirment me eſſe Neſtorianum, non opus eſt ut me defendam; quod ſi etiam affirmarent, cum non probent, ſed ſimpliciter accuſent, illis docti viri non crederent, quia ipſimet Tigurini ignorant prorſus quod fuerit dogma Neſtorii, ut jam probabo. Hoc tamen profiteor & coram Deo & hominibus fateor me nihil negotii habere cum Neſtorio, & Neſtorii doctrina (51). ---- Since the Divines of Zurich do not affirm that I am a Neſtorian, I have no occaſion to juſtify myſelf; if they ſhould affirm it, ſo long as they only laid ſuch a thing to my charge without proving it, the learned would not believe them; becauſe they themſelves are utterly ignorant of what the opinion of Neſtorius was, as I ſhall preſently make it appear. I profeſs however, and acknowledge before GOD and man, that I have nothing at all to do with Neſtorius or his doctrine.’ This proteſtation ought to make us wary in the preſent caſe.

We ought chiefly to miſtruſt Orichovius, who ſays that Arius, Macedonius, Neſtorius, and Aerius were revived in Stancarus (52). What he imputes to him with reſpect to the Euchariſt (53) is ſo extravagant, and even contradictory, that it ought to be looked upon as a calumny. It does not appear that the Divines of Zurich and Geneva exclaimed againſt Stancarus upon this head. The writers of the catalogues of Heretics (54), accuſe him of teaching that the Lord's Supper is an earneſt of the body of our Saviour. Is this an opinion contrary to that of Zuinglius's or Calvin's doctrine? They add, that he was infected with Rabbiniſm. This accuſation was only grounded upon his ſkill in Rabbinical learning, and his mentioning ſometimes the opinions of the Rabbins (55).

[L] He gloried that he had been perſecuted and condemned, as St Athanaſius was.] I have adviſed, ſays he (56), ſeven times at leaſt, Philip Melanchthon, Oſiander and Felix, the Superintendant of the Poliſh Churches, and the Miniſters of Zurich and Geneva: I have done it civilly, I diſſembled their errors, the way I took was to aſk them whether they were ſtill orthodox as to the doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation. They all joined againſt me. The following words contain a particular account of his complaints. ‘ (57) Omnes inſurrexerunt contra me. Alii enim vitam meam quæſiverunt ut Melancthon (58) per Joachimum Marchionem Brandenburgenſem & Electorem Imperii. Alii carceres præparaverunt perpetuos mihi, niſi admonitus aufugiſſem, ut Oſiander. Alii expulerunt me è domo mea (59) & literas ſcripſerunt ad omnes nobiles majoris & minoris Poloniæ & Ruſſiæ, ut nemo me reciperet, ſed expelleret, ut Fœlix ille impius & hypocrita cum ſuis Pinczovianis. Alii tam in Germania quam in Hungaria, Tranſylvania & Polonia minori multas Synodos celebraverunt contra me & fidem Catholicam de Trinitate & mediatore, & multos libellos plenos blaſphemiis Arrianis & Eutychianis, conviciis & horrendis calumniis ediderunt, ut me tandem cum pura doctrina catholicæ fidei perderent, at nihil facere potuerunt, ſicut, nec poterunt. Durum enim eſt contra ſtimulum, unum Deum Trinitatem calcitrare. Hoc enim modo Conſtantius Imperator Arrianus cum Arrianis novem Concilia celebravit contra D. Athanaſium, quem miris modis afflixerunt, proſcriptionibus, exiliis, & perſecutionibus, ſed veritas tandem vicit. ----- They all roſe up againſt me; for ſome ſought after my life, as Melanchthon did by means of Joachimus Marquis of Brandenburg, and Elector of the Empire. Some, of whom Oſiander was one, deſigned a perpetual impriſonment for me, unleſs I had been forewarned to make my eſcape. Others again drove me out of my houſe, and writ letters to all the Noblemen of the greater and leſſer Poland and Ruſſia, that none ſhould receive or entertain me, but drive me away. Of this number was that impious hypocrite Felix, together with his brethren of Pinczovia. Others as well in Germany as in Hungary, Tranſylvania, and the leſſer Poland, held many Synods againſt me and the Catholic faith concerning the Trinity and the Mediator, and publiſhed many libels full of Arian and Eutychian blaſphemies, injurious words and horrible aſperſions, in order to ruin me and the pure Catholic doctrine at once. Nevertheleſs they could not prevail, neither indeed ſhall they. For it is hard to kick againſt the pricks, one GOD in Trinity. In this manner did the Emperor Conſtantius, an Arian, hold nine councils with the Arians againſt St Athanaſius, whom they miſerably diſtreſſed by proſcriptions, baniſhments, and perſecutions: but truth was victorious in the end.’ He adds, That the Miniſters of Zurich writ to thoſe of Poland in 1560, to expel him from their churches. Take notice that he compoſed this work at Dubectz in Ruſſia, in the year 1561, and had it printed at Cracow the year following. Staniſlaus Matthew Stadnicki had ſheltered him at Dubectz (60).

[M] Orichovius .... confeſſes that he had married a wife being a prieſt.] So far he confeſſes that his fault was as great as Stancarus's, who had alſo married being a prieſt; but in other reſpects he clears himſelf of the ſin whereof he accuſes his adverſary. He alledges for his vindication, that he had kept within the pale of the Church, and that he abſtained from the ſacerdotal functions after his marriage. Thus he ſubmitted to

(p) Stancarus, de Trinitate & Mediatore, adverſus Tigurin. folio 7, of the ſheet F.

(q) It was printed at Cologne in 1563, in 8vo.

(50) Melch. Adam. in Vita Bullingeri, pag. 494.

(51) Stancarus, de Trinitate & Mediatore adverſus Tigurin. & Genevenſes, folio 6, verſo, of the ſheet F.

(52) Orichovius, in Chimæra, apud Spondanum, ad ann. 1551. See the folio 78, of that book of Orichovius.

(53) Ibid. See alſo Florim. de Remond, lib. ii, ch. xv.

(54) Lindanus, Prateolus, Gaultier.

(55) One of his books is intituled, de Rabinorum & Anabaptiſtarum falſa opinione. Another is intituled, de Locuſtis, juxta Scripturam & Rabinos. See the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca, pag. 245.

(56) Stancarus de Trinitate & Mediatore adverſus Tigurinos, in the laſt leaf but one of the ſheet [K].

(57) Id. ibid.

(58) This is ſo contrary to Melanchthon's genius, that it ought not to be credited.

(59) In the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the ſame book, he ſpeaks thus. Expuliſtis me paralyticum cum familia ex domo mea (non omnes damno) & ex toto regno quantum in vobis fuit. --- Notwithſtanding I was ſick of the Palſy, you drove me and my family out of my houſe, and, as far as in you lay, out of the whole kingdom. Nevertheleſs I do not blame you all.

(60) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of this work.

I ſhall add ſomething to what I have ſaid already. Some authors ſay that he was at Villach (r) when the Biſhop of Cracow ſent for him in the beginning of the year 1550 [N], to teach the Hebrew tongue. They tell us that having eſcaped out of the priſon to which that prelate had confined him (s), he retired to the houſe of Staniſlaus Stadnizki at Dubreczko, and ſet up a ſchool there, which was pretty flouriſhing during the life of Staniſlaus; that after this patron's death he retired to the houſe of Jerom Philippow, and afterwards to the houſe of Nicholas Oleſnicki at Pinczovia. I have quoted (t) a Poliſh author, who places the foundation of the Proteſtant church of Pinczovia in the year 1550; but Regenvolſcius places it in the year 1559 [O]. He obſerves that Stancarus was called from that place by Count Oſtrorog to reform the churches of Great Poland, and that he had for a companion in this work Felix Cruciger (u). Take notice that Stancarus received the degree of Doctor of Phyſic at Baſil, and that Sigiſmund Auguſtus naturalized him in Poland in the year 1569 (x). He died at Stobnitz on the twelfth of November 1574, aged ſeventy-three years. FRANCIS STANCARUS, his ſon, born on the ſecond of October 1562, was miniſter of the church of Oxa till his death which happened on the twenty-eighth of March 1621 (y).

(r) A city of Carinthia.

(s) See the remark [O].

(t) In the body of the article, citation (g).

(u) Taken from Regenvolſcius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Slavon. Provin. pag. 125, 126.

(x) Id. ibid. pag. 414.

(y) Id. ibid.

to the holy canons, and underwent the penance impoſed on married prieſts; but Stancarus married and forſook the church of Rome. (61) Do hoc tibi, atque concedo, me inter ſacerdotes publicos, tantiſper ſacrificaſſe, quoàd licuit, & quoad fas fuit: cùm autem ſacerdos duxiſſem uxorem, à ſacrificio me funditùs removi, & quod Canon jubet, in ordinem redegi, ita unus de multis factus, offero nunc Deo cor contritum & humiliatum, quod ne deſpiciat Deus, ſupplex plebe in media poſco. An ego te imitarer arrogantem, atque contumacem? cui parùm erat viſum mulieroſo ſacerdoti uxorem ducere, cum qua tibi connubii jus aliter non erat, niſi ſi à ſacrificio, & à ſacris adminiſtrandis abſtineres: ni etiam ſacrilegio ſtatas ſolenneſque ceremonias ſacerdotii pollueres, atque impiis in Eccleſiam introductis ſacris, omnia ſacra vetera, unà cum ſacerdotio, ex Eccleſia exterminares. . . . . . (62) Uxorem ego ſacerdos, contra legem duxi: ſed idem tamen ejus legis pœnam ſuſtinui: abrogationem nempe ſacerdotii. Hæc enim mulcta ſola ſequitur meum factum, legis atque Canonis præſcripto. . . . . Cùm factum, Stancare, in ducenda uxore, par ſit noſtrum, audi, quàm ipſius facti conditio ſit inter nos diſpar: tibi enim, in diſſenſione, ac diſſidio, per ſummum Eccleſiæ contemptum, uxor ducta eſt: mihi verò, ſumma voluntate, ac judicio ipſius Eccleſiæ, hæc eadem eſt adjudicata. Quid ita? quia pœnam legis ſuſtinui: & quod obedientem decuit, Canonis juſſu, à ſacris me removi: tu contrà, & pœnam legis contemnis, & ſacris te immiſces. But we muſt not depend upon all that he ſays; he diſſembles and ſuppreſſes what he thinks diſadvantageous in the accuſation. He does not confeſs that he had entirely broke with the church of Rome, and that he had diſputed againſt it a long time. Nevertheleſs this is very true (63): he returned afterwards into the pale of that church; which was the reaſon why Stancarus called him an apoſtate. He ſhuns this blow without confeſſing any thing.

[N] He was at Villach when the Biſhop of Cracow ſent for him . . . . in the year 1550.] I quote Regenvolſcius for my voucher in this fact. Abſente Liſmanino, ſays he (64), ille idem Epiſcopus Cracov. Maciejovius, Franciſcum Stancarum Mantuanum Italum, virum doctum, Villaco evocat, initio A. 1550, ad profeſſionem literarum Hebraicarum in Academia Cracovienſi.

(61) Staniſl. Orichovius, in Chimæra, fol. 5.

(62) Id. ibid. fol. 6.

(63) See Simon Starovolſcius, in Elog. centum Polonorum, pag. 78, 79.

(64) Adrianus Regenvolſcius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Slavonicarum Provinciarum, lib. i, cap. xv, pag. 125.

[O] Regenvolſcius places it in the year 1559.] This ſeems more probable; for if Stancarus, who was called to Cracow in the beginning of the year 1550, ſtopped at divers places after his flight before he went to Pinczovia, it is not eaſy to conceive how he could be at the houſe of Oleſnicki in the year 1550. It therefore ſeems more reaſonable to ſay that it was in the year 1559, when he urged him to drive out the Monks. Ab hoc (Hieronymo Philippovio) Pinczoviam, ad Nicolaum Oleſnicium, qui Pinczoviâ, Monachis ejectis, puram religionem A. 1559 induxit (65). But the ſame author confounds us, by affirming in another place, that Oleſnicki drove out the Monks in the year 1550, and that he was accuſed of this to the king, as likewiſe for having afforded a retreat to Stancarus, of whoſe promotion he gives the following account. 'Epiſcopus Cracovienſis . . . . . Franciſcum Stancarum . . . . . trahi jubet in Caſtellum Lipoviec, ubi 'Epiſcopalis carcer eſt, quinto ab Urbe Cracovia milliari. Sed ex eo, induſtriâ Georgii Nigri famuli ſui, 'conciſo in longas faſcias: uno atquè altero linteo, 'liberatus, Staniſlao Laſſocio ſubcamerario Lancicenſi, 'atque Andrea Triceſio, delabentem expectantibus; 'exceptus, venit in oppidum Dubieczko, ad Staniſlaum Stadnicium, inde Pinczoviam ad Nicolaum 'Oleſnicium (66). - - - - The Biſhop of Cracow . . . . . 'ordered Francis Stancarus . . . . . to be carried to the 'caſtle of Lipoviech, where the epiſcopal priſon is, five miles 'from the city of Cracow. Making his eſcape from thence by 'the contrivance of his ſervant George Niger, who cut a 'pair of ſheets in long pieces, and by the aſſiſtance of Staniſlaus Laſſocius and Andrew Triceſius, who received him 'as he ſlid down, he came to Staniſlaus Stadnizki at Dubrezko, and from thence to Nicholas Oleſnicki at Pinczovia.' He furniſhes us with ſome hints to unravel theſe difficulties, for he obſerves (67) that Oleſnicki was prevailed upon at laſt to diſmiſs Stancarus, and to re-call the Monks, upon condition that they would behave well, which they did not. They run away after, having been guilty of new diſorders, upon which their monaſtery was converted into a ſchool. We may therefore admit two Reformations eſtabliſhed at different times in the city of Pinczovia, the one in the year 1550, and the other in the year 1559. The Hiſtorian is nevertheleſs blameworthy for being ſo indiſtinct in his narratives.

(65) Id. ibid. pag. 126.

(66) Id. ibid. pag. 228.

(67) Ib. p. 229.

STELLINGI.

STELLINGI. It is the name that thoſe Saxons took to whom Lotharius the ſon of Lewis the Debonnaire granted leave to make profeſſion of the Pagan Religion which Charlemaigne had obliged their fathers to renounce. Du Tillet ſpeaks of it; but he does it in much fewer words than an author that has quoted him [A].

[A] Du Tillet ſpeaks of it, but he does it in much fewer words than an author that has quoted him.] The Emperor 'Lotharius . . . . . turned monk at Pruina, 'to do penance for his ſins, particularly for his diſobedience to his father, and becauſe in order to have 'ſuccours againſt his brothers Lewis and Charles the 'Bald, he had reſtored to part of the Saxons, whom 'his grandfather, Charlemaigne, had made Chriſtians, 'their idolatrous worſhip, to which as ſoon as they 'were returned, they took the name of Stellingi, living in full liberty of conſcience, and every man profeſſing what religion he liked beſt (1).' We ſhall ſee how Peter de St Julien enlarges upon this. He had been inveighing againſt liberty of conſcience, and, among other things, he had ſaid (2), that thoſe who aſk it without any reſtriction, ſeem to aſpire at the privileges of the Thelemites in Rabelais, who had cauſed this motto to be put upon the frontiſpiece of their temple, Do what thou wilt; 'and to this purpoſe, continues he (3), I 'remember to have read in the collections of the Recorder du Tillet; that the Emperor Lotharius by 'name, and ſon to Lewis the debonnaire, finding himſelf greatly embarraſſed, by reaſon of the wars he 'was carrying on againſt his brothers, required his

(1) Du Tillet, Recueil des Rois de France, pag. m. 45, See alſo Fauchet, Hiſt. de Charles le Chauve, ch. vii, folio m. 27.

(2) Pierre de Saint Julien, Meſlanges Paradoxales, p. 199.

(3) Id. ibid.

‘Saxon ſubjects to ſuccour him with men and money, which they refuſed to do, unleſs he would grant them a liberty of conſcience. Lotharius, whoſe heart was more ſet upon victory than upon the intereſt of religion, did not then conſider the importance of the Saxons demand, and, without any further reflexion, complied with it. Now theſe Saxons were ſo much addicted to Paganiſm and Idolatry, that tho' Charlemaigne had ſo harraſſed and weakened them by a war of thirty-three years ſtanding, that they had no other way left of ſaving their lives but by receiving baptiſm, they nevertheleſs ſubmitted to it rather out of fear than devotion. Wherefore having now obtained a liberty of conſcience, they plainly diſcovered that the Chriſtian religion, which they had embraced through conſtraint, was not planted in their hearts, and could take no root there. It likewiſe happened that as all ſects are accuſtomed to take their name from their author, or elſe to invent a new one for themſelves, theſe Saxons called themſelves Stellingi, and returned to their former idolatry. Afterwards the Emperor Lotharius, coming to a better way of thinking, was touched with a remorſe of conſcience, (as well for his diſobedience and harſhneſs to his father, as for having taken upon him to diſpenſe the Saxons from their baptiſmal vows and engagements, and preſumed to diſpoſe of their conſciences, which were not at all ſubject to his power and juriſdiction) and quitting the world, (where he had lived without either fearing GOD, or honouring his parents) turned Monk.’

By comparing the words of Peter de Saint Julien with thoſe of du Tillet, one may form a juſt idea of the liberty which many writers take of adding a hundred things to the teſtimony of the authors whom they quote.

It is not neceſſary to make any reflexions upon the maxims of Peter de Saint Julien (4): they have been confuted a thouſand times over by the Advocates for Toleration (5).

(4) See the remark [F], of the article VIRET.

(5) See the remark [F] of the article SANCTESIUS (CLAUDIUS.)

STEPHANUS Byzantinus was an expert Grammarian, who lived in the Vth or VIth century. He compoſed a dictionary, wherein he inſerted the Nouns Adjective derived from the Nouns Subſtantive of places, which ſerved to denote the inhabitants of thoſe Places [A]. This was attended with many obſervations borrowed from Mythology and Hiſtory, which diſcovered the origin of cities and colonies, and their changes and differences, whereby the author equally ſhewed his exactneſs and learning. We have nothing left but a ſorry abridgment of that work, which the Grammarian Hermolaus thought fit to make, and which he dedicated to the Emperor Juſtinian (a). Notwithſtanding the injury this curious book has ſuffered by the ignorance of the abbreviator and tranſcribers, it has proved very uſeful to the learned, who thought that no antient book did better deſerve to be corrected and explained in a critical way. Sigonius, Caſaubon, Scaliger, Salmaſius, &c (b), took upon them to illuſtrate it; but it did not appear in Latin till 1678 [B]. That edition publiſhed at Amſterdam was followed by that of Leyden ten years after. The Dutch diſperſed before-hand ſome ſheets of thoſe editions, which hindred Father Lubin from publiſhing this author, on whom he had (a) Suidas, in Ἑρμόλαος.

(b) See Colomiés's Bibliotheque Choiſie, pag. 46. & ſeq. where you will find the names of ſeveral authors, who have writ upon Stephanus.

[A] The nouns adjective . . . . which ſerved to denote the inhabitants of thoſe places.] The title, περὶ πόλεων, de urbibus, which is commonly given to that work, is neither that which the author, nor that which the abbreviator put to it. The true title of the book was ἐθνικὰ: hence Hermolaus intituled the abridgment he made of it, ἐθνικῶν ἐπιτομή. ‘But becauſe ſeveral perſons have undertaken, at ſeveral times, to abridge this abridgment, and to leave out even the name and the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the firſt abbreviator, it is no wonder if the antient titles of the book are loſt. In the room of which ſome ſmatterers in learning have ſubſtituted this περὶ πόλεων, becauſe they thought the main deſign of the author was to write a Geographical book. But they were miſtaken, his real deſign was to write a Grammatical work, to explain the names derived from nations, cities, and provinces, juſt as if one ſhould explain grammatically the words Pariſian, Frenchman, Dutchman, &c. and ſhew the great variety that may be obſerved in the formation of theſe derivative terms (1).’ This is the opinion of thoſe who have publiſhed Stephanus, as it is related in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres. This opinion might have been criticized upon; for there is no appearance that the principal deſign of this Grammarian was the explication of theſe derivative terms. It was probably the leaſt part of his project, and only an acceſſory to his work. I own he is very careful to obſerve that ſort of nouns, but takes up but little room, compared with the facts that he relates, and the teſtimonies he quotes; which would be more apparent if we had the whole work. There we ſhould find a line or two in an article for the explanation of the noun adjective, derived from the name of a city, and ſometimes whole pages in one article only. I believe, till I be better informed, that the title ἐθνικὰ implies all the obſervations that can be made upon a nation, a city, and a place, in as much as an author confines himſelf to the origin of places and Geographical hiſtory. See in the remark [G] the paſſage of Father Lubin. (2) ‘What is very pleaſant is, that when they cite the author of this book they call him Stephanus de Urbibus, whence it came to paſs that many perſons took de Urbibus to be the name of the author's family. Father Lubin had a mind to call him Stephen of the Cities in his Geographical tables on Plutarch; but having conſulted the gentlemen of the French academy, he could never make them approve his deſign. He ſeems to complain of their hardneſs in his Geographical Mercury (3).’ He was much in the wrong to complain of it.

[B] It did not appear in Latin till the year 1678.] There were three Greek editions, that of Aldus Manutius, that of the Junti, and that of Xylander; but tho' the laſt engaged to publiſh his Latin verſion forthwith, and tho' the continuator of Geſner's Bibliotheca affirmed, that the book of our Stephanus was publiſhed by Xylander in Greek and Latin, in 1568, it is certain it did not thus appear till the year I have mentioned. A Portugueze Jew, named Pinedo, publiſhed it at Amſterdam in 1678, with a Latin tranſlation of his own making, and a commentary (4). Six years after, Mr Rijk, profeſſor at Leyden, publiſhed the notes of Lucas Holſtenius on that ſame book of Stephanus, which he had from Cardinal Francis Barberini. There was a new edition of Stephanus printed at Leyden in 1688, in Greek and Latin, as that of Pinedo: the Latin tranſlation was made by Berkelius (5). This tranſlator added to it a large and learned commentary. His remarks on the laſt letters are ſhorter, and not ſo learned, becauſe he died before the work was printed. Mr Gronovius has much contributed to the amendment of this edition.

[C] Which hindered Father Lubin from publiſhing that author, on whom he had beſtowed much pains.] This diſappointment vexed him, and made him inveigh againſt the Dutch. Here I ſhall tranſcribe the words of a Journaliſt. ‘Having mentioned Father Lubin, I will not forget the indignation he has conceived againſt the Dutch, ſince he has been informed that they were printing Stephanus de Urbibus, with a Latin tranſlation, and a commentary. If you conſult the ſixty-third page of his Geographical Mercury, you may ſee with what anger he ſpeaks. The occaſion of his grief is, that they have maliciouſly ſupplanted him, as he ſays, and deprived him of the fruit of his long ſtudies. He had been ten years tranſlating that book, and corrected the faults of the three editions, by the help of two Greek manuſcripts of the king's library, which had been very obligingly lent him by Mr Carcavi; he had made ſome Geographical notes upon

(1) Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, for July 1684, Art. iv, pag. 485.

(2) Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, ibid. pag. 486.

(3) Pag. 62.

(4) See the judgment which Colomiés paſſes on it in his Bibliotheque, Choiſie, pag. 46.

(5) He was rector of the college of Delft.

had beſtowed much pains [C]. The fragment of Stephanus [D] concerning Dodona, plainly ſhews, that Hermolaus left out a thouſand good things; and becauſe he adds ſometimes ſomething of his own, one cannot certainly tell whether Stephanus Byzantinus made profeſſion of Chriſtianity or not [E], for who knows whether the paſſages wherein he ſeems to ſpeak like a Chriſtian are his? Moreri deſerves to be cenſured [F]. Father Lubin very juſtly obſerves that a great ſervice would be done to the readers, if the Nouns adjectives of inhabitants were inſerted in Geographical Dictionaries [G]. If I might adviſe, I would have them inſerted in the ſecond edition of Furetiere's Dictionary. Mr Colomiés (c) quotes ſome words of Scaliger, which appear very obſcure to me [H].

upon it, filled up the chaſms, and compared all the authorities of the authors cited with the originals that are extant. Thoſe who ſaw his manuſcripts were amazed at his great labour; when lo, the Dutch, all of a ſudden, diſperſed the firſt ſheets of their edition over all Europe, that no Bookſeller might undertake the printing of that book. This is certainly a ſevere blow for an author, and eſpecially for a monk of the order of St Auguſtin, who was going to ſhew the world his great ſkill in the Greek tongue and critical learning, which people will not eaſily believe without plain proofs of it. It is ſo true, that people can hardly believe ſuch a thing, that the Abbot Baudrand having informed the public, in his Dictionary, that Stephanus de Urbibus had been tranſlated and adorned with very learned notes, by the R. F. Lubin; Pinedo writ on purpoſe to Paris to know the truth of it, and was anſwered, that Mr Baudrand had given it out in fide parentum, upon hearſay (6).'

[D] The fragment of Stephanus concerning Dodona.] It was taken from a very antient manuſcript, which was in the library of Mr Seguier, Chancellor of France. Tennulius, profeſſor in the illuſtrious ſchool of Nimeguen, was the firſt that publiſhed it. He added to it a Latin tranſlation, with notes. Berkelius made a ſecond edition of it (7), which contained a new tranſlation of his own, and ſome remarks. Pinedo made a third verſion of it, and publiſhed it at the end of his Stephanus with notes. Mr Grovonius made a fourth edition of it in 1681 (8), wherein the three preceding verſions were to be ſeen: he added to it ſome learned diſſertations.

[E] One cannot certainly tell whether Stephanus . . . . made profeſſion of Chriſtianity.] The reflexion of a Journaliſt ſeems to me very proper to ſhew, what a little command the writers of theſe laſt ages have over their prejudices; for there is hardly any book wherein their unhandſome way of ſpeaking of other religions does not diſcover what religion they profeſs. The reflexion is as follows. 'Although Lucas Holſtenius believed that Stephanus Byzantinus was a Chriſtian, the thing is ſtill diſputable. There are the ſame difficulties concerning Ammianus Marcellinus: ſome ſay he was a Pagan, others maintain that he was not. I conclude from thence, that the writers of this age are infinitely more partial or conceited than the antient. Are there any geographical or hiſtorical Dictionaries, or even Hiſtories, that do not diſcover the partiality of the author for or againſt the Church of Rome? It will never be diſputed in future ages, whether Moreri, the Abbot Baudrand, &c. were Roman Catholics or Proteſtants. One may know the ſect of a Grammarian by the very rudiments of a Grammar (9).' If I was to give my opinion, I had rather ſay, that our Stephanus was a Chriſtian (10), than that he was a Pagan, as a very learned man will have it; and had he always related the ridiculous opinions of the Heathens, without criticizing on them, it would be no crime. 'Non eſt igitur audiendus Septimius Florens Chriſtianus, quem non puduit Stephanum auctorem Ethnicum appellare; in Commentariis ſuis ad Ariſtoph. Irenam p. 77. (11). - - We ought not therefore to believe Septimius Florens a Chriſtian, who in his Commentaries on Ariſtophanes's Irena has not bluſhed to call Stephanus a Pagan writer.'

[F] Moreri deſerves to be cenſured.] For he refers his reader to a book that was never publiſhed, and ſays nothing at all of Pinedo's edition. Father Lubin, an Auguſtin, ſays he, has tranſlated it into Latin, and hath added to it very learned remarks. See his tranſlation. Would any man doubt, after the reading of theſe words, that Father Lubin's Stephanus has been actually publiſhed? I believe Moreri thought ſo, but however he deceived his readers. He had read in Mr Baudrand (12), 'Quod (opus Stephani) nunc Latinum reddidit, reſtituit, & notis illuſtravit doctiſſimis P. Auguſtinus Lubin Auguſtinianus. - - - Which book of Stephanus is now turned into Latin, reſtored, and illuſtrated with very learned notes, by Father Lubin, an Auguſtin Friar.' He did not doubt, after ſuch a teſtimony, that he might ſpeak as poſitively as he did. Mr Baudrand made a good uſe of Pinedo's reflexion (13); he declared in his new edition, that Father Lubin's work was not yet printed (14). Such a clauſe ſhould never be forgotten, by thoſe who mention a work that is ſtill in the author's ſtudy.

[G] Father Lubin had reaſon to believe, that a great ſervice would be done, if the Nouns Adjectives of inhabitants were inſerted . . . . .] Here follows the paſſage which I promiſed above. You will find in it, among other things, the author's thoughts about the deſign of Stephanus. The deſign of Stephanus de Urbibus was, ſays he (15), to teach his ſcholars the Greek Hiſtory; and leſt in reading they ſhould take the people of one city for that of another, he made it his buſineſs, ſpeaking of cities, to obſerve τὰ ἐθνικὰ of them, which we may tranſlate the familiar names (16) that are given to thoſe people, derived from the name of the city where they dwell; for inſtance, ἀντιόχεια, τὸ ἐθνικὸν ἀντιοχεύς, ἀθῆναι, ὁ πολίτης ἀθηναῖος. We have good reaſon to wiſh, that ſome learned man would undertake the ſame thing about Latin names of towns, adding to them the derivative name by which the inhabitants are called; as from Roma, Romanus, from Carthago, Carthaginenſis. The ſame might be done in our own language, and it would not be unbecoming a man of parts to obſerve how the inhabitants of our cities and provinces are called, how an inhabitant of Bretagne is called a Breton, of Anjou an Angevin, of Paris a Pariſian, and the like of others: the reading of our Hiſtories would be more pleaſant, and there would not be ſo many faults in our tongue; thoſe derivative words ſhould not be wanting in our Geographical Dictionaries.

[H] Some words of Scaliger, which appear to me very obſcure.] 'Pinedo does not obſerve in his preface that Nicolas Sophianus had in his poſſeſſion an entire Stephanus: Præter alios codices Græcos, ſays Scaliger in a letter to Gruterus, quos Nic. Sophianus habebat, erat & integer Stephanus cum toto Κ & Λ, quæ hodie imperfecta circumferri non ignoras (17). - - - Beſides other Greek manuſcripts in the poſſeſſion of Nicholas Sophianus, there was an entire Stephanus with the letters K and L whole, which, as you very well know, are now imperfect.' I cannot apprehend what he means by an entire Dictionary, with the whole letters K and L; it is a riddle to me. Juſt as if one ſhould ſay, that a man has read the whole New Teſtament, with the Goſpel of St John and the Acts of the Apoſtles (§ a).

[§ a) If after the word Stephanus in the Scaligerana, one was to read nempè, to wit, the ſenſe would be more diſtinct; but it is clear enough without that, and ſo great an exactneſs of expreſſion is not neceſſary in ſuch a familiar diſcourſe as this, which perhaps after all belongs leſs to Scaliger than to thoſe who compiled the Scaligerana. Rem. Crit.]

(c) Colomiés, ubi ſupra, p. 49.

(6) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, ubi ſupra, pag. 487.

(7) At Leyden, 1674, in 8vo.

(8) That edition is in 4to.

(9) Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, ubi ſupra, pag. 486.

(10) See in Berkelius's preface, the paſſages which ſhew that Stephanus was a Chriſtian

(11) Berkelius, ibid.

(12) Ad Philipp. Ferrarii Alexandrini Lexicon Geographicum, Tomo ii, folio 357, citante Pinedo in Præfatione.

(13) Cum hujus ſcrutandi gratia ad amicum quemdam literas dediſſem, ille lepide reſcripſit, illud à Michaele Antonio Baudrand dictum fuiſſe in fide parentum. - - - Having writ to a friend for information, I received this pleaſant anſwer from him that Michael Antony Baudrand had affirmed ſuch a thing upon the faith of tradition. Pinedo, ibid.

(14) Ejus opus notis nondum editis illuſtravit P. Auguſtinus Lubin. Baudrand Geograph. Tom. ii, pag. 444.

(15) Mercure Geographique, pag. 64.

(16) The word familiar ſeems here to be very improper.

(17) Colomiés, ubi ſupra, p. 49.

STEVIN (Simon) one of the beſt Mathematicians of the XVIth century, was born at Bruges, and ſettled in Holland, where he was alſo made Overſeer of the dikes (a). He was in high eſteem with Maurice of Naſſau Prince of Orange who loved and underſtood the Mathematics very well. The books which Stevin publiſhed met with a good reception [A]. He invented a kind of ſailing chariots, which went very faſt [B]. One of his beſt productions is his treatiſe upon Staticks [C].

[A] The books which Stevin publiſhed met with a good reception.] He publiſhed a book of Arithmetic in French, in the year 1585, printed by Plantin at Antwerp in 8vo. Problematum Geometricorum Libri V, in the year 1583 in 4to (1), and divers other treatiſes in Flemiſh, moſt of which have been tranſlated into Latin by Willebrord Snellius; but that on the finding out of harbours was tranſlated by Grotius (2). The works of Stevin were collected and publiſhed in Latin in the year 1608, and in French in the year 1634, in folio. Here follows a particular account of the titles according to the French edition. The work is divided into ſix volumes, the firſt of which contains his Arithmetic, that is, the computations of Vulgar or Arithmetical numbers: likewiſe Algebra with the equations of the five quantities. The ſix books of Algebra by Diophantus of Alexandria, the four firſt of which are tranſlated by Simon Stevin, and the laſt two are done newly by Albert Girard, Samielois. The practice of Arithmetic by Simon Stevin, containing the tables of Intereſt, Decimals; likewiſe a treatiſe of incommenſurable quantities with the explication of the tenth book of Euclid. The ſecond volume comprehends Coſmography, that is to ſay the doctrine of Triangles, Geography, and Aſtronomy. The third comprehends the practice of Geometry. The fourth the ſcience of Weights or Staticks. The fifth Opticks. The ſixth Caſtrametation, Fortification by Sluices, and general Fortification. Obſerve that the 2d, 3d, 4th and 5th volumes are intitled Mathematical Memoirs of Prince Maurice, Grotius (3) made a fine poem upon this part of Stevin's works. The French tranſlator's name was Albert Girard: he reviſed, corrected, and enlarged, the former editions. It is eaſy to diſtinguiſh what is his. About a year after his death his widow and eleven children dedicated to the States-General the Mathematical works of Stevin, which he had tranſlated, and which were printed (4) in the year 1634, as I have already taken notice.

[B] He invented a kind of ſailing chariots which went very faſt.] Valerius Andreas ſpeaks of them in this manner. ‘Inventor fuit Curruum velivolorum apud Batavos, quos ne equus quidem, licet celeritate ingenti præſtans, longe ſpatio æquare poſſit. Ferunt enim ſedentes in ejuſmodi curru duarum horarum ſpatio leucas Hollandicas quatuor, videlicet Sceveringâ Pettenum uſque confeciſſe (5). - - - He invented chariots with ſails in Holland, which the ſwifteſt horſe could not long keep up with. For it is reported that people ſitting in one of theſe chariots did in the ſpace of two hours travel four Dutch leagues, viz. from Sceveringh to Putten.’ Voſſius affirms the ſame thing (6). Grotius has writ a Poem intitled Iter Currus veliferi (7), which is a beautiful deſcription of their method of ſailing in thoſe chariots.

[C] One of his beſt productions is his treatiſe upon Statics.] Swertius affirms, that Stevin ſo throughly underſtood the Statics, that he could raiſe any burthen whatſoever with ſmall ſtrength and an eaſy machine (8). Valerius Andreas makes uſe of the ſame words as Swertius; but he adds, that this inſtrument was called Pantocrator, - - all-ſufficient, and he quotes Adrian of Rome, as a perſon who had given this teſtimony to Simon Stevin (9). We find in Voſſius (10) an exact idea of Stevin's treatiſe upon Statics; but he calls the inſtrument by the name of Pancratium. Let us obſerve a groſs error in Valerius Andreas: he ſays (11) that the method of finding out harbours is what they call Statics, a very noble and abſtruſe part of the Mathematics, and in a manner reared anew by Stevin, whoſe treatiſe on that ſubject is incomparable, and has been tranſlated by Grotius. Certain it is, that Grotius put into Latin what Stevin had writ in Flemiſh on the art of finding out harbours. But this is no part of Statics. Stevin treats of that in the fifth book of his Geography. This book in the French tranſlation is intitled Du Trouve-Port, ou la maniere de trouver les Havres (12).

(a) Valer. Andr. Bibliotheca Belg. pag. 813.

(1) Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 813.

(2) See Voſſius de Scient. Mathem. pag. m. 259, 285.

(3) See the ſecond book of his Sylvæ, pag. 62, & ſeq. edition. Poëmatum 1617.

(4) At Leyden for Bonaventure and Abraham Elzevir.

(5) Valer. Andr. ubi ſupra.

(6) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, cap. lvii, num. 19, pag. 337.

(7) See Grotii Poemata, ubi ſupra, pag. 224.

(8) Adeo rei ponderariæ peritus fuit, ut nullum offerri illi poſſet pondus, quantumvis grave, quod non parvis viribus ac facili inſtrumento movere potuiſſet. Swert. Athen. Belg. pag. 677.

(9) Valer. Andr. ubi ſupra.

(10) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, cap. xlvii, num. 11, pag. 284, 285.

(11) Valer. Andr. ubi ſupra.

(12) See page 170, of the Mathematical Works of Stevin, Edit. of Leyden 1634.

STIFELIUS (Michael) a Lutheran miniſter in the village of Holtzdorff near Wirtemberg, lived in the XVIth century. He perſuaded his hearers that the end of the world would come on the third of October 1533 at ten in the morning. He had made this fine diſcovery by the computation of ſquare numbers [A]; but he gave it out as a revelation from Heaven. A great number of country people ſuffered themſelves to be ſo infatuated with this notion, that they neglected their work and ſpent their ſubſtance. The day appointed being come Stifelius got into the pulpit, and exhorted his hearers to be ready, for that the moment was at hand in which they were to aſcend into Heaven with the ſame cloaths they had on. The hour paſſed, but nothing appeared of what they expected, and Stifelius himſelf began to be in doubt, when ſuddenly a ſtorm aroſe which revived his hopes, and made him renew his exhortations: behold, ſaid he, the prelude to the laſt judgment. The ſtorm laſted but a ſhort time, and the peaſants that were aſſembled there ſoon perceived that the ſky was clear. Upon this they grew angry with their miniſter, dragged him out of his pulpit, bound him, and carried him to Wirtemberg; where they accuſed him as an impoſtor, and inſiſted upon ſome reparation being made to them. It is ſaid that their pretenſions and complaints were declared void, and that Stifelius by the intereſt of Luther was re-eſtabliſhed in his church. Hanard Gameren gives a pleaſant account of this in the IXth Eclogue of his Bucolics (a). Tilman Bredenbach recites it intire (b), after having related the adventure in proſe. I ſhould not be very ready to believe theſe two authors, if I did not find it related

[A] He had made this fine diſcovery by the computation of ſquare numbers.] Others ſay that it was by the numeral letters of a paſſage of ſcripture. ‘Ex ſupputatione quadratorum numerorum, tanquam ex divina revelatione, diem ultimi judicii futurum prædixit Anno 1533. 3. Octob. circa 10. diei horam. . . . . . Referunt nonnulli Stifelium collegiſſe, vaticinium ſuum ex verbis iſtis, VIDebVnt In qVeM transfIXerVnt, quorum literæ numerales continent numerum 1533 (1). - - - He foretold, by the computation of ſquare numbers, &c. . . . . . Others ſay that Stifelius collected that prophecy from theſe words, VIDebVnt In qVeM transfIXerVnt (they ſhall look upon him whom they have pierced) the numeral letters of which include the number 1533.’ Is it not a deplorable caſe, that the mind of man ſhould be liable to ſuch groſs illuſions, and that theſe ſhould be ſo catching.

(a) He was a native of the country of Liege, and he taught the Greek tongue in the univerſity of Ingolſtad. See Valerius Andreas's Bibliotheca Belgica, pag. 339.

(b) In the 32d chapter of the 7th book Sacrarum Collationum, pag. m. 707. It is from him that Florimond de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, livr. ii, ch. vi, num. 7, has taken it.

(1) Marcus Fridericus Wendelinus, Contemplat. Phyſicarum §. ii, cap. xvi, pag. 322.

related by an eminent Proteſtant Divine [B]. It is true he does not mention Luther nor the ſtorm which rouzed the expectation of the auditory afreſh. Spondanus tells this ſtory with other circumſtances [C]. I do not think that we ought to diſtinguiſh this Stifelius from him whoſe Arithmetical works were highly commended, and who died in the year 1567 [D], nor from him to whom Luther writ the letters of which I ſpeak

[B] If I did not find it related by an eminent Proteſtant Divine.] It is Marcus Fridericus Wendelinus. He relates it in the ſixteenth chapter of the ſecond ſection of his Contemplations upon Phyſics. That chapter is intitled De tempore excidii mundani, and contains a long catalogue of falſe ſuppoſitions concerning the time of the end of the world. Wendelinus, who writ this in the year 1624 could not confute by the event all thoſe of whom he ſpeaks. He could not prove a falſhood (2) upon Philip Nicolai, who ſaid that the world would come to an end in the year 1670; nor upon Oſiander who had aſſigned the year 1689; nor upon him who aſſigned the year 1700, to confute whom Remalcus writ a book on purpoſe. When Wendelinus compoſed that chapter, Germany was full of predictions about the end of the world, or the concluſion of the wars which at that time diſtreſſed Europe. Si præſentium temporum, ſays he, Prophetias de fine ſeculi liberet examinare, volumen ſatis ſpiſſum labor hic abſumeret: Quod enim Germaniæ noſtræ eſt antrum, quod de fine ſeculi, & præſentium turbarum eventu vaticinia non ſpirat (3)? He ſays that for three years before divers pamphlets were ſpread about, ſignifying that the golden age was to begin in the year 1624. He mentions one Nagelius, who had foretold ſurpriſing revolutions, and was a man of ſo great obſtinacy, that however contrary an event proved to his predictions, he would ſtill maintain that they were true. He always brought himſelf off by aſking a further delay. De anno, quem jam agimus, à Chriſto nato milleſimum ſexcenteſimum viceſimum quartum, quot quæſo per Orbem, intra triennii ſpacium, chartæ volitarunt, quæ aurei in eum ſeculi exordium conjecerunt? Inter Prophetas hoſce familiam ducit Paulus Nagelius, qui vaticiniis ſuis planè Propheticâ fiducia promulgatis, multorum animos hactenus ſuſpenſos tenuit; dum inſignium mutationum momenta in Calendariis ſuis notavit. Scriptis etiam compluribus neſcio quas viſiones & arcanorum apocalypſes prædicavit, tantâ animi fiduciâ, ut ne ab eventu quidem contraria monſtrante, vaticiniorum ſuorum veritatem ſuſpectam debere reddi contenderit. Saxonicis ſubinde, ad fidem impetrandam dilationibus ſibi indultis. Mihi quidem, aliorum exemplo, virum illum exagitare non eſt animus; in quo unum hoc probo, quod ſeriâ vitæ noſtræ emendatione imminentes pœnas effugere publicus pœnitentiæ præco jubet. Attamen vitio, opinor, nemo mihi vertet, ſi majorem illi vel in arcanis revelandis ſapientiam, vel in ignotis reticendis prudentiam exoptem (4).

What has been ſaid will occaſionally ſerve to ſhew the fanatic Nagelius in a proper light, and to prove that the ſtory which Gameren has put into verſe is not without a foundation, ſince Wendelinus relates it among ſeveral others which are very certain.

I make no doubt but Philip Camerarius, a Proteſtant writer, meant the ſame Stifelius in the following paſſage. ‘It is very well known in our parts what the reaſons ‘were which a parſon (5) of our time, a man of tolerable learning and a great Arithmetician, alledged, ‘not with any ill deſign, as I think, but becauſe he ‘truſted too much to his numbers and calculations, ‘grounded upon four words of one of the Evangeliſts, ‘Videbunt in quem pupugerunt, from which he drew ‘his computations, taking the ſix V. the two I. the ‘D. and M. and out of theſe forming a cypher of ‘years, to make his pariſhioners believe in an arithmetical ſermon, with which he entertained them, ‘that the end of the world was come, ſo as to aſſign ‘the day and the hour. He ſo much inſiſted upon ‘it, that many ſimpletons gave credit to him, and, ‘as the cuſtom of fools is, they reſolved before every ‘thing periſhed to live merrily, and ſo they ſpent ‘their all in good eating and drinking. . . . . When ‘the day and hour fixed by him was near, thoſe who ‘had believed in his ſermons met in a chapel, very ‘devoutly expecting the end of the world; and that ‘they might be the better prepared for it, he preached ‘a new ſermon to them, ſuited to this fancy of his. ‘Before he had done, there aroſe a violent ſtorm in ‘the air with thunder and lightening, which was ‘part of his prophecy. This made the poor creatures ‘imagine that their hour for leaving the world was ‘come. But ſoon after the ſtorm ceaſed, and the ſky ‘appeared as it was before; upon which the miſerable ‘pariſhioners perceiving that the parſon had impoſed ‘upon them, and that they had been fooliſhly induced ‘by his perſwaſion to ſit at table longer than it was ‘convenient for them, enraged at ſuch an affront, ‘were preparing to fall foul upon him, with an intention to drub him ſoundly, nay marry to diſpatch ‘him upon the ſpot, if he had not quickly made his ‘eſcape, and if ſome of them, more compoſed than ‘the reſt, had not mitigated their anger (6).’ Simon Goulart, Camerarius's French tranſlator, obſerves in his additions that there were ſome moderns who, laying down falſe principles, and making groundleſs ſuppoſitions, have preſumed to fix the end of the world about the year 1696 (7). The event has ſhewn that they were miſtaken.

Perhaps it will be aſked whether it is better to follow Camerarius who puts down the year 1532, or Wendelinus who puts 1533, and who ſuppoſes that Stifelius made uſe of the word transfixerunt, and not of pupugerunt, in the paſſage of the Evangeliſt? I anſwer ſome people affirm that Stifelius had adopted both theſe calculations. See Spondanus's narrative in the following remark.

[C] Spondanus tells this ſtory with other circumſtances.] Michael Stifelius, ſays he (8), an apoſtate Monk, born at Eſlingen, propheſied that the end of the world would come in the month of October 1532. He took Luther for that angel of the Revelation who flew through the midſt of heaven, in order to preach the goſpel to the inhabitants of the earth; and as for himſelf he fancied that he was the ſeventh angel, whoſe trumpet was to proclaim the end of the world *. He was not inclinable to proclaim this coming of JESUS CHRIST, but the expreſs command of GOD obliged him to it. Having communicated his thoughts to Luther, he wrote a book wherein he declared that in the tenth month of the year 1533, on the ſecond day of the forty-ſecond week, at eight a clock of the morning, JESUS CHRIST would come upon earth to judge the world. He grounded his calculation upon thoſe words, JESUS NAZARENUS REX JUDÆORUM, and upon theſe VIDEBUNT IN QUEM TRANSFIXERUNT. The numeral letters of the firſt paſſage give 1532: thoſe of the ſecond 1533. The year 1532 being elapſed, he was ſo obſtinately perſuaded that his prediction would be accompliſhed in the year 1533, that he was amazed at Luther's adviſing him to have other thoughts, and at his not ſeeing a thing ſo evident. The 18th of October, which was St Luke's day, not proving to be the day of judgment, as he had poſitively affirmed it would, every body laughed at his predictions. Nevertheleſs though he was impriſoned at Wittemberg, he ſeverely reprimanded Luther for exhorting him to be more wiſe, and to profit by the double experience of his miſtake, and perſiſted all his life in the vain employment of changing his hypotheſis by the ſuperſtitious virtue of numbers. He died in the year 1567, aged fourſcore (9). Selneccerus, who was preſent at his death, ſays that he received it with ſigns of mockery. Luther, who held it raſh in Stifelius to prefix a certain time, was nevertheleſs firmly perſuaded that the end of the world was to come ſoon, and he always expected it after the vernal Equinox in the month of April about Eaſter-tide, when every thing that the winter had killed returns to life. He thought he had reaſon to believe that JESUS CHRIST would return at that time. So ſays Spondanus, but he brings no quotation to vouch for him. Mr Teiſſier and Moreri have erred about the cypher: for they quote Spondanus as having applied this fact to the year 1553.

[D] I do not think that we ought to diſtinguiſh this Michael Stifelius from him whoſe arithmetical works were highly commended, and who died in the year 1567.] Quenſted ſpeaks of one Michael Stifelius born at Eſlingen ſpeak elſewhere (c), and who was miniſter at Eſslingen in the year 1525 (d). He was expelled that church, and retired into Auſtria, where he was preacher to a perſon of quality (e) to whom Luther recommended him as a learned, pious, modeſt, and diligent man (f). They were obliged to diſmiſs him in the year 1527 (g). He had been an Auguſtin-friar at Eſslingen (h). He writ a Poem in the German tongue upon the conformity of Luther's doctrine with that of Jeſus Chriſt (i). For the reſt, he was not the only perſon that inſpired the country people with indoIence under pretext that the end of the world was near. Bredenbach tells us that one Campanus did the ſame thing in the country of Juliers [E].

---

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 324.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 326, 327.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) It is in the Latin quidam Parochus.

(6) Camerarius, Meditations Hiſtor. Tom. i, livr. iii, chap. i, pag. 203, Lyon 1610.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 208.

(8) Spondan. ad ann. 1533, num. 15.

* Revelat. X.

(9) Permanſit uſque ad vitæ exitum (qui contigit anno Chriſti 1567 octogenario) in ſuis ſubinde renovatis fatuitatibus ex numerorum vana ſuperſtitione. Id. ibid.

(c) In the remarks [B] and [H] of the article BORE.

(d) Seckend. Hiſt. Luther. lib. ii, pag. 16.

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 84.

(f) Id. ibid. lib. iii, pag. 122.

(g) Id. ibid.

(h) Idem, in Scholiis ad I Indicem, num. 76.

(i) Id. ibid.

Eſslingen upon the Necker, a great Arithmetician, and paſtor to ſome Evangelical Churches: 'Cujus 'libri Arithmetici, adds he, reconditiore numerorum 'ſcientia referti in magno, uti debent, pretio inter 'doctos habentur (10). - - - Whoſe arithmetical books 'are filled with a deeper knowledge of numbers, and on 'that account are deſervedly in great eſteem with the 'learned.' Thuanus makes uſe of the ſame words, ſpeaking of the death of Stifelius in the year 1567: a man, as he obſerves, who had been a long time Profeſſor in Saxony and Pruſſia, and who died at Iena in Thuringia, when he was fourſcore years of age (11). According to Voſſius he died there at the age of fifty-eight (12); but I am more inclined to believe Bucholcer, who ſays that he died in that place on the 19th of April 1567, in the 81ſt year of his age, after having been miniſter to ſeveral churches in Saxony and Pruſſia (13). I do indeed believe that he was not a Profeſſor, as Thuanus pretends; but a parſon. However that be, his arithmetical works are called very exact by the ſame Bucholcer. You will find in Voſſius (14), 1, That Poſſevin has obſerved that Stifelius's Arithmetic printed at Nuremberg, with a Preface by Melanchthon, has the approbation of great men. 2, That in the opinion of Joſeph Blancanus (15) the method in which Stifelius has treated Algebra, and all the parts of Arithmetic, is an excellent one. Voſſius places the edition of his complete Arithmetic in the year 1544, and obſerves that Stifelius publiſhed a ſyſtem of Arithmetic according to the Italian practice, a treatiſe of Algebra, and likewiſe an eccleſiaſtical computation in the German tongue.

You will obſerve that Wendelinus, Spondanus, &c. agree that the Stifelius who foretold the end of the world was an excellent Arithmetician.

Apply here the reflexion which I made (16) upon the long life of Comenius.

[E] Bredenbach tells us that one Campanus did the ſame thing in the country of Juliers.] He inſinuates as if an artful fellow had encouraged this man in his whimſical notions, in order that he might purchaſe at a cheaper rate the lands of the credulous country people. I ſhall give the ſtory compleat, and obſerve that it is taken from Lindanus, who is not a very authentic writer. 'Perſuaſerat Joannes Campanus miſeris ruſticis, non longè à fluvio Rura degentibus, 'quod vel hodie res ipſa loquitur, & teſtantur vicini, 'ne amplius auſteri ſeſe frangerent agriculturæ laboribus: non ſeſe fruſtra duris vexarent, diutius fatigarent, enecarent, fodiendi, arandi, metendi ſudoribus; inſtare diem judicii; brevi omnia inundationibus aquarum delenda: indulgerent genio igitur: 'molliter ſeſe tractarent, ſuavius viverent, quod miſellæ ſupererat vitæ ruſticanæ, omnia prope diem 'certo certius peritura. Illi ſtolidi ſtolido ac deliro 'Prophetæ creduli ſuos vendunt agellos: qui illos 'emit ſenſis non fruſtrà ſeſe illum aluiſſe Prophetam (17). - - - John Campanus had perſuaded the poor 'peaſants near the river Rura, as the thing itſelf appears at this day, and as their neighbours teſtify, that 'they ſhould no longer conſume their ſtrength by the rough 'labours of huſbandry, nor haraſs, fatigue, and kill themſelves to no purpoſe, by the heavy toils of digging, ploughing, and reaping; for that the day of judgment was at 'hand, and every thing was in a ſhort time to be deſtroyed by a deluge of water. For this reaſon he exhorted them to make much of themſelves, and to ſpend 'the poor remains of their country life in eaſe and pleaſure, nothing being more certain than that all things 'were ſoon to periſh. Thoſe poor creatures giving credit 'to a ſimple and delirious prophet ſold their lands: you 'may gueſs that the perſon who bought them did not 'keep that prophet for nothing.' He quotes afterwards an epigram of Martial upon a man, who had ſpent a very great eſtate in leſs than a year, becauſe an Aſtrologer had foretold him that he was to die ſoon.

Dixerat aſtrologus periturum te cito, Munna,
 Nec, puto, mentitus dixerat ille tibi.
Nam tu dum metuis, ne quid poſt fata relinquas,
 Hauſiſti patrias luxurioſus opes.
Biſque tuum decies non toto tabuit anno:
 Dic mihi, non hoc eſt, Munna, perire cito (18)?

Munna, th' Aſtrologer conjectur'd well
Who did that you ſhould periſh ſoon foretel:
Since while you haſten'd to prevent your fate,
In luxury you ſpent your whole eſtate,
And were in leſs than one ſhort twelve-month found
To have conſum'd two hundred thouſand pound.
Now, Munna, tell me, ſince the caſe is ſo,
Is this to periſh very ſoon or no.

Compare with this the conſequences of the great promiſes of Comenius (19), and theſe words of Camerarius: 'Niſeus, tyrant of Syracuſe, did as much (20) a 'great while ago; for being told by a Soothſayer that 'the end of his life drew near, he ſpent all that he 'had upon feaſts, looſe women, and other debauches 'of the like nature. The ſame thing is ſaid to have 'happened in our days to a rich man at Lyons, who 'having cauſed a calculation of his nativity to be 'made, and fancying that his death was certainly 'foretold, very raſhly diſtributed all his wealth, as 'if he had had one foot already in the grave, ſo 'that he left himſelf nothing. But being deceived by 'the Aſtrologer, he was forced to beg charity for his 'ſubſiſtence, having lived to a great age, and much 'longer than he expected (21).'

(10) Quenſt. de Patriis Illuſtr. pag. 164.

(11) Thuanus, lib. xli, pag. m. 832.

(12) Voſſius, de Scientiis Mathem. pag. m. 317.

(13) Bucholc. Index Chronol. ad ann. 1567, pag. 620.

(14) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, he quotes Poſſevin, Biblioth. Sel. lib. xv, cap. iii, pag. 182. Edit. Rome.

(15) In Mathematicorum Chronologia, pag. 60.

(16) In the remarks [I] and [K], of article COMENIUS.

(17) Bredenbachius, Sacrarum Collationum, lib. xxxiii, pag. m. 711, ex Lindano lib. i, cap. ix, de fugiendis Idolis.

(18) Martial. Epigr. lxxxiv, lib. ix.

(19) See the remark [K], of the article COMENIUS.

(20) That is to ſay, as much as the peaſants, of whom he had been juſt ſpeaking, as we have ſeen in the remark [B].

(21) Camerarius, ubi ſupra, pag. 203.

STILPO

STILPO, a native of Megara, was one of the moſt famous antient Philoſophers. He was either diſciple of Euclid himſelf, or of ſome of Euclid's diſciples; and acquired ſuch a reputation by his eloquence, and the acuteneſs of his wit, that people left the other ſchools in crowds to go to Megara, in order to improve by his lectures (a). In a journey he made to Athens, trades-people left their ſhops to ſee him (b). Being jeſted upon by reaſon of that curioſity, he had an anſwer ready [A]. Some ſay he kept

(a) Diogen. Laertius, lib. ii, num. 113.

(b) Id. ibid. num. 119.

[A] Being jeſted upon by reaſon of that curioſity, he had an anſwer ready.] Every body is eager to ſee you, ſaid one to him, they admire you as a wild beaſt; ſuch an eagerneſs is like that which people expreſs to ſee a bear or an elephant. You are miſtaken, anſwered he, they admire me as a true man. θαυμάζουσί σε ὡς θηρίον· οὐ μὲν οὖν, εἶπεν ἀλλ' ὡς ἄνθρωπον ἀληθινόν. Admirantur te veluti belluam. Minime, inquit ille, ſed velut hominem verum (1). This thought was not unlike that of Diogenes the Cynic, who, with a lanthorn in his hand, looked for a man in ſuch places where he ſaw moſt people. The men he ſaw having not a human reality and perfection, ſeemed to him counterfeit men; they had nothing of the man but the name. In this ſenſe Stilpo, a true and real man, ſhould have been accounted by the Athenians kept a miſtreſs beſides his lawful wife; but this is not certain [B]. He was naturally very much given to wine and women; and yet it did not appear that he made himſelf drunk, or that he lived a leud life: he had corrected the bad inclinations of his temper by the ſtudy of Philoſophy [C]. The fear of the gods did not work that effect in him; for he is reckoned among Atheiſts, or among thoſe Philoſophers, who had little religion [D]. Some alledge, as a proof of his impiety, a thing which happened nians a more ſcarce and admirable animal, for which trades-people ſhould leave their work, than the moſt extraordinary beaſts of the Indies.

(1) Diogenes Laertius, lib. ii, num. 119.

[B] Some ſay that he kept a miſtreſs . . . but this is not certain.] Diogenes Laërtius ſays ſo only upon the credit of an inconſiderable author. Καὶ γυναῖκα ἠγάγετο, καὶ ἑταίρῃ συνῆν Νικαρέτῃ, ὥς φησί πȣ καὶ Ὀνήτωρ: Ac præter uxorem quam duxerat, Nicarete etiam pellice utebatur, ut Onetor ait (2). - - - - Onetor ſays, that, beſides a wife he had married, he likewiſe kept Nicarete, a concubine. Had there been any ground for this ſlander, Athæneus would not have forgot to mention it, ſince he makes it his buſineſs to cry down every body upon that account, eſpecially the Poets, the Wits, and the Philoſophers. But he only ſays that Nicarete, a courtezan, illuſtrious for her birth and learning, heard Stilpo's lectures. Would he not have added, that ſhe was his concubine, if he had believed what Onetor ſays of it? Νικαρέτη δὲ ἡ Μεγαρὶς (3) ἐκ ἀγεννὴς ἦν ἑταίρα, ἀλλὰ καὶ γονέων καὶ κατὰ παιδείαν ἐπέραστ☉ ἦν. ἠκρόατο δὲ Στίλπων☉ τȣ̃ φιλοσόφȣ. Megarenſis quoque Nicarete non obſcura & ignobilis meretrix fuit, ſed & natalium ſplendore, & doctrinâ perquàm amabilis. Philoſopho namque Stilponi operam dederat (4). See in the following remark the glorious teſtimony that was given to our Philoſopher's perfect chaſtity.

[C] He had corrected the bad inclinations of his temper by the ſtudy of Philoſophy.] This we find in a paſſage of Cicero. 'Stilponem Megaricum philoſophum, acutum ſanè hominem, & probatum temporibus illis accepimus. Hunc ſcribunt ipſius familiares & ebrioſum, & mulieroſum fuiſſe: neque hoc ſcribunt vituperantes, ſed potiùs ad laudem: vitioſam enim naturam ab eo ſic edomitam, & compreſſam eſſe doctrina, ut nemo unquam vinolentum illum, nemo in eo libidinis veſtigium viderit (5). - - - - We are told that Stilpo, of Megara, the Philoſopher, was truly a man of parts, and had a very good character in thoſe times. His acquaintances relate that he had a ſtrong inclination for wine and women; nor do they write this in a cenſorious way, but rather as commending him: for he ſo curbed and ſubdued the vitious tendency of his nature, by the help of Philoſophy, that no body ever ſaw him drunk, nor perceived in him the leaſt ſymptom of leudneſs.' We ſhall ſee below the noble encomiums beſtowed upon his virtue by Plutarch (6), and Athenæus (7).

[D] He is reckoned among Atheiſts, or among thoſe Philoſophers who had little religion.] He ſpoke his thoughts too freely; ſo that he was baniſhed, notwithſtanding the ſubterfuges wherewith he endeavoured to rectify his expreſſions in the Areopagus. I ſhall uſe La Mothe le Vayer's words, and at the ſame time correct them when there is occaſion for it. Stilpo was more cautious; for being aſked, at an improper time, by Crates, whether our prayers and worſhip are acceptable to the gods, he ſmartly anſwered, that ſuch a queſtion ſhould not be aſked in the ſtreet, but in private, and in a cloſet: which is the ſame anſwer that Dion (8) made to another, who aſked him, whether or no there were any gods. The great Pontiff Cotta gave alſo the ſame anſwer to Velleius, who ſuppoſed that it was a very difficult thing to deny the exiſtence of the gods. Credo, ſays he, ſi in concione quæratur, ſed in ejuſmodi ſermone & conſeſſu facillimum. But Stilpo found himſelf much perplexed upon another occaſion, being ſummoned to appear before the Areopagites for ſaying that the Minerva of Phidias was not a god: neverthelesſ he came off cunningly enough, by ſaying that ſhe was a goddeſs, and not a god, making a diſtinction between male and female. Which made Theodorus aſk him, as he was going from the court, whether he had ſeen Pallas under her petticoats, ſince he ſpoke ſo pertinently of her ſex. Neverthelesſ he was baniſhed for this freedom of ſpeech (9). To ſatisfy every body, I ſhall relate the thing in the words of the original. Κράτητ☉ αὐτὸν ἐρωτήσαντ☉, εἰ οἱ θεοὶ χαίρȣσι ταῖς προσκυνήσεσι καὶ εὐχαῖς; φασὶν εἰπεῖν,

Περὶ τȣ́των μὴ ἐρώτα, ἀνόητε, ἐν ὁδῷ, ἀλλὰ μόνον· τὸ δ' αὐτὸ καὶ Βίωνα ἐρωτηθέντα εἰ θεοί εἰσιν, εἰπεῖν,

Ὀυκ ἀπ' ἐμȣ̃ σκεδάσεις ὄχλον ταλαπείριε πρέσβυ.

Quum rogaſſet illum Crates an Dii precationibus ac divinis honoribus gaudeant, Noli me inquit, fatue, in via de hiſce rogare, ſed ſolum ac ſeorſum. Hoc ipſum & Bionem interrogatum, an ſint Dii, dixiſſe tradunt, Tunc ſenex turbam à nobis propellere curas (10)?

Being aſked by Crates, &c. . . . . It is ſaid that Bion, when the queſtion was put to him, whether there was any gods, made the ſame anſwer;

Old man, why do you not remove the croud,
That ſtandeth near me? . . . . .

Diogenes Laërtius means, without doubt, Bion the Boryſthenite, one of the boldeſt Atheiſts mentioned by the Antients. The conformity of his thought, with that of Stilpo, is very diſadvantageous to the latter. Cotta in Cicero was little more orthodox, ſince he found it no difficult thing to deny the exiſtence of the gods, but when there was ground to be afraid of informers, and of the fury of the people. 'Queritur primum in ea quæſtione quæ eſt de natura Deorum, ſintne Dii, necne ſint? Difficile eſt negare credo, ſi in concione quæratur; ſed in hujuſcemodi ſermone & conſeſſu facillimum (11). - - - In the queſtion concerning the nature of the gods, the firſt thing to be aſked is, Whether there are any gods or not? If ſuch a queſtion were put to one in a public aſſembly, I grant that it would be difficult to chuſe the negative; but in a converſation and meeting like this there is nothing more eaſy.' Thoſe men would have made a great alteration in the maxim mentioned by Balzac; De divinis etiam vera dicere periculoſum eſt (12). - - - In religious matters it is even dangerous to ſpeak the truth: they would have put in præcipue, above all, inſtead of etiam, even. They had been right in a certain ſenſe; for the Pagans would not allow that the ideas of the unity and perfect ſimplicity of GOD ſhould take place of their pernicious and ridiculous opinions concerning the Divine Nature (13).

A STRANGE opinion of the Heathens concerning the ſtatues of their gods.

Here follows an inſtance of the blindneſs of the Heathens. Can any thing be more ſtrange than the opinion of the Athenians, otherwiſe an ingenious and learned nation, concerning the ſtatues of their gods? Did they not fancy that the work of a ſculptor became a GOD, as ſoon as it was conſecrated to a deity? Did they not believe that Phidias's Minerva was the very goddeſs that ſprang out of Jupiter's head? Doubtleſs they had ſuch a fooliſh conceit, otherwiſe there had been no neceſſity for Stilpo to uſe ſuch a diſtinction as he made to vindicate himſelf. His crime was this: he aſked one day, whether Minerva, the daughter of Jupiter, was a god: he was anſwered, that ſhe was. But, replied he, that Minerva is Phidias's work, and not Jupiter's daughter; and therefore ſhe is not a god. Whereupon he was cited before the Areopagites, and did not deny what he had ſaid: he pretended that he had expreſſed himſelf exactly; Minerva, ſaid he, is not a god, but a goddeſs, for the gods are males. Ἐφ' ᾧ καὶ εἰς Ἄρειον πάγον προσκληθέντα, μὴ ἀρνήσασθαι, φάσκειν δ' ὀρθῶς διειλέχθαι. μὴ γὰρ εἶναι αὐτὴν θεὸν, ἀλλὰ θεάν· θεȣ̀ς δὲ εἶναι τȣ̀ς ἄῤῥενας. Qua ex re quum in Arium pagum pertractus fuiſſet, nihil inficiatum ferunt, imo recte ſe loquutum aſſeruiſſe: non enim deum eſſe, ſed deam: deos quippe mares eſſe (14). It is plain, that if the Pagans had made a real diſtinction between the ſtatues and the gods to whom they were conſecrated, there had been no neceſſity for Stilpo to alledge the difference between a god male and a god female, in order to juſtify himſelf. This happened to him in a temple [E], and perhaps they have done him no wrong. He had an extreme indifference for the good things of fortune, and looked upon the qualities of his ſoul as his only good. Which appears from the anſwer he made after the deſtruction of his country [F]. Nay, he looked upon the infamy of his daughter as an inſignificant thing; for he could never be brought to own that it was a diſhonour or a misfortune to him. Many learned men want ſuch a turn of mind [G]. The innovations

---

(2) Id. ibid. num. 114.

(3) He had been ſpeaking of another Nicarete, a courtezan, p. 593.

(4) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 596.

(5) Cicero de Fato, cap. v.

(6) See the remark [H], at the end.

(7) See the remark [E].

(8) It ſhould be Bion.

(9) La Mothe le Vayer, Dialogue de la diverſité des Religions, pag. m. 358, 359. It is the laſt of the five Dialogues of Oraſius Tubero.

(10) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, num. 117, pag. 148.

(11) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxxii.

(12) Balzac, Lettre III à Chapelain, livr. i, pag. m. 21.

(13) See, above, the words of Joſephus, citation (116), of the article PYTHAGORAS.

(14) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, num. 116, pag. 148.

This way of clearing himſelf was inſignificant, ſince the word Θεός among the Greeks, and the word Deus among the Latins (15) did very properly belong to the goddeſſes. The beſt apology had been to ſay, that Minerva, as Jupiter's daughter, was a god; but that the piece of metal out of which Phidias had made a ſtatue conſecrated to Minerva, was not a god. This apology would have been a very good one, if Stilpo had been arraigned before other judges; but it ſignified nothing in the court of the Areopagites, and therefore Stilpo did not make uſe of it. He was not ignorant that the gods were thought to incorporate themſelves in their ſtatues, and therefore it was believed that the ſtatues were metamorphoſed into gods by virtue of the conſecration.

[E] A thing which happened to him in a temple.] All thoſe who eat garlic were forbidden to enter into the temple of the mother of the gods. Stilpo had ſo little regard for that prohibition, that he went into the temple of that goddeſs after he had eat garlic, and even lay in it. He dreamed that the goddeſs appeared to him, and ſaid, Stilpo, you are a Philoſopher, and yet you offend againſt the holy laws. He thought he anſwered her, Give me ſomething better to eat, and I will engage to leave off garlic. Menage alledges this particular as a proof that this Philoſopher had no religion (16). And indeed this ſavours of a prophane man, who derided both the law and the goddeſs. I confeſs that Athenæus, who relates this adventure, makes a quite contrary judgment of it; for he alledges it as a ſign of Stilpo's temperance. Στίλπων δ' οὐ κατεπλάγη τὴν ἐγκράτειαν καταφαγὼν σκόροδα καὶ κατακοιμηθεὶς ἐν τῷ τῆς μητρὸς τῶν θεῶν ἱερῷ. ἀπείρητο δὲ τῷ τούτων τὶ φαγόντι μηδὲ εἰσιέναι. ἐπιστάσης δὲ αὐτῷ τῆς θεοῦ κατὰ τοὺς ὕπνους, καὶ εἰπούσης ὅτι φιλόσοφος ὢν ὦ Στίλπων παραβαίνεις τὰ νόμιμα; καὶ τὸν δοκεῖν ἀποκρίνασθαι κατὰ τοὺς ὕπνους. σὺ δέ μοι παρέχε ἐσθίειν, καὶ σκορόδοις οὐ χρήσομαι. Enimverò Stilpo ſua confiſus temperantia, non ideò perterritus eſt, quod cum allium comediſſet in templo matris Deûm obdormierit. Arcebatur enim delubro qui horum quidquam guſtaſſet. Ei porrò ſomnum capienti, adſtans dea cum diceret, Philoſophus es, ô Stilpon, & ſacras tamen leges violas, viſum ſibi fuiſſe hæc reſpondere in ſomnis, Præbe mihi quod edam, & allio non veſcar (17). - - - - Stilpo, truſting to his temperance, was not therefore frightened, because he had ſlept in the temple of the mother of the gods, after having eaten garlic; though every one that had taſted any thing of that kind, was forbidden ſo much as to enter there. He dreamed that the goddeſs appeared to him, &c.

[F] The anſwer he made after the deſtruction of his country.] Demetrius Poliorcetes having ſubdued Megara, gave orders that Stilpo's houſe ſhould be ſpared, and that whatever was taken from it ſhould be reſtored. I relate the thing as I find it in Diogenes Laertius (18). Were I to deſcribe it of my own head, I would add ſomething to it, I would ſay that the ſoldiers plundered Stilpo's houſe without any regard to the orders of Demetrius; but this is not the thing in queſtion: The queſtion is, that Demetrius writ to Stilpo, to know of him what he had loſt in the plundering of the town. Stilpo anſwered him that he had loſt nothing, ſince no body had deprived him of his reaſon and learning. He added ſeveral other things to inſpire him with humanity and a noble deſire of being beneficial to men; and the prince was ſo moved with his advice, that he conformed to it. I believe ſeveral devout people would do the ſame; but I believe alſo that ſome would go by this maxim, Charity well ordered begins at home. Should a prince, after the plundering of a town, promiſe them the reſtitution of all their effects, they would certainly take hold of ſuch an opportunity to inſpire him with clemency, and recommend to him the welfare of the people; but they would not forget themſelves; they would ſend him an exact liſt of all their loſſes, and endeavour to make them up with advantage. But here is a Philoſopher who was far from being a devout man, who uſes his intereſt with a victorious prince, to no other end than to perſuade him to put a ſtop to the diſorders of war, and to beſtow his favours upon the people; he does not ſend a liſt of what he had loſt. His houſe has been plundered, they offer him a full reſtitution; but he anſwers that he has loſt nothing, and that his goods did not conſiſt in ſuch things as the ſoldiers could take from him. This is doubtleſs, very generous. I wiſh Seneca had not ſuppoſed that Stilpo had loſt his wife and children; for a man who boaſts in ſuch a caſe that he has loſt nothing, carries his Philoſophy too far. It is probably a falſe gloſs of Seneca; he is the only author that mentions ſuch a loſs. (19) ‘Omne intra ſe bonum terminabit, & dicet quod Stilpon ille dixit, Stilpon quem Epicuri epiſtola inſequitur. Hic enim capta patria, amiſſis liberis, amiſſa uxore, cum ex incendio publico ſolus, & tamen beatus exiret, interroganti Demetrio, cui cognomen ab exitio urbium Poliorcetes fuit, Num quid perdidiſſet? Omnia, inquit, bona mea mecum ſunt. Ecce vir fortis ac ſtrenuus, ipſam hoſtis ſui victoriam vicit. Nihil, inquit, perdidi. Dubitare illum coëgit, an viciſſet. Omnia mea mecum ſunt. Juſtitia, virtus, temperantia, prudentia, hoc ipſum, nihil bonum putare quod eripi poſſit (20). - - - - He will make all good terminate within himſelf, and he will ſay as Stilpo ſaid; Stilpo, againſt whom Epicurus inveighs in his epiſtle. That Philoſopher, having loſt his wife and children, and been an eye-witneſs to the deſtruction of his country, whilſt he eſcaped out of the public flames alone, tho' ſtill happy, was aſked by Demetrius, ſirnamed Poliorcetes, from his deſtroying ſo many cities, Whether he had loſt any thing? To which he anſwered, I have all my goods with me. In this manner did that brave and reſolute man triumph over his victorious enemy. I have loſt nothing, ſays he. He forced Demetrius to doubt, whether he had overcome. I have all my goods with me. Juſtice, virtue, temperance, and prudence, were his goods; he reckoned nothing good which can be taken from us.’ It is ſaid (21), that Ptolemy, ſirnamed Soter, having taken Megara, offered money to Stilpo, and deſired him to take ſhipping with him. That Philoſopher accepted of a little money, and refuſed the honour of following that prince into Egypt. He retired into the iſle of Ægina till Ptolemy returned into his kingdom. This ſhews a great diſintereſtedneſs, tho' it falls very ſhort of the preceding inſtance.

[G] Nay, he looked upon the infamy of his daughter as an inſignificant thing . . . . . Many learned men want ſuch a turn of mind.] He married her to Simmias: It is not ſaid whether the huſband of that leud woman did patiently bear his diſgrace; but we are told that the Father expreſſed an extraordinary indifference. Your daughter's behaviour is a diſgrace to you, ſaid one to him. Not at all, anſwered he, ſhe can no more caſt a blot upon my reputation, than I can adorn her's. Ταύτης οὐ κατὰ τρόπον βιούσης, εἶπέ τις πρὸς τὸν Στίλπωνα, ὡς καταισχύνοι αὐτόν· ὁ δέ, ΟΥ' μᾶλλον (εἶπεν) ἢ ἐγὼ ταύτην κοσμῶ. Hæc dum laſcivius viveret, Stilponique à quodam renuntiatum eſſet eam ſibi probro eſſe, Non, inquit, iſta majori mihi probro eſt, quam ego illi ornamento (22). See in Plutarch (23) how he maintained that the ſins of his daughter were only a misfortune to herſelf. Happy are thoſe who can give ſuch a turn to their minds.

A LIST of ſome learned men diſgraced by the leudneſs of their families.

Such an indifference would have been very neceſſary to many learned men, in order to make their lives eaſy; for their wives or daughters have been very unchaſte: and I think there are ſtill ſome inſtances of ſuch a diſorder. Fernelius (24) and Druſius (25) have been in that category; and Cujas likewiſe: The daughter of that great man was of ſuch an amorous temper that innovations of his Logic cannot be approved; he rejected the universals [H]: and tho' it

---

(15) See Menage's Notes, in hunc locum Laërtii, p. 128.

(16) Fuit Stilpon parcus Deorum cultor & infrequens, imo ἄθεος. Narrat Athenæus X. 5. in Templo matris Deûm allium &c. Menagius, in Laërt. lib. ii, num. 117, pag. 128.

(17) Athenæus, lib. x, cap. v, pag. 422.

(18) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 115.

(19) Diogenes Laërtius ſays nothing of it, nor Plutarch in the two places wherein he mentions Stilpo's anſwer, viz. in his tract, de educatione puerorum, pag. 5, and in the tract de animi tranquillitate, pag. 475.

(20) Seneca, Epiſt. IX, pag. m. 178, 179. See alſo the ſame Seneca de conſtantia ſapientis, cap. 5.

(21) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 115.

(22) Id. ibid. num. 114.

(23) Plut. de tranquillitate animi, pag. 468.

(24) See the article FERNELIUS, citation (32).

(25) See the article DRUSIUS, remark [O].

that though Thuanus procured her a husband when she was but fifteen years of age, having doubtless observed that she was in haste, yet he could not prevent her anticipating her marriage; and after she was married, she carried on her love intrigues so openly, that her husband, who was an honest gentleman, died of grief for it. She married another, and grew worse and worse (26). The author from whom I have these words, had been saying, That the scholars, who did what they pleased with her, called it commenting upon Cujas's works, and that some of them, out of respect to her father's memory, abstained from such an infamous commerce. It is said, That a colleague of Cujas was not so discreet, and that he caressed his daughter, even during her father's life. Paul Manutius was in the same case. He put his daughter into a convent, hoping by that means to free himself from the troublesome care of looking after her; but even after she had made her vows, she writ several letters to him one after another to let him know, that if he did not take her out of that confinement, she would steal away. That poor man made several journeys, and used so many sollicitations, that he obtained from the Court of Rome the dispensation his daughter desired. She quickly got a husband, and though he was a very honest man, she gave up herself to all manner of dissoluteness. Her father did not sink under his grief, nor under the inconveniences occasioned from time to time by the remains of a venereal disease; but it made him very uneasy. Sacris in claustris jampridem conjecta filia, eo dementiæ, ac furoris abrepta est impetu, ut inde se clàm egressuram minaretur misero patri, nisi omni studio ipsam extrahere niteretur. Quò factum, ut is plurium itinerum vexatione, morosaque apud Romanos judices prehensatione, æger animo, adflictusque corpore, tandem hujusmodi poculum, licet peramarum, tamen justa necessitate quæsitum exorbere sit coactus, inusitato exemplo virginem pluribus annis Deo dicatam, mundanis iterum angustiis devovendi, quæ cum posteà honesto conjugi nupta, prava se libidinis fœdarit indole, infeliciterque peregerit, intestino is mœrore correptus, reliquum vitæ solicita cogitatione traduxit. Quum vero etiam ei accesserint vetusta luis gallicæ inquinamenta, quibus alternatim vel temporum, vel locorum, vel victuum lædebatur mutatione, deterrimam prorsus vitæ conditionem sortitus videri potuit, nisi commoderato semper, infractoque animo, eam se perferre singulis ostendisset (27). Some learned men have had a leud wife and a leud daughter at the same time. Barnabas Brissonius was one of them, if we believe Scaliger (28). Some others have been so deeply engaged in one half of that misfortune, that no mention is made of their daughters. Such was Paulus Perusinus, that learned man, so highly praised by Boccacio, and so well beloved by Robert, King of Naples. His wife made him a cuckold; and when he died, his finest writings were treacherously destroyed by his wife (29). I could give a list, wherein one might see great names, besides the learned of a low rank, 'quos 'fama obscura recondit. --- who are lost in obscurity.' but I leave it to those who will undertake to carry on the subject which Pierius Valerianus began (30). It will not be amiss to put in one class, by themselves, all the learned, who have been unhappy by their marriage. All those men wanted our Stilpo's indifference.

[H] He rejected the universals.] Being a sharp disputant (31), he rejected the very species. Who says man, says nothing of this or that man; he does not speak of one more than of the other, and therefore he says nothing of any body. The grass that is shown me, is not grass; for grass existed a thousand years ago; and therefore it is not the grass you shew me. Such was Stilpo's way of arguing (32). Perhaps it will be thought that he proposed those objections only to play upon an equivocation, which the Greek construction of the words afforded him, and to which the modern languages are not liable. There is a great difference between these two propositions, Peter is man, Peter is a man. The first is false and not used; the second is true, and generally used: but the Greeks and Latins would have made use of the same terms, to say, That Peter is man, and that Peter is a man. Hence it is that Stilpo might suppose that if he asked, shewing a cabbage, What is that? he would be answered, It is cabbage. But he might have answered, You are mistaken; cabbage existed a thousand years ago; and therefore it is not what I shew you. Such a cavil would be groundless now-a-days; for the answer to Stilpo's question would be, It is a cabbage, and not it is cabbage. Is it not then likely that this Philosopher had no other design than to divert himself with cavils, grounded upon the turn of the expression? I believe he had another thought, and that he was altogether against universal terms, and what they call Predicables in the Aristotelian schools. There was something real in his objection; it was more than playing upon words. I think he meant that the species is not affirmed of individuums, and that therefore the species are a meer chimera. Man is not more this man than that man, and it does not signify John rather than Peter; and therefore it signifies no body. His meaning appears more clearly in Plutarch than in Diogenes Laërtius. We read in Plutarch that Colotes violently exclaimed against Stilpo, and accused him of overturning human life; for how could we live, said Colotes, if we were not allowed to call a man good, or a captain; and if we should say man is man, and then by itself good is good. Τραγῳδίαν ἐπάγει τῷ Στίλπωνι, καὶ τὸν βίον ἀναιρεῖσθαι φησιν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, λέγοντος ἕτερον ἑτέρου μὴ κατηγορεῖσθαι. πῶς γὰρ βιωσόμεθα, μὴ λέγοντες ἄνθρωπον ἀγαθὸν, μηδὲ ἄνθρωπον στρατηγὸν ἀλλὰ ἄνθρωπον ἄνθρωπον, καὶ χωρὶς ἀγαθὸν ἀγαθόν. καὶ στρατηγὸν στρατηγόν. Tragœdiam adversus Stilponem excitat, aitque ab eo vitam tolli, quod dixisset, Alterum de altero non prædicari. Quomodo enim, inquit, vivemus, si non dicamus hominem bonum, hominem imperatorem, sed hominem hominem seorsum, bonum bonum, ducem ducem (33). It appears from this objection of Colotes, that Stilpo would not allow that a thing should be affirmed of another, but that every thing should be affirmed of itself, and that the attribute of a proposition should not reach farther than the subject. Here is the ground he went upon. That two things may be affirmed one of another, they ought to have the same nature; for in every affirmative and true proposition, the attribute and the subject are really the same. But man and good are not of the same nature; the definition of the one differs from the definition of the other; and therefore good and man cannot be joined together, one of them cannot be affirmed of the other. In like manner running cannot be attributed to a horse; it is an action, the definition whereof is not the same with that of a horse. Besides, should you affirm of a man that he is good, and of a horse that he runs, that is, should you affirm that good and man are the same thing, and that a horse and running are the same thing, how could you affirm that aliments and medicaments are good, and that lions and dogs run? Εἰ μὲν γὰρ ταυτὸν ἐστι τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ τὸ ἀγαθὸν, καὶ τῷ ἵππῳ τὸ τρέχειν, πῶς καὶ σιτίου καὶ φαρμάκου τὸ ἀγαθόν; καὶ νὴ Δία πάλιν λέοντος καὶ κυνὸς τὸ τρέχειν, κατηγορούμενον δ' ἕτερον, οὐκ ὀρθῶς ἄνθρωπον ἀγαθὸν καὶ ἵππον τρέχειν λέγομεν. Nam si idem sunt homo & bonum, & equus ac currere, quo pacto bonum etiam de cibo & medicamento dicetur? rursusque currere de leone & cane? Ergo non recte dicemus de homine prædicari bonum, de equo currere, cum diversa sint (34). These are logical subtilties, whereby all languages would be confounded, and all men would be obliged to be silent or to speak ridiculously; and yet a Sophist trained up in the art of disputing, and used to cavils about abstractions, would give a great deal of trouble to his adversaries, if he undertook to maintain Stilpo's opinion to the utmost. He would not be immediately silenced by the distinction of the attributes in concreto and in abstracto, and by the secundum id quod important in obliquo, or in recto; it would be requisite to dispute a long time about this question, utrum universale maneat in actuali prædicatione. These trifles, though contemptible in themselves, and such as cannot perplex a man of a solid judgment, might nevertheless carry a wrong-headed man into Spinozism: 'Hæ nugæ seria ducunt in mala: ---- These trifles 'bring on substantial evils.' For those who deny universal attributes, cannot admit any individuum's that resemble one another. They must say, that two beings, of which the attribute of substance should be truly affirmed, would be one and and the same substance; which is to say in equivalent terms, that it were ſuppoſed that he did it only to ridicule the Sophiſts, he ſhould be blamed for his ill taſte and his wrong ſubtilties.

---

(26) Nouv. de la Rép. des Lettres, for June 1686, pag. m. 722.

(27) Joannes Imperialis, in Musæo Historico, pag. 108.

(28) In Scaligeranis, Voce Miron.

(29) Quem librum maximo hujus operis incommodo Biellæ impudicæ conjugis crimine, eo defuncto, cum pluribus aliis ex libris ejusdem, perditum comperi. Boccacius, de Genealogia Deor. lib. xv, cap. vi, apud Vossium, de Hist. Lat. pag. 526.

(30) He wrote a book intituled, De Infelicitate Literatorum.

(31) Δεινὸς δὲ ἄγαν ὢν ἐν τοῖς ἐριστικοῖς, ἀνῄρει καὶ τὰ εἴδη. Quum esset disputator acerrimus, species quoque tollebat. Diogen. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 119.

(32) Apud. Diogen. Laërt. ibid.

(33) Plutarch. adversus Colotem, p. 1119, C.

(34) Plutarch. ibid, p. 1120, A.

Inſtead of improving one's judgment, they were only fit to ſpoil it. A courtezan rallied him about it [I], in anſwer to what he ſaid to her by way of cenſure or rallery. I muſt not forget a dream of his, which ſeems to ſignify that he was a prieſt, and which ſhews, that even in his ſleep, he knew how to philoſophize [K].

there is but one ſubſtance in the whole univerſe. Common ſenſe agrees, in this point, with the moſt evident notions of Philoſophy. A peaſant does clearly conceive, without being miſtaken, that the whole eſſence of man belongs to each man, and ought to be affirmed of each man, and yet that each man is diſtinct from all others. And therefore he clearly conceives that the ſame eſſence, which is affirmed of Peter is not affirmed of Paul; but that the eſſence, which is affirmed of the one, is like the eſſence which is affirmed of the other. The Scotiſts are pitifully miſtaken in this point, with their Univerſale formale à parte rei. The moſt perplexing ſubtilties will never prevail over theſe notions in a man of ſolid parts; and whoever cannot reſolve them, may juſtly laugh at them. I remember that in a public diſputation, one of the opponents endeavoured to prove that there are no univerſals; he went about it thus: If there were univerſals, Genus's would have two ſpecies under them; but it is impoſſible: for a ſpecies cannot differ from another: I prove it. The difference of a ſpecies is altogether like the difference of another; therefore there are not two ſpecies. The conſequence is right, and I am going to ſhew the truth of the antecedent by an example. Rationality, the ſpecific difference of a man, does not at all differ from irrationality, the ſpecific difference of a beaſt. Rationality does not really differ from the human ſoul; therefore it is a ſubſtance: Irrationality (35) does not really differ from a beaſt; therefore it is a ſubſtance. Thus rationality, as it is a ſubſtance, does not differ from irrationality. How then does it differ from it? Are there ſome entities of realities in it that are not in irrationality? But are thoſe entities accidents or ſubſtances? If they are ſubſtances, they make no difference between rationality and irrationality. If they are accidents, they have the eſſence of being; but irrationality has it likewiſe, and therefore it perfectly reſembles them; they cannot therefore make it differ from rationality. If it be ſaid, that they differ from being, ſince they have the attribute of inherence, which being has not; I reply that inherence, is a being, and therefore cannot make an accident differ from being. And if you anſwer that inherence implies ſomething elſe beſides being, I repeat my inſtance: that other thing does neceſſarily contain the eſſence of being; it is therefore like being; and you will always have that objection in your way, though you ſhould ſuppoſe in infinitum that the conſtitutive character of inherence contains ſomething that has ſomething beſides being. This objection proves that being has not under it ſubſtance and accident, and that ſubſtance has not under it body and ſpirit, and conſequently that there are no univerſals, Quod erat probandum. The reſpondent did not apprehend the difficulty; nor did the preſident apprehend it much better. The aſſembly did not apprehend it neither, and the opponent was like to be hiſſed. Doubtleſs it was the beſt way to ſilence him: His argument was altogether wrong; for it would prove that there is no difference between white and black, pain and pleaſure.

If you conſult Ariſtotle's Metaphyſics, in that part of his work wherein he examines what concerns the unity of Being, you will ſee that the queſtion about univerſals was ſurrounded with a thouſand perplexing difficulties. He does not forget this objection? If being and unity are ſomething, how can there be ſeveral beings beſides that thing? How can there be more than one being? For what differs from being is nothing; and therefore we muſt conclude, as Parmenides did, that all beings are but one; becauſe, if there were many, they would be different from being, that is, they would be nothing at all. Εἰ δ᾽ ἔστι τὶ αὐτὸ ἓν καὶ αὐτὸ ὂν, ἀναγκαῖον οὐσίαν αὐτῶν εἶναι τὸ ὂν καὶ τὸ ἕν. οὐ γὰρ ἕτερόν τι καθόλου κατηγορεῖται, ἀλλὰ ταῦτα αὐτά. ἀλλὰ μὴν εἴ γ᾽ ἔσται τι αὐτὸ ὂν καὶ αὐτὸ ἓν, πολλὴ ἀπορία πῶς ἔσται τι παρὰ ταῦτα ἕτερον. λέγω δὲ πῶς ἔσται πλείω ἑνὸς τὰ ὄντα. τὸ γὰρ ἕτερον τοῦ ὄντος οὐκ ἔστιν. ὥστε κατὰ τὸν Παρμενίδου συμβαίνειν ἀνάγκη λόγον ἓν ἅπαντα εἶναι τὰ ὄντα, καὶ τοῦτο εἶναι τὸ ὄν. Quòd ſi quid eſt ipſum unum, & ipſum ens, neceſſe eſt, eorum ſubſtantiam eſſe unum, & ens: non enim aliquid aliud univerſaliter prædicatur, ſed eadem ipſa. At vero ſi quid erit ipſum ens, & ipſum unum, magna dubitatio eſt, quonam modo aliquid aliud præter hæc erit. Dico autem quomodo entia erunt plura uno. Quod enim aliud ab ente eſt, non eſt. Quare ſecundum Parmenidis rationem, neceſſe eſt accidere omnia entia eſſe unum, & hoc eſſe ens (36). It does not appear that Ariſtotle was able to reſolve that difficulty.

But to return to Stilpo. Colotes is blamed for two things: one is, that he exclaimed againſt the ſubtilties of that Philoſopher, without reſolving them categorically; the other is, that he pitched on a doctrine, in order to criticize upon it, which Stilpo advanced meerly out of a witty conceit (37), and to ridicule the Sophiſts of that time, by giving them a bone to pick. Plutarch was the more exaſperated at this choice of Colotes, becauſe a great many fine things might have been ſaid of Stilpo, of which Colotes did not ſpeak one word. It will appear from the following paſſage of Plutarch, that Stilpo was a very honeſt man. Μετὰ δὲ Σωκράτην καὶ Πλάτωνα προσμάχεται Στίλπωνι, καὶ τὰ μὲν ἀληθινὰ δόγματα καὶ τοὺς λόγους τοῦ ἀνδρὸς, οἷς ἑαυτόν τε κατεκόσμει καὶ πατρίδα καὶ φίλους, καὶ τῶν βασιλέων τοὺς περὶ αὐτὸν σπουδάσαντας, οὔτε γέγραφε, οὐδὲ ὅσον ἦν φρόνημα τῇ ψυχῇ μετὰ πραότητος καὶ μετριοπαθείας. ὧν δὲ παίζων, καὶ χρώμενος πρὸς τοὺς σοφιστὰς λογαρίων προὔβαλε γέλωτι αὐτοῖς, ἑνὸς μνησθεὶς, καὶ μηδὲν εἰπὼν πρὸς τοῦτο, μηδὲ λύσας τὴν πιθανότητα, τραγῳδίαν ἐπάγει τῷ Στίλπωνι. Poſt Socratem & Platonem Stilpo oppugnatur. Hujus quidem vera decreta, & ſermones, quibus ſeipſum, patriam, amicos regeſque ipſi operam navantes exornavit, tum animi elationem manſuetudini & affectuum mediocritati conjunctam, Colotes non retulit. Quas vero jocans ille ſophiſtis ridenſque objecit ſententiolas, harum unam allegans, cum neque refelliſſet neque ſolviſſet ipſe probabilitatem, tragœdiam adverſus Stilponem excitat (38). ---- Next to Socrates and Plato, he falls upon Stilpo. As for the ſolid opinions of that Philoſopher, and his diſcourſes, by which he has done honour to himſelf, to his country, to his friends, and to the kings who favoured him, Colotes takes no notice at all of theſe, nor of his other good qualities, ſuch as his magnanimity, his gentleneſs, and his moderation. But from among the little objections which he makes to the Sophiſts by way of rallery he calls out one, and without ſaying any thing that can ſhew the improbability of it, he abuſes Stilpo in a tragical manner.

[I] A courtezan rallied him about it.] Athenæus ſays, That Stilpo ſitting at table with Glycera, upbraided her with corrupting young men. To which ſhe anſwered, You are charged with the ſame fault, for people complain that you ſpoil their judgment with your needleſs and ſophiſtical ſubtilties; and they add, that it ſignifies but little which way they are ſpoiled, whether it be by a Philoſopher or a courtezan. Μηδὲν οὖν διαφέρειν ἐπιτριβομένοις καὶ κακῶς πάσχουσιν ἢ μετὰ φιλοσόφου ζῆν, ἢ ἑταίρας. Nihilque referre iis qui ſic in miſerias incidunt ac pereunt, an apud philoſophum degant, an apud ſcortum (39). Athenæus had been ſaying that Courtezans took great pride in their learning, whereby they got the art of quick repartees and witty ſayings; but Glycera's anſwer alledged by him, is no proper inſtance to ſhew the juſtneſs of their railleries. That courtezan defended herſelf by advancing a falſity; for there never was ſo great a corruption in antient Greece, that people ſhould have been as unwilling to ſee young men learn nothing but vain ſubtilties of a Philoſopher, as to ſee them engaged in leud practices with women.

[K] A dream of his . . . which ſhews that even in his ſleep he knew how to philoſophize.] Plutarch will afford me the commentary I went upon theſe words. ‘ It is reported of Stilpo the Philoſopher, that he thought he ‘ ſaw Neptune in his ſleep, and that he ſeemed very ‘ much diſpleaſed with him, becauſe he had not, as was

(35) By irrationality the opponent underſtood the poſitive attributes which conſtitute the beaſt, conſidered as not having the faculty of reaſoning.

(36) Ariſtotel. Metaphyſ. lib. iii, cap. iv, pag. m. 663. C.

(37) Plutarch is perhaps miſtaken in ſuppoſing this.

(38) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 1119, C.

(39) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 584.

‘was uſual with his prieſts, ſacrificed an ox in honour of him; not in the leaſt daunted at the apparition, he thus boldly accoſted it. Neptune! What is this buſineſs you here complain of? You come hither like a child, and are angry with me, becauſe I did not borrow money and run in debt to pleaſe you, and fill the city with the ſmell of roaſt meat, but privately ſacrificed to you in my own houſe, ſuch ordinary victims as I could get. At this confident reply, Neptune ſmiled, and (as the ſtory goes) reached him his hand, as an aſſurance of his good will to him, and told him, That for his ſake he would ſend the Megarenſians abundance of ſea Loaches that ſeaſon (40)’.

STOFLERUS (JOHN) a famous Mathematician and Aſtrologer, was born at Juſtingen, in Suabia, on the tenth of December 1452. Notwithſtanding the meanneſs of his birth, he made ſo great a progreſs in his ſtudies, that he was admired for it. He particularly minded thoſe things, for which he was naturally beſt qualified; for being ſenſible that he had a genius for Mathematics, he applied himſelf to that ſcience much more than to any other. He taught it at Tubingen with ſo good ſucceſs, that he got a wonderful reputation. The books he publiſhed [A], kept up and increaſed the glory he had acquired by his lectures (a); but he did not ſucceed in the prognoſtications he had the boldneſs to publiſh. He foretold that there would be a great deluge in the year 1524, and ſtruck a great terror all over Europe [B]: but he was confounded by the

[A] The books he publiſhed.] His Kalendarium Romanum Magnum, dedicated to the Emperor Maximilian, was printed (1) in 1518. He publiſhed his Aſtronomical Tables at Tubingen, the year before. He alſo publiſhed Rationem compoſitionis Aſtrolabiorum; Coſmographicas aliquot deſcriptiones, de Sphæra Coſmographica, hoc eſt, de globi terreſtris artificioſa ſtructura; de duplici terræ projectione in planum, hoc eſt, qua ratione commodius chartæ Coſmographicæ, quas Mappas mundi vocant, deſignari queant. A Latin commentary upon Proclus's ſphere, and a German tract about the dimenſion by the aſtrolabe and the quadrant, and the calculation of conjunctions and oppoſitions, with a cenſure upon the ancient cycles, and the prediction of eclipſes (2). Voſſius ſays his Ephemerides begin with the year 1432, and end with the year 1525 (3); but according to Melchior Adam, they begin with the year 1532, and reach to the twenty years following. Voſſius is more credible than Melchior Adam. Doubtleſs the latter took for the whole work what was only a continuation of it.

[B] Foretold there would be a great deluge in the year 1524, and ſtruck a great terror all over Europe.] Auguſtin Niphus perceiving the great amazement of the people after that prediction, publiſhed a book to ſhew that there was no reaſon to fear ſuch a deluge. Cum ſtatim à publicata Joan. Stoefleri Ephemeride diluvii iſtius prænuncia, Auguſtinus Niphus ut homines à gravi timore liberaret, quem ipſa omnibus incutiebat, libellum ſuum de falſa diluvii prognoſticatione Carolo V. obtuliſſet, non defuit, &c (4). Princes, and even learned men, were afraid of that calamity as well as the people; which was doubtleſs occaſioned, in ſome meaſure, by the agreement of ſeveral Aſtrologers, in publiſhing ſuch a prediction, among whom there were ſome of the beſt Aſtronomers. Cirvellus, profeſſor of Divinity at Alcala, put out a book in the vulgar tongue, wherein, without blaming in general the precautions that were uſed againſt the deluge, he was contented to blame thoſe who made fooliſh expences upon that account: he propoſed ſome expedients to preſerve one's ſelf from the inundation at a reaſonable rate. Thoſe, who had their houſes near the ſea, or near ſome rivers, left them, and ſold their land and houſhold-goods at a great loſs. Simile falſis hujuſmodi, & extremæ dementiæ prognoſticis, fuiſſe illud mihi perſuadeo, quo non vulgarium Ephemeridum conſarcinatores dumtaxat, ſed ex Aſtronomis peritiores multi, ſupremam ex imaginaria quadam eluvione, cunctis mortalibus perniciem impendere contendebant; adeoque rumoribus iſtis, vulgarium hominum animos perterruerant, ut metus etiam ad ſapientiores pervenerit. Nam Petrus Cirvellus Hiſpanorum omnium ſui temporis doctiſſimus, cum Theologiæ, in almo Complutenſi Gymnaſio, Lectoris munere fungeretur, & verò multos, ut ipſemet inquit, fluviis, vel mari finitimos populos, jam ſtupido metu perculſos, domicilia ac ſedes mutare vidiſſet, ac prædia, ſupellectilem, bonaque omnia, contra juſtum valorem ſub actione diſtrahere, ac alia loca vel altitudine, vel ſiccitate magis ſecura requirere, ſui officii eſſe putavit, in publica illa conſternatione, quam de nihilo excitare perſuaſum non habebat, Conſilium vernaculo ac materno idiomate conſcribere, ut paſſim ab omnibus legeretur, quo ſingulis modum præſcriberet, impendentis ejuſmodi calamitatis præcavendæ: atque adeò ita rebus ſuis conſulendi, ut minimum ab illa damnum reciperunt (5). The great Chancellor of the Emperor Charles V, conſulted Peter Martyr about that conſternation, who told him that the calamity would not be ſo dreadful as people fancied; but that thoſe conjunctions of the planets would certainly occaſion a great diſorder. The Duke of Urbino ſtood in need of a good Philoſopher, who proved to him, in a printed book, that the fear of ſuch a flood was ill-grounded. Quod rumor ille non per Hiſpanias modo, ſed longè lateque per Europam diſſeminatus fuerit, teſtem ſiſtere poſſum Petrum Martyrem, qui de illo à Caroli V, magno Cancellario percunctatus, ipſi hunc in modum ex Valleoleto reſpondet Epiſtola 20. libri 34. Quid ego ſentiam de pluviis, in initio anni quarti & vigeſimi prædictis ab Aſtronomis interrogas, veras fore conjunctiones illas omnium Planetarum, & iiſdem locis ſcio, in materiis præcipuè diſpoſitis, & particularibus regionibus aliquid magni parituras arbitror; ſed neque auſim eorum ſententias approbare, qui ore aperto abſolutè fore alluviem ita generalem vociferantur, ut neque mari, aut ulli terrarum parti, ſit ignoſcendum, quin horrenda ſint incommoda perpeſſuræ, &c. Neque verò tantùm Cancellarius ille ſe ex eorum numero eſſe oſtendit, quos vaniſſimus diluvii metus percellebat, ſed Urbini Dux non priùs ab eodem liberari potuit, quàm Paulus de Middeburgo Foroſempronienſis Epiſcopus, variis rationibus Mathematicis, & Philoſophicis, quas poſtea typis commiſit, ei liquido demonſtraſſet, inanem eſſe prorſus metum omnem, quem de futuro diluvio conceperat (6). Guido Rangone, General of the army at Florence, being afraid that the reaſons alledged by Auguſtin Niphus, would remove the fear of Charles V, and make him neglect the neceſſary precautions, engaged a famous Phyſician to write againſt that book of Niphus, in order to oblige his Imperial Majeſty to provide for his ſafety, and to appoint inſpectors, who ſhould view the ground in the provinces, and mark out the places where men and beaſts would be leſs expoſed to the waters of the flood. Non defuit Thomas quidam Philologus patria Ravennas, & celeberrimæ famæ Medicus, qui è veſtigio libellum alium de vera diluvii prognoſticatione, ad eundem Imperatorem miſit, cum præfatione, quam iſthuc maxima parte referre, non alienum à propoſito duxerim. Ne ex illo conventu tot ſyderum in piſcibus, diffortunium quodquam patereris, Guido Rangonus Rei Florentinæ armorum generalis gubernator, me monuit, & excitavit, ut de futuro diluvio anni MDXXIIII, exactam ad te compoſitionem dirigerimus; Quatenus amoto Sueſſani Philoſophi, jam impreſſo errore, locis huic maximo diluvio ſubditis, & ab hoc ipſo alienis, diligentiùs circumſpectis, & annotatis, humanum genus & cætera viventia, vel tu ipſe ad minus (nam ubi Imperatoris periculum, hîc pro viribus & manu, & corpore, & ingenio utendum) ab eo diffortunato & horribili aſpectu liberareris (7). Some other writers imitated that Phyſician. ‘Quemadmodum contingit aliquando ut cæcus cænum ducat, ſic nonnulli alii Philologum hunc licet aberrantem ſequuti ſunt; ex quibus Nicolaus Peranzonus, vaticinum de vera diluvii prognoſticatione, cum xx. inundationum hiſtoria, Anconæ edidit. Mihique præterea videre contigit, cujuſdam Michaëlis de Petra ſancta, Ordinis Prædicatorum de obſervantia, ſacræ Theologiæ Doctoris, Regentis ſtudii in Conventu Minervæ, & Metaphyſicam in Romano Gymnaſio profitentis libellum, in defenſionem Aſtrologorum, judicantium ex conjunctionibus Planetarum the event. I ſhall mention ſeveral particulars relating to this, whereby it will appear that

---

(40) Plut. de profectu virtutis ſentiendo, pag. 83.

(a) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philoſophorum, pag. 73, 74.

(1) At Oppenheim.

(2) Taken from Melchior Adam in Vitis Philoſophorum, p. 74.

(3) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 186.

(4) Naudæus, in Judicio de Auguſtino Nipho, pag. 48.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 46, 47.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 47, 48.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 48.

‘ rum in Piſcibus MDXXIV diluvium futurum. Hunc enim veluti conceptis verbis, operi ſuo titulum fecit (8). - - - - As it ſometimes happens, that the blind lead the blind, there were others that imitated this blundering Philologer, among whom was Nicolas Peranzonus, who publiſhed at Ancona a prophecy concerning the true prognoſtication of the flood, together with the hiſtory of twenty inundations. I have likewiſe ſeen a ſmall book of Michael de Petra Sancta, of the Order of Obſervators, Regent in the convent of Minerva, Doctor of Divinity, and Profeſſor of Metaphyſics in the college at Rome, written in defence of thoſe Aſtrologers, who concluded, from the conjunction of the planets in the ſign Piſces, in the year 1524, that there would be a flood. For this is almoſt, in expreſs words, the title which he gives to his book.’ There was ſo great a terror in France, that many people were like to grow distracted upon that account. ‘ In Gallia parum abfuit quin ad inſaniam homines non paucos, periculi metu (diluvium) adegerit, quemadmodum apud Joannem Bochellum ſcriptorem Annalium Aquitaniæ; Claudium Duretum, cap. 27. libri de fluxu & refluxu maris; Spiritum Roterium ordinis ſancti Dominici, & ſacræ apud Toloſates fidei quæſitorem, in refutatione doctrinæ cujuſdam Aſtrologi; Augerium Ferrerium in libro quem ſcripſit adverſus Rempublicam Bodini; Albertum Pighium in Aſtrologiæ defenſione ad Auguſtinum Niphum? Euſtorgium à Bello loco Poëtam vernaculum in Rythmis ſuis, multoſque alios videre eſt (9). - - - In France, not a few were almoſt diſtracted with this fear, as may be ſeen in John Bochel, who writ the Annals of Aquitain; Claudius Duret, in the 27th chapter of his book on the ebbing and flowing of the ſea; Spiritus Rotter, a Dominican Friar, and Inquiſitor at Toulouſe, in his confutation of the doctrine of a certain Aſtrologer; Augerius Ferrier, in a book which he writ againſt the Republic of Bodin; Albertus Pighius, in his defence of Aſtrology to Auguſtinus Niphus, Euſtorge de Beaulieu, a French Poet, in his rhimes; and many others.’ Read theſe words of Bodin (10). ‘ GOD has promiſed that there ſhall be no deluge for the time to come, and has performed his promiſe. For tho’ the great conjunction of Saturn, Mars, and Jupiter, happened in the ſign Piſces, in the year 1524, when all the Aſtrologers of Europe, Aſia, and Africa, foretold an univerſal deluge, and many unbelievers built up arches to ſave themſelves, and even Preſident Auriol at Toulouſe, tho’ they were told of GOD’s promiſe and oath, that he would no more deſtroy men by a flood; that year was indeed attended with ſtorms and great floods in many countries, but there happened no deluge.’ A writer, who animadverted upon Bodin, denied the fact as to Auriol; but the following reply was made to him, ‘ I think I have omitted nothing but what is frivolous and inconſiderable, and deſerves no anſwer. And, amongſt others, what you ſay, pag. 47, that Auriol did not make a boat to avoid being deſtroyed by the deluge, which the Aſtrologers foretold, was to happen in the year 1524, but to go a fiſhing; and yet you tell us, that the boat ſtands upon four pillars: it is not uſual to put boats upon pillars. But I have read a book written againſt Aſtrologers, by a Dominican, called Spiritus Roterus, an Inquiſitor of the Faith, when he was at Toulouſe, which was lent me by Raymund l’Eſtonat of Pamiers, who has ſettled in theſe parts, and told me how that Monk undertook to write that book againſt an Aſtrologer who was then at Toulouſe, and pretended to tell one’s fortune by the ſtars. That author ſays in that book, that Auriol cauſed an arch to be built at Toulouſe, in order to avoid the deluge; which he could know better than you, ſince you lived neither in the ſame place, nor at the ſame time with Auriol. As for what you ſay in the ſame page, that Bodin is very much to blame for ſaying that Auriol was a preſident; ſince he was only a doctor of the Canon-law, whom you call a bold, rich, and learned man; I confeſs that Bodin was miſtaken in that point (11).’ The northern nations were not free from thoſe alarms, as it appears from this paſſage. ‘ Mali iſtius impendentis metum ad extremum uſque Septentrionem pervaſiſſe, teſtatur manifeſtè Cornelius Scepperus Neoportuenſis, cùm inter cauſas quibus fuit compulſus, ut librum adverſus Aſtrologos de ſignificationibus conjunctionum ſuperiorum Planetarum anni MDXXIV conſcriberet, eas potiſſimum enumerat. Adde me neque in Aſtrologiam ſcribere, ſed in eos tantùm, qui falſa prædictione totum in ſe orbem converterant. Neque enim ſolùm vulgo eam rem perſuaſerunt, ſed ſummis etiam Regibus, & Principibus. Occurrunt quæ hac de re me percunctatus eſt ſereniſſimus Princeps D. Chriſtiernus Daniæ, Sueviæ, Norvegiæque Rex, occurrunt & crebra vulgi ſuſpiria, tamdiu mala ſibi ominantis: quem autem hominum non impellerent hæ lacrymæ? quem non permoveret impoſtura, incitaret iniquitas (12)? - - - Cornelius Scepperus Neoportuenſis plainly affirms, that the dread of this impending calamity had reached as far as the extremities of the North; ſince among the reaſons which moved him to write a book againſt the Aſtrologers concerning what was ſignified by the conjunction of the planets in the year 1524, he chiefly inſiſts upon the following. Add, ſays he, that I do not write againſt Aſtrology, but againſt thoſe who had alarmed the whole world by their falſe prediction. for they not only perſuaded the common people of it, but alſo kings and princes. I reflect upon the queſtions that were put to me on this head, by the moſt ſerene Prince, Chriſtiern King of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. I reflect upon the frequent ſighs of the vulgar, ſo long kept in a fearful expectation of evils that were to come upon them. What man would not be rouzed by theſe tears? or who could be unmoved at the ſight of ſo much fraud and iniquity?’

We have ſeen what Bodin ſays, that rains and floods made a great devaſtation in ſeveral places, in the year of that pretended deluge; but ſome authors, who are more to be credited than he, affirm, that the month of February 1524, was, contrary to cuſtom, very dry and clear. Now this was the time of the conjunction pointed out by the Aſtrologers for a deluge; ſo that one would think the extraordinary dryneſs of that month happened on purpoſe to confound thoſe men. Cardan and Origanus were vexed that Stoflerus had brought ſuch a diſgrace upon their trade by a prognoſtication ſo contrary to the event. Read theſe words of the learned Gaſſendus. ‘ Memorabile certè eſt, quod in hiſtoriis, † ac omnibus penè ſuperioris ſæculi libris legitur; cum Aſtrologi ob plureis Conjunctiones magnas, & nonnullas mediocreis in Aqueis Signis celebrandas, prædixiſſent menſe Februario anni MDXXIV fore Diluvium generale, ac ſtragem tantam, quanta fuiſſet ante id tempus inaudita; adeò ut non paucis conſternatis per Galliam, Hiſpaniam, Italiam, Germaniamque animis, apparaſſent navigia, aut comportatis farinis, aliiſque rebus neceſſariis, petiiſſent loca editiora; contigiſſe tamen, ut totus Februarius ſereniſſimus, pulcerrimuſque exſtiterit; planè, ut ſi operata data comparatus fuiſſet vaticiniis Aſtrologorum refellendis (cùm ſit alioquin inſolitum, abire Februarium impluvium) quod ne ipſis quidem Cardano ⸸, & Origano ‡ diſſimulare licuit; dolentibus illud de futuro Diluvio judicium fuiſſe non ſine Aſtrologiæ infamia à Stœflero prolatum (13). - - - It is certainly a memorable thing, which we read in every hiſtory, and almoſt in every book, of the laſt century; that whereas the Aſtrologers, on account of ſeveral great and ſome ſmaller conjunctions that were to happen in the watery ſigns, had foretold, that in the month of February 1524, there would be a general flood, and ſuch a devaſtation as had been never heard of before that time; which ſo frightened numbers of people in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, that ſome provided ſhips, others took with them a ſtock of meal, and other neceſſaries, and fled to the mountains; nevertheleſs it ſo fell out that the whole month of February was extremely clear and fine. One would think.... &c.’ Take notice, that Bodin, a credulous man, and infatuated with Aſtrology, vindicates Stoflerus as well as he can; for, on one hand, he gives us to underſtand, that if there was not a ſecond deluge in the year 1524, it was becauſe GOD prevented it to perform his promiſe; and, on the other hand, he enlarges upon the calamities wherewith Chriſtendom was afflicted after the conjunction of the planets: and the better to mend the that it is no eaſy matter to diſcredit Aſtrologers [C]; for notwithſtanding this falſe prediction, they found afterwards a vaſt number of cullies. Some ſay he foretold that the end of the world would be in the year 1586. I believe they are miſtaken [D]; and I cannot

---

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 49.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Bodin, de la République, book iv, pag. m. 550.

(11) Renatus Herpin, Apologie pour la République de Jean Bodin, in the laſt page.

(12) Naudæus, ubi ſupra, p. 50.

† Bochell. in Annal. Aquit. Bodin. 4. de Rep. 2. Duret. de flu. & refl. mar. c. 27, &c.

⸸ Lib. 7. aphor. 34.

‡ 3. Par. introd. 3.

(13) Gaſſendus, Phyſicæ. §. ii, lib. vi, Oper. Tom. i, pag. 729. col. i.

the buſineſs he has recourſe to ſome falſities; for he ſpeaks (14) of the war of the Boors in Germany, and of the league againſt the King of France, who was taken, and of the conqueſt of Rhodes by the Turks. That iſland had been ſubdued in the year 1522. I ſhall have occaſion by and by to mention another fraud of that writer.

[C] I ſhall mention .... ſeveral particulars, whereby it will appear that in is no eaſy thing to diſcredit Aſtrologers.] I have mentioned, in the foregoing remark, ſeveral facts concerning the chimerical prediction of that pretended deluge; to which I add what follows: ‘In the ſaid year 1523, reckoning as they do in Aquitain, where the year begins in March upon Lady-day, and ends on the ſame day, all the provinces of France were extremely afraid of an univerſal deluge, becauſe the Aſtronomers had foretold, that in the month of February of the ſaid year, and in the beginning of the year 1524, according to their computation, (for they begin with the firſt day of January) there would be twenty conjunctions, great and ſmall together, ſixteen of which would poſſeſs watery ſigns, portending to the greateſt part of the world, to climates, kingdoms, provinces, ſtates, and dignities, and to all land and ſea creatures, a certain change and alteration, ſuch as our foreſathers never ſaw, nor read in hiſtories. Whereupon men and women were in great fear. Many removed from their low habitations, went into high places, provided themſelves with meal, and other neceſſaries, and made public proceſſions and prayers, that GOD would take pity on his people; and yet there happened no ſuch thing: on the contrary, the ſaid month of February proved as fine as ever it was, and the months following finer than they had been ten years before. Whereby GOD made it appear that Aſtronomy is not a certain ſcience; and whatever the planets may foretel, GOD is above it (15).’ The author from whom I have this paſſage, does not forget the chicaneries which the Aſtrologers alledged to cover their ſhame. ‘However, ſays he (16), ſome Aſtrologers alledged in their vindication, that thoſe conjunctions had produced their effect the year before, becauſe there had been many great floods in ſeveral places, which had drowned houſes and lands. Others ſaid, that ſuch conjunctions would not have their effect till ten years after, during which many great, dreadful, and detrimental, things would happen; which proved true, as will appear hereafter. For, that very ſame year 1523, in November, there was a little froſt, which froze up the greateſt part of the wheat, and moſt cabbages, and ſhort-ſhanked apple-trees; and a good number of ſmall treaſurers, who conſumed the public finances of France, were put out of their places; whereupon this diſtich was made in a bantering way.

L'an mil cinq cens vingt & quatre moins ung
Le Choux d'yver & Treſoriers tout ung.

The fifteen hundredth year and twenty three,
For Cabbages and Treaſurers ſhall be.

How comes this author to reckon among the public calamities the turning out of the treaſurers, who waſted the finances and devoured the people? He ſhould rather have accounted it a happineſs. As for what concerns the froſt in the month of November, which he calls a ſmall one, tho' he aſcribes great effects to it, the ſame doubts ariſe in my mind, which I have propoſed in the article BERQUIN (17). It is a remarkable thing that Beza ſhould mention ſuch a froſt upon the year 1528, as a curſe, which the execution of an innocent man brought upon the whole kingdom. Cunæus, Profeſſor at Leyden, made an oration about climacterical years in 1638, when he left the Rectorſhip, wherein he mentioned the prediction of a new deluge in the year 1524 (18), and laughed at it. He added, that according to the teſtimony of Ludovicus Vives, that year proved as clear, happy, and plentiful, as ever was ſeen (19). Vives does not preciſely ſay all this; nevertheleſs his words are ſtill more proper than Cunæus's to ſhew the falſity of the prediction. ‘Illud quoque Noë diluvium non ſiderum commiſtionibus aſſignatur, ſed ultioni numinis. Verum iſti (aſtrologi) ſolita temeritate ſub certum horoſcopum reducunt eluviem illam orbis, & ſimilem horoſcopum contigiſſe ferunt anno vigeſimo quarto, qui annus orbem fere totum inſanis iſtorum prædictionibus terruit, quum nullus annus memoria eorum qui viverent aut mitior aut ſerenior fuerit, aut ſuis omnibus partibus tempeſtivior? Primùm in tanta varietate, tamque incertis iis qui annales ſcribunt, quem annum poſſunt ipſi annotare quo diluvium contigerit? Ita non dicunt hoc eveniſſe, quia hic erat aſtrorum coitus: ſed quia id contigerit, talem affirmant fuiſſe. Hoc verò non eſt ab experimentis ſcientiam colligere, ſed ad tuendam temeritatem aſſertionis confingere ſibi experimenta. Verum irriſit iſtos natura, qui quo tempore natatoria in aquis omnia erant minati, ſereniſſimi ut ſi quando antea fulſerunt ſoles, & ver fuit omnium amœniſſimum (20). - - - Noah's flood is not aſcribed to the conjunction of the Planets, but to the vengeance of the Deity. Nevertheleſs thoſe Aſtrologers with their uſual impertinence account for that inundation of the world by a certain conſtellation, and pretend that the like conſtellation fell out in the year 1524, when they terrified the whole world with their mad predictions; whereas no year, as far as thoſe that were then alive could remember, had been more mild, more ſerene, and more ſeaſonable in all its parts. And firſt in ſo great a variety and doubtfulneſs of the Hiſtorians, to what year can they fix the deluge? Thus they do not ſay that this happened becauſe the conjunction of the Planets was ſuch, but they affirm that ſuch was the conjunction of the Planets becauſe this happened; which is not gathering knowledge from experiments, but feigning experiments to ſupport an impertinent aſſertion. Nature ſufficiently ridiculed them, becauſe at the very time when their threatened inundation was to take place over all, the ſun ſhone forth exceedingly bright, and there never was a more pleaſant ſpring.’ A learned German, who publiſhed ſome notes upon Cunæus's orations, quotes this paſſage of Ludovicus Vives, and ſays, that Cardan maintained that Stoflerus was miſtaken for want of a ſufficient ſkill in Phyſics. Cardan endeavours to ſhew, that the ſame poſition of the Planets which was to produce an inundation, according to Stoflerus, was really to produce fair weather (21); but this pretended juſtification of Aſtrology, by cenſuring thoſe who do not well underſtand it, does not deſerve to be minded upon this occaſion.

[D] Some ſay he foretold that the end of the world would be in the year 1586. I believe they are miſtaken.] I have here in view Mr Petit, Intendant of the Fortifications, who uſes theſe words. ‘Did not Stoflerus foretel, that, in the year 1524, there would be ſo great inundations, that if the world was not to be deſtroyed by fire, there would be then an univerſal deluge, by reaſon of the great conjunctions of the Planets in watery ſigns? Which frighted all Europe to that degree, that many people repaired to the mountains with all manner of proviſions. Others provided barks and ſhips to avoid being drowned; and yet the month of February, in which all theſe things were to happen, proved extremely dry, to the ſhame of Aſtrologers. Did not he ſay likewiſe that in the year 1586, after an eclipſe of the ſun in May, and the conjunction of all the Planets, the world would be at end by the fury of winds and ſtorms, which proved ridiculous (22).’ I believe one might boldly deny what he ſays in his ſecond queſtion, and affirm, that Stoflerus foretold no ſuch thing for the year 1586. In the firſt place, his Ephemerides do not reach ſo far. In the ſecond place, that year is not characterized by an eclipſe of the ſun in May, nor by the conjunction of all the Planets. I think I have found out what led that author into this miſtake: he had read in Gaſſendus, next to what concerns the prediction of a deluge, an account of a prediction concerning the year 1186. Some time after, truſting too

(14) Bodin, de la République, livr. iv, pag. 553.

(15) Jean Bouchet, Annales d'Aquitain, fol. m. 213, Naudæus and Gaſſendus call him wrong Bochellus in the paſſages above quoted, citatations (9) and (13).

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Remark [A].

(18) The Printers put 1504. That fault has been corrected in the Leipſic edition 1693.

(19) Proditum memoriæ Ludovicus Vives, auctor certiſſimus, reliquit, nullum annum æque ſerenum, nullum æque fauſtum, & ubertate notabilem fuiſſe. Cunæus, Orat. IV, pag. 78, Edit. Lipſ. 1693.

(20) Lud. Vives, de Veritate Fidei Chriſtianæ, lib. i, cap. x, pag. 120, Edit. Baſil. 1544.

(21) Cardan. Aphor. Aſtrol. Segmento vii, Aphoriſm. xxxiv, apud Aug. Buchnerum in Orat. Cunei, pag. m. 375.

(22) Petit, Diſſertation ſur la nature des Cometes, pag. 337.

I cannot tell whether thoſe are to be credited, who give out, that he made ſome predictions upon the year 1588 [E]. Authors are not agreed about the circumſtances of his death: ſome ſay (b) he died of the plague at Blaubeurs, on the ſixteenth of February 1531. Others will have it that he died of a wound in his head, which he received by the fall of a board in his cloſet: they add, that he foreſaw that danger [F]. He had a great affection for Munſter, his ſcholar; which proved very beneficial to the commonwealth of learning: for had he not ſuffered him to tranſcribe his writings, they had been loſt for ever, when the originals were burnt (c). It is to be obſerved, that he was much to his memory, he thought that Gaſſendus upbraids Stoflerus with a ſecond overſight; and on this ſuppoſition he ſet down 1586, inſtead of 1186. What will confirm my conjecture is, that the year 1186 has the two characters abovementioned, viz. an eclipſe of the ſun (23), and a conjunction of all the Planets, as it appears from theſe words of Gaſſendus. ‘Simile vaticinium fuit, quod ex Rigordo Scaliger * refert, ſcribente Aſtrologos tantum portendiſſe exitium, à ventorum, tempeſtatumque vehementia, ob Planetas tam inferiores, quàm ſuperiores coituros menſe Septembri anni MCLXXXVI præeunte Solis defectione XI Kal. Maij, ut rerum finem imminere à nemine dubitaretur; cùm eventus tamen poſtea coarguerit ejuſce Oraculi vanitatem (24). - - - Like to this was the prophecy of which Scaliger gives an account taken from Rigordus. That author ſays, the Aſtrologers had foretold ſo great a deſtruction by the fury of winds and tempeſts, upon the conjunction of the higher and lower Planets, which was to happen in the month of September 1186, after an eclipſe of the ſun on the 21*ſt of April, that no body doubted but the end of the world was at hand. Nevertheleſs the event ſhewed how groundleſs the prediction was.*’ Naudæus obſerves that the weather proved very fine, inſtead of the dreadful ſtorms foretold by the Aſtrologers. ‘Vide ſodes apud Rigordum, quid anno Chriſti MCLXXIX acciderit. Orientales Aſtrologi omnes, literis per totum orbem miſſis, tam ſecurè quàm ſi Regio diplomate res ipſa ſancita fuiſſet, edixerant, anno ſeptimo poſt, qui fuit MCLXXXVI, Planetas omnes tam inferiores, quàm ſuperiores, in unum coïturos ineunte Septembri, ſcilicet poſt Eclipſim factam XI Kalend. Mai. Indeque tantùm ex ventorum, & tempeſtatum violentia periculi ſecuturum, ut fermè rebus humanis, extremum finem imminere aſſererent. Quid igitur poſtea factum eſt, niſi ut mortales innumeros, qui per totum illud ſeptennium, vitam ſibi præ metu, & periculorum expectatione acerbam putaverant, ineunte termino ab Aſtrologis illis præſtituto, molles potiùs Favonii, quàm Aquilones, & blanda ſedataque Autumni temperies, quàm nubila vel perturbata exciperet (25)? - - - Conſult Rigordus touching what happened in the year 1179. The eaſtern Aſtrologers having ſent letters all over the world, with as much confidence as if the royal ſignet had been annexed to them, proclaimed that in the ſeventh year after that, viz. the year 1186, there was to be a conjunction of all the upper and lower Planets towards the beginning of September, after an eclipſe of the ſun on the 21*ſt of April. They affirmed that this would occaſion ſuch ſtorms and winds, that the end of all things was very near at hand. What followed upon this? Nought elſe but that vaſt numbers of people, who had led an uneaſy life for ſeven years through fear and the expectation of danger, when the term fixed by the Aſtrologers was come, were agreeably ſurprized with gentle Zephyrs, inſtead of north-winds, and with a mild and peaceable autumn, inſtead of clouds and tempeſtuous weather.*’ Bodin has been a prevaricator upon this occaſion: he ſuppoſes the Aſtrologers did not foretel great winds, but great revolutions of ſtate. He had a mind to ſave their honour by ſuch a ſubterfuge; for take the hiſtory of the world where you will, you will find ſome revolutions within the ſpace of fifteen or twenty years. We read alſo, ſays he (26), ‘that in the year MCLXXXVI in September, the lower and upper Planets were in conjunction, when the eaſtern Aſtrologers by letters ſent into all parts, as the Chronicles of Saint Denys has it, threatened all nations with a change of government, which proved true. But it muſt be confeſſed that the Hiſtorian is miſtaken in ſaying that there was an eclipſe of the ſun the eleventh of April (27), and the fifth of that month an eclipſe of the moon: which is naturally impoſſible.’

[E] I cannot tell whether thoſe are to be credited who give out that he made ſome predictions upon the year 1588.] A year ‘which all Judicial Aſtrologers called a wonderful one, becauſe they foreſaw ſo many ſtrange accidents, and ſo much confuſion in natural cauſes, that they affirmed, that if the world was not then at an end, there would happen at leaſt an univerſal change (28).’ The author of the Mercurius Gallo-Belgicus ſays, that Stoflerus found as many calamities in the prognoſtications for the year 1588, as Regiomontanus: which is as much as can be ſaid. ‘Joannes Regiomontanus, Mathematicus ſummus, aliquantò antequàm Romæ anno à partu Virginis 1475, ætatis ſuæ 42 in vivis eſſe deſiit, prognoſticum ſeu vaticinium in hanc ferè ſententiam edidit:

Poſt mille expletos à partu virginis annos,
  Et poſt quingentos rurſus ab axe datos,
Octuageſimus octavus mirabilis annus
  Ingruet, & ſecum triſtia fata trahet.
Si non hoc anno totus malè concidet orbis,
  Si non in nihilum terra fretumque ruet;
Cuncta tamen mundi ſurſum ibunt atque deorſum
  Imperia, & luctus undique grandis erit.

Eadem Joannes Stœflerus, inſignis Aſtrologus, & noſtro ſeculo generoſiſſimus Heros Henricus Rantzovius, in ſuo de annis climactericis & imperiorum periodis libello, vaticinatus eſt (29). - - - John Regiomontanus, a great Mathematician, ſome time before his death, which happened at Rome in the year of Chriſt 1475, and in the 42*d of his age, publiſhed a prognoſtic or prophecy almoſt to this purpoſe.*

The year of Chriſt five hundred eighty eight Shall bring, when added to a thouſand more
Evils of an intolerable weight
  Such as were never felt before.
For in that year if ſea and earth and all
Do not into their antient nothing fall,
At leaſt it will diſturb the courſe of things,
And hatch the fate of Empires and of Kings.
Strong fear ſhall ev'ry mortal heart confound,
And ſorrow ſhall in ev'ry place abound.

‘John Stoflerus, a famous Aſtrologer, and in our days, that illuſtrious hero Henry Rantzovius, in his treatiſe on climacterical years and the periods of empires, foretold the ſame things.’ That author imitates Bodin, for he falſifies Hiſtory to ſave the honour of thoſe Aſtrologers: he places (30) the execution of the Queen of Scotland in the year 1588 (31). For the diverſion of the reader I ſhall ſet down a flight of Mr Petit, Intendant of the Fortifications. Do not you think, ſays he (32), after having quoted the four laſt verſes of Regiomontanus's prophecy, that it was word for word the ſame Prognoſtick with that of the Sieur Andreas (33), only Regiomontanus is not ſo poſitive as to the year, and does not ſo much contradict himſelf. That fooliſh fellow (Andreas) ſays poſitively, that the world will be at an end in two years time at fartheſt: and immediately after he affirms, that all the powers will be deſtroyed, and fall into the hands of the Turks; that is, after the end of the world, and when there will be neither men nor beaſts. Would to GOD he might be the laſt beaſt, and the laſt Aſtrological fool.

[F] Of a wound in his head, which he received by the fall. . . . They add, that he foreſaw that danger.] This I find in Seth Calviſius. ‘Johan. Stofflerus, ſays he (34), Juſtingenſis, Mathematicus inſignis, certo die ſibi periculum ruinâ imminere præviderat, & quia ædes ſuas ſatis firmas noverat, convocat in Muſæum ſuum viros eruditos, quorum conſuetudine

‘& ſer-

(b) Melch. Adam, ibid. pag. 74.

(c) Omnibus libris inſtrumentiſque Stofleri incendio fortuito Tubingæ conſumtis, nihil illarum lucubrationum evaſiſſet; niſi multa Munſterus deſcripta adſervaſſet. Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra.

(23) Not in May, as Mr Petit ſays, but the 21ſt of April, Mr Petit, for want of attention, did not mind the word Kal. in Gaſſendus.

* Præfat. in Manil.

(24) Gaſſendus, ubi ſupra.

(25) Naudæus, ubi ſupra, pag. 45. Conſult Calviſius, ad ann. 1186, who obſerves that the Arabians in Spain gave notice of that conjunction. Hinc prædixerunt: Tantus, inquiunt, erit ventus, ut pulvere repleturus ſit arbores & turres. Inde ſequentur hæc miracula: Veniet vir ſapiens, Doctor veritatis. Deinde orietur quidam ex Elam, qui magnas ſtrages faciet. Sed nihil annotatum eſt, quod evenerit. - - - Hence they foretold that there ſhould be a violent ſtorm of wind, which would fill the trees and towers with duſt; after which theſe miracles ſhould follow, viz. a wiſe man and the teacher of truth ſhould come; and afterwards another man ſhould ariſe out of Elam, and commit great havock. . . . . But nothing of all that was foretold came to paſs. He quotes Richardus: it is likely he meant Rigordus.

(26) Bodin, ubi ſupra, pag. 557.

(27) Probably it is an error of the tranſcriber; for all authors place that eclipſe on the 21ſt of April.

(28) Perefixe, Hiſt. de Henri le Grand, pag. m 92.

(29) Janſonius Doccomenſis Friſius, in Mercurio Gallo-Belgico, ad init. anni 1589, apud Wolfium, Lect. memorabil. Tom. ii, pag. 1028. See above remark [E] of the article BRUSCHIUS.

(30) Ibid. apud eumdem, Wolfium, ibid.

(31) She was beheaded the eighth of February 1587, old-ſtile.

(32) Diſcours ſur l'Eclipſe de Soleil du 12. d'Août 1654, printed at the end of his Diſſertation upon Comets, pag. 338.

(33) Upon occaſion of the eclipſe of the year 1654, a diſcourſe in German and French was handed about under the name of the Sieur Andreas, ſometimes ſtiled a Mathematician of Padua, and ſometimes of Prague, with an atteſtation of the Chancery of Meningen. Id. ibid. pag. 326.

(34) Sethus Calviſius, ad ann. 1531, pag. m. 1165.

was one of thoſe who went about the reformation of the calendar [G]; but this undertaking was not finiſhed until a long time after his death.

‘ & ſermonibus recrearetur: orta inter ſobria pocula diſputatio: ad controverſiam explicandam è ſuperiori loco librum depromit: ſed laxato clavo aſſer, in quo ſtabant libri, in caput ejus decidit, & inſigne vulnus infelici ſeni infligit, ex quo mortuus eſt die 16 Febr. Tubingæ. - - - John Stoflerus, of Juſtingen, a famous Mathematician, foreſaw that ſuch a day he ſhould be in great danger of having ſomething fall upon his head; for which reaſon, as he knew that his own houſe was pretty firm, he got ſome learned men to bear him company in his ſtudy. While they were ſitting over a moderate glaſs of wine, a ſmall diſpute aroſe, and he to decide the controverſy took down a book from a higher place. But as the nail was looſened, the ſhelf on which the books ſtood fell upon his head, and gave the poor old man a grievous wound, of which he died at Tubingen on the 16th of February.’ Voſſius did not know that this particular is to be found in Calviſius; for he mentions it only upon the credit of a ſomebody (35).

[G] He was one of thoſe, who went about the reformation of the calendar.] After the neceſſity of that reformation had been propoſed in the council of Conſtance, ſome Aſtronomers conſidered how it might be effected. I need not name here thoſe who began: I ſhall only ſay, that under the Pontificate of Leo X, two writers publiſhed their thoughts about it: one of them was Paul of Middleburg (36); and the other our John Stoflerus, who inſcribed his propoſitions to the council of Lateran (37). I ſay nothing of Joannes Maria de Tholoſanis, a Dominican, whoſe book de emendatione Calendarii Romani was dedicated to the council of Trent. That Monk ſays, that Stoflerus propoſed three expedients, one whereof was to leave out ten days, and this was pitched upon to put an end to that affair. ‘ Frater Joan. Maria de Tholoſanis ordinis prædicatorum de emendatione Calendarii Romani cap. 3. ad Concilium Tridentinum ſic ſcribit: Circa hujus æquinoctii reformationem reperiuntur variæ formulæ: quarum tres ponit Joan. Stoefflerus in ſuo Calendario propoſitione 39. Prima earum inter alias potiſſima eſt & facillima, ſecunda difficilis eſt, & gignens perturbationem magnam, & diſſidium in eccleſia Dei per orbem diffuſa. Ultima abſque difficultate ſervari poſſet. Hæc ille. Secundam autem formulam vocat, qua noſtri temporis correctores uſi ſunt, 10 dies eximentes ex uno menſe (38). - - - Friar John Maria de Tholoſanis, a Dominican Friar, in his treatiſe on the Correction of the Roman Calendar, writes thus: Several expedients have been offered for the reformation of this equinox; three of which John Stoflerus lays down in the 39th propoſition of his Calendar. The firſt of theſe, which is the principal one, is very eaſy, the ſecond hard, and fit to breed great diſturbance and diſſention in the Church of God throughout the world. The laſt may be obſerved without any difficulty. Thus he. Now what he calls the ſecond expedient is the ſame which the correctors of our time made uſe of, by leaving ten days out of one month.’

(35) De morte ejus ſic non nemo, penes quem fides eſto. - - - In this manner does ſomebody ſpeak of his death. Let him anſwer for the truth of it. Voſſius, in Addit, Libri de Scient. Mathem. pag. 450.

(36) He was Biſhop of Foſſombrone in Italy.

(37) Henricus Wolphius, ubi infra, pag. 121.

(38) Henricus Wolphius, in Tractatu de Tempore & ejus mutationibus, pag. 129.

STOUPPA, or STOUP, (JOHN NICOLAS) in Latin Stupanus, profeſſor of Phyſic at Baſil, was born in the country of the Griſons on the eleventh of December 1542. He was ſent to Baſil at fifteen years of age, and there obtained at the age of twenty ſeven the degree of Doctor in Phyſic. He ſucceeded Hoſpinianus as profeſſor of Logic in the year 1575, and Theodore Zwingerus, as profeſſor of Phyſic, in the year 1589. He died at Baſil in the year 1621, aged ſeventy-nine years (a). It is of him, if I am not miſtaken, that Francis Hotman ſpeaks in a letter, which deſerves to be quoted [A]. Among other works of his [B] we have a Latin tranſlation of the Neapolitan

(a) Taken from the Theatrum of Paul Freherus, pag. 1344.

[A] It is of him . . . . that Francis Hotman ſpeaks in a letter, which deſerves to be quoted.] It appears by that letter that a Profeſſor of Baſil, named Stupanus, had been Rector of the univerſity in the year 1578, and that he maintained he did not know whether the Maſs was a blaſphemy, and that the like queſtions were of ſmall importance to him. ‘ Idem ille bonus Typographus Perna, qui toties à Magiſtratu ob impios & execrandos libellos à ſe impreſſos in carceres detruſus fuit, deteſtanda opera omnia Machiavelli ab eodem illo Stupano Latinè converſa hic imprimit. Scis illa opera propter tam apertas in Moſem & Chriſtum blaſphemias ne in Italia quidem aut divendi licere. . . . . Hæc tamen blaſphemia & verborum portenta Baſileæ cum Magnifici D. Rectoris privilegio & auctoritate promulgantur, latinè converſa ab eo qui biennio ante illam Magnificam Rectoris perſonam geſſit, diu mendiculus, pane pauperum & Senatus eleemoſyna educatus, nunc nuper opulentæ uxoris ſecundæ maritus: Qui mihi biennio antè Rectoratu fungens coram D. Wrſtiſio dicere auſus eſt, ſe neſcire an Miſſa Papiſtica eſſet blaſphemia: neque talia ad ſe pertinere (1). - - - That ſame honeſt Printer Perna, who has been ſo many times impriſoned by the magiſtrates on account of the wicked and execrable books put forth by him, is nevertheleſs printing here all the deteſtable works of Machiavel, turned into Latin by that ſame Stupanus. You know that theſe works, by reaſon of their open blaſphemies againſt Moſes and Jeſus Chriſt, are not even allowed in Italy to be ſold. . . . . Nevertheleſs theſe blaſphemies and ſtrange words are printed at Baſil with the privilege and authority of the moſt noble Rector, being turned into Latin by the perſon who filled that honourable poſt two years before. This man was originally a beggar, and had been brought up as a poor ſcholar by the charity of the Senate, but had lately married a rich ſecond wife. While he was Rector two years before, he had the impudence to ſay before Urſtiſius that he did not know whether the Popiſh Maſs was blaſphemy, and it was not his buſineſs to enquire about it.’ In this manner does Francis Hotman ſpeak of him in a letter to Rodolphus Gualtherus miniſter of Zurich, dated from Baſil the 25th of December 1580. He had mentioned that diſpute to him in a former letter of the 27th of September preceding, where he obſerves that his adverſary did highly praiſe the conduct of the Elector Palatine for having driven a great number of Calviniſt miniſters out of his dominions. They were ſo many conſpirators, as Stupanus ſaid. He had prefixed a preface to a book that was corrected; nevertheleſs it was ſold without any alteration to the Papiſts. Hotman communicated it to Gualtherus, to the end that he might be the better informed of Stupanus's religion. Decertaveram aliquoties cum Stupano tunc (2) Rectore qui negabat ſe ſcire, an Miſſa Papiſtica eſſet blaſphemia. Contendebat rectè à Palatino factum, quòd tot conſpiratores (ut appellabat) ex ditione ſua expuliſſet. Tandem cujuſmodi fuerit meus Antagoniſta, ex incluſa ejus præfatione cognoſces. Mutatum tandem fuit folium. Sed iſtud apud Papiſtas divenditur (3). Hotman relates that as ſoon as he had heard theſe words of Stupanus, where he ſpeaks with ſuch indifference of the Maſs, he went to three Profeſſors, to conſult with them how he might be ſoundly reprimanded before the Academical Senate. They anſwered him in ſuch a manner as left him no room to hope, which grieved him very much. He committed the vengeance of ſuch enormous profanity to God, and deplored the ſtate of the univerſity where the intereſt of religion was neglected in this manner. Quo audito acceſſi ad Zulcerum, Amerbachium, Zwingerum (4), ſperans fore ut mihi daretur locus, illum (Stupanum) apud Collegium objurgandi. Nihil addo, quid reſponſi habuerim. Ego demiſſo vultu, Baſileenſem Religionem admirans & ad hæc nova prope obſtupeſcens, tacitus domum redii, & tantæ profanitatis (ne quid acerbius dicam) ultionem Deo commiſi. Nam quod te non ignorare arbitror, ſimillima eſt aliis omnibus in rebus ad Religionem pertinentibus Academiæ iſtius ratio: Ad quam

(1) Franciſcus Hotomanus, Epiſtola xcix, pag. 139, Edit. Amſtel. 1700.

(2) It ſhould be thus, and not as it is in the printed copy nunc, now; for it appears by the xcixth letter, that Stupanus had been rector two years before 1580.

(3) Hotoman. Epiſt. xcvii pag. 135, 136.

(4) It ſhould be read thus, and not Zwinglium, as in the printed copy.

Neapolitan Hiſtory writ in Italian by Pandolphus Collenuccio. His ſon Emanuel Stouppa, Doctor of Phyſic, ſpoke the funeral Oration of Gaſper Bauhinus, and publiſhed the Lexicon Medicum Caſtelli with additions, and the Aphoriſms of Hippocrates ranged and illuſtrated in a new method, as alſo ſome other books (b). He was born in the year 1587, and died in 1664 (c). I believe that Antony Stouppa, who writ ſome books, was of the ſame family [C].

quam tamen Magiſtratus omnia quæ ad Religionem pertinent, referre ſolet. Ego apud familiares meos Zwingerum & Amerbachium non ceſſo tantam iſtam profanitatem execrari, ſed reſponſi nihil aliud refero niſi quod iſta negotia non ad ſe, ſed ad Theologos pertinent (5). He had, not long after, ſome ground of conſolation adminiſtered to him; becauſe at the ſollicitation of the deputies of Zurich, they proceeded ſome length at Baſil againſt Profeſſor Stouppa (6). I do not know what the conſequences of it were.

[B] Among other works of his.] Theſe other works are Oratio de Cælii ſecundi Curionis Vita atque obitu, printed at Baſil in the year 1576 in 4to; a Latin tranſlation of the dialogues of Francis Patricius de ratione ſcribendæ legendæque Hiſtoriæ; another of ſome philoſophical treatiſes of Alexander Piccolomini: and another of the war between Selim II and the Venetians (7). He alſo writ de Holometri fabrica & uſu inſtrumento Geometrico olim ab Abele Fullonio invento, nunc verò ipſius Stupani opera, Sermone Latino ita explicato, ut ad omnis generis dimenſiones inveſtigandas, & regiones deſcribendas utiliſſimum ſimul, facillimumque eſſe queat. Acceſſit etiam Federi Delphini jucundiſſima Diſputatio de æſtu maris & motu octavæ Sphæræ, folio Baſileæ per Petrum Pernam 1577 (8), and a Medicina Theorica printed at Baſil in the year 1614 in 8vo, and binæ Epiſtolæ Medicæ printed at Nuremberg in the year 1625 in 4to, with the Ciſta Medica of John Hornungus (9).

[C] Antony Stouppa, who write ſome books, was of the ſame family.] He was born in the country of the Griſons, was a Phyſician, and died of the plague at Baſil in the year 1551 (10). He made additions ad Diſpenſatorium medicamentorum Nicolai Myrepſi, printed at Lyons in the year 1543. He tranſlated into better Latin Albohazen Hali filii Abenragel libros octo de judiciis aſtrorum. That was printed at Baſil in the year 1551 in folio (11).

(b) Vide Lindenium renovatum, pag. 259.

(c) Konig, pag. 783.

(5) Hotoman. Epiſt. xcix, pag. 139.

(6) Heri primum audivi Stupanum noſtrum eſſe delatum, rogatu (ut mihi quidam confirmarunt) Legatorum veſtrorum. Id. ibid. pag. 138.

(7) Written in Italian by John Peter Contarino. The Latin tranſlation was printed at Bazil in the year 1573, in 4to.

(8) Taken from the Epitome of Bibliotheca Geſneri, pag. m. 477, col. 2.

(9) Lindenius renovatus, p. 651.

(10) Epitome Biblioth. Geſneri, pag. m. 68.

(11) Ibid.

STRIGELIUS (Victorinus) was born at Kaufbeir (a) the twenty-ſixth of December 1524. He loſt his father (b) in 1527, and was ſent to Friburg in Briſgaw, in the year 1538, to continue his ſtudies. There he went through a courſe of Philoſophy under John Zinckius, and left that place in 1542, to go to the univerſity of Wittemberg, where he made it his buſineſs to inform himſelf of the opinion of the Proteſtants. He went to Luther's lectures, but more frequently to thoſe of Philip Melanchthon. After he had taken his degree of Maſter of Philoſophy in 1544, he betook himſelf to read private lectures, which procured him a great reputation, and proved very uſeful to his ſcholars. He went on with this exerciſe till the war forced him to leave Wittemberg, and to go to Magdeburg, and then to Erford. The war being ended he went to Iëna in 1548, where he married the year following; and being a widower two years after, he married again in 1553. He aſſiſted at the conference of Eiſenac in 1556 [A], and had a friendly diſpute with Menius, upon a queſtion concerning the neceſſity of good works, about which the divines were divided. He reduced that controverſy to ſeven propoſitions, on which the whole diſpute run. The concluſion was, that Menius engaged before the Elector of Saxony, and the whole aſſembly, not to depart from the doctrine contained in the ſeven propoſitions, which he acknowledged to be very conſonant to the word of God. Afterwards Strigelius, purſuant to the prince's order, drew up a form of confeſſion, to which all the divines ſubſcribed. The year following he was attacked by Illyricus, and had a verbal diſpute with him at Weimar [B]. The acts of the conference were publiſhed, but not faithfully, ſo that he complained that ſomething had been left out (c). He was impriſoned [C] with two others in 1559, becauſe they had diſapproved ſome Theological Doctrines, and the piece which thoſe of Weimar had publiſhed againſt thoſe of Wittemberg. He was ſet at liberty three years after, and betook himſelf again to read lectures; but becauſe he

[A] He aſſiſted at the conference of Eiſenac in 1556.] George Major, a Divine of Wittemberg, openly declared for the interim (1), and for the phraſe inſerted in it concerning the neceſſity of good works (2). Ambſdorf ran into another extreme, for he maintained, that good works were pernicious to ſalvation (3). This was the fourth ſchiſm of the Lutherans (4). Such was the ſubject of the conference of Eiſenac, in which our Strigelius acted the moſt conſiderable part. Thuanus (5) confounds the time and the place when he ſays that Strigelius aſſiſted at the conference of Altemburg (6) in the year MDLXVIII, and MDLXIX. Bochſtadius (7) ſhowed long ago that it is a miſtake.

[B] He was attacked by Illyricus, and had a verbal diſpute with him at Weimar.] They were both Profeſſors in the univerſity newly founded at Iëna (8). Their diſpute ran upon two points (9): firſt, Whether God creates a new ſubſtance, when he regenerates a ſinner: ſecondly, Whether the Grace of the Holy Ghoſt leaves any liberty to man. Strigelius denied the firſt point, and affirmed the ſecond. (10) Note, that Flacius Illyricus was a rigid aſſertor of Luther's doctrine de ſervo arbitrio. On the contrary, Strigelius approved the moderate expreſſions of Melanchthon: and therefore he was looked upon as one of the leaders of the Synergiſts, that is, of thoſe who acknowledge that man's will co-operates with Grace. This was the fifth ſchiſm of the Lutherans (11). According to Quenſtedt, Strigelius was the incendiary and trumpeter of that war, Belli ſynergiſtici, κορυφαῖος, fax & tuba (12). I have mentioned in another place (13) the conference of Weimar: many authors place it not in the year 1557, as Melchior Adam and Hoornbeeck (14) do, nor in the year 1561, as Spondanus (15), but in the year 1560. And they are in the right; for I have now lying before me the Acts of that Conference printed in the year 1562, with this title; Diſputatio de originali peccato & libero arbitrio, inter Mathiam Flacium Illyricum & Victorinum Strigelium publicè Vinariæ per integram hebdomadam, præſentibus Illuſtriſſ. Saxoniæ Principibus, Anno 1560 initio menſis Auguſti habita. It is a book of 394 pages in 4to.

[C] He was impriſoned.] Falling ſick during his impriſonment he had leave to get himſelf carried to his wife, but upon condition that he ſhould be at home as a priſoner. Several princes, and even the Emperor Maximilian, interceded for him, and obtained that he might be viſited by his friends (16).

[D] He

(a) It is an imperial city in Suabia, near the Alps. Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theologor. German. pag. 423.

(b) He was a native of Memminguen, and Phyſician to the Lords de Fronſberg, Id. ibid.

(c) See the remark [E].

(1) Micrælius, Synt. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. p. m. 766.

(2) Id. ib. p. 865.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Thuan. lib. xlvi, pag. 941.

(6) It was held towards the latter end of 1568, and in the beginning of 1569.

(7) See the letters written to Goldaſtus, and publiſhed in 1688.

(8) Henr. Alting. Theol. Hiſt. pag. 298.

(9) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. German. pag. 420.

(10) Alting. ibid.

(11) Micræl. ubi ſupra, pag. m. 865.

(12) Quenſtedt, de Patriis Viror. illuſtr. pag. 158.

(13) In the remark [C], of the article Illyricus.

(14) In Summa Controverſiarum, pag. 527. Edit. 1653.

(15) Spondanus, ad. ann. 1560, num. 32, pag. 602.

(16) Taken from Melchior Adam, ibid. pag. 421.

he quickly perceived that the poſt he was in was not a ſafe one [D], he left Iëna, and did not regard the remonſtrances which the univerſity of that name writ to him to perſuade him to return. He went to Leipſic, where he publiſhed notes upon the Pſalter. He obtained from the Elector the liberty of teaching in the univerſity of Wittemberg, or in that of Leipſic, and choſe to live in this laſt city. He began his lectures there on the firſt of March, 1563, and explained not only Divinity, but alſo Logic and Morals. He had carried his common-places as far as the article of the Euchariſt, which he was to begin in February 1567; but the ſchool door was ſhut againſt him, and they ſent him word to leave off reading lectures. He applied himſelf to the Elector of Saxony for redreſs, and not obtaining the juſtice he expected, he yielded to the Odicum Theologicum (d), - - The Hatred of Divines, and retired into the Palatinate. He hoped the Elector would take care of him, and he was not miſtaken, for he was called to Heidelberg to be profeſſor of Morality, and for ſome other employments. He worthily diſcharged the duties of thoſe places till he died, which happened on the twenty-ſixth of June 1569, after a very ſhort ſickneſs, according to his wiſhes (e). He was a good Philoſopher and a good Divine, and he had an admirable talent of teaching youth. His life was attended with a thouſand vexations; he was accuſed of hereſy; he was defamed to the higheſt degree, anathematized, and expoſed to penal laws [E]. This was the reaſon why

(d) Ceſſit impotentiæ Theologorum. Melch. Adam, ibid. pag. 423.

(e) Conſecutus eſt quod ſæpe in votis habuit, videlicet ne difficili & producto morbi genere ſpiritum edere cogeretur. Id. ibid. pag. 425.

[D] He perceived . . . . that the poſt he was in was not a ſafe one.] He thought he could not continue in it without endangering his conſcience, his reputation, and his life. He perceived that the peace, ſuch as it was, which the Divines of Iëna had concluded between him and his enemies, was ill obſerved: beſides, he was warned by many credible perſons, that he ſhould uſe all poſſible diligence to avoid the ſnares, or rather the open violence, deſigned againſt him. His fear was not groundleſs, for he knew that Solomon adviſes us not to truſt to an enemy, and to keep off from him; and he remembred Menander's ſaying, That reconciliations produce a wolf's friendſhip (17). When he anſwered the letter of the univerſity of Iëna, he declared, That if his going away was not free from blame, it was rather to be aſcribed to the inconveniencies of the time and place, and the ſnares of falſe brethren, than to himſelf (18), and, in a word, that he had rather retire into the moſt dreadful ſolitude, than return to Iëna. '(19) Paucis ut dicamus: ſumma propoſiti ipſius hæc fuit: nolle ſe redire Iënam: ſed potius iturum quocunque Deus vocarit: etiamſi in ea loca migrandum eſſet:

. . . Pigris ubi nulla campis
Arbor æſtiva recreatur aura:
Quod latus mundi nebulæ, maluſque
Jupiter urget (20).

' - - - To ſay all in a few words; the ſum of his reſolution was, that he would not return to Iëna; but would rather go wherever GOD ſhould call him; although it were into thoſe places,

. . . Where no ſun appears,
Or wrapt in clouds or drown'd in tears;
Where woods with whirling tempeſts toſt;
Where no relieving ſummer's breeze
Does murmur thro' the trees,
But all lies bound and fix'd in froſt.

CREECH.

If we conſider all thoſe things, we ſhall be leſs ſurprized to ſee that the diſputes of Divines are now a-days ſo ſcandalous. They were more ſcandalous ſtill at that time. Take notice that Strigelius was diſmiſſed by the Elector for not keeping his word, and raiſing unneceſſary conteſtations (21). He anſwered that he had promiſed to be modeſt only upon condition of doing nothing contrary to truth and his conſcience. Strigelio contra affirmante ſe modeſtiam quidem promiſiſſe, ſed duabus adjectis conditionibus ſalva veritate, & ſalva conſcientia. Thoſe two conditions do certainly deſerve to be underſtood, or expreſsly mentioned in all treaties: but they open a way for reviving old quarrels; and with thoſe two pretences, one may break the bonds of any engagement.

[E] His life was attended with a thouſand vexations; he was accuſed of Hereſy, he was defamed to the higheſt degree, anathematized, and expoſed to the penal laws.] Melanchthon having conſidered Strigelius's nativity, ſaid, That the ſtars threatened him with all manner of aſſaults. 'De ſchemate ejus genethliaco, Melanchthon, ubi id conſideraſſet, ita ex ſiderum poſitu ratiocinatus fuit; fore, ut artibus innumeris oppugnaretur; non aliter, Quàm lapis æquoreis undique pulſus aquis (22).

' - - - Melanchthon, having conſidered his nativity, concluded from the poſition of the ſtars, that he ſhould ſuffer an infinite number of aſſaults; no otherwiſe than

A rock that's buffeted on every ſide
By the rude billows . . . .

Perhaps the man born under ſuch malignant conſtellations, explained that prediction by theſe verſes of Horace, when he found himſelf expoſed to ſlanders, and ſchool diſputes:

. . . . Inſtat fatum mihi triſte, Sabella
Quod puero cecinit, divinâ motâ anus urnâ:
Hunc neque dira venena, nec hoſticus auferet enſis,
Nec laterum dolor, aut tuſſis, nec tarda podagra,
Garrulus hunc quando conſumet cunque: loquaces,
Si ſapiat, vitet, ſimulatque adoleverit ætas (23).

For now the fatal hour, the time is come,
The midwife told me, when ſhe read my doom;
She turn'd the ſieve, and ſaid, Nor ſword, nor cough,
Nor poiſon, plague, nor charms, ſhall take him off:
Nor the catarrh, nor flux, nor pox deſtroy,
But an eternal tongue ſhall kill the boy,
And therefore would he have his life be long,
When grown a man avoid a talking tongue.

CREECH.

However it be, let us ſee how he deſcribes his anguiſh (24): 'De meis rebus quid multa attinet ſcribere, cum non ſolum in veteri luto adhuc hæream; ſed etiam ad reliquas moleſtias accedat truncata & mutilata editio diſputationis inter me & hominem barbarum (25) agitatæ, & aliorum ſcriptorum: quibus fama mea atrociſſimè, apud eos, qui vitam & mores meos non penitus perſpexerunt, læditur ac deformatur. Nam inter reliquas criminationes ipſa morte acerbiores tribuitur mihi impia & extrema levitas, vanitas, inconſtantia, perfidia in negocio religionis, & pertinax odium veritatis. Ad hæc convicia, quorum molem vix una navis vehat, accedit fulmen injuſtæ condemnationis, quam Paulus vocat Anathema Maranatha. - - - To what purpoſe ſhould I write a great deal touching my own affairs; ſince I am not only ſtill entangled in the old mire, but likewiſe to my other vexations I have a freſh misfortune added, viz. a lame and curtailed edition of the diſpute between me and the Barbarian, and of my other books: by which means my reputation ſuffers grievouſly with thoſe who are not thoroughly acquainted with my life and converſation. For, among other accuſations more inſupportable than death itſelf, I am charged with an

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 421, 422.

(18) Id. ibid. pag. 422.

(19) Id. ibid.

(20) Theſe verſes are to be found in Horace, Od. XXII, lib. i.

(21) Quod violaſſet promiſſa, ac certamina moviſſet non neceſſaria. Id. ibid. pag. 424.

(22) Id. ibid. pag. 417.

(23) Horatius, Sat. IX, lib. i, ver. 29.

(24) Strigelius, Epiſt. ad Wolfgangum à Kotteritz, apud Melchior. Adamum, ubi ſupra, pag. 420. That letter was written in 1562.

(25) That is Flaccius Illyricus.

why, like Melanchthon in a like caſe, he often begged of GOD that he would take him out of this world (f) [F]. I ſhall not give a catalogue of his works; it may be ſeen in Mr Teiſſier (g). I muſt obſerve as a remarkable thing, that he made no ſcruple to uſe the thoughts and expreſſions of other writers [G]. It has been ſaid, that he retracted ‘impious and unbounded levity, pride, fickleneſs, treachery in the point of religion, and an obſtinate hatred to truth. Add to theſe reproaches, which would be more than a ſufficient cargo for any one ſhip, the thunder-bolt of unjuſt condemnation, which St Paul calls Anathema Maranatha.’ He adds, that though the teſtimony of a good conſcience ſerves him for a ſhield againſt the darts of calumny, yet he could not forbear being touched with the falſities publiſhed againſt him. His greateſt grief was to have his hands tied, that is, to be forced by the circumſtances of time and place to ſay nothing, though his ſilence made him ſuſpected by ſeveral perſons. Such is the fate of thoſe, who are perſecuted by enemies whoſe faction is uppermoſt, and ſupported by the ſecular power. Thoſe enemies publiſh whatever they pleaſe, and lye impudently to conceal their ſhameful artifices, and their iniquity from the public. Thoſe, who are calumniated by them, could not make a good defence without ſaying ſome things that would exaſperate their common maſter, and expoſe them to new miſeries. They are therefore ſilent; but ſuch a conduct produces an ill effect: the enemy triumphs at it, and many people, haſty in their judgments, put a ſiniſter interpretation upon it. There is nothing more advantageous, according to the notions of the world, than to be always for the ſtrongeſt faction; and, on the contrary, nothing can be more diſadvantageous, with reſpect to one's temporal intereſt, than to be for the party that is in the right, if it be inferior in credit and power. ‘Multis etiam, they are Strigelius's words, meum ſilentium, quo has calumnias diſſimulare cogor, ſuſpectum eſt, perinde quaſi mihi honeſta oratio deſit ad has labes & maculas detergendas. Sed boni viri, quibus conditio mea, triſtis ſane & luctuoſa, notior eſt, non ignorant, quibus vinculis conſtrictus impediar, quo minus vel cauſam ipſam explicare, vel innocentiam meam à morſibus venenatiſſimis hominum vindicare poſſim (26). - - - The ſilence in which I am obliged to paſs by theſe reproaches is ſuſpected by many; as if I wanted a ſolid defence againſt ſuch foul imputations. But good men, that are acquainted with my ſad and mournful condition, are not ignorant by what fetters I am bound up and hindered from juſtifying my cauſe, and clearing my innocence from the venemous attacks of men.’ All that I can do, ſays he, is to implore GOD's juſtice, and to cry out, as the prophet David did, O Lord God the avenger, O God the avenger, ſhew thy ſelf clearly. Exalt thy ſelf, O judge of the world, and render a reward to the proud (27). When he gave the reaſons why he had left Leipſic, the chief he alledged was the injury done, not ſo much to himſelf, as to truth, by forbidding him to mention a doctrine that was dearer to him than his life (28). His ſecond reaſon was, That no body offered to aſſiſt him, when his innocence was ſuppreſſed. The third, That he had received a threatning anſwer from the court; and laſtly, That he was oppreſſed by the threatnings of the Divines, and the anathema's of the Preachers (29). But the better to know the unhappineſs of his fate, and how unfortunate he was in being expoſed to the injuſtice of a violent faction, and more ſtill, in being too ſenſible of the injuries he received from them; it is ſufficient to obſerve that he grew old before his time. He was worn out, and decrepit in body and mind at forty-four years of age. He complained of it ſome few months before he died, as it appears from theſe words, ‘Cum ante annos decem & corpore & animo vigerem: nunc tot calamitatibus tum victus tum fractus, vix ægra membra traho, & animi alacritatem ſeneſcere comperio. Quare me omni cura & cogitatione præparo ad iter, quod ducit ex hujus vitæ miſeriis ad æternam tranquillitatem (30). - - - Whereas ten years ago I was vigorous both in mind and body, I am now ſo far ſubdued and broken with ſuch a number of calamities, that I can ſcarce drag along my weary members, and I perceive a ſenſible decay in the chearfulneſs of my mind. For which reaſon I am preparing myſelf with the utmoſt diligence and thought, for that journey which leadeth out of the miſeries of this life to eternal tranquillity.’ A verſe of Virgil with a ſmall alteration in it might have been applied to him (31).

[F] Like Melanchthon, in a like caſe, he often begged of GOD that he would take him out of this world.] I deſire to die, ſaid Melanchthon (32); firſt, that I may enjoy the beatifical viſion; ſecondly, that I may be no longer expoſed to the implacable hatred of Divines. Strigelius had the ſame thoughts: read theſe words of Melchior Adam. ‘A Flacio Illyrico, & ejus manipularibus, objectum ei eſt crimen hæreſeos: quod graviſſimè tulit: nominatim accuſatus eſt; quod non rectè ſentiret & doceret de ea parte doctrinæ; quæ appellatur, de libero arbitrio. Ab aliis verò aliorum inſimulatus eſt errorum: ut vita ejus perpetua fuerit pugna & dimicatio. Itaque ut Melanchthon ante mortem dixit: cupio ex hac vita migrare propter duas cauſas: primum ut fruar deſiderato conſpectu Filii DEI & cœleſtis eccleſiæ: deinde ut liberer ab immanibus & implacabilibus odiis Theologorum: ita ipſe eaſdem cauſas ſæpè inter precandum uſurpare ſolitus fuit: cum videret ſe hoc fato natum: ut omnibus eorum telis, qui eſſent arguti cives ſine virtute, vita & fama ſua propoſita eſſet (33). - - - The crime of Hereſy was objected to him by Flaccius Illyricus and his followers, which grieved him very much. He was chiefly accuſed by them of thinking and teaching amiſs concerning what is called the doctrine of free-will. Others charged him with different errors, in ſuch a manner that his life was a continued fight and ſtruggle. Wherefore as Melanchthon ſaid before his death, I wiſh to die for two reaſons, &c. . . . . Strigelius frequently made uſe of the ſame reaſons in his prayers, perceiving that he was born to this fate, that his life and reputation ſhould be expoſed as a mark to the darts of ſuch men as had a great deal of wit but no virtue.’ If his father and mother had been witneſſes of his great trouble, their grief for it would have proceeded from a cauſe very different from that which made Iſaac and Rebecca uneaſy. The latter were troubled to ſee how well their ſon agreed with ſtrangers; but the former would have been afflicted at the war kindled between their ſon and his brethren, a war which grieved him no leſs than the alliance of ſtrangers grieved Eſau's mother. See the margin (34). It is to be obſerved that the Church, who is a good mother, bears her grief a little better than Rebecca; ſhe is troubled to ſee her children at war, and is ſo uſed to it, that one would think it is become familiar to her. She bears prudently, and ſhews a greater or ſmaller degree of patience, according as people have more or leſs dexterity in huffing her. But what is moſt admirable is the patience of the people; it may be ſaid that as in ſome countries they patiently bear all manner of taxes, they are every where no leſs tame with reſpect to controverſies.

[G] He made no ſcruple to uſe the thoughts and expreſſions of other writers.] In this reſpect he ſeemed to be for a community of goods; he did not think that in doing ſo he was a plagiary, and he was very willing that other authors ſhould deal with him as he dealt with them. If you find any thing in my books, ſaid he, that fits you, you may freely uſe it; every thing is at your ſervice. ‘Cùm Victorinus noſter diu multumque verſatus eſſet in lectione eorum Autorum, qui libros Ariſtotelis quaſi in ſuum ſuccum convertiſſent, illorum potiùs veſtigia voluit, ubi & quantum poſſet, conſectari, quàm novam per omnia cudere verſionem. Ac quidem ille vir & factus erat, & natus, ut ſi qua ei de re dicendum eſſet aut ſcribendum, & ipſi, quæ de eadem illa ipſa re alii etiam recentiores, & qui viverent adhuc, rectè tradidiſſent, in mentem venirent, non puderet hinc illum verba ab iis & ſententias mutuari. Non enim hoc dicebat plagium eſſe literarium, ſed ingenuam atque candidam doctis atque bonis viris dignam κοινωνίαν. Et faciat, inquit, aliquis idem, ſi ſe cum fructu hoc poſſe ſperat, de meis quoque (35). - - - As our Victorinus was extremely well verſed in thoſe authors who had thoroughly ſtudied and digeſted the books of Ariſtotle, he rather choſe to follow their footſteps, as much as poſſible, than to coin a tranſlation that ſhould be

(f) Taken from Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. German. pag. 417, & ſeq.

(g) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, p. 325.

(26) Strigel. apud Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. German. pag. 421.

(27) Pſalm xciv, ver. 1.

(28) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 424.

(29) Ad hæc omnia acceſſerunt minæ Theologorum & fulmina anathematum adverſus ipſum in concionibus edita. Id. ibid.

(30) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 425.

(31) The 114*th of the* vi*th book of the Æneid,* Invalidus vires ultra ſortemque ſenectæ. And bore beyond the ſtrength decrepit age ſupply'd. Let us ſay of Strigelius, Invalidus vires infra ſortemque juventæ. Leſs firm than is the fate of luſty youth.

(32) See above the remark [G] of the article MELANCHTHON.

(33) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 427.

(34) Eſau … took to wife two daughters of Heth, which were a grief of mind to Iſaac and Rebekah. Geneſ. xxvi. 34, 35. And Rebekah ſaid to Iſaac, I am weary of my life becauſe of the daughters of Heth. If Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth …. what good ſhall my life do me. Geneſ. xxvii, 46.

(35) Jacobus Monavius, Præf. Nicomacheorum Ariſtotelis cum verſione, Argumentis & Scholiis Strigelii, apud Thomaſium de Plagio Literario, num. 194, p. 82.

retracted at his death; but I take it to be a meer ſtory [H].

‘ new in every part. And indeed that man was ſo ‘ framed by nature, that when he was about to ſpeak or ‘ write upon any ſubject, if any thing occurred to him ‘ which other modern writers, ſome of whom were then ‘ alive, had handſomely expreſſed, he was not aſhamed ‘ to borrow words, and even ſentences from them: for ‘ he did not think, &c . . . .

[H] It has been ſaid that he retracted at his death, but I take it to be a meer ſtory.] We are told that a gentleman, who ſtudied at Heidelberg, met one day Strigelius in the ſtreet, and told him, Sir, ſome years ago you did not believe or teach the Calviniſtical doctrines you teach now. I was your ſcholar at Iena, where you gave other inſtructions to your diſciples. Strigelius made no anſwer, and went home, and finding himſelf very ill, moſt humbly intreated the Elector (36) to be ſo kind as to come to him, giving him to underſtand that he would impart to him ſome things relating to ſalvation. The Prince went to him, being accompanied by Count George de Hundſructen. What I have taught hitherto at Heidelberg in favour of the Calviniſts, ſaid Strigelius to him, does not well agree with the word of GOD; but the doctrines, which the Lutherans have profeſſed till now, are very true. The Elector having heard thoſe words, went away in anger. Strigelius quickly expired with a groan (37) This ſtory is taken from the relation of a journey to Conſtantinople, made by Gerlach, to whom Andreas Carolus (38), Abbot of St George, refers the reader, after having mentioned what you have juſt now read. He doubts whether one ſhould ſay that Strigelius had an unconſtant ſoul, rather than call it an unhappy one (39). He had called him before a weather-cock in point of religion, and a favourer of the Synergiſts and Zuinglians (40).

(36) It was Frederic III.

(37) Mox autem ægrotans Victorinus animam (inconſtantem dicam, an infelicem?) gemebundus exhalavit. Andr. Carolus, memorab. Eccleſiaſt. ſeculi xvii, pag. 49.

(38) Andr. Carolus, ibid.

(39) It ſeems in this place that he means a damned ſoul.

(40) Homo varius & verſipellis tum Synergiſtis, tum Zinglianis addictus. Id. ibid. pag. 34.

STROZZI (PHILIP) of an antient and rich family of Florence (a), was one of thoſe, who, after the death of Clement VII, moſt earneſtly endeavoured to recover the liberty of their country, by expelling Alexander de Medicis. When he ſaw that their ſollicitations at the court of the Emperor Charles V [A] were inſignificant, he took a ſhorter and more criminal method; which was to cauſe the pretended uſurper to be aſſaſſinated [B]. He engaged a man in this plot who put it in execution; but the ſucceſs of that enterprize was more fatal to the liberty of the Florentines, than the diſcovery

(a) See the remark [A], near the end.

[A] Their ſollicitations at the court of the Emperor Charles V.] There is ſomething about this in Rabelais's letters. The Cardinals Salviati and Rodolphus went to Naples with our Strozzi in the year 1536, to engage the Emperor to ſet up again a republican government in Florence: they did not ſucceed in it. ‘ I hear their affairs have not had the ſucceſs they ‘ hoped for, and that the Emperor told them peremp- ‘ torily that he had, at theirs and the late Pope Cle- ‘ ment's requeſt, appointed Alexander de Medicis, ‘ Duke of the territories of Florence and Piſa, which ‘ he never thought of, and had never done, had it ‘ not been for them; that if he ſhould depoſe him, it ‘ were acting the part of a juggler, doing and undo- ‘ ing; and that therefore they ſhould reſolve to ac- ‘ knowledge him for their Duke and Lord, and to ‘ obey him as vaſſals and ſubjects ought to do. As ‘ for the complaints they made againſt the Duke; he ‘ told them he ſhould take cognizance of them upon ‘ the place (1).’ I ſhall add the following words out of the firſt letter (2). ‘ I hear that it is (3) about the ‘ affair of Florence, and the difference between Duke ‘ Alexander de Medicis and Philip Strozzi, whoſe ‘ eſtate the Duke deſigned to confiſcate. It is no ‘ ſmall eſtate, for next to the Fourques of Auſburg, ‘ he is accounted the richeſt merchant in Chriſtendom. ‘ The Duke had appointed ſome men in that town ‘ to poiſon or kill him. Being informed of it he ob- ‘ tained the Pope's leave to bear arms, and he was ‘ commonly attended by thirty ſoldiers well armed. ‘ The Duke of Florence being informed that Strozzi ‘ and thoſe Cardinals were gone to the Emperor, and ‘ that he offered him four hundred thouſand ducats, ‘ if he would appoint ſome perſons to inquire into ‘ the Duke's tyranny and wickedneſs, ſet out from ‘ Florence, appointed Cardinal Cibo governor in his ‘ abſence, and arrived in that city (4) the day after ‘ Chriſtmas.’ In the thirteenth letter Rabelais ſays (5). ‘ That thoſe Cardinals, and Strozzi, with his money, ‘ could not prevail with the Emperor, though they ‘ offered, in the name of all thoſe that were baniſhed ‘ from Florence, to give him a million of gold ready ‘ money, to finiſh La Rocqua, that was begun in ‘ Florence, and to keep a good garriſon in it in the ‘ Emperor's name, and to pay him a hundred thou- ‘ ſand ducats every year, provided he would get their ‘ eſtates and former liberty reſtored to them’. Afterwards the author mentions the honours that were done to the Duke of Florence by Charles V, and then he adds: ‘ (6) From that time the ſaid Cardinals, the ‘ Biſhop of Xaintes, and Strozzi have continued their ‘ ſollicitations; the Emperor has at laſt referred the ‘ thing till he comes to Florence . . . . And the Duke ‘ has proceeded ſo cunningly in his tyranny, that the ‘ Florentines have proteſted to the Emperor nomine ‘ communitatis, that they deſire to have no other ‘ Lord but him. It is certain he has ſeverely puniſh- ‘ ed the exiles.’

Take notice that the author of the notes upon Rabelais's epiſtles, will not believe that Philip Strozzi was a merchant (7). But it is hardly conceivable how at that time a family of Florence could have got ſo much wealth without trading. However, if he was not a famous Banker, he deſerved to be accounted one. The baron de Forquevauls gives him that title. ‘ Philip ‘ Strozzi, ſays he (8), and Bartholomew Valori, better ‘ Bankers than Captains, were forced at Montemurlo. He adds (9), ‘ That he was prodigiouſly rich for a ‘ citizen. Peter Strozzi, notwithſtanding his loſſes ‘ and expences, had ſtill four hundred thouſand crowns ‘ in the banks of Venice and Lyons, that remained ‘ out of his father Philip's inheritance (10).’ He went to Francis I, at the camp of Marolles, with a troop of two hundred Arquebuziers on horſeback, which had coſt him above fifty thouſand crowns (11). This I find in Brantome, who adds (12): ‘ He was vaſtly ‘ rich, and ſaved a great deal of money at Venice, ‘ where he kept for ſome time with Mr Strozzi, his ‘ ſon (13). That brave lord ſpent that vaſt eſtate in ‘ the ſervice of our kings; for, as I have it fro[illegible]is ‘ ſon, and his antient ſervants, whereas he was worth ‘ above five hundred thouſand crowns, when he came ‘ into the ſervice of our kings, he did not leave ‘ twenty thouſand crowns to his ſon when he died: ‘ that is ſpending to ſome purpoſe.’ Here is another paſſage of Brantome, which fully confirms what I have quoted out of him. ‘ The king gave to Mr Strozzi, ‘ ſon of the Mareſchal of France, fifty thouſand ‘ crowns as a reward for the office of Colonel-General ‘ of the infantry, with which he bought Breſſuire in ‘ Poitou; and this is all that he and his father left of ſo ‘ great an eſtate as he brought into France: for I have ‘ heard many people ſay, That when he came thither, ‘ hehad a million of gold in bank, or in goods and ‘ jewels, or in money, or books (14)’.

[B] Which was to cauſe the pretended uſurper to be aſſaſſinated.] I ſhould be very much to blame, ſhould I think that I can comment upon this text more elegantly, by uſing my own words than by uſing Balzac's expreſſions; and therefore I ſhall make no alteration in the proof he affords me (15). ‘ Philip Strozzi, ‘ the huſband of Clarice de Medicis, ſiſter (16) to ‘ Pope Leo, not being able to bear the reign of Duke ‘ Alexander de Medicis, exhorted Laurence de Me- ‘ dicis, his couſin, to conſpire againſt the life of ‘ Duke Alexander, and to reſtore the liberty of his ‘ country,

(1) Rabelais, Letter viii, pag. 29.

(2) Idem, pag. 8, & ſeq.

(3) That is, that the Cardinals Salviati and Rodolphus were gone to the court of Charles V, at Naples.

(4) That is, at Rome.

(5) Rabelais, ibid. pag. 55.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 56.

(7) Obſervat. ſur les Epitres de Rabelais, pag. 61.

(8) Francois de Pavie, Baron de Forquevauls, Vies de pluſieurs grands Capitaines, pag. 379.

(9) Id. ibid. pag. 382.

(10) Ibid. pag. 383.

(11) Brantome, Capitaines Etrangers, Tom. ii, pag. 287.

(12) Brantome, ibid. pag. 288.

(13) Philip Strozzi, Colonel-General of the French infantry. See Moreri, and Father Anſelm, whom he tranſcribes. See alſo the following article.

(14) Idem, Brantome Memoir. des Capit. François, Tom. iv, pag. m. 311, 312.

(15) Balzac, Entretien, xxxiv, ch. vi, pag. m. 330.

(16) Balzac ſhould have ſaid niece.

diſcovery of the whole conſpiracy would have been. The death of Alexander de Medicis made room for a ſucceſſor better qualified than he was, to ſettle a new ſovereignty. He beat the Malecontents: Strozzi was made a priſoner, and found no better expedient than to kill himſelf [C]. He had married Clarice de Medicis, nearly related to Leo X, by whom he had ſeveral children, and among others Peter Strozzi, Mareſchal of France, mentioned in Moreri's Dictionary (b). It is not true that the Nun, who wrote ſome Latin hymns, was that Mareſchal's ſiſter [D].

'country. Laurence appeared willing to undertake 'ſuch a dangerous enterprize; but he was afraid that 'his two daughters would run the hazard of loſing 'their honour, becauſe his eſtate would be confiſcated. Philip told him that ſuch a fear ſhould not 'hinder him, and aſſured him that whatever the ſucceſs of his enterprize might be, he would marry 'two of his ſons to his two daughters. Which he 'did, for Laurence having made his eſcape after 'Duke Alexander's murther, without reaping any 'advantage from it, Philip religiouſly performed his 'promiſe, and gave Laodamia de Medicis to Peter 'Strozzi, who was ſince Mareſchal of France, and 'Magdalen to Robert Strozzi, who lately died at 'Rome (17).'

[C] He found no other expedient than to kill himſelf.] I ſhall ſtill uſe Balzac's words (18). 'The ſame 'Philip, after the death of Duke Alexander oppoſed 'Coſmo, his ſucceſſor, firſt great Duke of Tuſcany. 'But having loſt the battle of Marone, near Florence, 'he was made priſoner; and believing that his enemy 'would poiſon him or put him to an ignominious 'death, reſolved to kill himſelf. Before he executed 'that ſtrange reſolution, he made his will, the original whereof I have ſeen at Rome, among the 'papers of the late Signor Pompey Frangipane, in 'which among other things, that man, whom the 'antients would have adored, orders and entreats his 'children to dig up his bones out of the place where 'they ſhall lie in Florence, and to get them tranſported to Venice; to the end, ſays he, that ſince 'he could not be ſo happy as to die in a free city, 'he may enjoy that bleſſing after his death, and his 'aſhes may reſt in peace out of the conqueror's dominion. Afterwards he engraved upon the mantle-piece of the chimney with the very ſame point of 'the dagger wherewith he killed himſelf, this verſe 'of Virgil, > Exoriare aliquis noſtris ex oſſibus ultor.

>
> Riſe ſome avenger of our Libyan blood.
>
> Dryden.

'Which was faithfully executed by his children, who 'came into France to ſerve the king againſt the Emperor Charles V, who had founded the domination 'of the Medicis at Florence. I muſt not forget that 'the ſame Philip Strozzi, at the beginning of his 'will, expreſſes a great confidence in God's mercy, 'hoping he will forgive him for killing himſelf, ſince 'he did it like a man of honour to maintain his liberty; being of opinion that when a free man has 'loſt it he may lawfully die. But the Goſpel is contrary to ſuch an opinion, and New Rome calls deſpair what Old Rome called greatneſs of ſoul. She 'excommunicates now thoſe whom ſhe would have 'formerly deified.'

Note, That one of the reaſons that moved Strozzi to kill himſelf was the fear of expoſing his friends to great dangers by what he might confeſs againſt his will upon the rack (19), which appears from a paper that was found in his chamber, wherein he '(20) upbraided Cardinal Libo (21), a friend and truſty 'counſellor to the Duke, with his great cruelty, and 'exhorted him to fill himſelf with the blood he had 'ſo much thirſted after. As for me, added he, ſince 'I have not been able to help my friends in my lifetime, I will do them no prejudice after my death ... 'A remarkable inſtance of human miſery, ſays the 'Baron de Forquevauls, and of the uncertainty of the 'things of this world! Philip Strozzi, who a few 'months before was as much eſteemed and honoured 'as any man in Italy, not only for his riches, that 'were prodigious for a citizen, and for the antiquity 'of his family, which had continued in honour for 'ſeveral hundred years, but alſo for his agreeable 'converſation, magnificence, and liberality, for his 'learning, and his great knowledge and experience of 'the world, finds himſelf a captive in that very 'town whoſe liberty he deſigned to preſerve, and is 'obliged to kill himſelf with his own hands to avoid 'the cruelty of his ungrateful fellow-citizens.' It is allowed that he was a man of learning. 'Fortes non 'ſunt, qui alicujus deſiderii potiundi ſpe privati, aut 'calamitate oppreſſi, manus ſibi intulerunt, qualis 'paucis annis ante Philippus Stroſſius, opibus florens, 'literis non ineruditus, cætera felix, ſi ſua ſorte contentus, partibus adverſis non faviſſet (22). - - - - Such 'are not truly brave who, upon ſome diſappointment or 'calamity that oppreſſes them, take away their own life; 'as Philip Strozzi did a few years ago; a man of 'great riches, not unlearned, and happy in all other 'reſpects, if he had been contented with his own lot, 'and not favoured the oppoſite faction.'

[D] It is not true that the Nun, who wrote ſome Latin hymns, was that Mareſchal's ſiſter.] Brantome, who ſays ſo, is miſtaken. 'He had a ſiſter, ſays 'he (23), who is a Nun, and an Abbeſs in Italy, 'a very honeſt lady, and very well ſkilled in divine 'and human learning, eſpecially in Latin Poetry. 'She wrote ſeveral fine hymns and ſpiritual canticles 'in Latin verſe, which have been ſung in the 'churches of Italy with great admiration and devotion: nay, I have heard ſay that they are ſung ſtill 'in ſome churches.' Colomiés knew not this miſtake of Brantome: he quotes him (24) to confirm what he had cited out of Thuanus in praiſe of Laurentia Strozzi, a Dominican Nun, who died in 1591, aged ſeventy-ſeven years, and whoſe hymns were printed at Paris ten years after (25). That Nun was not ſiſter to Peter Strozzi, Mareſchal of France, as Colomiés thought upon Brantome's credit: ſhe was ſiſter to Cyriacus Strozzi (26), profeſſor of Philoſophy and of the Greek tongue at Florence, and then profeſſor at Bologna, and at laſt at Piſa, ſon of Zachary Strozzi, deſcended from the ſame anceſtors with our Philip. There is more reaſon to ſay that Signor Flaminio's wife (27) was ſiſter to Peter Strozzi, Mareſchal of France. Brantome ſpeaks of her thus: 'She had 'alſo another ſiſter, Signora Magdalena Strozzi, an 'able, ingenious, and very beautiful woman, whom 'I ſaw at Rome in my younger years. She had 'married Signor Flaminio, Count of Anguilara, 'who commanded ſome gallies with the Prior of Capua, his brother-in-law. That Count was the ſon 'of that brave Count de Anguilara, who was killed 'in the ſervice of King Francis I.' This Magdalen might very well be the ſame that is mentioned in the Prejugez legitimes contre le Papiſme, on occaſion of a ſteel-box, containing among other relicks our Saviour's prepuce. 'A devout lady, called Magdalen Strotia '(28), was commiſſioned to look over thoſe precious 'treaſures, and put them in order. When ſhe came 'to the little bag wherein the prepuce was, ſhe went 'about to unty the ſtring of the bag; but her fingers 'grew ſtiff and without motion at three ſeveral times: 'Upon this they cried out a miracle, a miracle; and 'another perſon was appointed to open the bag, viz. 'Clarice, daughter of Madam Strotia, who was a 'virgin, and young enough to be ſure of her virginity. For none but a virgin's fingers could touch 'that prepuce (29).' Read the ſequel of this paſſage in the original; it is a ſharp ſatire and a pleaſant ridicule upon many other things, beſides the imprudence of thoſe who write ſo many chimerical things about relics.

(b) He quotes there Baron Forquerauls: he ſhould have ſaid Baron Forquevauls.

(17) When Balzac writ this, Robert muſt have been dead a long time before.

(18) Balzac, ibid. pag. 331, 332.

(19) See the Baron de Forquevauls, p. 381.

(20) Id. p. 382.

(21) It ſhould be Cibo.

(22) Rorarius, quod animalia bruta ratione utantur melius homine, pag. 15.

(23) Brantome, Capit. Etrangers, Tom. ii, pag. 294.

(24) Colomiés, Bibliotheque Choiſie, p. 207.

(25) See an Encomium upon that Nun in Hilarion de Coſte, Tom. ii, pag. 97. & ſeq.

(26) See her Encomium among thoſe of Papyrius Maſſo, Tom. ii, pag. 223, & ſeq. See alſo Mr Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges tirez de Mr de Thou, Tom. i, p. 275, & Tom. ii, pag. 188. Edit. 1696.

(27) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 387, calls him Flaminio d'Aſtaba.

(28) It ſhould be Strozzi.

(29) Jurieu, Préjugez légitimes contre le Papiſme, Tom. ii, pag. 227. He quotes Tolet. in ſecundum Luc. poſt. annotat. 31.

STROZZI (Philip) grandſon (a) of the foregoing. You will find in Moreri that he was born at Venice in 1541; and that he was brought into France at ſeven years of age. He was bred up with King Francis II, who was then Dauphin, and began to bear arms in Piedmont, under Mareſchal de Briſſac (b). A ſally of youth moved him to go into Piedmont, without telling his father of it. We ſhall ſee, below, the particulars of that mad prank [A], and I ſhall mention likewiſe the care that was taken of his ſtudies [B]. He was a very brave man, and teſtified upon many occaſions the utmoſt intrepidity (c). He was made Colonel-General of the French Infantry, after the deceaſe of Mr Dandelot, in the year 1569 (d). It was he who did ſo well arm the Infantry, and brought in the uſe of large bored arquebuſes (e). He reſigned that office when they gave him the command of the army that was ſent to the Tercera iſles, to attempt the re-eſtabliſhment of Don Antonio, King of Portugal [C]. That expedition proved very unfortunate; he loſt his life in it [D] the twenty-ſixth of July 1582, and was uſed by the enemies as an infamous pirate: ſeveral

(a) He was the ſon of Peter Strozzi, Marſhal of France.

(b) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 386.

(c) See Brantome in the Encomium upon Strozzi, in the fourth volume of his Memoirs.

(d) Anſelme, ibid. See alſo Brantome, ibid. pag. 270.

(e) Brantome, ibid. pag. 289.

[A] We ſhall ſee . . . . the particulars of that mad prank.] ‘Being but a boy, and bred up with the young King Francis II, who was then Dauphin, and hearing of the noble war that was made in Piedmont, he ſtole away only with two horſes, and a Milan arquebuſe at his ſaddle-bow, and went thither, having for his guide that ſpecial rogue John de Eſt, a German, who was lately hanged at Blois, having been made ſome years before Knight of the order of St Michael . . . . . . That fellow adviſed him to ſteal ſome ſilver baſons, cups, and ewers from his mother, in order to make his journey. When the Mareſchal, his father, came to know this, and what reaſon had moved him to it, he ſaid, That if it had been for any thing elſe, and not for ſuch a glorious deſign as that of going to the war, he would have hanged him; but that he forgave him, and would do ſo for the time to come, if he took more from him, provided it were upon ſuch a noble account. Mr Strozzi told me ſo himſelf. Afterwards when he ſaw him, though he was naturally very ſevere, he laughed at it before his mother, who deſired he ſhould be puniſhed for it: however he gave him a ſevere reprimand (1).’

[B] I ſhall mention . . . . the care that was taken of his ſtudies.] ‘His father took care of his education, and particularly that he ſhould be inſtructed in good learning; he himſelf had made a great proficiency in it: his ſon could not come near it; however he had learning enough. I have heard him ſay that one day his father aſked him what he had done that morning. He told him that he had rid, plaid at tennis, and then breakfaſted. Ah! unhappy young man, ſaid his father, you feed the body before you feed the ſoul? Do ſo no more; firſt of all fill your mind with good reading and ſtudy, and then deal with your body as you think fit. Such were the wiſe precepts which that father gave to his ſon, who made a good uſe of them; for he had as much knowledge as valour, tho' I believe that ever ſince he left his books to betake himſelf to the war, he did not beſtow half an hour upon reading (2).’

[C] He reſigned that office, when they gave him the command of the army . . . . to attempt the re-eſtabliſhment of Don Antonio, King of Portugal.] Varillas is miſtaken as to the circumſtances of this fact. I ſhall make it appear when I have ſet down Brantome's words. ‘Not long before he undertook that voyage by the queen's order, he was deſired and preſſed to lay down his office of Colonel, being told that he could not be General of that Army, and Colonel in France. Such a propoſal was unacceptable to him, and he was unwilling to comply with it. However, becauſe the king had a mind to raiſe Mr d'Epernon, and to gratify him with that poſt, of which he was more ambitious than of any other, Mr Strozzi was forced to reſign it, to his great grief; for I know what he told me then: he added, that if he did not die in the enterprize, he would be preferred to a greater poſt than that was, and that none ſhould ever dare to deprive him of it. The king gave him fifty thouſand crowns as a reward, wherewith he purchaſed Breſſuire in Poitou (3).’ It appears from the laſt words of this paſſage, that Varillas ſhould not have ſaid that Philip Strozzi, going to the Tercera iſles, had nothing to loſe in France, ſince he was ſo far from having made any purchaſe in it, that he had ſpent the three millions his grandfather had left (4). That Hiſtorian is the more inexcuſable, becauſe he quotes Brantome's encomium upon Philip Strozzi. Let us ſee his other miſtakes. ‘The court had lately done Strozzi the greateſt injury he could receive, for King Henry III had deprived him without a cauſe, and even without a pretence, of his office of Colonel of the French infantry, to beſtow it upon the Duke d'Epernon; and becauſe all thoſe that are out of favour grow contemptible, tho' their merit be never ſo great, it was not to be thought that the French, on board the Queen-Mother's fleet, would have a ſufficient eſteem for the General ſhe had given them, ſince they knew that the court made ſo little account of him, that they had taken from him the moſt important poſt in the army, without making him any amends; which had never been practiſed in the foregoing reigns, nor in that of Henry III, before the prodigious fortune of the Duke d'Epernon (5).’ There are two things in this paſſage, the falſity whereof appears from the words of Brantome, above quoted. It is not true that Strozzi was deprived of his office of Colonel without any pretence, and without making him any amends. I am contented with this criticiſm, tho' I might proceed farther in my obſervations againſt Varillas; for the hiſtory of the French monarchy may doubtleſs afford ſome examples of what he affirms to have never been practiſed.

[D] That expedition proved unfortunate; he loſt his life in it.] The Marquis de Sainte Croix, who commanded the Spaniſh fleet, obtained a compleat victory over the French; but he caſt a blot upon his victory, by his cruel uſage of the vanquiſhed. A particular account of his cruelty may be ſeen in a book of Varillas (6), out of which I ſhall only take what concerns our Strozzi. He was forced to ſurrender, after he had made a brave defence (7): ‘(8) Binvile, a gentleman of Picardy, who wrote fifty years after three volumes des Véritez Françoiſes (9) in Cardinal de Richelieu's vindication, with more eloquence and neatneſs than any other apologiſt of that prime miniſter, relates from the depoſition of the French, who made their eſcape from the expedition on the Tercera iſles, that Strozzi was wounded above his knee with the ſhot of an arquebuſe, ſo that he could not ſtand; and that he was carried in that condition to the Marquis de Sainte Croix, who turned his head another way with diſdain, that he might not ſee him; that being told he was the General of the French fleet, he ordered him to be removed, becauſe he did but foul and poiſon his ſhip; that a Spaniſh ſoldier, in obedience to the marquis, made an end of Strozzi, by giving him two ſtabs, and then they threw him into the ſea. Other relations do not agree about theſe particulars; and tho' they own that Strozzi had been wounded in the fight, ſo that he could not have recovered, and yet that the Marquis de Sainte Croix ordered they ſhould make an end of him; they add, that he kept his corpſe to have it hanged with the other priſoners, on whom he deſigned to inflict that puniſhment, under pretence that they were men whom no body would own, who came to make war with Spain in the Tercera iſles, tho' that monarchy was at peace with that of France.’ Varillas ſhould not have quoted Binvile, for that author ſays nothing in particular about Strozzi: he only ſays (10), that the Marquis de Sainte Croix uſed him barbarouſly; and of all the facts he relates thereupon, there is none he grounds upon the teſtimony of the French, who returned from the Tercera iſlands. Varillas ſhould have quoted Brantome, who expreſſes himſelf thus (11): When

(1) Brantome, Mémoirs des Capitaines François, Tom. iv, pag. m. 303.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 304.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 311.

(4) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri III, livr. vi, pag. m. 134.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 135.

(6) The Hiſtory of Henry III.

(7) Varillas, ibid. pag. 145.

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 146.

(9) Moreri under the word Barthelemi (Charles) mentions the author of that book; he ſtyles him Sieur de Bienville.

(10) Véritez Françoiſes, Part. ii, pag. 403, Edit. of Paris 1643, in 4*to.*

(11) Brant. ubi ſupra, 307.

ſeveral gentlemen, who had followed him, were delivered up to the executioner, like ſo many robbers on the ſea, who had no commiſſion for what they did [E]. He was extremely ſevere; which appeared when he ordered eight hundred women of pleaſure, who followed the camp, to be thrown into the river Loire (f). His free diſcourſe about religion occaſioned a belief that he was little perſuaded of the truth of Chriſtianity; but Brantome affirms he was wronged in that reſpect, and that he was otherwiſe a very honeſt man (g) [F]. This teſtimony proceeding from a man, who acknowledges on the other hand (h) that Strozzi plaid him a trick of a moſt ungrateful friend, and that he had the reputation of being neither a bad enemy nor a good friend, is of great weight: for men offended upon ſuch a nice account, do not uſe to conceal the other faults that are known to them, and do not ſay that this was the only one (i). It is affirmed that he gave great credit to Judicial Aſtrology, and that it proved very prejudicial to him in his laſt expedition [G].

(f) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri III, book vi, pag. m. 142.

(g) Brantome, ubi ſupra, pag. 305.

(h) Id. ibid. pag. 310.

(i) As honeſt a man as ever came from Florence: He had but one fault; he was the coldeſt friend that ever was ſeen. Id. ibid. pag. 311.

Mr Strozzi ‘ſaw the fleet, commanded by the Marquis de Sainte Croix, making towards him, he was ſo deſirous of preventing him, that his ſhip being heavy, and a bad ſailer, for it was a large Flanders hulk, he removed into a lighter ſhip, on which was Mr de Beaumont, lieutenant to Mr de Briſſac, whoſe governor he had been, and without any farther delay came up to the admiral, and they fought a long while hand to hand; but being wounded in the thigh, near the knee, with a muſket-ſhot, his men being diſcouraged, left off fighting: whereupon the Spaniards eaſily boarded him, and carried him to the Marquis de Sainte Croix, who ſeeing what a miſerable condition he was in, ſaid, he would only be a troubleſome and offenſive nuiſance on board the ſhip, and ordered they ſhould make an end of him; which was done by giving him two ſtabs, and then they threw him into the ſea.’ See the margin (12).

[E] He was uſed as an infamous pirate: ſeveral gentlemen, who had followed him, were delivered up to the executioner as robbers on the ſea, who had no commiſſion for what they did.] ‘As ſoon as the Marquis de Sainte Croix landed in the iſland of St Michael, he cauſed about three-hundred French priſoners, among whom there were fifty-two gentlemen, to be brought into the public place, called Villa Franca (13). They were expoſed, by his order, upon ſcaffolds to the public view, or rather to be laughed at by the people; and then they were ſentenced to be hanged; as the interrupters of commerce, the enemies of the public peace, and favourers of rebels and pirates, who made bold to come from France in a body, to ſerve Don Antonio againſt Philip II, King of Spain, lawful heir of Portugal, notwithſtanding the peace between the Spaniards and the French (14).’ Thuanus's words are more energetical. ‘Tum per tubicinem captivis ſiſti juſſis, ex numero procerum XXVIII numerati ſunt, ex nobilitate circiter L, ex omni numero CCC, quos omneis ad mortem damnavit (Santacrucius) publicato elogio, quod pacem inter Chriſtianiſſimum & Catholicum reges juratam violaſſent; Antonio Crati Priori ad claſſem Indicam intercipiendam inſidias ſtruenti operam navaſſent; inſulas R. Catholici, uti jam ad S. Michaelis inſulam fecerant, prædaturi veniſſent; conſerta pugna Catholici claſſem oppugnaſſent. Proinde tanquam publicæ tranquillitatis ac commercii perturbatores erga majeſtatem Catholicam perduelles ac piratæ infames utriuſque Regis bono, ſic Santacrucii ſententia ferebat, criminalium cauſarum judici capite plectendi traduntur (15). - - - Then the priſoners being produced at a ſignal given by a trumpeter, were found to make in all three-hundred; among whom there were twenty-eight noblemen, and about fifty gentlemen. All theſe the Marquis de Sainte Croix condemned to death, having firſt cauſed a public declaration to be made, that they had broken the peace concluded between their Chriſtian and Catholic Majeſties; that they had aſſiſted the Prior Antony Crates in his ſcheme for intercepting the Weſt-India fleet; that they had come to plunder the iſlands of his Catholic Majeſty, as they had already done to the iſland of St Michael; and that they had openly attacked his fleet. For which reaſons, as enemies to the public peace and trade, as traytors to his Catholic Majeſty, and as infamous pirates, they were delivered over, as the ſentence run, for the good of both kingdoms, to the Judge of criminal cauſes, in order that they ſhould be puniſhed with death.’ It is affirmed in ſome relations, that the Marquis having cauſed Strozzi to be put to death, kept his corpſe, to have it hanged with the other priſoners, on whom he intended to inflict ſuch a puniſhment (16). Henry III required no ſatisfaction for that bloody affront, which ought to be reckoned one of the moſt ſhameful paſſages of his reign. The Hiſtorian Conteſtagio . . . . tho' he was a penſioner of Spain . . . . owns that Strozzi acted in Henry the third's name, and had a patent for being General of that army (17). The author, from whom I have theſe words, adds, that the nobility and the ſoldiers who followed Strozzi, had engaged in that voyage by the moſt Chriſtian's King's ſpecial command; and that his majeſty had declared to Pope Gregory XIII, by his ambaſſador, and Philip II, by Mr de Saint Goart, afterwards Marquis de Piſany, that he avowed that naval expedition, as being obliged, by antient treaties, to protect the kingdom of Portugal. It was therefore an inexcuſable baſeneſs to expreſs no reſentment for ſuch a breach of the laws of war, and ſuch an ignominious puniſhment inflicted upon the French priſoners, as if they had been pirates and men whom no body would own. Thoſe who blame that prince for giving too great a power to his favourites, do him no injuſtice; but they ſhould blame him much more for being ſo weak as to approve all the fancies of his mother, an ambitious woman, who pretended to the crown of Portugal out of an intolerable vanity. She was one of thoſe, who laid a claim to that kingdom (18), and made no ſcruple to produce ridiculous and chimerical pretenſions, that the world might think her anceſtors had been more illuſtrious than it was reported. Having made ſuch a ſtep out of meer vanity, ſhe proceeded to warlike preparations in order to conquer Portugal; ſhe ſent a fleet into the Tercera iſlands, which had the ill ſucceſs I have mentioned; ſhe had the confuſion to ſee that thoſe who acted in her name, and by her ſon's authority, were uſed like pirates, and France was obliged to leave ſuch an ignominious affront unpuniſhed. That queen, who pretended to be ſo great a Politician, had a wrong notion of things, and will never ſerve for a proof that women are capable of governing. Could any thing be more imprudent and impertinent than to engage in ſuch a war, when the kingdom was full of factions, and laboured under great diſtempers, the curing of which ſhould have been the principal care of the court.

REFLEXION upon the conduct of Catherine de Medicis.

[F] His free diſcourſe about religion occaſioned a belief that he was little perſuaded . . . but Brantome affirms, he was wronged in that reſpect, and that he was otherwiſe a very honeſt man] Theſe laſt words are Brantome's: here follows what he adds. ‘Moſt people looked upon him as a man who had little religion; they might think ſo if they pleaſed, but they never ſounded the bottom of his ſoul. It was true, he was no biggot, no hypocrite, and no devourer of crucifixes, and that he little minded maſſes and ſermons; but then he believed the main things which ought to be believed; and beſides, he would not have wronged any body for any thing in the world. Indeed when he was in a merry mood, he would ſometimes laugh at Purgatory and Hell; but no ſtreſs ſhould have been laid upon it, for he did cerly believe Hell-torments, tho' he laughed at the great dragon repreſented by Painters. To conclude, he ſaid many things, which he might as well have let alone; but that was more out of mirth than out of any ill deſign. I have been familiarly converſant with him about thirty years, and I may ſay he was no impious man (19).’ It is in vain for Brantome to palliate the thing; what he ſays is ſufficient to ſhew that Strozzi had infinitely more morality than religion.

[G] It is affirmed that he gave great credit to Judicial Aſtrology, and that it proved very prejudicial to him in his laſt expedition.] Read theſe words of Varillas (20). ‘The French plundered and burnt ‘the (12) You will find in d'Aubigné Hiſt. Univ. Tom. ii, book v, ch. xxi, pag. 1160, an account very different from this.

(13) Varillas ſhould have ſaid to the public place of Villa Franca: Villa Franca is a town, and not the name of the public place of a town.

(14) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 147.

(15) Thuanus, lib. lxxv, pag. m. 422, 423.

(16) Varillas, ibid. pag. 146. See alſo Thuanus, ibid. pag. 423.

(17) Véritez Françoiſes, Part. ii, pag. 405.

(18) See Mezerai in the fifth volume of his Abrégé Chronologique, pag. m. 238.

(19) Id. ibid. Tom. iv, p. 305.

(20) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 137.

'the town of Aguna, and cauſed ſuch a conſternation through the whole iſle of St Michael, that they would have made themſelves maſters of it on the ſame day, if they had purſued their victory; but it was Strozzi's fault as well as the Queen-mother's, his near relation, to be too much addicted to Judicial Aſtrology. He was perſuaded that there were fortunate and unfortunate days for him, and he had made a kind of calendar, which he obſerved with all poſſible exactneſs. The day on which he had been fighting was marked in it with a black ſpot; which made a greater impreſſion upon his mind than the victory he had obtained. He fancied that if he purſued it, he ſhould fall into the precipice his fate had prepared for him; and that his ill fortune began to favour him, the better to bring him to it. This was ſufficient to ſtop him, tho' the circumſtances were ſo favourable, that the citizens of the two chief towns of the iſle of St Michael, had deſerted them, and fled to the mountains, where they hoped to be more ſafe.' There is no body, whom it more concerns to be free from ſuch ſuperſtitions, than the General of an army. See above (21) what I have ſaid concerning Pericles and Nicias.

(21) Remark [B] of the article PERICLES.

STURMIUS (JAMES) was born at Straſburgh in the year 1489 [A], of one of the moſt noble families of that place, and made himſelf illuſtrious by the ſervices he did to his country. He exerciſed the moſt conſiderable offices with great capacity and probity, and glorioully performed ſeveral deputations both in the diets of the empire, and at the courts of Vienna and England. He very much contributed to the alteration that was made in religion at Straſburgh in the year 1528, and to the erection of the college that was opened ten years after (a), and to Sleidan's Hiſtory [B]. He died at Straſburgh on the thirtieth of October 1553 (b). He had been ſome years without receiving the ſacrament, being offended at the diſputes of Divines about the ſenſe of theſe words, this is my body. See the remark [D] in the following article.

(a) See remark [B], of the following article.

(b) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Juriſc. pag. 91, & ſeq.

[A] He was born at Straſburgh in the year 1489.] Melchior Adam places his birth in the year 1490 (1); but he mentions his epitaph (2) wherein it is placed in the year 1489. I rather chuſe to follow the epitaph, then the narrative of that writer. It is ſaid in Moreri's Dictionary, that our James Sturmius was born at Sleida, near Cologne, according to Verheiden. This is taken from Mr Teiſſier (3); but it is certain Verheiden does not ſay ſo, for he ſpeaks of John Sturmius, and not of James. What Mr Teiſſier adds, That Sturmius, after he had begun his ſtudies at Liege, went on with them at Paris, and that he had the direction of the univerſity of Straſburgh, in the quality of Rector, is a conſequence of his firſt miſtake, viz. of his falſly ſuppoſing that Verheiden ſpeaks of James Sturmius. What follows is not better. He died, not eighty years old, as Verheiden ſays, but in his climacterical year (4). Verheiden does not deſerve ſuch a cenſure; he only ſays that John Sturmius died being above eighty years old (5), which is true. Thuanus is miſtaken when he ſays that James Sturmius died in his climacterical year (6). His epitaph (7) imports, that he died in his ſixty-fourth year. Note, that Pantaleon (8), who quotes Sleidan, tells us, that James Sturmius departed this life in his climacterical year ſixty-three. Sleidan does not ſay ſo; on the contrary he obſerves that Sturmius lived above ſixty-three years. I ſhall ſet down the whole paſſage, becauſe it contains a juſt encomium upon the perſon, who makes the ſubject of this article. 'Octobris die penultimo, Jacobus Sturmius, vir longè & prudentiſſimus & integerrimus, ac planè decus nobilitatis Germanicæ, propter eximias animi dotes & doctrinam inſignem, è vita decedit Argentorati, cùm ex febri quartana per tempus bimeſtre decubuiſſet. Ætatis annum exceſſerat tertium & ſexageſimum (9). ---- On the thirtieth of October, James Sturmius, a man of the greateſt prudence and integrity, and who was truly an honour to the German Nobility, by reaſon of his exquiſite parts and uncommon learning, died at Straſburgh; after having been confined to his bed for two months by a Quartan Ague. He was paſt his ſixty-third year.' See how dangerous it is to truſt to quotations, that have not been compared with the original.

[B] He very much contributed ..... to Sleidan's hiſtory.] That Hiſtorian acknowledges it. 'Hiſtoriam nihil magis decet quàm veritas atque candor. Ego certè, ne quid in ea parte poſſet in me deſiderari, diligenter incubui: nec enim ex vano quicquam hauſi, vel auditione levi, ſed ſcribendi materiam mihi ſuppeditarunt acta, quæ ſtudioſè collegi, de quorum fide nemo dubitare poſſit: Intervenit etiam verè nobilis & præclari viri, Jacobi Sturmii, ſubſidium & opera, qui per annos amplius triginta verſatus in publicis & arduis negociis, maxima cum laude, quum ſua me non dedignaretur amicitia, quæ fuit ipſius humanitas, dubitantem & hærentem aliquando in vadis atque ſcopulis, peritus ipſe gubernator, ſubinde reduxit in viam æquabilem minimeque ſalebroſam, & majorem operis partem, ante morbum, quo ſublatus interiit, meo rogatu perlegit, & quorum oportuit, diligenter admonuit (10). ---- Nothing is more becoming hiſtory than truth and candour. I for my part have been at all poſſible pains not to fail in this point; for I have taken nothing at random, nor upon ſlight hear-ſay, but have carefully collected my materials out of records, the authority of which cannot be doubted. I have likewiſe been greatly aſſiſted by that noble and eminent perſon James Sturmius, who was himſelf employed for above thirty years in public and arduous affairs, and acquitted himſelf with great reputation. As he was pleaſed to honour me with his friendſhip, ſo when he found me ſometimes wavering and entangled amidſt rocks and ſhallows, like a ſkillful pilot he conducted me into an even and ſecure track. Before the ſickneſs of which he died, he peruſed at my entreaty the greateſt part of the work, and took pains to give me all neceſſary hints and admonitions.'

(1) Melch. Adam, ubi infra, pag. 91.

(2) Ibid. p. 95.

(3) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 72.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Verheiden, in Iconibus, pag. 138.

(6) Thuan. apud Teiſſier, ibid.

(7) Apud Melch. Adam, in Vitis Juriſconſultor. pag. 95.

(8) Pantaleon, in Diario Hiſtorico, ad diem 30 Octobr. pag. 327.

(9) Sleidanus, Hiſtor. lib. xxv, folio m. 725, ad ann. 1553.

(10) Jo. Sleidanus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Hiſtor. folio m. a v.

STURMIUS (JOHN) was born at Sleida in Eifel (a) near Cologne (b) the firſt of October 1507. He ſtudied firſt in his native country, with the ſons of Count Manderſcheid, whoſe receiver his father was. Afterwards he ſtudied at Liege in St Jerom's college, and then he went to Louvain in 1524, where he ſpent five years, three in being inſtructed and two in inſtructing others; and his ſchool-fellows were John Sleidan, Gonthier Andernac, Chriſtopher Montius, Bartholomew Latomus, Andrew Veſalius, James Omphalius, and ſome others, who became famous, and had a great affection for him. He ſet up a Printing-houſe with Rudger Reſcius, Greek-profeſſor, and printed ſome Greek authors, beginning with Homer, and ſoon after he carried thoſe editions to Paris in 1529 (c). What Melchior Adam ſays, is not true, that he was familiarly acquainted with Conrad Goclenius at Louvain [A]. He was very much eſteemed

(a) See his Epiſtle Dedicatory in the ſecond volume of Cicero's Orations.

(b) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philoſophor. pag. 342.

(c) Id. ibid.

[A] It is not true that he was familiarly acquainted with Conrad Goclenius.] Melchior Adam expreſſes himſelf thus: 'Ibidem (Lovanii) cum familiariter verſaretur cum Rudgero Reſcio, & Conrado Goclenio, hominibus eſteemed at Paris, where he read public lectures upon Greek and Latin authors, and upon Logic. He alſo married there, and kept many boarders; but becauſe he liked the new opinions, as they were called, he found himſelf in danger more than once, which doubtleſs was the reaſon why he removed and went to Straſburgh in the year 1537, to fill up the place the magiſtrates offered him. The year following he opened a ſchool there, which became famous [B], and by his means obtained of the Emperor Maximilian II, the title of an univerſity in the year 1566. He was a good Philologer, and writ Latin with great purity, and his way of teaching was very methodical. Upon this account the college of Straſburgh, of which he was rector, became the moſt flouriſhing in all Germany. His talents were not confined within the bounds of his ſchool; for he was intruſted with ſeveral deputations in Germany, and into foreign countries, and acquitted himſelf in thoſe employments with great honour and vigilance. He ſhewed an extraordinary charity to the Proteſtant refugees. He was not contented to beſtir himſelf in order to help them in their miſery by his advices and recommendations; but he ran in debt and grew poor

---

‘ hominibus literatiſſimis, utriuſque linguæ Græcæ & ‘ Latinæ Lovanii tum Profeſſoribus, &c. (1). - - - As he ‘ was familiarly acquainted at the ſame place with Rudgerus ‘ Reſcius and Conrad Goclenius, two very learned men, ‘ and at that time profeſſors at Louvain of both the ‘ Greek and Latin languages, &c.’ Theſe words are not clear enough: the plain meaning of them ſeems to be that Conrad Goclenius was profeſſor of the Greek and Latin tongues, as well as Rudgerus Reſcius; but it was not ſo. Goclenius was only profeſſor of the Latin tongue, and Reſcius of the Greek. The words I am going to quote out of John Sturmius will inform us of this diſtinction, and, beſides, that he applied himſelf to Reſcius, who had fallen out with Goclenius, and was little acquainted with the latter. ‘ Memini ego, Hermanne princeps Illuſtriſſime, So ‘ Sturmius ſpeaks to the Archbiſhop of Cologn in the epi- ‘ ſtle dedicatory of the ſecond volume of Cicero's Orations, ‘ cum Lovanii ante annos quindecim eſſem, præclaram ‘ de Comite Schauemburgio, quem tu tibi adjutorem ‘ atque ſucceſſorem cooptaſti, ſpem nobis omnibus da‘ tam eſſe. Audivit ille tum quotidie in Latina lingua ‘ doctorem, diſertum hominem Conradum Goclenium: ‘ cum ego Rutgeri Reſcii propter græcas literas, quas ‘ ille omnium optime tradebat, eſſem ſtudioſus: ob ‘ eamque cauſſam minus ego Conrado familiaris qui a ‘ Rutgero diſſentiebat. Sed de Schauemburgio conſen‘ tientes noſtri ſenſus erant, maximum aliquando ‘ ornamentum atque lumen in ſua Repub. futurum, ‘ ſi eum curſum ſtudiorum, in quo tum erat, poſſet ‘ conficere. - - - - Moſt illuſtrious Prince Hermanus, I ‘ remember that about fifteen years ago, while I was at ‘ Louvain, we had conceived excellent hopes of Count ‘ Schauemburg, whom you choſe for your aſſiſtant and ‘ ſucceſſor. At that time he daily frequented the ſchool ‘ of the eloquent Conrad Goclenius, profeſſor of the Latin ‘ tongue; whereas I applied myſelf to Rudgerus Reſcius, ‘ who taught the Greek language the beſt of any: and for ‘ this reaſon I was the leſs familiarly acquainted with ‘ Conrad, who was at variance with Rudgerus. Never‐ ‘ theleſs we had all the ſame notion of Schauemburg, ‘ viz. that he would prove a ſhining light, and an ‘ exceeding great ornament to his country, if he could but ‘ finiſh the courſe of ſtudies in which he was then en‐ ‘ gaged.’ I have ſaid more than once, that it is a fault not to date Epiſtles Dedicatory and Prefaces, and I have been confirmed in this opinion as I was tranſcribing this paſſage of Sturmius; for as it is not ſaid in my edition, which is that of Straſburgh, apud Joſiam Ribelium 1558, whether it be the ſecond or the third, &c. I ſhould have thought that it is the firſt, and conſequently that Sturmius dedicated it in the year 1558: but had I drawn ſuch a conſequence, I had been miſtaken in ſeveral things; I had falſely believed that he ſtudied at Louvain in 1543, and that Conrad Goclenius was then living. In order to avoid thoſe miſtakes I have been obliged to enquire into the true date of the firſt edition of Cicero's Orations, publiſhed by Sturmius, and I have found that it came out in 1540. Is it not a ſad thing to loſe one's time by the negligence of others? Is it reaſonable that the omiſſion of a thing, which required no more than a daſh of a pen (2), ſhould expoſe many readers to a very great trouble?

[B] He opened a ſchool in 1538, which became famous.] This ought not to be ſo underſtood as if no publick lectures had been read in the city of Straſburgh, before that year. The contrary is true; for Sturmius ſays, that when he arrived there Capito expounded the Bible, Hedio explained the Goſpels, James Bedrot taught Greek, Michael Delius (3) Hebrew, Chriſtian Herlin explained Euclid, Bucer, who was writing his retractation without any conſtraint put upon him, and correcting his Commentaries upon the Goſpels, explained in his houſe Themiſtius's Paraphraſes, and James Sturmius, Nicolas Cniepſius, and James Meyer were curators of the ſchool (4). The ſame Sturmius ſays, that when he made a journey from Louvain to Straſburgh in the year 1528, he found there a ſchool (5), where Bucer read lectures upon the Pſalms. What was done in the year 1538 is as follows. The college received an authentic form under the ſtatutes drawn up after Sturmius's arrival, and began to be ſolemnly regulated according to the diviſion of its ſeveral claſſes, and the functions aſſigned to each teacher and profeſſor. Read this inſcription, which is to be ſeen at Straſburgh (6). ‘ Anno poſt milleſimum ‘ 538, depoſitis armis, & pacata gravi inter Caro‘ lum V. Imperatorem Rom. & Franciſcum I. Gal‘ liarum Regem, diſcordiâ, S. P. Q. Argentin. ‘ juventuti CHRISTIANÆ religione & liberalibus diſ‘ ciplinis inſtituendæ ludum literarium aperuit.

‘ Præfecto primario Jacobo Sturmio,
Rectore Joan. Sturmio.

‘ In the year 1538, the war being come to an end, and the ‘ great quarrel between the Emperor Charles V and ‘ Francis I, King of France, being made up, the Senate ‘ and people of Strasburgh erected a ſchool for inſtructing ‘ the youth in Chriſtianity and the liberal arts.

‘ James Sturmius was ſuper-intendant,
John Sturmius Rector.

Thoſe, who ſay (7) that James Sturmius was Rector of the college of Straſburgh (8), would not have confounded that illuſtrious magiſtrate with our John Sturmius, if they had read that inſcription. This confuſion is to be found in a contrary ſenſe in the Memorabilia Eccleſiaſtica of Andreas Carolus. That author ſtiles John Sturmius Firſt Senator and Syndic of the city of Straſburgh. It is in that part of his work where he obſerves that the Academy of that place was not made an univerſity till the year 1621. ‘ Anno ‘ ſuperioris Centuriæ ſexageſimo octavo (9), Gymna‘ ſium literarium Argentinenſe, à Johanne Sturmio ‘ fundatum, qui primarium Senatorem & Syndicum ‘ loci agebat, gratiâ Maximiliani ſecundi privilegia ‘ Academica accepit, & Sturmius, qui commodam ‘ rationem inſtituendæ juventutis monſtraverat, perpe‘ tuus Rector creatus eſt; Sed hoc demum anno jus ‘ Univerſitatis ei Ferdinandus II impertiit, ac poteſta‘ tem conferendi omnium Facultatum gradus honora‘ rios dedit. Micræl. Hiſt. Eccleſ. 172 (10). - - - - - ‘ In the year 68 of the laſt century the ſchool at Straſburgh, ‘ founded by John Sturmius, who was Firſt Senator and ‘ Syndic of the place, received the privileges of an ‘ Academy by the favour of Maximilian II; and Stur‐ ‘ mius, who had propoſed a proper method for inſtructing ‘ the youth was created perpetual Rector. But it was ‘ not before the preſent year that Ferdinand II beſtowed ‘ upon it the rights of an univerſity, and the power of ‘ conferring degrees in all the different faculties.’ This writer, you ſee, quotes Micrælius, though the latter has not committed that fault; for he has very well diſtinguiſhed the two Sturmius's: he ſays that James, a Senator

(1) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philoſophor. pag. 342.

(2) That is, the date of a letter.

(3) Note that he was married to Anne Mychſnera, who ſpoke Latin fluently. Abſque hæſitatione latine cum domeſticis loquens, Jo. Sturmius, in Part. i, Anti-Pappi quarti, pag. m. 17.

(4) Ex Sturmio, ibid. p. 17, 18.

(5) Tum ſchola etiam conſtituta erat. Id. ibid. pag. 10.

(6) See Nathan Chytræus, in Itinerum Deliciis, pag. m. 430.

(7) See the remark [A], in the foregoing article, and the laſt remark of this.

(8) See Melchior Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 343.

(9) According to Melchior Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 344, it was in 1566.

(10) Andr. Carolus Memorab. Eccleſ. Sæculi XVII, ad ann. 1621. pag. 526.

poor for them [C]. He publiſhed ſeveral books (d), and lived till the third of March 1589, that is, eighty-one years, five months, and two days. Tho' he had loſt his ſight, he minded the public good (e). He was married three times (f), and left no children behind him. He had many troubles in his life-time, the greateſt whereof was his being expoſed to the perſecutions of the Lutheran miniſters. When he came to Straſburgh he found a moderate Lutheraniſm, which he liked well enough, tho' he was of Zuinglius's opinion. The Lutheran miniſters grew angry by degrees with thoſe, who did not believe the Real Preſence: he was diſpleaſed with their violent ſermons, and it is ſaid he abſtained ſeveral years from the public exerciſes of religion [D]. He was preſſed hard, and a Senator and a Syndic, founded the college, and that John, who taught the ſcholars, was made Rector of it for life. Anno 1568, Argentinenſis ſchola, quam jam ante XXX annos Jacobus Sturmius, ſenator primarius & ſyndicus, adornari curaverat, privilegia à Maximiliano II accepit, & Johannes Sturmius, qui rationem inſtituendæ juventutis monſtraverat, perpetuus Rector eſt creatus. Noſtra demum ætate, A. 1621, jus univerſitatis à Ferdinando II accepit (11).

[C] He ran in debt, and grew poor for them.] Read theſe words of Melchior Adam. ‘Cum domus illius optimo cuique dies ac noctes pateret, eſſetque velut commune quoddam exulum aſylum, peregrinorum ac pauperum hoſpitium, quos omnes fovendo, alendo, foris domique juvando, facultates haud exiguas abſumſit: maxime Gallorum Evangelicorum ſalutem tuendo, in quam omnes ſuas divitias impendit, ipſeque cum ſuis egere maluit, quam communem cauſam deſerere: animo laudabili & perpetua gratitudine digno (12). - - - - - His houſe was open day and night to every honeſt man, being as it were a common ſanctuary for baniſhed people, and a place of entertainment for the poor and ſtrangers. He laid out very conſiderable ſums of money in ſupporting, cheriſhing, and aſſiſting thoſe at home and abroad; particularly in providing for the welfare of the French Proteſtants; for upon this he ſpent his whole eſtate, chuſing rather to be in want with his family than to deſert the common cauſe: of ſuch a commendable diſpoſition was he, and ſo worthy of a perpetual gratitude.’ Sturmius being called veſpertilio, a bat, by Oſiander, anſwered, that perhaps it was an alluſion to the veſpertilio in the proverb, to ſignify that he was very much in debt (13). He does not deny that he was, but he maintains that he never abſconded to cheat his creditors, and that his debts, contracted upon a glorious account, were prejudicial to no body (14); that he was the only ſufferer, and that for above ſixteen years (15) that he groaned under that yoke, and exhauſted himſelf, by paying large intereſts, and contracting new debts to pay the old ones, not one creditor could be produced who had loſt one farthing by him. Heus bone vir: quando ego unquam, fraudationis cauſa latitavi? vel potiùs, quando ego unquam latitavi? vel creditorem nomina, vel indicem produc: qui me fraudationis cauſa latitaſſe dicat, aut qui dicat, me latitaſſe, & quando latitarim: & quo tempore: & propter quem creditorem. Creditorem unum nomina: qui annos jam ſedecim uno nummo in hoc ære alieno fraudatum ſe à me verè poſſit dicere. Sedecim enim annos & eo amplius in hac miſeria verſor; unum creditorem produc, qui unius teruncii, mea cauſa, & meo nomine jacturam feciſſe jure conqueratur, tametſi graviſſimis uſuris & verſuris, tot jam annos exhauriar (16). Afterwards he declares that he has run in debt to maintain his Proteſtant brethren. Cur non iſtud potiùs cogitavit innocentia & caritas, & ſimplicitas tua? Hic homo horum hominum Eccleſias defendit, propter quas eſt ære alieno oppreſſus, & propter quas omne æs ſuum, jam alienum eſt: & qui propter æs alienum, in extremam egeſtatem dejectus eſt (17). I do not think Oſiander alluded to that proverb. I believe he uſed the word veſpertilio only to reflect upon Sturmius for being neither a profeſſed Lutheran nor a profeſſed Calviniſt. Sturmius was ſenſible that it might be Oſiander's meaning, and vindicated himſelf in that reſpect (18).

[D] It is ſaid he abſtained ſeveral years from the public exerciſes of religion.] Oſiander laid to his charge that he had never been at church for the twenty laſt years. Sturmius made him this anſwer (19): If you ſhould preach thirty years at Straſburgh I would never go to your ſermons. During the laſt thirty years I would have conſtantly avoided to hear you preach, if I had been obliged to be ſilent, and to approve your invectives by my ſilence. (20) After I had been ſilent and kept off a long time from the ſermons and diſputes of your miniſters, I was preſent at the laſt public diſputation of Pappus; and becauſe I ſaid ſomething, which might have removed the perplexity the opponent had reduced him to, I raiſed a ſtorm againſt me, by which I have been almoſt overwhelmed: how then can you object to me that I have been twenty years without going to your ſermons? Et mihi objicis viginti annorum neglectas conciones; cum una diſputatiuncula, cui vix interfui, me prope perdiderit? He mentions to him thoſe, who in the primitive Church, put off receiving baptiſm till the laſt moment of their lives; which ſhews that they were a long time without communicating. He alledges, James Sturmius, who had been ſeveral years without receiving the communion, and abſtained from it, by reaſon of the diſpute the miniſters had raiſed about the Euchariſt. ‘Quis Jacobo Sturmio fuit diligentior, in noſtræ urbis religione, & Senatus autoritate defendenda? Quàm multos annos ille vir ad menſam Domini non acceſſit? Quam quæſo ob cauſam aliam, quàm propter hoc Theologorum diſſidium? Idcircone aut Eccleſiam, aut Senatus autoritatem contemſit (21). - - - - What man in this city was more active in ſupporting our religion, and the authority of the ſenate, than James Sturmius? Neverthelеſs he abſtained many years from the holy communion, becauſe of the difference of Divines upon this point. But did he for that deſpiſe either the Church, or the authority of the ſenate?’ His other anſwers give ground to believe that Oſiander accuſed him of hindering his wife, his ſervants, and his boarders, from going to church. He calls it a falſity, and defies his adverſary to produce a witneſs of his accuſation. I married, ſays he, my third wife ſeven years ago; I lived twenty years with the firſt (22), and as many years with the ſecond (23). No body can ſay that they have not conſtantly heard ſermons, and received the communion, and been very careful to give alms. I ſhall ſet down in Latin what concerns his ſervants. ‘Tot jam annos, tot ſcribas & famulos, tot ancillas, tantam familiam habui: ex his unum aliquem bonum compares, qui dicat, ſe meo juſſu, aut me autore à concionibus, & à ſacra menſa abfuiſſe (24). - - - - I have had for ſo many years ſuch a numerous family of tranſcribers, footmen, and ſervant-maids. Now find one honeſt perſon among all theſe, who can ſay that he had my commands or authority, for not hearing ſermons and receiving the ſacrament.’ He names ſome of his boarders, and, among others, two grand-ſons of a ſiſter of Martin Luther, who, ſays he, will witneſs that I never reproved them for hearing ſermons. Hitherto he has ſaid nothing that contains a formal denial of what was objected to him, that he had been twenty years without hearing any ſermon; but afterwards he calls it a lie, as you may ſee in theſe words: ‘At viginti jam annos nullas conciones audiviſti: at ſi tu iſtud viginti annos affirmes, totos viginti annos mentieris, quod pace tua dictum velim. Quamobrem, inquis, non venis? tot jam annis. An non reſpondi? ſi tu tot annos conciones tales haberes, cujuſmodi tu & Pappus ſæpe habetis: tot ego te etiam deinceps, audire nequeam, & cauſam quæris, quam tibi jam expoſui (25)? - - - - But you ſay that I have heard no ſermons for twenty years. If you inſiſt upon its being twenty years, I muſt beg leave to tell you that it is a groſs falſhood. You aſk why I have not come to church for ſo many years? Have I not already anſwered you? If you were to preach for ſo many years in the manner that you and Pappius do, juſt ſo long would I refuſe to hear you, and yet you aſk the reaſon, which I have already told you.’ To make this part of his anſwer coherent, we muſt ſuppoſe that he did not avoid all ſorts of ſermons in general; but only thoſe of ſuch rigid Lutherans as Pappus was.

(d) See the Catalogue of them in Teiſſier, Additions aux Eloges, Tom. ii, pag. 117, 118, Edit. 1696.

(e) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philoſophor. pag. 342, & ſeq.

(f) See the remark [D].

(11) Micræl. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 570, Edit. 1699.

(12) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 345.

(13) Sturmius, in IV Anti-Pappi, Part. iii, pag. 148.

(14) Propter æs alienum nemini noxium vexor . . . . ob æs alienum honeſtiſſima de cauſa conflatum. Id. ibid.

(15) He ſpoke ſo in the year 1580.

(16) Sturmius, ubi ſupra, pag. 149.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) Id. ibid. and pag. 150.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 165.

(20) Id. ibid. pag. 166.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Joanna Ponderia. Id. ib. pag. 167. Melchior Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 343, & 345, calls her Johanna Piſonia, which doubtleſs made Mr Baillet, article lxxv, of the Anti call her Joanne le Pois. Melchior Adam, pag. 345, ſays ſhe was a native of Paris, and that ſhe died a few years after her huſband had ſettled at Straſburgh. Which cannot be, ſince ſhe lived twenty years with him.

(23) Margarita Wigandia: ſhe was the daughter of the wife of John Sapidus, colleague of Sturmius: the only ſon ſhe had by him died a child. Melch. Adam, ibid.

(24) Sturm. ubi ſupra, pag. 167.

(25) Id. ibid.

and forced to declare himſelf, and was not the ſtrongeſt, for they turned him out of his place [E]. I have mentioned in another place the encomium he beſtowed upon Calvin's

Nevertheleſs it is certain that a Divine of the Confeſſion of Augſburgh, has aſſerted that John Sturmius was above twenty years without going to church and receiving the ſacrament, and that he uſed to play at cheſs in ſermon-time. Venerabile Miniſterium Argentoratenſe non ignorat, Sturmium ultra 20 annos nec templum frequentâſſe, nec ſacra cœna uſum. Retulit mihi M. Frideric. Rhodius, olim Superintendens Arnſtadienſis in Thuringia, gravis Theologus, quique multos per annos Sturmii fuerat domeſticus convictor, ſe illum vidiſſe nunquam in templo, ſed plerumque ludo ſcachorum diebus Dominicis ſub concionis tempus triviſſe (26). Mr Crenius, who affords me this curious paſſage, mentions another, which ſhews what John Pappus anſwered, being accuſed of never praying for the Reformed Churches of France. How could John Sturmius, ſays he, hear me pray for them ? I have ſerved theſe ten years the church and univerſity of Straſburgh, and he has never heard my lectures nor my ſermons. Tu vero audiveris ? Ecquam igitur ſcholam meam, aut concionem toto hôc decenniô, quò in ſchola & Eccleſia jam miniſtro audiviſti (27)? Afterwards Pappus tells him what he begs of GOD, not only for the Proteſtants of France, but alſo for all perſecuted Churches. 1. That the errors which their miniſters teach them, be not imputed to them. 2. That GOD would be pleaſed to diſcover to them the truths they are ignorant of. 3. To ſtrengthen them in their afflictions, and enable them to ſuffer them patiently, and not to relapſe into Popiſh Idolatry. 4. To convert or reſtrain their perſecutors. Atqui ego quotidie, & in Eccleſia, & domi Deum precor, non modò pro Gallicanis, ſed pro omnibus afflictis & perſecutionem patientibus Eccleſiis : & ne neſcias, hæc ipſis precor. 1. Ne Dominus ipſis errores, quibus inſcientes imbuuntur à ſuis Doctoribus imputet, &c (28).

I muſt not forget that Sturmius was accuſed of flattering the Roman Catholics. If this accuſation was grounded on his writing againſt them in a civil, and not in a paſſionate and injurious manner, it was very unjuſt. His moderation was very acceptable to his Popiſh adverſaries ; and Cardinal Sadolet, and John Cochlæus writ very civilly againſt him (29). He aſked (30) whether they would alledge as a proof, a piece of poetry, wherein he had lately congratulated the Biſhop of Straſburgh upon his coming to town, and his agreement with the magiſtrates ; and he maintained that it would be a very wrong reaſon, ſeeing the friendſhip eſtabliſhed between that prelate and the magiſtrates, was a very proper ſubject for a congratulation ; and he adds a particular reaſon, grounded upon the family of that prelate. He was Count of Manderſcheidt, related to thoſe with whom our Sturmius had learned the Latin tongue. He confeſſed that many illuſtrious perſons of the Church of Rome had been his friends and his patrons, and he declared, that tho' we are diſpleaſed with the conduct of great men and princes in ſome reſpects, yet we ought to eſteem their virtues and fine qualities. (31) 'In magnis autem viris & in Principibus, etiamſi aliqua diſpliceant, tamen virtutes magnæ ſunt conſiderandæ, ut in Sadoleto, Bembo, Julio Phlugio, aliiſque doctiſſimis viris. In Carolo V pater tuus (32), ſi meminiſti, quid improbarit, noſti : tamen quæ nobis non placebant in hoc Imperatore, ita non placebant, ut illi in ratione militari gloriam, & in victoriis æquitatem, & fortunam non adimeremus. - - - - Great men and princes, tho' they may diſpleaſe us in ſome things, are nevertheleſs to be eſteemed for their eminent virtues and good qualities ; for example, Sadoletus, Bembo, Julius Phlugius, and other learned men. You remember, I ſuppoſe, what your father found fault with in Charles V : nevertheleſs thoſe things which did not pleaſe us in that emperor, diſpleaſed us in ſuch a manner, that we did not ſeek to ſtrip him of his glory in war, of his moderation in victory, and of his good fortune.' To this example of Charles V he adds that of the Guiſes, pretending that the French Proteſtants did not ſcruple to acknowledge their valour, their parts, &c. It muſt be confeſſed that thoſe maxims are very reaſonable ; but they are little practiſed by men tranſported with zeal, or of a fiery temper.

[E] He was preſſed hard . . . . . and was not the ſtrongeſt ; for they turned him out of his place.] He was ſuſpected of Calviniſm from the year 1561, as it appears from the letter he writ to Melchior Speccer, on the 26th of October, of the ſame year (33) ; for he informs him of the reaſons that moved him to expound St Chryſoſtom, and anſwers what was ſaid of him, that he was like a ſnail, which began to ſhew it's horns after they had been hid for a long time (34). He clearly diſcovered his thoughts about the Euchariſt, which occaſioned the firſt perſecution he was expoſed to (35). He defended Zanchius in the quarrel, of which I ſhall ſpeak in another place (36), which made him more odious ſtill to the Lutherans ; and he was ſo much diſpleaſed with their proceedings, that he had a mind to leave Straſburgh and to go to Zurich. I find this particular in a letter of Zanchius to Henry Bullinger. 'Sed quid ſi Sturmius quoque me ſequatur, vel potiùs ego ipſum ? Is enim conſtituit, ſe ad vos conferre, &, ſi fieri poſſit, prædium aliquod ſibi apud vos comparare, & ibi tamquam in quodam Tuſculano, totum ſe S. literarum ſtudio conſecrare, & contra adverſarios ſuum ſtylum in hac ſenecta pro Chriſto exercere. Sed hoc cupit interim celari, donec videat, quem exitum habitura ſit cauſſa. Si igitur, ut antè dixi, aliter cadat cauſſa noſtra quam ipſa meretur : non ſolùm ego ſed etiam Sturmius, libentiſſimè vobiſcum vivemus. Si verò ita controverſia noſtra componatur, nt nobis quoque liceat veritatem tueri : Sturmius quidem manebit, ego verò faciam, quod tu ipſe conſultius gloriæ Dei futurum judicaveris (37). - - - - But what if Sturmius ſhould follow me, or rather I him ? For he is reſolved to retire among you, and to purchaſe a ſmall eſtate there, if poſſible, where he may dedicate himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of the holy Scriptures, and exerciſe his pen in his old age againſt his adverſaries in behalf of CHRIST. But he deſires that this may be kept ſecret in the mean time, till he ſee what iſſue the cauſe will have. If therefore, as I have already hinted, our cauſe ſhould be otherwiſe determined than juſtice requires, both Sturmius and I will chuſe to come and live with you. But if the difference ſhould be ſo made up, as that we likewiſe ſhall be allowed to defend the truth ; in that caſe Sturmius will remain where he is ; and I for my part ſhall do whatever you think moſt adviſable for the glory of GOD.' The quarrel wherein Zanchius was concerned, had ſuch an iſſue, that Sturmius did not find himſelf obliged to retire. But he happened to have much leſs credit and good fortune, when there aroſe ſome difference between him and Pappus, Doctor of Divinity, and Miniſter of Straſburgh. He publiſhed (38) ſeveral Anti-Pappus's, and many books were publiſhed againſt him. You will find many things relating to this in Mr Baillet's Anti. At laſt Pappus, being ſupported by authority, obtained the victory, and had Sturmius deprived of the rectorſhip of the univerſity, and the Calviniſts turned out of their places. 'Idem (39) . . . . . adverſus Pappum Argentinenſem Theologum, turbonem verius, à quo quod loco illo moti ſint Noſtri, initio facto à venerando ſene Johanne Sturmio, cœpit, probavit Michael Beutherus, in Declaratione Agendæ Eccleſiæ Argentinenſis (40). - - - - Beutherus . . . . proved the ſame thing againſt Pappus, a Straſburgh Divine, or rather a trubulent fellow, who violently diſplaced thoſe of our profeſſion, beginning with that venerable old man John Sturmius.' They are the words of a reformed Divine, who calls Pappus a ſhuffling and factious man ; but the Lutherans maintain that he was an excellent ſervant of GOD, a very ſtout champion, and an invincible combatant in the ſpiritual war for the pure Goſpel (41) ; and that Sturmius was deprived of his place for no other reaſon but becauſe he had raiſed ſome troubles. Joh. Pappus . . . . . inſignis Argentinenſium Athleta adverſus Joh. Sturmium, Rectorem Academiæ, Rhetorem Calvinianorum, & ob turbas datas tandem ab officio remotum. (42). Perhaps not to overwhelm the good old man, and to make the thing more tolerable to him, the odious words of deſtitution and expulſion were omitted, and they gave him to underſtand that they diſpenſed him from the rectorſhip of the univerſity by reaſon of his old age. I have read a reformed author, who makes

---

(26) Conradus Schluſſelburg, in extrema, conſtante, chriſtiana, neceſſaria Reſponſione & Explicatione ad calumnioſum Script. Chriſtoph. Pelargi, apud Crenium, Animadverſ. Philol. & Hiſtoric. Part. vi, pag. 142.

(27) Jo. Pappus, Defenſ. III, contra Sturmium, pag. 118, apud Crenium, ubi ſupra, pag. 140.

(28) Id. ibid. apud Crenium, ibid. pag. 141.

(29) Sturmius, in Part. iii, Anti-Pappi IV, pag. 150.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 169.

(31) Id. ibid.

(32) He ſpeaks to Andreas Oſiander a Divine of Tubingen.

(33) It is among thoſe of Zanchius in the ſecond book, pag. 223, & ſeq.

(34) Innuis me limacem eſſe qui annos jam multos latuerim, nunc demum cornua exeram. Epiſt. Zanchii, lib. ii, pag. 225.

(35) Ibid. pag. 28.

(36) In the article ZANCHIUS (JEROME).

(37) Epiſt. Zanchii, lib. ii, pag. 17.

(38) At Neuſtad, in the Palatinate in the year 1579, and in the year 1580, in 4to.

(39) Viz. that the Formulary of Concord had been often altered by the Lutherans.

(40) Hoornbeeck, Summa Controverſ. pag. m. 505.

(41) Strenuum ſe præſtitit in bello ſpirituali pro Eccleſia puriore militem atque Athletam invictum. Andr. Carolus, ubi ſupra, ad ann. 1610, pag. 226.

(42) Micrælius, ubi ſupra, pag. 785.

Calvin's Inſtitution [F]. I ſhall take notice of ſome faults in Moreri [G].

makes uſe of this turn, that Heaven declared him emeritus in the year 1583. ‘ Uſque ad annum Chriſti ‘ 1583 quo Deo placuit eundem rude donare (43) . . . ‘ Exiſtimo autem D. Sturmium noſtrum, rude, quo ‘ divinitus donatus eſt, contentum &c (44). - - - - ‘ Till the year 1583, when it pleaſed G O D to diſcharge ‘ him as one that had ſerved his time . . . . Now I fancy ‘ that Sturmius was very well contented with this diſ- ‘ charge, &c.’ I take this from a letter, which contains a handſome parallel between Theophraſtus and Sturmius. Here follows a paſſage that wants to be rectified. ‘ John Sturmius . . . . having continued in ‘ his office till he was eighty years old and above, ‘ found himſelf no longer able to diſcharge the duties ‘ of it, and obtained from the magiſtrates of Straſ- ‘ burgh, that his place ſhould be filled up by Mel- ‘ chior Junius, his ſcholar (45).’ It is not true that he exerciſed his office till he was eighty years of age and above; he loſt it in 1583, which was the ſeventy-ſixth year of hs age. He deſired no ſucceſſor, becauſe he was no longer able to continue in it; it was taken from him.

[F] I have mentioned, in another place (46), the encomium he beſtowed upon Calvin's Inſtitutions.] And I ſaid that this encomium concerns the edition of the year 1543, which is the third. I went upon two reaſons: one is, that it is certain the ſecond edition is that of the year 1539 (47); the other is that theſe words of Sturmius, ‘ Inſtitutio Chriſtianæ Religionis ‘ quam primo inchoatam, deinde locupletatam, hoc ‘ vero anno abſolutam edidit; - - - - The Inſtitution of ‘ the Chriſtian religion, which he firſt begun, and after- ‘ wards enlarged; but the compleat edition of it he pub- ‘ liſhed this year,’ ſuit only with the third edition. But to conceal nothing, I ought to mention here what I have read in the ſecond Anti-Pappus, viz. that Calvin being miniſter at Straſburgh, enlarged his Inſtitution, and publiſhed it in the ſame city, apud Wendelinum Rihelium, and that Sturmius prefixed to that book the judgment he made of it. Ego meam ſententiam in fronte ejus libri de Calvino affixi (48). Which does not agree with the third edition, viz. that of the year 1543, for Calvin was not at Straſburgh that year; he returned to Geneva in September 1541. My conjecture is thus: Sturmius knowing that the book was reprinting at Straſburgh in 1543, inſerted ſome words, in his judgment, which ſhewed that it was a third edition. And therefore it is true that the words of Sturmius, which I have quoted in the article of CALVIN, (citat. 27.) concern the third edition, and conſequently I have ſaid nothing but what is true; but I think I ſhould have obſerved that Sturmius had prefixed the ſame encomimum (49) to the ſecond edition, 1539. Let thoſe who have this ſecond edition, judge whether my conjecture be right or not.

[G] Some faults in Moreri.] I. It is not true that Verheiden ſays that James Sturmius was born at Sleida near Cologne. See the remark [A] in the foregoing article. II. It is not true that this Sturmius began his ſtudies at Liege, and went on with them at Paris. III. And that he perſuaded John Sleidan to write the hiſtory that made him ſo famous. See in the remark [B] of the foregoing article, how far he contributed to that hiſtory. IV. It is not true that John Sturmius perſuaded him to undertake the eſtabliſhment of an univerſity at Straſburgh: the only thing they had in view then was a ſchool, or what they call in Holland and Germany an illuſtrious ſchool (50), which is different from an univerſity: however it be, John Sturmius did not adviſe ſuch an eſtabliſhment; for he was ſent for from Paris for no other reaſon, but becauſe they had already formed the project of that ſchool, that is, they had reſolved to introduce into the ſchool that was already at Straſburgh, and of which James Sturmius was one of the Curators, the beſt regulations, and the moſt proper method to promote ſtudy; and they thought, with great reaſon, that John Sturmius was a man well qualified both to teach and to have the direction of the ſchool. V. Moreri ſhould not have ſaid, that the deſign of founding an univerſity was happily executed; for, I repeat it again, nothing but a ſchool was deſigned at that time. VI. He ſhould therefore have ſaid, not that John Sturmius had the foundation of that univerſity confirmed by the emperor, but that he obtained from that prince, that the ſchool ſhould be erected into an univerſity. VII. When Moreri ſays, that after the year 1566, John Sturmius performed . . . ſeveral embaſſies . . . . and aſſiſted at ſeveral conferences; he intimates that Sturmius had no ſuch employment before that time, which is a miſtake; for not to mention the other deputations that preceded the year 1566, it is certain that in 1540, he was ſent to the conferences of Worms with Calvin, Capito, and Bucer (51). VIII. He did not loſe his ſight after he had taught at Straſburgh for the ſpace of fifty-one years. He began to teach there in 1538, and was deprived of his place in 1583, and therefore he taught but forty-five years. IX. If he had taught for the ſpace of fifty-one years, and then if he had loſt his ſight, Moreri ſhould not have diſtinguiſhed between the time when he died, and the time when he loſt his eyes: for the year 1589, in which he died, according to Moreri, and according to the truth, falls in with the fifty-firſt year ſince he began to teach in that city. X. Moreri ſhould not have ſaid that he died at eighty years of age; for he had ſaid that Sturmius was born in the year 1507, and died in 1589. Judge whether Moreri had got the art of writing; how careleſly does he make uſe of Melchior Adam? I omit his calling James and John Sturmius's deputations, by the names of embaſſies. He ſhould have known that an imperial city has, indeed, agents, reſidents, envoys, and deputies, but not ambaſſadors. He knew not that the Latin word legatio has a larger ſenſe than the words embaſſy and deputation.

(43) Jo. Jacobus Grynæus, Epiſt. IX, lib. i, pag. 151.

(44) Ibid. pag. 153.

(45) Thuanus, apud Teiſſier, Addit. aux Elog. Tom. ii, p. 116.

(46) In the article CALVIN, remark [F].

(47) This appears by a ſhort Epiſtle of Calvin to the reader, dated at Straſburgh, Auguſt 1, 1539.

(48) Sturmius, in Anti-Pappo ſecundo, p. 111.

(49) Except the words, which ſignify that it is the third edition.

(50) Note, that in the illuſtrious ſchools, they do not teach Grammar and Rhetoric; but they were taught in the ſchool of Straſburgh.

(51) See the ſecond Anti-Pappus of Sturmius, pag. 112.

SUETONIUS PAULINUS (CAIUS) Governor of Numidia, in the year of Rome 794, overcame the Mauri as far as mount Atlas (a); and was the firſt Roman captain, who went beyond that famous mountain (b). He writ a relation of that war (c). He was one of the beſt warriours in his time, and people did not ſcruple to ſay, that he contended with Corbulo for military glory (d). He performed very noble exploits in Britain (e) [A], where he commanded in the year 814, and 815; but having overcome the rebels, he puniſhed them too ſeverely for the devaſtations and ſlaughter they had (a) Dio, lib. lx.

(b) Plinius, lib. v, cap. i.

(c) Pliny, ibid. ſays ſomething of it.

(d) See the remark [A], at the beginning.

(e) That is to ſay England, according to the ſtyle now-a-days.

[A] He performed noble exploits in Britain.] Emulation was no ſmall help to him; for he endeavoured to equal the glory Corbulo had got by recovering Armenia. Sed tum Paullinus Suetonius obtinebat Britannos, ſcientia militiæ, & rumore populi, qui neminem ſine æmulo ſinit, Corbulonis concertator, receptæque Armeniæ decus æquare domitis perduellibus cupiens (1). Having obſerved that the iſle of Mona (2) ſerved the rebels for a ſhelter, he reſolved to take it, and ſucceeded in his deſign with no great difficulty, though the multitude of the iſlanders, who expected him on the ſhore, and their wives dreſſed like furies, and their Druids lifting up their hands to heaven, and uttering imprecations, ſurprized the Roman ſoldiers by the novelty of the ſpectacle. He cauſed their ſacred groves to be cut down, in which the inhabitants ſacrificed human victims (3), and ſettled garriſons; but whilſt he was taken up with thoſe things, he was informed that the Britons, under the conduct of the widow of Praſutagus, King of the Iceni, had riſen up in arms, and committed great diſorders. Whereupon he went over, and took ſuch effectual meaſures to prevent the progreſs of thoſe rebels, that he obtained over them a victory as remarkable as thoſe of former times (4). It is ſaid that about eighty thouſand Britons were killed in that battle, and that the Romans

(1) Tacit. Annal. lib. xiv, cap. xxix, ad ann. 814.

(2) It is thought to be that now called Angleſey.

(3) Exciſi luci, ſævis ſuperſtitionibus ſacri; nam cruore captivo adolere aras, & hominum fibris conſulere deos fas habebant. - - - He cut down the groves that were conſecrated to their barbarous ſuperſtitions; for they held it lawful to ſacrifice their priſoners, and to conſult the gods by looking into the intrails of men. Id. ibid. cap. xxx.

(4) Clara & antiquis victoriis par ea die laus parta. Id. ibid. cap. xxxvii.

had made, and therefore he was ſucceeded by a more indulgent man (f). It is thought he was conſul in the year of Rome 819 [B]. He was one the chief commanders of the troops of the Emperor Otho (g), and did not keep up in that war the reputation he had got. The ſoldiers openly murmured at his conduct (b); and it is certain that his maxims, which conſiſted in venturing nothing, and taking his meaſures with the utmoſt circumſpection, mans did not loſe four hundred men, which was not quite ſo many as their wounded. Suetonius's courage and firmneſs, and his prudence and experience, appeared glorioſly on that occaſion. You will find a curious account of this in Tacitus's Annals (5), and in Xiphilinus (6). The vanquiſhed were ſeverely treated, which was the reaſon why many rebels remained in arms, fearing the conſequences of their ſubmiſſion. ‘Tenentibus arma pleriſque, quos conſcientia defectionis, & proprius ex Legato timor agitabat. Hic cum egregius cetera, arroganter in deditos, & ut ſuæ quoque injuriæ ultor, durius conſuleret; miſſus Petronius Turpilianus tanquam exorabilior, & delictis hoſtium novus, eoque pœnitentiæ mitior (7). - - - Moſt of them remained in arms, being terrified with the conſciouſneſs of their revolt, and particularly afraid of the General. In other reſpects he was a man of great worth; but as he treated arrogantly thoſe who ſurrendered themſelves, or rather, like a perſon who revenged his own quarrels, ſeverely; Petronius Turpilianus was ſent in his room, a man of a milder temper, and who, being a ſtranger to the faults of the enemies, was for that reaſon the better diſpoſed to accept of their ſubmiſſions.’ Theſe words of Tacitus want a ſupplement; we muſt add to them the account he gives in the fourteenth book of his Annals. There we find what happened before Turpilian ſucceeded Suetonius, viz. that Julius Claſſicianus, who was Intendant in Britain after Suetonius's victory, fell out with that General, and cried him down as much as he could. He aſcribed to him the ill ſucceſſes, and imputed the good ones to the fortune of the Romans. He gave out that a General would quickly come, who would uſe clemency towards the vanquiſhed, and he writ to the court, that the war would never be ended, unleſs Suetonius was recalled. Julius Claſſicianus ſucceſſor Cato miſſus, & Suetonio diſcors, bonum publicum privatis ſimultatibus impediebat: diſperſeratque novum Legatum opperiendum eſſe, ſine hoſtili ira & ſuperbia victoris clementer deditis conſulturum. Simul in Urbem mandabat, nullum prælio finem exſpectarent, niſi ſuccederetur Suetonio: cujus adverſa pravitati ipſius, proſpera ad fortunam Reipub. referebat (8). Nero hearing of this, ſent Polycletus, one of his freedmen, into Britain, looking upon him as a fit man to reconcile the governor and intendant of the province, and to make the rebels accept of a peace. This freedman appeared with great pomp, and Suetonius was obliged to make his court to him (9); however he kept his poſt, till it was thought proper to beſtow it upon Turpilian.

If any one, in order to excuſe Suetonius's ſeverity, ſhould alledge the horrid barbarities the Britons exerciſed upon the Romans, it might be anſwered that the Britons did not do it till after they had ſuffered prodigious violences and extortions, and that therefore the Roman General ſhould not have been ſo implacable towards the vanquiſhed; for there is a vaſt difference between thoſe, who riſe up againſt a new maſter, whoſe yoke is pretty eaſy, and thoſe who ſhake off a new domination the moſt tyrannical in the world. In the firſt caſe an inſurrection attended with cruelty deſerves a ſevere puniſhment; but in the ſecond caſe, clemency ought quickly to ſucceed ſeverity. Tacitus ſays (10), that after the death of a Britiſh King, who had made the Roman Emperor joint heir with his two daughters, his houſe and his eſtates were plundered, his widow was whipped, his two daughters were raviſhed, the chief perſons of the country were turned out of their eſtates, and the King's relations reduced to the condition of ſlaves. The Roman colony of Camalodunum, made up of Veteran ſoldiers, ſeized every body's goods, and turned people out of their houſes, being countenanced by the Roman ſoldiers, who hoped to have ſome time or other the ſame liberty of plundering the iſlanders. In coloniam Camalodunum recens deducti, pellebant domibus, exturbabant agris, captivos, ſervos apellando: foventibus impotentiam veteranorum militibus, ſimilitudine vitæ, & ſpe ejuſdem licentiæ (11). Theſe proceedings inſpired the Britons with ſuch a hatred againſt the Romans, and with ſuch a violent deſire of recovering or preſerving their liberty, that there happened quickly a general inſurrection, the effects whereof were bloody and barbarous. The King's widow (12) put herſelf at the head of the Britons, and made them a very pathetical ſpeech (13). She did not forget the laſhes ſhe had received, nor the rape of her daughters; but alledged them, the better to encourage them to ſhake off ſuch a hard ſlavery. ‘Solitum quidem Britannis feminarum ductu bellare teſtabatur; ſed tunc non ut tantis majoribus ortam regnum & opes; verum ut unam è vulgo, libertatem amiſſam, confectum verberibus corpus, contrectatam filiarum pudicitiam ulciſci: eo provectas Romanorum cupidines ut non corpora, nec ſenectam quidem aut virginitatem impollutam relinquant (14). - - - She remonſtrated that it was indeed an uſual thing for Britons to fight under the conduct of women, but that ſhe did not then, as a perſon deſcended from ſuch noble anceſtors, ſeek to be avenged for the loſs of her kingdom and wealth: ſhe only reſented, like one of the vulgar, the loſs of her liberty, the ſtripes that ſhe had endured, and the violated chaſtity of her daughters; for that the luſts of the Romans were come to ſuch a height, that they did not ſpare the bodies, nor refrain their unclean hands from old age and virginity.’ Suetonius's abſence favoured the enterprize of the Britons; they deſtroyed ſeventy thouſand Romans or allies of the Romans (15); they gave no quarter, they killed, hanged, or burnt, every man they took. Neque enim capere aut venundare, aliudve quod belli commercium, ſed cædes, patibula, ignes, cruces, tanquam redituri ſupplicium, ac prærepta interim ultione, feſtinabant (16). They were no leſs cruel to the women of the beſt quality and the greateſt virtue (17); they hanged them ſtark naked, and cut off their breaſts and ſowed them in their mouths, that they might ſeem to eat them, and then they laid them at full length on ſmall and ſharp ſtakes, that ran into their bodies. This is what happens when new ſubjects are delivered up to the ſoldiery; but on the other ſide the Britons paid dear for their barbarity; for Suetonius puniſhed them cruelly. Note, that the Queen, who put herſelf at the head of them, poiſoned herſelf after the loſs of the battle (18).

[B] It is thought he was conſul in the year of Rome 819.] It plainly appears from a paſſage of Pliny that he was conſul (19); which is no leſs evident from theſe words of Tacitus. ‘Acque eo duces Othonianos ſpatium an moras ſuaſiſſe; præcipuè Paullinum, quod vetuſtiſſimus CONSULARIUM, & militia clarus, gloriam nomenque Britannicis expeditionibus meruiſſe (20). - - - And that for this reaſon the Generals of Otho moved for time or delays, eſpecially Paullinus, the eldeſt Conſular perſon, and a man famous for war, having acquired a great deal of glory by his Britiſh expeditions.’ If it be ſaid that there is no need of this paſſage of Tacitus, and that it is ſufficient to alledge theſe words out of the 14th chapter of the 16th book of his Annals: ‘C. Suetonio L. Teleſino Conſulibus Antiſtius Soſianus . . . . . ſibi conciliat. - - - - In the conſulſhip of Caius Suetonius and Lucius Teleſinus, &c.’ I anſwer that this paſſage of the Annals, which is commonly alledged to prove Suetonius's conſulſhip, does not appear deciſive, if we conſider a note of Mr de Tillemont (21). We have ſeen that Suetonius was, in the year of Rome 822, the moſt antient of thoſe who had been conſuls. But Lucius Piſo was ſtill living (22), and had been conſul in the year 809; and therefore Suetonius muſt have been conſul before the year 809, and conſequently the words of Tacitus's Annals do not concern his conſulſhip, ſince they belong to the year 819, or 818. Mr de Tillemont (23) conjectures that Caius Suetonius, who was conſul with Lucius Teleſinus in the 66th year of the Chriſtian Æra, that is, in the year 818, or 819, of Rome, was the ſon of Suetonius, who is the ſubject of this article. Father Hardouïn (24), and all the

(f) See the remark [A].

(g) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. i, cap. lxxxvii.

(b) Id. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xxiii, & alibi.

(5) Lib. xiv, cap. xxix, & ſeq.

(6) In Epitome Dionis in Nerone, pag. m. 173, & ſeq.

(7) Tacitus, in Vita Agricolæ, cap. xvi.

(8) Tacitus, Annal. lib. xiv, cap. xxxviii.

(9) Mirabantur (hoſtes) quod dux & exercitus tanti belli confector ſervitiis obedirent. - - - - The enemies wondered to ſee a general and an army, who bad finiſhed ſuch a glorious war, paying homage to a freedman. Id. ibid. cap. xxxix.

(10) Id. ibid. cap. xxxi.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Xiphilinus calls her Βȣνδȣίκα Bunduica. Tacitus, in his Annals, lib. xiv, cap. xxxi, calls her Boadicea, and in the Life of Agricola, cap. xvi, Voadica. It is very likely he always called her by the ſame name, and that the tranſcribers have ſpoiled the original in both places. I believe the true name is that we find in Xiphilinus.

(13) See her ſpeech in Xiphilinus, ubi ſupra, pag. 169, & ſeq. See alſo Tacitus, ibid. cap. xxxv.

(14) Tacit. Annal. lib. xiv, cap. xxxv.

(15) Id. ibid. cap. xxxiii.

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Xiphilin. ubi ſupra, pag. 173.

(18) Tacit. ubi ſupra, cap. xxxvii, but according to Xiphilinus, ibid. pag. 175, ſhe died of ſickneſs.

(19) Pliny, lib. v, cap. i.

(20) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. xxxvii, ad ann. 822.

(21) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. i, pag. m. 464.

(22) This plainly appears from a paſſage in Pliny the younger, Epiſt. VII, lib. iii.

(23) Tillem. ibid.

(24) Harduin, in Plin. lib. v, cap. i, pag. 526.

circumſpection, prevented his improving favourable opportunities [C], and afforded the enemies a ſufficient time to take care of their affairs. The worſt was that he ran away on the day of the general and deciſive battle, and that he boaſted to Vitellius that he had betrayed Otho [D], which probably was not true; but he was believed upon his word, and that ſaved his life. It has been ſaid that the hopes he had of being made Emperor, moved him to adviſe that the war ſhould be kept up between Otho and Vitellius; but Tacitus thinks he was too wiſe a man to have ſuch thoughts the other authors I have conſulted, ſay, that our Suetonius Paulinus was Teleſinus's colleague. You will find the ſame opinion in Voſſius, and a fault in Chronology; for Voſſius ſuppoſes that this conſulſhip belongs to the year of Rome 811 (25). Father Harduin (26) places it in the laſt year of Nero's life, and quotes the ſixth book of Tacitus's Annals. He ſhould have quoted the ſixteenth, and remembred that Nero died the ſecond year after the conſulſhip of Suetonius and Teleſinus. For the reſt, Mr de Tillemont (27) ſuppoſes, as a thing undeniable, that Suetonius had been conſul before he was ſent into Britain; and the reaſon he goes upon, is, that all thoſe who were ſent thither had been conſuls. I cannot tell whether he is in the right as to this laſt point, and the proof he takes from theſe words, vetuſtiſſimus conſularium, does not appear to me a convincing one; for perhaps the meaning of them is, that Suetonius was older than all thoſe who had been conſuls, tho' ſome of them had exerciſed the conſulſhip before him; and therefore I do not abſolutely condemn the common opinion, nor his neither. There may be ſome reaſons on both ſides: it were ſomewhat ſtrange that Tacitus ſhould never mention the conſular quality of Suetonius, if it had belonged to him, when he commanded in Britain.

[C] His maxims, which conſiſted in venturing nothing . . . . . prevented his improving favourable opportunities.] Cæcina, General of Vitellius's troops, made uſe of a ſtratagem, which did not ſucceed, and was like to be fatal to him, becauſe the Generals of Otho having diſcovered it, avoided the ſnare, and laid another which the enemy did not perceive. By this means they obtained a conſiderable advantage, but not ſuch as it might have been, if Suetonius had been bolder and leſs cautious. Tacitus gives the following character of him. ‘ Signum pugnæ non ſtatim à ‘ Suetonio Paullino pediti datum. Cunctator natura, ‘ & cui cauta potius conſilia cum ratione, quam proſpera ex caſu placerent; compleri foſſas, aperiri campum, pandi aciem jubebat, ſatis cito incipi victoriam ‘ ratus, ubi proviſum foret ne vincerentur. Ea cunctatione, ſpatium Vitellianis datum, in vineas nexu ‘ traducum impeditas refugiendi: & modica ſilva adhærebat; unde rurſus auſi promptiſſimos prætorianorum equitum interficere (28). - - - - Paullinus did ‘ not preſently give the ſignal of battle to the infantry. He ‘ was naturally ſlow, and preferred wary counſels ‘ grounded upon reaſon to ſuch as proved ſucceſsful by ‘ chance. He ordered the trenches to be filled up, the ‘ ground to be cleared, and the army to be drawn out. ‘ By that delay the troops of Vitellius had time given ‘ them to make a retreat into vineyards, which the knitting of the branches made difficult of acceſs. There ‘ was likewiſe a ſmall wood adjoining, from which they ‘ ſallied out and ſlew the boldeſt of the Prætorian horſe.' He rather choſe to give his opinion according to the rules of prudence, than to obtain an advantage by meer chance. Had he not ſounded the retreat on that day, the whole army of Vitellius had been cut in pieces; at leaſt it was the opinion of both parties: the reaſons he gave of his conduct were not approved; and I think warriors would readily change the proverb, Too much precaution is craft, into this, Too much precaution is an overſight. Let us ſtill hear Tacitus. ‘ Cæterum ea ubique formido fuit, apud fugientes, ‘ occurſantes, in acie, pro vallo, ut deleri cum uni‘verſo exercitu Cæcinam potuiſſe, ni Suetonius Paulli‘nus receptui ceciniſſet, utriſque in partibus percrebuerit. Timuiſſe ſe Paullinus ferebat, tantum inſuper ‘ laboris atque itineris; ne Vitellianus miles recens è ‘ caſtris feſſos aggrederetur, & perculſis nullum retro ‘ ſubſidium foret. Apud paucos ea ducis ratio probata, in vulgus adverſo rumore fuit (29). - - - There ‘ was ſo great a conſternation among thoſe who fled, ‘ while they met one another in the field, or before the ‘ trenches, that, as it was generally believed by both ‘ parties, Cæcina might have been cut off with his ‘ whole army, if Suetonius Paullinus had not ſounded a ‘ retreat. He gave out that he dreaded the great fatigue and journey which ſtill remained to go through, ‘ and that he was apprehenſive leſt the troops of Vitellius ‘ ſhould have ſallied freſh out of their camp, and ſet ‘ upon his men when they were weary, who, if they had ‘ met with any repulſe, were wholly deſtitute of all reſource. This reaſon of Paullinus was approved by ‘ ſome few, but was not at all acceptable to the vulgar.' But if on the one ſide Suetonius's circumſpection proved ſometimes prejudicial to Otho, it might on the other have prevented his ruin occaſioned by the raſhneſs of the other Generals. Suetonius was for protracting the war, and his opinion grounded upon very ſolid maxims (30), was alſo that of Marius Celſus, and Annius Gallus, his colleagues (31). But Titian, Otho's brother, and Proculus, Præfect of the Prætorium, who had the greateſt intereſt with that emperor (32), adviſed the quite contrary, and brought things into the greateſt danger. The following paſſage is to Suetonius's honour. ‘ Otho conſultavit, ‘ trahi bellum, an fortunam experiri placeret. Tum ‘ Suetonius Paullinus, dignum fama ſua ratus, qua ‘ nemo illa tempeſtate militaris rei callidior habebatur, ‘ de toto genere belli cenſere; feſtinationem hoſtibus, ‘ moram ipſis, utilem diſſeruit (33). . . . . Otho pronus ‘ ad decertandum; frater ejus Titianus, & præfectus ‘ prætorii Proculus, imperitia properantes, fortunam ‘ & deos & numen Othonis adeſſe conſiliis, affore conatibus teſtabantur, neu quis obviam ire ſententiæ ‘ auderet, in adulationem conceſſerant (34). - - - Otho ‘ held a conſultation whether it was better to ſpin out ‘ the war, or to try his fortune at once. Suetonius Paullinus thinking it worthy of his reputation in the military art, which no man in his days was thought to ‘ underſtand better, to give his opinion of the war in general, argued, that diſpatch was for the intereſt of ‘ the enemy, delay for theirs. . . . . . Otho was inclined ‘ to a battle; his brother Titian, and Proculus, Prefect ‘ of the Prætorium, hurried on by ignorance, affirmed ‘ that good fortune, the gods, and the deity of Otho, favoured their counſels, and would proſper their undertakings; and leſt any one ſhould contradict their opinion, they gave into a ſtrain of flattery.' A battle being reſolved upon, it was debated whether Otho ſhould be there or not, and it paſſed in the negative; Suetonius and Celſus not daring to oppoſe it, leſt they ſhould be accuſed of expoſing the prince to danger (35). They ſent him therefore with very good troops into a ſafe place: which weakened the army, and diſcouraged the ſoldiers (36), and after that retreat Suetonius and Celſus had only the name of Generals (37); their counſels were not followed, every thing depended upon Proculus's fancy. It is therefore no great wonder if the battle was loſt, and if Suetonius ran away and durſt not return into the camp. But he cannot be excuſed for what I am going to relate; it is a downright infamy.

[D] He boaſted to Vitellius that he had betrayed Otho.] The commanders of the victorious army, and thoſe who had been vanquiſhed, went to Vitellius at Lyons. He cauſed ſeveral captains of Otho's party to be put to death, and left Suetonius and Proculus in the uncertainty of the event. At laſt they were heard, and obtained their pardon, becauſe they made him believe they had betrayed Otho, and gave an account of the meaſures they had taken to deſtroy him. Suetonium Paullinum, ac Licinium Proculum, triſti mora ſqualidos tenuit: donec auditi, neceſſariis magis defenſionibus, quam honeſtis uterentur. Proditionem ultro imputabant: ſpatium longi ante prælium itineris, fatigationem Othonianorum, permixtum vehiculis agmen, ac pleraque fortuita, fraudi ſuæ adſignantes, & Vitellius credidit de perfidia, & fidem abſolvit (38). Can any thing be more unworthy of the Roman name?

---

(25) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. lib. i, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 133.

(26) Harduin, ubi ſupra.

(27) Tillem. ubi ſupra.

(28) Tacitus, Hiſtor. lib. ii, cap. xxv, ad ann. 822.

(29) Id. ibid. cap. xxvi.

(30) They may be ſeen in Tacitus, ibid. cap. xxxii.

(31) Ibid. cap. xxxi.

(32) Id. ibid. lib. i, cap. lxxxvii.

(33) Id. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xxxi.

(34) Id. ibid. cap. xxxiii.

(35) Id. ibid.

(36) Id. ibid.

(37) Profecto Brixellum Othone, honor imperii penes Titianum fratrem, vis ac poteſtas penes Proculum Præfectum. Celſus & Paullinus, cum prudentia eorum nemo uteretur, inani nomine ducum, alienæ culpæ prætendebantur. Id. ibid. cap. xxxix.

(38) Id. ibid. cap. lx.

thoughts [E]. We ſhall ſee below (i) that it was a miſtake to take him for the father of Suetonius the Hiſtorian, and to ſay that he wrote the life of Otho.

[E] Tacitus thinks he was too wiſe a man to have ſuch thoughts.] He had read in ſome authors, that the armies of Otho and Vitellius, whether they were afraid of the war, or were diſguſted at both emperors, whoſe infamy diſcovered itſelf daily, thought of coming to an agreement, and electing a new maſter, or intruſting the ſenate with that election, and that this was the reaſon why the commanders of Otho's troops, eſpecially Paulinus, were for prolonging the war (39). Tacitus is willing to believe that ſome few men wiſhed in their hearts the public peace and a good prince; but he cannot perſuade himſelf that Suetonius, who was ſo prudent a man, could hope that in ſo corrupt an age, the ſoldiers, who had broke the peace to have a war, would give over the war out of a deſire of peace. Nor can he believe that armies, whoſe manners and languages were ſo different, could agree in ſuch a deſign, nor that moſt of the chief officers, being conſcious of their luxury, indigence, and crimes, would have been contented with an honeſt emperor, not beholden to them for his dignity. Neque Paullinum, qua prudentia fuit, ſperaſſe, corruptiſſimo ſeculo, tantam vulgi moderationem reor, ut qui pacem belli amore turbaverant, bellum pacis caritate deponerent: neque aut exercitus linguis moribuſque diſſonos, in hunc conſenſum potuiſſe coaleſcere: aut Legatos ac duces, magna ex parte luxus, egeſtatis, ſcelerum ſibi conſcios, niſi pollutum obſtrictumque meritis ſuis Principem paſſuros (40).

SUETONIUS (Caius Suetonius Tranquillus), a Roman Hiſtorian, ſon of Suetonius Lenis [A], flouriſhed under the empire of Trajan and Hadrian. He applied himſelf very much to ſtudy, and I think it may be ſaid that he taught Grammar and Rhetoric (a). It is certain he pleaded ſome imaginary cauſes; and I think he alſo pleaded ſome real ones before the judges. Pliny, who places him among thoſe who were called Scholaſtici (b), a ſort of men who never pleaded or made orations but in a hall, or by way of exerciſe (c), affirms in another place (d) that Suetonius deſired him to procure

[A] Son of Suetonius Lenis.] The proof of this is contained in the following paſſage. ‘ Interfuit huic ‘ bello pater meus Suetonius Lenis, tertiæ decimæ legionis Tribunus anguſticlavius (1). - - - My father ‘ Suetonius Lenis was preſent at this battle, being Tribune ‘ of the thirteenth legion, and an Anguſticlavian.’ It appears alſo from theſe words, that Suetonius's father was Tribune of the thirteenth legion, and that he was at the battle of Bedriacum, in which Vitellius's troops defeated thoſe of Otho. Had Muretus exactly remembred the paſſages of Tacitus, alledged by him, he would have made a better uſe of his critical learning. He found Linus with a little hole before it in a manuſcript, whereupon he fancied that three letters were loſt, and that inſtead of Linus, the true reading was Paulinus; from whence he inferred that Suetonius the Hiſtorian was the ſon of Suetonius Paulinus, who is the ſubject of the forgoing article. Vidi ego librum, qui cariem & tineas ſenſerat, in quo poſt nomen Suetonius foramen erat exiguum: deinde ſequebatur linus: & ſupra alia manu emendatum lenis: Omnino autem legendum eſt Paulinus; id enim ei verum cognomen fuit. Teſtem in eam rem laudabo Tacitum, qui fortis viri neque nomen, neque virtutem tacitam eſſe ſivit. Ejus enim & ſæpe in annalibus, & in Agricolæ vita perhonorificam mentionem facit (2). He was ſo fond of his conjecture, that he did not mind the teſtimonies of Tacitus, which he made uſe of; for if he had conſidered them with attention, he might eaſily have perceived that they were wholly inconſiſtent with his critical obſervation; and he would have concluded that Suetonius, whoſe exploits are mentioned by Tacitus, could not be him who was only a Tribune in the war of Vitellius. To which I add, that according to the ſame Tacitus, in a work (3) not quoted by Muretus, Suetonius Paulinus was one of Otho's Generals during the ſame war, which uterly deſtroys Muretus's correction. Theſe are very ſtrange faults, and yet a Critic ought never to take notice of them in an inſulting manner, being always mindful that he may want the ſame indulgence when he commits the like miſtakes, which is unavoidable. Were I allowed to compare the inferior with the great, I would apply to myſelf the inference drawn by Lipſius from this miſtake of Muretus (4). ‘ Quid dicam? Non ‘ inſector te vir elegantiſſime, ſed bona fide hæc ſcribis. ‘ Erras nimis. Suetonius ille Lenis, Tribunus fuit: ‘ noſter belli dux. Ille anguſticlavius, id eſt, non‘ dum Senator, ſed inter equites: Iſte Conſularis, nec ‘ tenue uſquam veſtigium confuſionis ejus quam facis. ‘ Hoc mihi in tranſcurſu monitum, non ut carpam ‘ (Fidem teſtor); ſed ut claro ſub exemplo doceam ‘ quàm fallax hæc Critica, & ignoſcendum etiam ‘ nobis eſſe, ſi labimur interdum in proclivi iſtâ viâ. ‘ - - - - What ſhall I ſay? Far be it from me to inſult ‘ ſo ingenious a man as you are. You write theſe things ‘ candidly, tho' your error is too plain: for that Suetonius ‘ Lenis was a Tribune; our's a General. The one was ‘ an Anguſticlavian; that is to ſay, not yet a ſenator but ‘ a knight; the other was a conſular perſon, nor is there ‘ the leaſt footſtep of that jumble which you make. I take ‘ notice of this by the by, not from an itch of finding ‘ fault, as I ſolemnly declare, but that I may prove from ‘ an evident example how deceitful a thing Criticiſm is, ‘ and ſhew that we ought alſo to be excuſed if we ſtumble ‘ now and then in ſuch a ſlippery path.’

Perhaps ſome will think that Suetonius Lenis, father of Suetonius the Hiſtorian, was the ſon of Suetonius, who is the ſubject of the foregoing article; but there is no ground for ſuch an opinion; for if Suetonius had been the grandſon of that great warrior, and of that Roman Conſul, he would not have ſpoken of his grandfather ſo plainly as he does: ‘ Avum meum ‘ narrantem puer audiebam, cauſſam operis ab interioribus aulicis proditam, &c (5). - - - - When I was ‘ a boy, I have heard my grandfather tell the true cauſe ‘ of that work, which he had learned from ſuch courtiers ‘ as had the beſt opportunities of knowing theſe things, ‘ &c.’ An Hiſtorian may be ſo modeſt as not to inſert in his work occaſionally the glorious titles of his anceſtors; but it is hardly poſſible, that when he mentions his father or grandfather, he ſhould be contented to name them without mentioning the important offices conferred upon them. Our Suetonius did not forget his father's tribuneſhip; much more would he have mentioned his father's generalſhip; the occaſion neceſſarily required it; for it is on account of the battle of Bedriacum that he obſerves that his father commanded a legion, during the war of Otho and Vitellius: but it was in that war that Suetonius Paulinus commanded Otho's troops.

One Sicco Polentonus had ſaid before Muretus, that Suetonius Paulinus is the father of Suetonius the Hiſtorian. Beſides, he aſcribes to him ſome books that were written by the latter, viz. De Inſtitutione Officiorum, de Illuſtribus Scriptoribus, deque hiſtoria ludicra. It is in a life of Suetonius, which Pighius inſerted in his Annals (6), and which is of no value. This Polentonus was ſecretary of the city of Padua in the beginning of the XVth century (7). Voſſius (8) affirms two things: 1. That Geſner ſays that Suetonius Lenis is the ſame with Suetonius Paulinus, and that he was the father of Suetonius the Hiſtorian, and author of a life of the Emperor Otho: 2. That La Popeliniere ſays the ſame. There is no ſuch thing in Geſner's Bibliotheca quoted by Voſſius; but the following words are to be found in the abridgment of it, made by others: ‘ Suetonius Lenis, Suetonii Tran‘ quilli pater, Lucii Othonis imperatoris vitam de‘ ſcripſit. Item librum de inſtitutione obſervata, & ‘ librum Prætorum (9). - - - - Suetonius Lenis, father ‘ to Suetonius Tranquillus, writ the life of the Emperor ‘ Lucius Otho. Alſo a book, De Inſtitutione Obſervata; ‘ and another book concerning the Prætors.’ There is nothing in theſe words, whereby it may appear that the

---

(i) In the remark [A] of the following article.

(39) Ex eodem, ib. cap. xxxvii,

(40) Id. ibid.

(a) Suidas, in Τράγκυλλος, calls him only a Grammarian, and mentions the titles of ſeveral grammatical books written by Suetonius.

(b) Plinius, Epiſt. xxiv, lib. i.

(c) Id. Epiſt. iii, lib. ii.

(d) Id. Epiſt. xviii, lib. i.

(1) Sueton. in Othone, cap. x.

(2) Muret. Variarum Lect. lib. xv, cap. xi, pag. 1144.

(3) The firſt and ſecond book of Tacitus's Hiſtory.

(4) Lipſius, in Tacit. Hiſtor. lib. ii, pag. m. 484.

(5) Sueton. in Caligula, cap. xix.

(6) Ad annum 818. See Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latinis, pag. 134, & 167.

(7) See Voſſius, ibid. pag. 804.

(8) Voſſius, ibid. pag. 135.

(9) Epitome Bibl. Geſneri, pag. 769, Edit. 1583.

procure him a delay, becauſe a dream made him afraid of miſcarrying in a cauſe at the bar. There was a long and very ſtrict friendſhip between thoſe two writers (e); and it proved advantageous to Suetonius, for Pliny did him great ſervices. He procured him an office of Tribune (f), and then he had it beſtowed upon another, at Suetonius's requeſt. He obtained for the latter, whoſe wife was barren, the jus trium liberorum, that is, the privileges of thoſe who have three children. That favour was ſeldom granted, and Pliny had not obtained it for his friend, had it not been for the great intereſt he had at the Imperial court, and for the earneſt deſire he expreſſed to obtain it (g). He was then (h) governor of Bithynia, under the empire of Trajan. Suetonius raiſed himſelf conſiderably afterwards, for he was ſecretary to the Emperor Hadrian; but he loſt that office about the year 121, when ſeveral perſons were put out of favour for not paying a due reſpect to the empreſs [B]. He wrote many books [C], moſt of which are loſt. We have only his Hiſtory of the firſt twelve Emperors, and part of his treatiſe concerning the illuſtrious Grammarians and Rhetoricians. That hiſtory is very much commended by our moſt learned Humaniſts [D]: he ſpeaks much more of the Emperors than of the affairs of the Empire; and the diligence wherewith he has collected ſo many particulars concerning their actions and inclinations, cannot be ſufficiently admired. He does not obſerve the order of time; and no Hiſtory was ever more different from annals than this is. He reduces every thing to ſome general heads, and places together what relates to each head. He is very conciſe, and frequently touches upon

(e) Id. lib. i, Epiſt. xxiv; lib. x, Epiſt. xcv.

(f) Id. Epiſt. viii, lib. iii.

(g) See the 95th and 96th Letters of the 10th book of Pliny.

(h) About the year 104.

the author of them believed that Suetonius Lenis, and Suetonius Paulinus are the ſame perſon. La Popeliniere expreſſes himſelf thus: Suetonius Lenis, the father of Tranquillus, wrote the life of the Emperor L. Otho, and a book concerning the Prætors (10). This is all falſe.

Note, That Suetonius taking the ſir-name of Tranquillus, retained the whole ſenſe of the ſir-name Lenis, [Gentle] which his father had. But we do not know the reaſon which made him prefer the one to the other: perhaps he only conſulted his ear, and Tranquillus ſounded better to him.

[B] He loſt that office . . . . . when ſeveral perſons were put out of favour for not paying a due reſpect to the empreſs.] This is to be found only in a paſſage of Spartianus. Septicio Claro præfecto prætorii, & Suetonio Tranquillo Epiſtolarum magiſtro, multiſque aliis qui apud Sabinam uxorem, injuſſu ejus, familiariùs ſe tunc egerant quàm reverentia domus aulicæ poſtulabat, ſucceſſores dedit (11). The ſenſe of thoſe words is thus repreſented by Mr de Tillemont: ‘ Adrian put out of favour many perſons in England, for having behaved ‘ themſelves too freely, without his order, towards ‘ the Empreſs Sabina, which is not farther explained ‘ in hiſtory. Suetonius Tranquillus, who doubtleſs is ‘ the Hiſtorian, loſt his office of ſecretary, &c (12).’ This is very judicious: we ſhall ſee in the remark; wherein I take notice of Moreri's miſtakes, that every body has not been ſo cautious as Mr de Tillemont.

[C] He wrote many books.] I ſhall uſe ſtill the expreſſions of the ſame writer (13). ‘ Suidas . . . . . ‘ aſcribes to him ſeveral works, which concern that ‘ profeſſion (14). Beſides, he obſerves that he had ‘ writ a book about the Grecian games, two upon the ‘ ſhews of the Romans, two upon the laws and ‘ cuſtoms of Rome, one upon the life of Cicero, or ‘ upon his books de Republica, a catalogue of the il‘ luſtrious men of Rome, and the eight books, ſtill ‘ extant, of the hiſtory of the emperors. * He had ‘ alſo writ three books of kings, of which St Pauli‘ nus made an abridgment in verſe. † The book of ‘ the inſtitution of Offices, quoted by Priſcian, may be ‘ the book concerning the laws and cuſtoms of Rome. ‘ The ſame Priſcian quotes eight books of his con‘ cerning the Prætors. A book intituled, De Rebus ‘ Variis, is aſcribed to him, wherein he treated of ‘ things that concern Grammar. ⸸ It appears by ‘ ſeveral authors, who quote his works, that they ‘ have been very much eſteemed even among the ‘ Greeks. ‡ Tertullian quotes his book concerning ‘ ſhews,  and St Jerome that of the illuſtrious ‘ men, in whoſe imitation he wrote his. It is likely ‘ that what is now extant of Suetonius concerning the ‘ illuſtrious Grammarians, Poets and Orators, made ‘ part of that work. He ſpeaks of ſome Grecians, ‘ but they taught at Rome.’

[D] That hiſtory of the firſt twelve emperors, is very much commended by our moſt learned Humaniſts.] It is a continued ſeries of choice and curious facts, related ſuccinctly without digreſſions, reflexions, and reaſonings. There is in it a character of ſincerity, which plainly ſhews that the author feared and hoped for nothing, and that his pen was not directed by hatred or flattery. He repreſents abundance of vices, with all their deformity, without diſcovering any inclination to ſlander, and without omitting the good qualities of thoſe whoſe crimes he deſcribes (15). Which muſt needs pleaſe the judicious readers, who are extreamly offended, when they obſerve that an author loves ſlandering, and relates wicked actions, not ſo much to perform the part of an Hiſtorian, as to ſatisfy his ſatirical humour. Many readers do not much care whether an Hiſtorian diſcovers ſuch a humour, or appears free from it; it is enough for them if he be ſatirical; thoſe men have doubtleſs wrong notions of things, and little honeſty; but all things being otherwiſe alike, I think they would rather chuſe a hiſtory, wherein wicked princes are ingenuouſly deſcribed, than one that may be ſuſpected by reaſon of the author's malignity; and therefore they may agree with men of a good taſte in approving Suetonius. He found the art of perſuading the reader of his ſincerity; which plainly ſhews that he is no paſſionate writer. Let us ſee what judgment has been made of him by ſome learned men: I begin with the eloquent Politian. ‘ Hæc ſingula ita Suetonius hic noſter perſecutus in ſua Hiſtoria eſt, ut præ‘ ter explicandi ſcientiam, qua mirifice eſt uſus, etiam ‘ diligentiam nobis fidemque, & libertatem ſuam plane ‘ probaverit. Nulla in his libris ſuſpicio eſt gratiæ, ‘ nulla ſimultatis, nihil ſtudio dictum, nihil ſuppreſſum ‘ metu, rebus ipſis data omnia, veritati in primis ſer‘ vitum eſt, ut plane appareat ad perpetuam magis ‘ poſſeſſionem (ut Thucydides ait) quam ad intuitum ‘ hoc opus, pugnamque præſentem comparatum eſt. ‘ Nam qui aut fœdis aſſentationibus, aut malignis ‘ obtrectatiunculis, ſupra quam res ipſa poſtulet, quaſi ‘ ſervire hiſtoriam cogunt, ii mihi haud minus eam ‘ dehoneſtare videntur, atque ii qui Herculem ipſum ‘ depingant, Lydiæ Omphalæ in muliebri & crocina ‘ tunicula famulantem (16). . . . . . Hanc in ‘ primis captare Hiſtoricus laudem debet, ut liber‘ tate uſus maxima in ſcribendo, ut neque aſſenta‘ tioni quaſi obnoxius, neque obtrectationi quaſi ‘ offenſus, ſed fidei ſerviſſe atque incorruptæ veri‘ tati exiſtimetur, ne quid in eo ſervile, neve quid ‘ malignius deprehendatur, ſic ut nec ullis conditioni‘ bus ſolicitatus, neque mercedula cuiquam auctoratus, ‘ ſed ſui homo juris, rectus, atque intrepidus neutram ‘ in partem præponderet (17). . . . Tantum abeſt, ut ‘ hic noſter quicquam vel metu, vel ſtudio adductus, ‘ rebus ipſis detraxerit, ut Nervæ etiam, Trajani, ‘ Adrianique ſuæ ætatis Imperatorum vitas tacere præ‘ optaverit, quam aut periculoſe de viventibus male ‘ ſentire, aut extollendo potentiores, parum videri ‘ liber (18). - - - - Every one of theſe things is ſo well ‘ executed by Suetonius in his hiſtory, that beſides his de‘ ſcriptive art, which is admirable, he has likewiſe ‘ given us plain proofs of his diligence, veracity, and ‘ freedom. There is no room for any ſuſpicion of par‘ tiality or ill-will in his books; nothing is ſaid out of ‘ favour, nor ſuppreſſed out of fear: the facts themſelves ‘ have engroſſed his whole attention, and he has con‘ ſulted truth in the firſt place; by which it appears that ‘ his upon cuſtoms and ordinances, ſo that thoſe who read his Hiſtory with a good commentary, or hear it explained by a learned Critic, may learn a vaſt number of things relating to antiquity. Some blame him for being ſo particular in deſcribing the leud actions and horrid debaucheries of Tiberius, Caligula, Nero, &c [E]. It cannot be denied that the inquiries he made into thoſe things are very ſingular, and that he allowed a great deal of liberty to his pen; and therefore it has been ſaid that he writ the lives of the Emperors with the ſame freedom as they lived. Neverthelеſs he was a man of very good morals, and great virtue (i). He made no haſte to publiſh his works, and wanted to be intreated not to keep them ſo long in his cloſet (k). The beſt commentaries upon that writer are thoſe of Torrentius and Caſaubon. They have been inſerted at large, with

---

(10) La Popeliniere, Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, livr. vi, (and not v, as Voſſius quotes it) pag. 344.

(11) Ælius Spartian. in Vita Adriani, cap. xi, pag. m. 102, Tom. i, Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ Scriptor.

(12) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. ii, pag. m. 418, ad ann. 121.

(13) Id. ibid. pag. 486.

(14) That is, that of a Grammarian.

* Auſon. Ep. 19, pag. 466.

† Suet. prol.

⸸ Prol.

‡ Tert. ſpec. c. 5. pag. 92. c.

 Hier. v. ill. præf. pag. 261. a.

(15) See Bodin. Method. Hiſt. cap. iv, pag. m. 65.

(16) Politianus, Præfat. in Suetonium, folio m. b. 3.

(17) Id. ibid. folio b. 4.

(18) Id. ibid. fol. b. 5.

(i) See the paſſage of Pliny in the remark [E] citation (31).

(k) See the remark [F], citation (50).

‘ his work was framed (as Thucydides ſays) for a perpetual poſſeſſion, not for a tranſitory view, or to ſerve a preſent purpoſe. For ſuch perſons as make hiſtory ſubſervient to vile flattery, or ſpiteful detraction, beyond what the truth requires, do no leſs diſhonour it than thoſe who introduce Hercules himſelf in petticoats, performing the offices of a domeſtic drudge to Omphale, Queen of Lydia . . . . . An Hiſtorian ought chiefly to aim at this commendation, viz. of being eſteemed a moſt free and impartial writer, who neither flatters nor detracts, but ſtrictly obſerves the laws of ſincerity and truth. He muſt take care not to diſcover any thing ſervile or malicious, nor to give ground for ſuſpecting that he is acted by an undue influence, or bound, as a hireling, to any one, but he muſt ſhew himſelf to be a man independent, upright, and undaunted, who is no ways byaſſed to either ſide. . . . . . Our Hiſtorian was ſo far from being influenced by the motives of fear or favour, to detract any thing from the truth, that he rather choſe not to write the lives of Nerva, Trajan, and Adrian, the emperors of his time, than to run any riſque by ſpeaking ill of the perſons then alive, or to ſeem leſs free and impartial, by extolling his ſuperiors.’ I ſhall add the following words of Lipſius to this fine encomium. ‘ Suetonium Tranquillum non injuria commendo ſæpe juventuti. Verba vides? Pura, terſa, propria. Filum totum orationis? Breve, nervoſum. Rem ipſam? Utilis pariter & jucunda hiſtoria eſt: & quod mihi caput, plena moris & doctrinæ antiquæ. Quis obſecro, ritus publicus olim privatuſque fuit, quem velut de induſtria non tangat? Quod munus, quis magiſtratus, quem non libet? Tangat & libet, dico. Non enim explicet: quod inſtitutum ejus vetuit & ratio ſcribendi. At viam tamen latam ſternit ad indagandum: & aures atque animum imbuit auditione aliqua, imò cognitione (19). - - - - I very often recommend Suetonius Tranquillus to the youth, not without reaſon. If you examine his words, they are pure, neat, proper: if the whole thread of it's diſcourſe, it is ſhort and nervous. If you conſider his ſubject, it is both an uſeful and pleaſant hiſtory: and which chiefly weighs with me, it is full of morality and antient learning. What rite is there either public or private which he does not purpoſely touch upon? What office or magiſtracy which he does not briefly mention? I ſay, touch upon, and briefly mention; for he does not fully explain them, becauſe the deſign and method of his book hindered him from doing ſo. Neverthelеſs he opens a large field for enquiry, and communicates to the ears and mind ſome hints, or rather ſome degrees of knowledge.’ One witneſs more: ‘ Suetonius vitas aliquot deſcripſit Auguſtorum. Fidem ſi ſpectes, nihil certius. Acumen ſcribentis ſi conſideres, & prudentiam, nihil acutius nihil prudentius. Verborum, quantum ſatis eſt, adhibet; copiam autem rejicit. Formulas fori & curiæ omnes ſervat in loquendo. Mirificus planè vir, & dignus qui ab omnibus ametur & legatur (20). - - - - Suetonius has writ the lives of ſome of the Cæſars. As to his veracity, there is nothing more certain than what he ſays. If you conſider his wit and diſcretion, in theſe no man has exceeded him. The words that he makes uſe of are as many as are ſufficient, but he rejects a copious ſuperfluity. He keeps up all the phraſes of the Forum and the court in his ſtyle. In ſhort, he is truly an admirable writer, and deſerves to be read and liked by all.’ If any one deſires a greater number of teſtimonies, he needs only read Hanckius in the firſt volume de Romanarum rerum ſcriptoribus, pag. 112, and 113; and in the ſecond volume, pag. 287, and 288. See alſo Sir Thomas-Pope Blount, pag. 104, of the Cenſura celebriorum Autorum. But the reader ought alſo to find here what the Antients have ſaid of Suetonius's candor and ſincerity. ‘ Suetonius Tranquillus, emendatiſſimus & condidiſſimus ſcriptor Antouinm & Vindicem tacuit, contentus eo quod eos curſim perſtrinxerat. . . . Et de Suetonio non miramur cui familiare fuit amare brevitatem (21). - - - - Suetonius Tranquillus, a moſt correct and candid writer, paſſes over Antony and Vindex, being ſatisfied with this, that he had given them a touch by the by. . . . . And as to Suetonius, I am not at all ſurprized, ſince he was particularly fond of brevity.’

I muſt not conceal that thoſe, who are willing to know the date of each event, are very much diſpleaſed with Suetonius. That hiſtorian has wholly neglected it; he does not obſerve any chronological order; and indeed it was no part of his deſign; and it is to be obſerved that he is excuſable for pitching upon a method, which excuſed him from following that order. There were hiſtories enough, which contained an exact account of the reign of the Emperors, according to the time in which every thing had been done; and therefore he did not think it proper to compoſe a work of the ſame nature, but rather choſe to diſcover the private actions of the Emperors, and to put together in one chapter what concerned their marriages, and in another chapter what concerned their education, their friendſhips, their buildings, &c. He pitched upon the moſt difficult part of Hiſtory; for it is much eaſier to collect the materials of wars or other public affairs, than to give a particular account of what paſſes in a palace, I mean of the inclinations and private actions of the monarch; what he was as a huſband, as a father, as a brother, as a maſter, as a friend, as a lover; what caprices he was ſubject to, what clothes he wore, what meals he made, &c. I am ſure that if a man ſhould undertake at this day to write the hiſtory of the Popes, Emperors, or Kings of France, &c. in imitation of Suetonius, running back to the laſt 150 years, more or leſs, as he did, he would meet with great difficulties; and if he ſucceeded as well as Suetonius, he would be admired, and looked upon as an excellent author of a ſecret hiſtory. Oh, how fit would ſuch a book be to enrich a Bookſeller!

[E] Some blame him for being ſo particular in deſcribing the leud actions . . . . of Tiberius . . . . &c.] Muretus exclaimed with great eloquence againſt Suetonius upon that account, ſo far as to ſay that the reading of that Hiſtorian is as dangerous for young people as the verſes of Catullus and Martial. I ſhall ſet down the whole paſſage of the oration he made in the college of Rome, the fourth of November 1580. ‘ At Suetonium S. Hieronymus laudat. Magnum teſtimonium, ſi laudat. Non enim ſanctitate tantùm Hieronymus, ſed & eruditione & judicio præſtitit. Quomodo igitur laudat? Eâdem libertate ſcripſiſſe eum ait Cæſarum vitas, quâ ipſi vixerunt. Non magna laus, ſi laus eſt: ſed ego laudem eſſe non puto. Quid enim laudis habet, cùm Cæſares in ſumma licentia atque impudentia vixerint, orationis turpitudine, ipſorum flagitia æquaſſe, quæque illi perpetuis tenebris operienda patrarant, ea nudis & prætextatis verbis in lucem & in aſpectum hominum protuliſſe? Itaque nihil apud Suetonium frequentius legas, quàm exoletos, & ſpintrias & cellarios, & nubentem Neroni Sporum, Doryphoro Neronem; voces etiam, quas in illis flagitiis miſerint, quaſi hæc ſcire, poſterorum intereſſet: quorum commemoratione non ſcriptorem modò, ſed ipſas chartas erubeſcere oportebat: cùm hæc interim ita ſubtiliter ac particulatim perſequitur, ut docere voluiſſe videatur. In Tacito nihil ſimile reperias. Talia aut præterit, aut ita ſignificat, ut odiſſe & abhorrere videas, non, ut illum alterum, cupidè in eis immorari. Inter Vopiſcos igitur, & Spartianos, & Lampridios, (19) Juſtus Lipſius, Elector. lib. ii, cap. xvii, pag. m. 811, Tom. i, Oper.

(20) Franciſc. Robortellus, in Literis ad Jo. Bapt. Campegium, Tom. i, de Populi Romani vita & victu præmiſſis.

(21) Vopiſcus, in Firmo, pag. m. 691, Tom. i, Hiſtoriæ Aug. Script. See alſo the ſame writer in Probo, pag. 639, where he places him among the Hiſtorians, qui non tam diſerte quam vere memoriæ (res geſtas) tradiderunt. - - - who have related things not ſo eloquently as truly.

with the notes of ſome learned Critics, in the edition of Utrecht 1672 (l). I have not ſeen the French tranſlation of Suetonius, printed at Lyons in the year 1556, in 4to (m); and therefore I cannot ſay whether George de la Bouliere, who is the author of it, has been as cautious as Mr du Teil (n). The latter has left out whole chapters, and in many places

(l) Publiſhed by Mr Grævius. It was reprinted in 1691.

(m) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franc. pag. 446. La Croix du Maine, pag. 118, mentions only the edition of Lyons, 1569. (n) The fourth edition of his tranſlation of Suetonius, is that of Amſterdam, 1699.

‘pridios & ejuſmodi vitarum ſcriptores Suetonius emineat, illâ ſe jactet in aulâ; hoc ceteris melior, quod ætatis beneficio, meliùs quàm illi latinè loquitur: ad Taciti quidem gloriam aſpirare, aut ſe cum eo conferre ſi voluerit, omnium eruditorum convicio vapulabit. Equidem quod ad me attinet, Suetonii lectionem non minus quàm Catulli aut Martialis adoleſcentibus pernicioſam, etiam confirmatæ ætatis viris periculoſam puto (22). - - - - But it is ſaid that St Jerom commends Suetonius. An honourable teſtimony, if he does ſo. For Jerom not only excelled in piety, but likewiſe in learning and judgment. But how does he commend him? He ſays that he writ the lives of the Cæſars with the ſame freedom as they lived. This is no great commendation, if it be any at all; for my part I do not think it is any. For ſince the Cæſars lived up to the height of looſeneſs and debauchery, what praiſe is it for any man to have equaled their crimes by the immodeſty of his deſcription, and to have ſet before the eyes of men, in bare-faced and obſcene words, their vile actions, which ſhould rather have been buried in perpetual oblivion. You find nothing more frequently mentioned in Suetonius than Catamites, and the authors of unnatural luſts; Sporus married to Nero, and Nero to Doryphorus. He does not even forget the expreſſions which they made uſe of in the middle of their crimes; as if it concerned poſterity to know theſe things, the bare mention of which ſhould have made not only the author but the paper itſelf to bluſh. Nevertheleſs he inſiſts upon them ſo minutely and particularly, as if he had a mind to teach them. We find nothing like this in Tacitus. He either paſſes over ſuch things, or he hints at them in ſuch a manner as ſhews his hatred and abhorrence, but does not eagerly dwell upon them, as the other does. Wherefore let Suetonius ſhine among the Vopiſci, the Spartiani, the Lampridii, and other writers of lives of that ſort; in this he is preferable to them, that the age in which he lived gave him an opportunity of writing a better Latin ſtile than they: but if he ſhould aſpire to the glory of Tacitus, or dare to compare himſelf with him, he would be cenſured by all learned men. I for my part look upon the reading of Suetonius to be no leſs hurtful to young people than the reading of Catullus or Martial. Nay I think it even dangerous to men of a ripe age.’ Take notice that he oppoſes Tacitus to Suetonius, in order to ſhew that Tacitus has deſerved no blame, conſidering how cautious he is either to ſuppreſs thoſe filthy things, or to mention them only in general, and with indignation. Bodin made the ſame obſervation before Muretus, to make it appear that Tacitus is more to be commended than Suetonius, whom he otherwiſe acknowledges to be leſs blameable than Lampridius. ‘Hoc fortaſſis improbari poteſt (Suetonius) quòd fœdiſſimas quaſque principum libidines nimis ſtudioſè conſectatur quas Corn. Tacitus omiſit. Sed in eo genere longè à Lampridio ſuperatur, is enim tot portenta novarum voluptatum ab Heliogabalo invecta deſcribit, ut non magis ea narrare, quàm unicuique ad imitandum proponere videatur (23). - - - - In this perhaps Suetonius is blame-worthy, viz. in following too cloſely all the abominable luſts of princes, which Tacitus has omitted. He is nevertheleſs far out-done by Lampridius, who deſcribes ſuch a number of monſtrous and new pleaſures brought in by Heliogabalus, that he does not more ſeem to relate them than to propoſe them for the imitation of every one.’ But Bodin and Muretus did not conſider what difference there is between the author of an Hiſtory of the Empire, and the author of an Hiſtory of the Emperors. The former ought to touch but lightly upon the private actions of a prince; he ought to ſay but little of kings, except when they have an influence upon the general affairs of the ſtate. But thoſe, who write the hiſtory of the perſon of a monarch, ought chiefly to dwell on his private actions. Which is the reaſon why Suetonius thought himſelf more obliged than Tacitus to inſiſt upon the perſonal actions of the Emperors. Beſides, it may be affirmed that Tacitus did not take ſuch a method as the cenſurers of Suetonius aſcribe to him. He expreſſes the leudneſs of that time in very plain words, and perhaps he ſpeaks as much of it in proportion (24) as the other does. We might judge better of it, if we had all his hiſtory of Caligula. What Muretus ſays, that the public is not concerned to know the particulars of the Emperors debauchery, proves too much; for he may be anſwered that the public is not concerned to know the particulars mentioned by Tacitus concerning Agrippina, who inticed her own ſon to commit inceſt with her. What have we to do, may one ſay to Muretus, with the ‘laſciva oſcula & prænuntias flagitii blanditias, - - - - wanton kiſſes and careſſes that were the forerunners of the crime,’ which we read in Tacitus (25)? You muſt either condemn that Hiſtorian, or acquit Suetonius, and acknowledge that they are only more or leſs faulty. Note, that Eraſmus, whoſe authority is as good as that of Muretus, does not think that the deſcription of the leudneſs of the Emperors, whoſe hiſtory has been written by Suetonius, is unprofitable to the public. On the contrary, he believes it may be a curb to wicked princes, and that no tyrant could be at reſt, ſhould he conſider that his memory would be one day as execrable as that of Caligula and Nero is at this Day. It was for the public good that he put out an edition of Suetonius, and of the other Hiſtorians, who give us a particular account of the abominable actions of the Roman Emperors. I ſhall ſet down his own words, which repreſent his thoughts more fully and more emphatically than I can do. Ex bonæ fidei ſcriptoribus ſuper alias innumeras, hæc præcipua capitur utilitas, quod non alia res æque, vel bonorum regum animos ad res cum laude gerendas accendit, vel Tyrannorum cupiditates cohibet ac refrenat, dum utrique cernunt horum literis ſuam vitam omnem, mox in totius orbis, imo ſeculorum omnium Theatrum producendam, & quidquid nunc vel in abdito patrant, vel aſcito fuco prætexunt, vel metu diſſimulari cogunt verius quàm ignorari, paulo poſt clariſſima in luce ſub oculis omnium traducendum, cum jam metu pariter ac ſpe libera poſteritas, nec ullo corrupta ſtudio, magno conſenſu recte factis applaudet, parique libertate his diverſa explodet exſibilabitque. Nec enim arbitror quenquam tyrannum, ſic penitus omnem hominis ſenſum exuiſſe, ut vitam ſibi jucundam ducat, ſi norit ſuum nomen apud poſteros omnium ætatum ac nationum, tam inviſum & execrabile fore, quam eſt Neronis, Caligulæ, Heliogabali, Commodi, ad quorum mentionem, ceu portentorum verius quàm principum, nemo jam non deſpuit, non abominatur, non deteſtatur (26). What Eraſmus ſays may be confirmed by the following example. The Emperor Commodus cauſed a man, who had read the life of Caligula, written by Suetonius, to be devoured by beaſts; and he uſed him thus, becauſe he was born the ſame day with Caligula (27). From whence it may be inferred that he was more concerned for the memory of Caligula, than for that of the other Emperors defamed by that Hiſtorian. But ſince he exerciſed ſo great a cruelty upon a reader, by virtue of his concern grounded on ſuch frivolous reaſons, it is an eaſy matter to apprehend that he would not, for any thing in the world, have been uſed as Suetonius uſed Caligula; and therefore it is certain that tyrants are not willing their infamous actions ſhould be known. Such an hiſtorian as Suetonius may therefore make them uneaſy, and afraid that, ſome time or other, their memory will be as execrable as that of the Emperors, whoſe debaucheries he lays open.

Politian maintained, many years before Eraſmus, that the leud and cruel actions deſcribed by Suetonius, might inſpire the reader with love for the contrary virtues; and he alledged the conduct of the Lacedemonians, who in order to make their children hate drunkenneſs, took care to ſhew them drunken ſlaves. Read his words, wherein you will find alſo that a Muſician, the better to inſtruct his ſcholars, would have them hear very bad ſingers. Sed neque aut obſcænitatis apud hunc quiſquam, aut crudelitatis exempla reformidet. Siquidem & Lacedæmonii (ut eſt apud (22) Muretus, Orat. xvii, Vol. ii, pag. 347, 348, Edit. Lipſ. 1672, in 8*vo.*

(23) Bodin Method. Hiſt. cap. iv, pag. m. 65.

(24) That is, conſidering that he wrote the Hiſtory of the Roman Empire, and that Suetonius wrote the lives of the Emperors.

(25) Tacit. Annal. lib. xiv, cap. ii.

(26) Eraſm. Epiſt. Dedicat. Suetonii, Dionis Caſſii, Spartiani, Capitolini, Lampridii, &c. He dedicated that work to Frederic, Elector of Saxony, and to Prince George, couſin to that Elector. The Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Antwerp the fifth of June 1517.

(27) Eum etiam qui Tranquilli librum vitam Caligulæ continentem legerat, feris objici juſſit, quia eundem diem natalis habuerat quem & Caligula. Lamprid. in Commodo, cap. x.

places enervated Suetonius's phraſes; for he was ſenſible that the French language could not bear the vivacity and ſtrength of the deſcription which that Latin Hiſtorian gives us of the Emperor's debauchery. I muſt not forget Moreri's miſtakes [F].

Plutarchum) ſoliti etiam ſunt per feſtos dies bene potos ſervos, atque ex eo parum ſui compotes, quos illi Εἵλωτας vocabant, oſtendere inter convivia, atque illo pacto docere adoleſcenteis, quantum in ſe mali ebrietas contineret. Et Thebanus Giſmenias (28) bonos juxta maloſque tibicines diſcipulis oſtendens, Hoc modo, aiebat, canere oportet, illo non oportet. Videlicet collatæ vitiis virtutes, magis aliquanto, quam ſi ſeorſum inſpexeris, diluceſcunt (29).

Mr de Tillemont is of Muretus's opinion. '† Voſſius quotes out of St Jerom, ſays he (30), that 'Suetonius is as looſe and infamous in his narration, 'as the princes, whoſe hiſtory he writes, were in 'their lives; wherein he contradicts the praiſes beſtowed upon him by Pliny ‡: and it may be ſaid of 'him and Lampridius, that they teach the greateſt 'crimes by relating them.' I cannot grant him all the parts of this ſentence of condemnation; for I am perſuaded that Suetonius might write after ſuch a manner, without contradicting the praiſes beſtowed upon him by Pliny. 'Pliny ſays, That the more he knew 'him, the more he loved him, by reaſon of his probity, honeſty, good conduct, application to ſtudy, 'and learning (31).' The particular account Suetonius gives of the Emperors debauchery is no proof that he was a leud man, or that he took delight in deſcribing leud actions, nor in general that there was any thing wanting to his probity and honeſty. It ſhews only that he was a very ingenuous and ſincere man, and that he believed an hiſtorian ought faithfully to relate all the truths he can find out: and thoſe who are never ſo little qualified to judge of the character of an author by his way of writing, will be of opinion that Suetonius was only directed by his ſincerity and natural ingenuity, and not by a deſire of amuſing or tickling his paſſions. Nay, it ought to be preſumed, that he deſigned to puniſh vice as much as an hiſtorian can puniſh it, and to caſt a blot upon the memory of thoſe monſtrous men, by tranſmitting it to future ages, attended with all the execration it deſerves, and that he thought ſuch a method might in time prevent the like brutiſhneſs. It is certain that he and Lampridius inſpire a greater averſion and horror for the princes, whoſe abominable actions they have deſcribed, than the moſt preciſe and moſt grave writers can do.. Laſtly, I muſt obſerve that Mr de Tillemont did not make a right uſe of his judgment, when he undertook to invalidate the formal teſtimony of Pliny the younger, by looſe and uncertain conſequences. Let us ſtick to the teſtimony of one of the moſt honeſt men of that time. It were in vain to ſay that he beſtowed this encomium upon Suetonius in a letter wherein he begged a favour for him. I know that in ſuch caſes it is a common thing to uſe flattery; but Pliny affirms in the ſame letter, that he and Suetonius had contracted a ſtrict friendſhip long before: It was not a lie; for the truth of it appears from ſome other letters of Pliny. This great friendſhip and familiarity between Suetonius and Pliny had not laſted long, if Suetonius had not been ſuch a Man as Pliny repreſents him to be. I add that there is no author extant that reflects in the leaſt upon Suetonius's virtue; for we muſt not mind what Domitius Calderinus, a great romancer (32), ſays. Read this paſſage; 'Siniſteriora quædam de Suetonii moribus conſectatur, Marii, neſcio cujus, teſtimonium citans. 'Nos enim adoleſcenteis ipſum meminimus audire Domitium, cum diceret habere ſe peculiarem Marii 'Ruſtici librum, quem cæteris incognitum ſecum de 'Gallia attuliſſet, qui tamen codex, ne extincto quidem illo, nunquam comparuit. Atque ego quidem 'ſtudio incogniti mihi ſcriptoris incenſus, etiam ad ipſius Domitii parentis Benaci lacus accolas acceſſi, omnemque ejus librorum ſupellectilem ſcrutatus, Marium 'certe hunc ruſticum inveni nuſquam (33). - - - - He 'makes ſome harſh reflexions upon the morals of Suetonius, 'and quotes one Marius for his voucher: but who that 'Marius is I know not. We remember, indeed, in the 'days of our youth to have heard Domitius ſay, that he 'had a certain book of Marius Ruſticus unknown to others, 'which he had brought with him from France: but it 'never appeared, not even after his death. I for my 'part had ſuch a curioſity to ſee this unknown writer, that 'I was at the pains to go to the parents of Domitius, 'living near the Lake di Garda, and to rummage over 'his whole library, but this Marius Ruſticus was no where 'to be found.'

I ſhall inſert in this place La Mothe de Vayer's reflexion upon Muretus's invective. 'It were to be 'wiſhed, ſays Muretus, that we had not been informed 'of ſo many debaucheries and horrid vices of Tiberius, 'Nero, and Caligula. They are ſuch obſcenities as almoſt make the paper bluſh on which Suetonius repreſents them: and, if what an antient author ſays 'be true ‡, that there is but little difference between 'thoſe who carefully deſcribe ſuch infamous things, 'and thoſe who teach them; we can hardly excuſe 'Suetonius for taking ſuch a method (34). . . . But 'becauſe I have anſwered ſuch like objections in ſome 'other ſections, I ſhall only ſay, that there will hardly be any hiſtorian free from guilt, if it be a crime 'to mention wicked actions, which make up the 'greateſt, and often the moſt conſiderable part of his 'narration. Nay, do not we read of parricides, inceſts, idolatries, and a thouſand profanations in the 'ſacred Hiſtory, among good examples and holy inſtructions (35).' It is a difficult thing to make a good anſwer to that obſervation; and I would fain know what the ſcrupulous Tillemont would have ſaid againſt it. Doubtleſs he would have alledged ſpecious things; but it might have been inferred from them, that the moſt antient Hiſtorian, and the moſt knowing, ſince he wrote by inſpiration, ſhould not have mentioned the daughters of Lot; for it may be ſaid with the ſame reaſon, that this was indirectly teaching inceſt in ſuch circumſtances as were horrible. It might alſo be inferred from the reaſons alledged by that author, that hiſtory in general ought to be condemned (36); and that the trial of the Lady de Brinvilliers ſhould not have been publiſhed at Paris; and that the relations of conſpiracies ſhould not be made public, becauſe one may learn from them the art of plotting, and avoiding the wrong meaſures, which made that of the Pazzi, and ſeveral others miſcarry.

[F] I muſt not forget Moreri's miſtakes] I. Suetonius's father was not tribune of the third legion, but of the thirteenth. II. The title of Secretary of State is too great for Suetonius; it is not at all likely he ever had ſuch an employment: doubtleſs his office was like that of thoſe, who are now called Secretaries of the Cabinet. Spartianus calls him Magiſtrum Epiſtolarum (37), according to the ſtyle of his time, if we believe the learned Gutherius, who maintains that the Magiſterium Epiſtolarum was not appointed till after Hadrian's empire (38). III. Moreri ſhould not have ſaid that Suetonius loſt his place by reaſon of ſome privacies he had with the Empreſs Sabina. That expreſſion does too clearly imply a notion of gallantry, which does not appear in the Latin words of Spartianus, the only author who informs us of Suetonius's being put out of favour. We have ſeen above (39) how he expreſſes himſelf. Moreri (40) quotes him, after having ſaid, that the Emperor Hadrian diſcovered ſome love-intrigues of Sabina, and cauſed her to be poiſoned. It is not true that Spartianus ſays all this; and he is ſo far from giving to underſtand that thoſe, who loſt their places, had been in love with the Empreſs, that he clearly ſhews they had treated her with contempt. Salmaſius juſtly wonders that theſe words injuſſu ejus have not been minded, whereby it appears that thoſe men were turned out of their offices, becauſe they had behaved themſelves too haughtily and too familiarly with the Empreſs without Hadrian's order (41). If they had been guilty of ſome love-intrigues, the Hiſtorian would not have ſaid injuſſu ejus; for it were a very impertinent thing to ſay, that the Emperor deprived the Præfect of the Prætorium, Suetonius, and ſeveral others, of their offices, becauſe they had ſome love-intrigues with Sabina without his order. Were it not a piece of extravagance to ſuppoſe that he gave ſuch orders upon ſome occaſions? Do not tell me that, on the other hand, it were an extravagant thing to ſuppoſe that he ordered ſometimes his miniſters to uſe Sabina uncivilly; this ſuppoſition is very well grounded. We know that he uſed his wife as if ſhe had been a ſervant-maid (42); from whence it may be eaſily inferred that he allowed his officers to uſe her harſhly and very uncivilly. But this

---

(28) He ſhould have ſaid Iſmenias.

(29) Politianus, ubi ſupra, fol. b 5.

† Voſſ. Hiſt. Lat. lib. I. c. 31. pag. 166.

(30) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. ii, p. 488.

‡ Ruald. v. Plut. c. 28, pag. 51. 2.

(31) Tillemont, ibid. pag. 486. Theſe are Pliny's words, Epiſt. xcv, lib. x. Suetonium Tranquillum, probiſſimum, honeſtiſſimum, eruditiſſimum virum, & mores ejus ſequutus & ſtudia, jampridem, domine, in contubernium adſumſi: tantoque magis diligere cœpi, quanto hunc propius inſpexi.

(32) See above the remark [C], of the article CALDERINUS.

(33) Politianus, ubi ſupra.

‡ Parum abeſt à docente qui talia narrat.

(34) La Mothe le Vayer, Jugement ſur les principaux Hiſtoriens, pag. 230, of the third volume of his works in 12*mo*.

(35) Id. ibid, pag. 231.

(36) Compare with this what has been ſaid above, in the remark [S] of the article SFORZA (CATHERINE).

(37) Spartianus, in Adriano, cap. xi, pag. m. 102.

(38) Gutherius, de Officiis Domus Auguſtæ, lib. iii, cap. iv, pag. m. 438.

(39) In the remark [B].

(40) At the word Sabina.

(41) Qui impudicam familiaritatem intelligunt, næ illi multum falluntur, ne tale quicquam cogitarent, poterat per illas duas voces fieri, injuſſu ejus, ſi diligentius paulo attendiſſent. Salmaſius in Spart. Adr. cap. xi, pag. m. 102.

(42) Hujus uxor Sabina dum prope ſervilibus injuriis afficitur ad mortem voluntariam compulſa eſt. Aurelius Victor, in Adriano.

this permiſſion was not unlimited; he did not always permit ſuch an uſage, ſome perſons were only allowed to treat the Empreſs in that manner, and he told them how far that permiſſion might go. Thoſe who loſt their places did not keep within thoſe bounds; which is the reaſon why the Hiſtorian made uſe of the words injuſſu ejus, which ſhew the true cauſe of their diſgrace, and at the ſame time remove all ſuſpicion of gallantry. Salmaſius (43) perfectly unfolds this little myſtery. What he ſays againſt thoſe, who find love-intrigues in the matter, might have been confirmed by a reaſon, which he did not think of. Spartianus adds immediately after, that Sabina would have been divorced for her ill humour, if her huſband had been a private perſon. Uxorem etiam ut moroſam & aſperam dimiſſurus (ut ipſe dicebat) ſi privatus fuiſſet (44). He does not ſay one word of her unfaithfulneſs, and gallantry (45). From whence I conclude, that the deprived officers were only guilty of a blunt proceeding towards Sabina in her ill humour. Her vexation made her peeviſh and intolerable; but becauſe the officers of the court knew that the Emperor deſpiſed her, and did not much care ſhe ſhould be reſpected, they ſcolded at her in their turn, and went ſo far in it without the Prince's approbation, that they loſt his favour. The other particular, mentioned by Moreri, for which he quotes Spartianus, is really to be found in ſome manner in that author. Sabina uxor non ſine fabula veneni dati ab Adriano defuncta eſt (46), that is, Sabina died, not without a report that ſhe had been poiſoned by Hadrian. Nevertheleſs Moreri is miſtaken; for he will have it that the diſcovery of Sabina's gallantry was the cauſe of her being poiſoned; which would be very falſe, though we ſhould grant him that ſome love-intrigues were diſcovered when Suetonius was put out of favour. There were ſixteen years between the depriving of that Secretary, and the death of the Empreſs (47).

I ſhall further examine Moreri's narrative. That diſgrace, ſays he, put Suetonius upon writing for the public; and he compoſed the lives of the twelve Cæſars. . . . . Pliny the younger deſired him to put off no longer the publication of that work, and told him he found it ſo perfect, that the further poliſhing of it would but ſpoil it. There are many faults in thoſe words. IV. It cannot be proved that Suetonius's diſgrace inſpired him with the deſire of writing for the public. V. And therefore it is a great piece of raſhneſs to ſay in expreſs words, that it moved him to write the Hiſtory of the twelve Emperors; for ſince he compoſed many books, he might have writ when he was out of favour, and it cannot be concluded that he wrote preciſely a certain book. VI. No body knows what books Pliny the younger deſired him to publiſh. Why then does Moreri affirm that he deſired him to publiſh the twelve Cæſars? VII. It cannot be ſaid, without helping the letter, that he found them perfect. Which ſuppoſes that he declared he had read them; but this ſuppoſition does not well agree with theſe words: 'Patere, me videre titulum tuum; patere audire, deſcribi, legi, vænire volumina Tranquilli mei (48). - - - Suffer me to ſee your title, ſuffer the books of my friend Tranquillus to be heard and talked of, to be read and ſold.' It is true he had been ſaying what Moreri quotes, 'Perfectum opus abſolutumque eſt; nec jam ſplendeſcit lima, ſed atteritur. - - - The work is perfectly finiſhed; nor will further poliſhing add to the beauties of it, on the contrary it will rather diminiſh them.' But how do we know but he ſaid ſo like a friend? VIII. However it be, were it true that Suetonius did not write the lives of the twelve Cæſars till he was turned out of favour, Pliny the younger could not have complained of his ſlowneſs in publiſhing them (49); for doubtleſs he writ that letter to him under the Empire of Trajan. But Suetonius did not loſe his place till the fourth or fifth year of Hadrian's reign. IX. Inſtead of Sicco Polemon, Moreri ſhould have ſaid Sicco Polenton.

Some of theſe miſtakes of Moreri have been committed by la Mothe le Vayer, in his judgment upon the chief Hiſtorians (50). I wonder at it; for he was a much more learned man than Moreri, and had been directed in that work by Meſſieurs du Puy, and had the aſſiſtance of four great libraries, the King's, Thuanus's, their own (51), and that of Cardinal Mazarin. With ſuch helps he ſhould have writ an excellent book, and might even have avoided thoſe four miſtakes without them.

(43) Salmaſius, in Spart. Adr. ubi ſupra.

(44) Spart. ubi ſupra.

(45) This may ſerve to confute the fabulous ſtory publiſhed by Brantome, againſt Sabina in the firſt volume of his Dames Galantes, pag. 118.

(46) Spartianus, in Adr. cap. xxiv, pag. 204.

(47) See Tillemont, ubi ſupra, pag. 418, & pag. 450.

(48) Plin. Epiſt. xi, lib. v.

(49) Sum & ipſe in edendo hæſitator, tu mora tamen meam quoque cunctationem tarditatemque viciſti. - - - I myſelf am tardy in publiſhing any thing, but you by your delay, have exceeded my ſlowneſs. Id. ibid.

(50) The 2d, the 3d, the 4th, and the 5th. Moreri had them from him.

(51) La Mothe le Vayer, Preface to his Jugem. ſur les princip. Hiſtoriens.

SULACHA (a) (Simon) a Neſtorian Monk, of the order of St Pacomus, withdrew his obedience to his patriarch, and united himſelf to the Church of Rome. Thoſe who ſhook off the yoke as he did, made him their patriarch, and ſent him to Rome, where Pope Julius III, confirmed his patriarchate in 1552 (b). Sulacha made his confeſſion of faith at Rome, which was tranſlated into Latin by Maſius, with the letter thoſe Neſtorians wrote to Julius III, to deſire him to confirm the election of Sulacha, and to aſk his protection againſt a family, which had kept the patriarchate a long time (c). This was the ſubject of their diviſion: ſeveral of them could not endure that this dignity ſhould always remain in one family; and that family, which had enjoyed it above two hundred years, would not reſign it. Simon Sulacha being returned into the Eaſt, eſtabliſhed his patriarchal ſee at Caramit, a town of Meſopotamia, took the title of Patriarch of the Aſſyrians, and ordained ſeveral biſhops and archbiſhops. The Turks put him to death at the ſolicitation of the Schiſmatics. They elected for his ſucceſſor a Monk of St Pacomus, whoſe name was Hebed-Jeſu (d). I have mentioned him under that name, and under that of Abdiſſi: ſee thoſe articles. Father Paul (e) inſinuates that the Court of Rome, out of policy, made a great noiſe of that embaſſy of the Neſtorians, to ſupport her reputation in Europe by chimera's. I ſhall relate in a remark what that Hiſtorian ſays [A].

(a) See the remark [A], in the article HEBED-JESU.

(b) Petrus Strozza, de Dogmate Caldæor. apud Aubert. Miræum, Polit. Eccl. lib. ii, cap. v.

(c) See the Hiſtoire Critique du Levant, par le Sieur de Mony, ch. vii.

(d) Strozza, apud Miræum, ubi ſupra.

(e) Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, book v, at the beginning.

[A] I ſhall relate . . . . what that Hiſtorian ſays.] We find in his work (1) that the Pope received with great magnificence the Patriarch ſent to him by all the Churches between Euphrates and the Indies; that he cauſed him to be conſecrated biſhop; that he gave him the pallium with his own hands in a private Conſiſtory; that he ſent him back into his country, and had him accompanied by ſome Monks who underſtood Syriac; that at Rome, and all over Italy, the only talk was about the vaſt number of Chriſtians that were in that country, and the great acquiſitions the Holy See had made in it; that people diſcourſed particularly of the great number of Churches at Muzal (2), a town which was ſaid to be the antient Aſſur, ſituate upon the Tigris, not far from Nineveh; that they reckoned the moſt famous towns under the juriſdiction of that Patriarch, ſuch as Babylon, Tauris, Arbela where Darius was overcome by Alexander, Ecbatana, called by others Seleucia and Niſibis, and ſeveral provinces of Aſſyria and Perſia; . . . . that all thoſe things were printed and read with great curioſity. There was doubtleſs more oſtentation than truth in the matter; and it was a good piece of policy to make the names of thoſe famous cities ſound ſo high.

(1) F. Paul, Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, book v, at the beginning.

(2) The Confeſſion of Faith of that Patriarch mentions 18, whereof 15 were poſſeſſed by the Neſtorians, and 3 by the Jacobites. See F. Paul, ibid.

SULPICIA, or SULPITIA, a Roman lady, daughter of Sulpicius Paterculus, and wife of Fulvius Flaccus, obtained a very great honour, when it was thought proper to ſeek out a remedy againſt the leudneſs obſerved among the women of Rome. The evil appeared ſo great that recourſe was had to the aſſiſtance of Heaven, and to thoſe religious helps which ſupply the want of human means. The books of the Sibyls were conſulted, and upon the report of the conſultors it was decreed by the ſenate that a ſtatue ſhould be conſecrated to Venus Verticordia, that is, Converter of hearts [A], that women and maids might be more eaſily reclaimed from their leudneſs, and become chaſte. It was ordered that a moſt virtuous woman ſhould conſecrate that ſtatue of Venus; and at firſt a hundred women were choſen from all the reſt, and then ten out of that hundred, and all of them unanimouſly nominated Sulpicia to perform that function: ſo that this lady was acknowledged to be the moſt chaſte of all (a). I ſhall inquire

(a) Taken from Valerius Maximus, lib. viii, cap. xv. You will find his words in the remark [A].

[A] It was decreed by the Senate that a ſtatue ſhould be conſecrated to Venus Verticordia .... converter of hearts.] This particular is to be found in ſeveral authors, but in none with ſo many circumſtances as in Valerius Maximus. Merito, ſays he (1), virorum commemorationi Sulpitia, Ser. Paterculi filia, Q. Fulvii Flacci uxor, adjicitur. Quæ, cum ſenatus libris Sibyllinis per decemviros inſpectis cenſuiſſet, ut Veneris Verticordiæ ſimulachrum conſecraretur, quo facilius virginum mulierumque mentes à libidine ad pudicitiam converterentur; & ex omnibus matronis centum, ex centum autem decem ſorte ductæ, de ſanctiſſima fœmina judicium facerent, cunctis caſtitate prælata eſt. Pliny ſays the ſame in fewer words, only he does not mention the cauſe of that conſecration, nor the epithet of Venus. Pudiciſſima femina ſemel, matronarum ſententia, judicata eſt Sulpicia Paterculi filia, axor Fulvii Flacci: electa ex centum præceptis (2), quæ ſimulacrum Veneris ex Sibyllinis libris dedicaret (3). Solinus (4) tranſcribes Pliny, as he uſes to do. Ovid ſays nothing of Sulpicia, and inſtead of a ſtatue, he pretends that a temple was built to Venus Verticordia. He does not forget the cauſe of that new devotion; he ſays in expreſs words that it was occaſioned by the loſs of chaſtity.

Roma pudicitia proavorum tempore lapſa eſt:
Cumæam, veteres, conſuluiſtis anum.
Templa jubet Veneri fieri: quibus ordine factis,
Inde Venus verſo nomina corde tenet (5).

Of old when Roman chaſtity was fled,
Our fathers, anxious for the marriage-bed,
At the Cumæan propheteſs enquir'd,
To know what offering the gods requir'd.
She bid a temple to be rear'd anon
Unto the Paphian Queen of Love: which done,
Venus did ſtrait acquire another name:
From working changes on the heart it came.

He is to blame for not having paid to Sulpicia the honour ſhe deſerved. The glory ſhe acquired then, is ſo great, that he ſhould not have been ſilent about it. The other ladies acknowledged that ſhe ſurpaſſed them in chaſtity. Such an acknowledgment is as glorious to her, as it would be for a brave man, if a hundred brave men ſhould confeſs that he had more courage than they. It is a rare thing, ſays Martial (6), to ſee any body that is willing to yield to others in point of wit. But it is ſtill more rare among ſoldiers to find any that will yield to another in point of courage: nay, compliments are very ſcarce upon that head; and in general an honeſt man will ſeldom acknowledge that he has leſs honeſty than another, and a virtuous woman that ſhe is leſs chaſte than others. Such a civility is as rare among virtuous women, as it is among gallant women to acknowledge that their rivals exceed them in beauty. However, civil words and compliments are far from being looked upon as judicial and ſolemn acknowledgments; for if the queſtion was to chuſe for an honourable function appointed by the magiſtrates, the moſt honeſt woman or the moſt honeſt man in a town, none would be willing that others ſhould take advantage of the compliments they might have made them. Every one would revoke them, and enjoy the freedom of his judgment, and would think it a very hard thing publickly to acknowledge, that he is leſs worthy of being choſen for the appointed function; and therefore Sulpicia's virtue muſt needs have been very ſhining, ſince a hundred Roman ladies voted for her upon ſuch an occaſion. But perhaps it ought to be ſuppoſed that the Senate ordered that no lady ſhould vote for herſelf. The circumſtances of this fact are not clearly deſcribed by authors. Their meaning ſeems to be that a hundred Roman ladies were firſt of all choſen by lots, and then that ten of them were likewiſe choſen in the ſame manner, and that all of them acknowledged that Sulpicia deſerved to conſecrate the ſtatue. The management of that affair ſeems to me intricate; for why did they caſt lots twice, if they had a mind that the hundred ladies ſhould vote? I had rather ſay that a hundred women of the beſt reputation were firſt of all ſet apart, and then they drew lots, that ten of them ſhould name the woman, who was to conſecrate the ſtatue, and it was ordered that none ſhould name herſelf. Thus Sulpicia by the votes of ten ladies was preferred to a hundred women of the beſt reputation in the city; and yet none did formally declare that ſhe was leſs chaſte than Sulpicia. It had been a hard thing to require ſuch an acknowledgment in ſuch a conjuncture.

WHETHER it was a proper thing to make one's application to Venus, in order to put a ſtop to leudneſs.

Perhaps it will be ſaid that the ſenate did not make a right application; for, according to the doctrine of the Heathens, Venus equally preſided over unlawful and lawful love, and ſhe had occaſioned the prodigious leudneſs they intended to put a ſtop to. This objection is of no weight: the ſenate knew very well what they did, and for this very reaſon that Venus had occaſioned ſuch a diſorder, it was neceſſary to have recourſe to her; for, according to Cato's maxim, thoſe who are the cauſe of great evils, ought to put an end to them. Τῶν γὰρ αὐτῶν εἶναι καὶ ποιεῖν τὰ μεγάλα κακὰ καὶ παύειν. Nam eorundem eſſe & facere magna mala & comprimere (7). The ſenate might expect that Venus being appeaſed by the conſecration of that new ſtatue, and acknowledged to be the miſtreſs of hearts, would reclaim the fair ſex, either by ceaſing to inſpire them with love, or by fixing it on lawful objects. The firſt method is not amiſs; for how many people may uſe the complaint we read in an opera?

Mon cœur auroit encor ſa premiere innocence,
S'il n'avoit jamais eu d'amour.

My heart had ſtill been innocent,
Had it not been for love.

The ſecond method is a very good one: the ſenate might have told Venus; inſpire them with love, we are not againſt it; but let their love be lawful. Reclaim them from their ill courſes; bring them back into the right way. They are like rivers that run out of their channels, and overflow the country; let thoſe waters return into their channel; this we beg of you, as you are the goddeſs Verticordia, --- converter of hearts.

I have read in Pauſanias, that Harmonia, Cadmus's wife, conſecrated three ſtatues to Venus at Thebes; the firſt to Venus Urania; the ſecond to Venus Pandemos, and the third to Venus Apoſtrophia. The firſt was for ſpiritual love, the ſecond for bodily love, and the third was deſigned to prevent extravagant conjunctions, ſuch as inceſt, &c. Ἔθετο δὲ τῇ Ἀφροδίτῃ τὰς ἐπωνυμίας ἡ Ἁρμονία· τὴν μὲν Οὐρανίαν ἐπὶ ἔρωτι καθαρῷ, καὶ ἀπηλλαγμένῳ πόθου σωμάτων· Πάνδημον inquire into the date of this fact [B]; it has been too much neglected by authors.

---

(1) Valerius Maximus, lib. viii, cap. xv, num. xii, pag. m. 738.

(2) That is, who had been already choſen. Read præceptis, and not præcipuis as there is in moſt editions. See Salmaſius in Solinum, pag. 54, and Father Harduin, in Plin. Tom. ii, pag. 56, and 124.

(3) Plin. lib. vii, cap. xxxv, pag. m. 56.

(4) Solin. cap. i, pag. m. 12.

(5) Ovid. Faſtor. lib. iv, ver. 157.

(6) Aurum & opes & rura frequens donabit amicus: Qui velit ingenio cedere rarus erit. Mart. Epig. xviii, lib. viii.

(7) Plutarch. in Catone minore, pag. 184. D.

δημον δὲ, ἐπὶ ταῖς μίξεσι· τρίτην δὲ Ἀποστροφίαν, ἵνα ἐπιθυμίας τε ἀνόμου καὶ ἔργων ἀνοσίων ἀποστρέφῃ τὸ γένος τῶν ἀνθρώπων. Cognomina impoſuit Harmonia Uraniæ, purum ſignificans, & corporum cupiditate vacantem amorem: Popularis, ob Venerios congreſſus: jam vero Apoſtrophiæ numen coli inſtituit (id eſt Averſatricis) quo ab exlege cupiditate & inceſtis ſtupris hominum genus averteret (8). The Romans, you ſee, might have learned of other nations to honour Venus under the title of Verticordia; for there is no great difference between this title and that of Apoſtrophia: one implies the notion of a Converter, and the other that of a Diſſuader, if I may be allowed to uſe ſuch a word.

[B] I ſhall enquire into the date of this fact.] The antient authors do continually afford new occaſions to complain of their negligence in chronology. Tho' you examine the words of Ovid, Valerius Maximus, Pliny, and Solinus, never ſo narrowly, you will find nothing in them, whereby you may know at what time the conſecration of that ſtatue of Venus was performed. That time may be known from Julius Obſequens, who mentions (9) a certain prodigy, which happened under the conſulſhip of Marcus Acilius and Caius Portius, that is, according to Sigonius's Faſti, in the year of Rome 639. The daughter of a Roman knight was thunder-ſtruck, and it was found that her tongue was gone through that part of her body not proper to be named. The Soothſayers were conſulted; their anſwer was, that the maids and the knights were threatened with infamy (10): which proved true; for three Veſtals, who had love-intrigues with ſome Roman knights, were puniſhed at the ſame time. It was then that a temple was built to Venus Verticordia (11). Note, that from the year of Rome 639, till Julius Cæſar made himſelf maſter of the commonwealth, the corruption of manners, and particularly luxury, increaſed more and more; and therefore the ſtatue conſecrated by chaſte Sulpicia, did no good. See the margin (12).

(8) Pauſan. lib. ix, cap. xvi, pag. 742.

(9) Julius Obſequens, in Libro de Prodigiis, num. 97, pag. 51.

(10) It is to be obſerved that this maid was on horſeback when ſhe was thunder-ſtruck.

(11) Tres uno tempore virgines Veſtales nobiliſſimæ, cum aliquot equitibus Romanis, inceſti pœnas ſubierunt. Ædes Veneri Verticordiæ facta. Id. ib.

(12) The evil grew greater and greater from the time of Cæſar, inſtead of growing leſs. See what I quote out of Seneca in the remark [H], of the article VAYER.

SULPITIUS (JOHN) ſirnamed Verulanus, becauſe, if I am not miſtaken, he was a native of Verulum (a), a town in the Campania di Roma, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Belles Lettres with good ſucceſs. He flouriſhed towards the end of the XVth century. His commentary upon Lucan's Pharſalia was pretty good for that time. He publiſhed Vegetius with two other tracts de Re Militari (b). He alſo publiſhed ſome Latin verſes de Moribus, and Præludia Grammatica. I think he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from Sulpitius, who taught in the college of Rome, under the pontificate of Innocent VIII, and who began to reſtore the uſe of Muſic upon the ſtage [A], ſo that he may be looked upon as the firſt author of Opera's. He is alſo the firſt who publiſhed Vitruvius.

His

(a) Veroli in Italian.

(b) Æliani & Frontini. See Geſner's Bibl. fol. 457.

[A] Who began to reſtore the uſe of Muſic upon the ſtage.] I ingenuouſly confeſs that I ſhould be ignorant of this particular, had I not read it in a book of the Jeſuit Menetrier. I ſhall ſet down the whole paſſage (1). 'Thoſe remains of Dramatic Muſic, which had been 'preſerved in the church, ſerved to reſtore it two 'hundred years ago; and Rome, which had in a 'manner loſt it, to beſtow upon the recitation and de'clamation of actors, what the Grecians beſtowed 'upon ſinging and harmony, brought it upon the 'ſtage towards the year 1480, as I learned it from 'Sulpitius in the Epiſtle Dedicatory prefixed to his 'notes upon Vitruvius, which he preſented to Cardi'nal Riari, Great Chamberlain of the Church, and 'nephew of Pope Sixtus IV. . . . . Sulpitius praiſing 'the magnificence of that Cardinal, who had built 'ſtately palaces in and about Rome, begs of him that 'he would ſet up public theatres for Muſical repre'ſentations, of which this Sulpitius calls him the Re'ſtorer, having ſhown at Rome, a few years ago, 'what had not been in uſe there for many ages. He 'tells the Cardinal in that epiſtle, that Rome ex'pects from him a theatre for ſuch performances, be'cauſe he has already given ſuch an entertaintment 'to the people upon a moveable theatre, ſet up in a 'public place, and at other times in the caſtle of 'St Angelo for the Pope's diverſion, and in his palace 'for ſome Cardinals. Tu enim primus Tragœdiæ 'quam nos juventutem excitandi gratiâ & AGERE '& CANTARE primi hoc ævo docuimus, (nam ejuſ'modi actionem jam multis ſæculis Roma non viderat) 'in medio foro pulpitum ad quinque pedum altitudinem 'erectum pulcherrimè exornaſti. Eamdemque poſtquàm 'in Hadriani mole Divo Innocentio ſpectante eſt acta, 'rursùs intrà tuos penates tamquam in media Circi ca'veâ toto conſeſſu, umbraculis tecto admiſſo populo, & 'pluribus tui ordinis ſpectatoribus honorificè excepiſti. 'Tu etiam primus picturatæ ſcenæ faciem, quùm Pompo'niani (2) comœdiam agerent noſtro ſæculo oſtendiſti: 'quare à te Theatrum novum tota urbs magnis votis 'expectat.' Father Menetrier is miſtaken, when he ſays that this Latin paſſage is taken from the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Sulpitius's notes upon Vitruvius. Mr du Francaſtel, keeper of the Mazarine Library, has been pleaſed to inform me of ſome things relating to the book, wherein that Epiſtle Dedicatory is to be found, and thereby I know it is a Vitruvius (3) without any notes upon the text, and without any various readings. It is not paged, and has no ſignatures. Neither the time nor the place of the impreſſion, nor the Printer's name, are to be found in it. There is no date in the advertiſement to the reader, nor in the Epiſtle Dedicatory. That advertiſement contains theſe words, among other things: 'Jo. Sulpitius Lectori 'ſalutem . . . . Collatis multis id genus libris & im'primis uno noſtri Delii manu ſatis accurate per'ſcripto, eum mihi laborem aſſumpſi ut quantum per 'plurimas occupationes meas fieri poſſet, redderem 'unum imprimendorum archetypum adeò emendatum, 'ut parvus labor cuivis alteri ejuſdem rei ſtudioſo re'linqueretur. Quod ſi fidelis ut ſpero librarius fuerit '& cum his impreſſis ſcripti calamis conferentur, fa'cile fides noſtra & diligentia apparebit . . . . Primus 'hoc in ſtadio curro & ad certamen via jam liberali'ter ſtrata reliquos inter ſe excito. - - - - John Sulpi'tius to the reader. . . . . Having collated ſeveral ma'nuſcripts of this kind, particularly that which my friend 'Delius wrote with exactneſs, I took upon me, as much 'as the multiplicity of my affairs would allow, to procure 'a copy for the preſs ſo correct, that there ſhould be little 'trouble left for any other perſon that might ſet about the 'ſame thing. If the Printer ſhould do juſtice, as I hope 'he will, when the manuſcripts ſhall be compared with 'the printed copies, my diligence and fidelity will ſoon ap'pear . . . . I am the firſt who ſtart in this courſe, 'and excite others to a mutual ſtrife, having paved the 'way for them in ſuch an ample manner.' The Epiſtle Dedicatory begins thus: 'Raphaeli Riario Cardinali 'Sanctæque Ro. Eccleſiæ Camerario, Jo. Sulpitius fœ'licitatem. Quidquid curæ, ſtudii, vigiliarum, & operæ 'in emendando & vulgando Vitruvio poſui . . . . tuæ 'dedico amplitudini. - - - - John Sulpitius to Cardinal 'Raphael Riari, Great Chamberlain of the Church, 'wiſhes happineſs. Whatever pains, diligence, and la'bour, I have beſtowed upon the correcting and publiſh'ing of Vitruvius . . . . I dedicate it all to your Emi'nence.' Then follows the paſſage quoted by Father Menetrier. This edition of Vitruvius did not come out in the year 1480; for it was publiſhed under the Pontificate of Innocent VIII, who kept his ſee from the year 1484, till 1492. Here follow ſome words of the Epiſtle Dedicatory, whereby it appears that it

(1) Menetrier, des Repréſentations en Muſique, pag. 155, 156. That book was printed at Paris, in 1681.

(2) That is the ſcholars of the academy or college of Pomponius Lætus.

(3) A very ſmall folio.

His book de Moribus was tranſlated into French verſe by Peter Broé (c) a native of Tournon on the Rhone. La Croix du Maine (d), from whom I learn this, places the printing of that tranſlation in the year 1555, by Macé Bonhomme at Lyons, and he calls the author of the original, John Sulpitius of S. Alban, named Verulanus.

(c) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç, pag. 1000, calls him Brohe.

(d) Bibl. Franç, pag. 388.

was written towards the laſt years of that Pontificate. ‘ Innocentius impoſito bellis fine, Prætorio ſuburbano peracto, agilitatis certaminibus & equitum concurſionibus, dotalibuſque & ſumptuariis legibus revocatis. . . . . Tum floræ campus, tum Circus Flaminius lateribus aptiſſime ſternitur . . . . de Gymnaſio noſtro evertendo & magnifice conſtruendo (quod utinam præoccupaſſes : ibi enim cotidiana omnium diſciplinarum eduntur ſpectacula) prudentiſſimi Reformatores jam iniere conſilium (4). - - - - Pope Innocent having put an end to the war, finiſhed his country houſe, promoted games and tournaments, and repealed the dotal and ſumptuary laws . . . . Then the Campus Floræ, and the Circus Flaminius, were neatly paved with bricks. . . . . Immediately after that, the wiſe Reformers reſolved upon pulling down our academy, and building it up a-new in a magnificent manner (which I wiſh you had thought of before, becauſe there all manner of ſhows and exerciſes are daily exhibited).’

From what has been ſaid, I conclude that Father Menetrier does not well deſcribe this work of Sulpitius ; for he ſays they are notes upon Vitruvius, publiſhed about the year 1480.

Note, that this edition of Vitruvius is little known. The reader will be convinced of it by this extract of a letter, which Mr du Francaſtel has done me the honour to write to me. I inſert it here the more willingly, becauſe I am ſure that thoſe, who love the hiſtory of books, will find it very curious. ‘ To be better informed of the matter, I have read all the Prefaces, the Epiſtles Dedicatory, and other Prolegomena, prefixed to the Vitruvius's of the Mazarine Library, that have been printed with and without commentaries, in Latin, Italian, and French. It is a ſurprizing thing that none of them mentions this Jo. Sulpitius, nor his edition, which muſt needs be the firſt. Nay, moſt Commentators and Editors pretend to be the firſt who have gone about it. Mr Perrault, who, in the Preface to his French tranſlation of Vitruvius, mentions the names of thoſe who have publiſhed, tranſlated, or commented upon that author, ſays nothing of Sulpitius. I have ſeen the editions of Jocundus, Philander, Daniel Barbarus, Ceſariano, and Caporali, beſides that of Mr Perrault, which are in our library. I have found out another thing concerning one Hiero. Advocatus Ambroſii JCti. F. It is in a letter from Joannes Britannicus Brixianus, to that Advocatus, wherein he ſpeaks to him thus : ‘ Feciſti tuâ induſtriâ, ſtudio, & labore, ut Vitruvius de architectura, qui jam tot ſæculis in lucem caput ſuum proferre non audebat, qui ex omni parte mancus, lacerus, mutilatum ſe ſentiebat, nunc politus, purus, integer huc & illuc geſtiat meare, omnibus carus occurrat, omnibus gratus excipiatur. - - - - It is owing to your pains and induſtry, that Vitruvius, an Architect, who was ſo maimed and imperfect in every part, that, for many ages, he could not ſhew his head, does now come forth freſh, uncorrupted, and entire ; and is every where received with the greateſt fondneſs and approbation. That letter is printed at Venice, in 1493. Having read the Vitruvius's, without finding any thing in them, whereby one may know who was this Jo. Sulpitius, I thought that if I ſhould read all the prefaces, &c. of Verulanus's works, that are in our library, I might diſcover ſomething in them, ſuppoſing he had made the notes in queſtion ; but it was to no purpoſe, for that author makes no mention of them in ſeven or eight books which I have ſeen (5).’

(4) I am beholden for all theſe paſſages to Mr du Francaſtel, keeper of the Mazarine library.

(5) A Letter of Mr du Francaſtel, written from Paris, the 11th of December 1699.

S U R E N A, General of the Parthians in the war againſt the Romans, commanded by Craſſus in the year of Rome 701 (a), was for wealth, family, and authority, the ſecond man in the kingdom, but for courage and proweſs he was the firſt ; neither was any one ſo large ſized, or ſo well ſhaped. Whenever he travelled he had a thouſand camels to carry his baggage, two hundred chariots full of concubines, a thouſand compleatly armed men for his life-guards, and a great many more lightarmed, ſo that there were at leaſt ten thouſand of his ſervants and retinue. And the honour had long belonged to his family, that at the king's coronation he put the crown upon his head ; and when King Orodes had been exiled, he brought him in : it was he that took the great city of Seleucia, was the firſt man that ſcaled the walls, and with his own hand beat off the defendants ; and though at that time he was not above thirty years old, he was counted wiſe and diſcreet : wherein he had much the advantage of Craſſus, who was eaſy to be impoſed upon, firſt through his overweening confidence, and afterwards becauſe he was diſpirited and terrifyed by his calamities. Many ſtratagems were uſed againſt the Romans, and beſides, the Parthians fought with great vigour. Surena (b) was the talleſt and comelieſt man in the army. And the ſweetneſs of his looks, and effeminacy of his habit, could not promiſe ſo much manhood, as he really was maſter of ; for his face was painted [A], and his hair parted, after the faſhion of the Medes ; whereas the other Parthians looked more terrible, with their hair ſhaggy, after the Scythian mode. The ſucceſs of the battle was glorious to him ;

(a) Plutarch. in Craſſo, pag. m. 556.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 557.

[A] The ſweetneſs of his looks, and effeminacy of his habit, could not promiſe ſo much manhood, as he really was maſter of ; for his face was painted.] Generally ſpeaking, thoſe men, who pretend to be handſome, and who have recourſe to art to ſet off the luſtre of their complexion, and who often conſult their glaſs, that the ſymmetry of their hair and curls may often charm women, are not fit for war. They are meer beaux and ſparks ; the aſſemblies of ladies, feaſts, and balls, are the places where they ſignalize themſelves : the fatigue of war does not agree with them ; it requires men who are not afraid of being ſun-burnt : bravery does rather inſpire a deſire of frightning the enemy with a martial look, than of pleaſing women with a beauiſh air. But here is an exception to that general rule : Surena ſhews himſelf a valiant man in battle, he performs all the duties of a General, with all imaginable vigour and application ; and yet he paints, and is very careful of his hair ; which puts me in mind of a common topic very contrary to Cæſar's practice. It is a common maxim in war, that ſoldiers ought not to be permitted to enjoy the ſweets of a delicious life, that it is the way to enervate them and make them lazy ; and, among other inſtances, the fault of Hannibal, after the battle of Cannæ, is frequently alledged. He quartered his army in ſeveral places, where the ſoldiers uſed themſelves to a voluptuous life, and wine, baths, good cheer and women, deſtroyed that martial vigour, which had made them ſo formidable. The delights of Capua were to him what the battle of Cannæ had been to the Romans (1). ‘ In hyberna Capuam conceſſit. ibi partem majorem hyemis exercitum in tectis habuit, adverſus omnia humana mala ſæpe ac diu durantem, bonis inexpertum atque inſuetum. itaque quos nulla mali vicerat vis, perdidere nimia bona ac voluptates immodicæ : & eo impenſius, quo avidius ex inſolentia in eas ſe immerſerant. ſomnus enim & vinum, & epulæ, him; but he caſt a blot upon his glory by his perfidiouſneſs, in demanding an interview with Craſſus to conlude a treaty of peace (c). He was very civil to that Roman General, he gave him his word, and aſſured him there was an agreement concluded between the Parthians, ‘ & epulæ, & ſcorta balneaque, & otium conſuetudine indies blandius, ita enervaverunt corpora animoſque, ut magis deinde præteritæ eos victoriæ quàm præſentes tutarentur vires: majuſque id peccatum ducis apud peritos artium militarium haberetur, quàm quòd non ex Cannenſi acie protinus ad urbem Romam duxiſſet. illa enim cunctatio diſtuliſſe modò victoriam videri potuit: hic error vires ademiſſe ad vincendum. Itaque hercule, velut ſi cum alio exercitu à Capua exiret, nihil uſquam priſtinæ diſciplinæ tenuit. nam & redierunt plerique ſcortis impliciti: & ubi primùm ſub pellibus haberi cœpti ſunt, viaque & alius militaris labor excepit, tyronum modo corporibus animiſque deficiebant: & deinde per omne æſtivorum tempus magna pars ſine commeatibus ab ſignis dilabebantur: neque aliæ latebræ quam Capua deſertoribus erant (2). - - - Hannibal withdrew to Capua, where he took his winter-quarters. There he lodged his ſoldiers in houſes, for the greateſt part of winter; thoſe ſoldiers who had long been enured to all manner of hardſhips, and were unacquainted with eaſe and pleaſure. But thoſe men whom no hardſhips, no miſery, could tame and ſubdue, were ſpoiled and undone by too much wealth, and immoderate pleaſures; and ſo much the rather, becauſe, not having taſted pleaſures before, they abandoned themſelves wholly to them, and plunged in voluptouſneſs and debauchery. For ſleeping on ſoft beds, wine and feaſting, whoring and bathing, idleneſs and eaſe, which by habit grew daily more pleaſant and delightful, enervated their bodies and minds to ſuch a degree, that from thence forward the reputation of their former victories defended them more than their preſent ſtrength: and men ſkilled in military affairs have judged Hannibal their General more blameable for this action, than for not leading his army directly forward to Rome, after he had won the battle at Cannæ. For that ſtay ſeemed only to defer the final victory for a time, whereas this error ſeemed to diſable him from ever obtaining it. Thus he departed from Capua, as if he had led ſome other army; ſo little did they retain of their antient diſcipline: for they not only returned from that city, moſt of them entangled and enſnared in the love of harlots, but ſo ſoon as they came again to lie abroad on the bare earth, under tents and pavilions covered with beaſts hides, to march long journies, and to reſume their military hardſhips, their bodies became as tired, and their hearts as faint, as if they had been raw ſoldiers, newly come into the field: and all the time of their ſummer abode in the camp, many of them without licence or paſport ſtraggled away and deſerted their colours; while theſe deſerters had no other haunt, but Capua.’ The maxim grounded upon ſuch examples was neglected by Julius Cæſar; and he had no occaſion to repent that he had not followed it. He ſuffered his ſoldiers to plunge themſelves into all manner of debauchery after a great victory, and uſed to ſay that they could fight ſtoutly, even when they were perfumed. Nonnunquam poſt magnam pugnam atque victoriam, remiſſo officiorum munere, licentiam omnem paſſim laſciviendi permittebat: jactare ſolitus, milites ſuos etiam unguentatos bene pugnare poſſe (3).

(1) Titus Livius, ubi infra, pag. 376. Florus, lib. ii, cap. vi.

I think our Surena was one of thoſe men, of whom I have given two examples in the article of Henry IV (4). They give up themſelves to pleaſures, and entirely abſtain from them, according to the ſeveral junctures: they are voluptuous and lazy to the higheſt degree, when there is nothing to do; and extreamly vigilant and laborious, when there is a neceſſity for it. If we believe Velleius Paterculus, Mæcenas laboured very hard, when it was neceſſary; but when there was no preſſing buſineſs, he gave up himſelf to idleneſs, and lived as deliciouſly as the moſt effeminate man can do. C. Mæcenas, vir ubi res vigiliam exigeret, ſane exſomnis, providens atque agendi ſciens; ſimul vero aliquid ex negotio remitti poſſet, otio ac mollitiis pæne ultra feminam fluens (5). What the ſame Hiſtorian ſays of Lucius Piſo, though it falls ſhort of that, may yet ſerve for an example of the character I here deſcribe. ‘ De quo viro hoc omnibus ſentiendum ac prædicandum eſt, eſſe mores ejus vigore ac lenitate mixtiſſimos, & vix quemquam reperiri poſſe, qui aut otium validius diligat, aut facilius ſufficiat negotio, & magis, quæ agenda ſunt, curet ſine ulla oſtentatione agendi (6). - - - Concerning whom every one ought to think and ſay, that in his manners there is a perfect mixture of vigour and ſoftneſs, and that it is ſcarce poſſible to find any man who is either fonder of eaſe, or more capable of buſineſs, and aſſiduous without oſtentation in doing what is neceſſary to be done.’ He ſays much the ſame thing of Sentius Saturninus. ‘ Virum multiplicem in virtutibus, navum, agilem, providum, militariumque officiorum patientem ac peritum pariter, ſed eundem, ubi negotia feciſſent locum otio, liberaliter lauteque eo abutentem; ita tamen, ut eum ſplendidum ac hilarem potius, quam luxurioſum aut deſidem diceres (7). - - - A man endowed with many virtues, laborious, active, provident, who equally well underſtood and diſcharged military offices. Neverthele ſs as often as he had any reſpite from buſineſs, he miſpent it, yet in ſuch a manner, that you would ſay he was rather magnificent and gay, than luxurious and indolent.’

Tacitus mentions a General (8) of the ſame temper. It was he who contributed moſt to raiſe Veſpaſian to the throne. He was too voluptuous when he had nothing to do, and very active in time of buſineſs. ‘ Luxuria, induſtria, comitate, arrogantia, malis boniſque artibus mixtus: nimiæ voluptates cum vacaret: quotiens expedierat magnæ virtutes (9). - - - - - A man in whom there was a mixture of good and bad qualities, luxury, diligence, arrogance, and courteſy. He was too voluptuous, &c.’ See alſo what Tacitus ſays of one Criſpus Salluſtius in the 30th chapter of the third book of his Annals. Every body knows that Demetrius was a diſſolute man to the higheſt degree; and yet in time of war that Prince gave over his pleaſures, and applied himſelf entirely to his great enterprizes. Let us ſee how Plutarch relates the matter. He ſays (10) that Antigonus being uncapable of the fatigues of the war, by reaſon of his great age and the bulk of his body, committed the management of his greateſt affairs to the Prince, his ſon, whoſe conduct was admirably dextrous in military matters; and the old King was induced to bear with thoſe exceſſive liberties, wherein he drowned himſelf in the time of peace, becauſe he obſerved him to be the moſt temperate and abſtemious perſon in the world, in the time of war and action. . . . As for Demetrius, if he devoted himſelf to his pleaſures and luxury, he abandoned himſelf entirely to them; and if the trumpet ſounded to horſe, he was no leſs aſſiduous in the fatigues of war; he was, beyond all doubt, a very great Captain, and moſt notably dextrous, not only in his conduct, but in forming his levies, and raiſing an army, and in making all the neceſſary preparations of ſtores and magazines, the very muſcles and nerves of war, which he ever took care to provide in great abundance (11). I ſhall add an obſervation of the ſame author, attended with a fact relating to the matter I treat of. ‘ Artaxerxes plainly proved that cowardice, and effeminacy are the effects of a baſe vile nature, guided by erroneous notions, and not of niceneſs and ſuperfluous exceſſes, as moſt men ſuppoſe. For notwithſtanding his jewels of gold, his robe of ſtate, and the reſt of his coſtly attire, worth no leſs than twelve thouſand talents, with which he was conſtantly clad, his labours and toils were no leſs than thoſe of the meaneſt perſons in his army. For he marched himſelf the firſt on foot, having his quiver ſlung over his ſhoulder, and his ſhield on his arm; he led them through craggy mountains and rugged ways; inſomuch that the ſoldiers obſerving his courage and unwearied ſtrength, took wing, and went the more ſwiftly along with him, whoſe daily march was above two hundred furlongs (12).’ I ſhall here apply an obſervation that was made upon the Athenians. An author who had deſcribed their luxury and ſoftneſs, adds, and yet they won the battle of Marathon. Τοιοῦτοι δὲ ὄντες τὴν ἐν Μαραθῶνι μάχην ἐνίκησαν. Et ejuſmodi quum eſſent, tamen à prælio Marathonio victores diſceſſerunt (13).

3 One

(c) Id. ibid. pag. 562, 563.

(2) Titus Livius, lib. xxiii, pag. m. 362. See alſo pag. 377, where Marcellus encourages his ſoldiers, repreſenting to them how the delights of Capua had enervated the ſoldiers of Hannibal.

(3) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. lxvii.

Some examples of voluptuous men, and yet very laborious.

(4) Remark [A].

(5) Vell. Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. lxxxviii.

(6) Id. ibid. cap. xcviii.

(7) Id. ibid. cap. cv.

(8) Licinius Mucianus.

(9) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. i, cap. x.

(10) Plut. in Demetrio.

(11) Zozimus ſpeaks of Theodoſius in the like ſtrain.

(12) Plut. in Artaxerxe.

(13) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. iv, cap. xxii.

Parthians and the Romans, and that the only thing that remained to be done was to advance as far as the river to write it down. Craſſus had a mind to ſend for a horſe, but Surena told him that it was needleſs, ſince King Orodes gave him one. Craſſus got on

One would think that when the Antients ſuppoſe that Bacchus did wonders on the day of the battle with the giants, their deſign is to give us to underſtand that thoſe who ſeem only fit for dancing and amorous ſports, will nevertheleſs ſhew their bravery in a battle.

Tu, cùm parentis regna per arduum
Cohors Gigantum ſcanderet impia,
Rhœtum retorſiſti leonis
Unguibus, horribilique mala:
Quanquam choreis aptior, & jocis,
Ludoque dictus, non ſat idoneus
Pugnæ ferebaris: ſed idem
Pacis eras, mediuſque belli (14).

When impious giants climb'd on high,
And dar'd to ſtorm thy father's ſky,
Thy ſingle hand ſecur'd his crown:
You with a lyon's dreadful jaws,
And frightful nails retriev'd the cauſe,
Bold Rhetus quell'd and ſav'd the falling throne.
Tho' much more us'd to ſoft delight,
Unfit, unable for a fight
You once were thought, and doom'd to eaſe,
Yet when your heat and virtue roſe,
What fury ſeiz'd your haughty foes?
How equally inclin'd to wars and peace?

I will not reckon the great Scipio among the voluptuous men who minded important affairs. I ſhall only ſay, that his great cares were attended with innocent recreations. The rigid and auſtere Cato did not approve of it; but he was too ſevere in his judgment about the difference that is between an effeminate life and gaiety. However it be, he openly complained of Scipio's behaviour, who, during the preparations for the expedition of Carthage, made merry in Sicily. Cato was to be his Quæſtor; but he left him as ſoon as he perceived that his remonſtrances were not acceptable to him. He ‘returned from Sicily, and, together with Fabius, made a huge noiſe in the open ſenate againſt Scipio's laviſhing of unſpeakable ſums, and his childiſh loitering away his time in wreſtling-matches and comedies, as if he were not to make war, but holiday; ſo that he cauſed ſome of the tribunes of the people to be ſent, by commiſſion from the ſenate, to enquire into the truth of theſe allegations upon the ſpot, and, in caſe they found them true, to bring him back to Rome. But, on the contrary, Scipio ſhewed them the evident and certain promiſe of victory, in the prodigious proviſion he had made of all things neceſſary for the war; and that he only lived pleaſantly with his friends, when there was nothing elſe to do; ſhewing alſo that he was not, by his liberality to his ſoldiers, the more negligent in things of conſequence and moment (15)’ Valerius Maximus mentions this pretended remiſſneſs of Scipio, and ſays, among other things, that great ſouls launch forth with greater impetuoſity when they have been at reſt. Let us give the paſſage entire. ‘P. Scipio, cum in Sicilia augendo, trajiciendoque in Africam exercitu opportunum quærendo gradum, Carthaginis ruinam animo volveret; inter conſilia ac molitiones hujus tantæ rei operam gymnaſio dedit, pallioque & crepidis uſus eſt. Nec hac re ſegniores Pœnicis exercitibus manus intulit: ſed neſcio an ideo alacriores, quia vegeta & ſtrenua ingenia, quo plus receſſus ſumunt, hoc vehementiores impetus edunt. Crediderim etiam favorem eum ſociorum uberiorem ſe adepturum exiſtimaſſe, ſi victum eorum & ſolennes exercitationes comprobaſſet: Ad quas tum veniebat, cum multum ac diu fatigaſſet humeros, & cetera membra militari agitatione firmitatem ſuam probare coëgiſſet, conſiſtebatque in his labor ejus, in illis remiſſio laboris (16). - - - - Publius Scipio, while he was in Sicily, conſulting how to augment his troops and tranſport them into Africa, where he meditated nothing leſs than the ruin of Carthage, did nevertheleſs, amidſt his deſigns and preparations for this great work, frequent the Academy, and make uſe of the gown and ſlippers. Nor did the Carthaginians find him at all more remiſs upon this account, but rather briſker, becauſe ſtrong and reſolute minds launch forth with ſo much the greater impetuoſity as they have had a long eaſe and reſpite. I likewiſe fancy that he expected to ingratiate himſelf the more with the Allies, by ſeeming to approve of their way of living and their ſolemn exerciſes. But he did not come to theſe, before he had once heartily fatigued his ſhoulders, and tried the ſtrength of his other members by military work. In theſe things conſiſted his labour, and in thoſe his reſt.’ It appears from the end of this paſſage that there was no effeminacy in Scipio's conduct, and that he only mixed ſome recreation with his moſt important cares and labours. All great men are not capable of ſuch a variety; ſome deſpiſe pleaſures, and love an uninterrupted gravity; others are not equal to this ſort of variation, the chequering of great deſigns with dancing and drunkenneſs. Flaminius, one of the moſt illuſtrious perſons of antient Rome, could not apprehend how a man can be capable of ſuch a variety. Here follows what Plutarch ſays of him. ‘At another time Dinocrates the Meſſenian, having been fuddled at a merry meeting in Rome, danced there in a woman's habit, and the next day addreſſed to Titus for aſſiſtance in his deſign to get Meſſina out of the Achæan hands. I ſhall (ſays he) conſider of it, but cannot but wonder that you who are enterprizing deſigns of that moment, can find leiſure to revel and ſing in your cups (17).’ Montagne makes very fine obſervations upon the capacity of the ſoul, whereby a man may turn his mind ſometimes one way and ſometimes another, and is able to do things that ſeem inconſiſtent. ‘(18) I am well pleaſed to ſee a General of an army at the foot of a breach he deſigns to attack, talking freely at dinner-time with his friends; and Brutus, againſt whom and againſt the Roman liberty, heaven and earth were combined, ſtealing ſome hours in the night, as he goes the rounds, to read Polybius. Little ſouls buried under the weight of affairs, know not how to extricate themſelves; they know not how to lay them aſide, and re-aſſume them.

. . . . . ô fortes pejoraque paſſi,
Mecum ſæpe viri, nunc vino pellite curas,
Cras ingens iterabimus æquor (19).

. . . . . Cheer, rouze your force,
For we have often ſuffer'd worſe.
Drink briſkly round, diſpel all cloudy ſorrow,
Drink round, we'll plow the deep to-morrow.

CREECH.

He alledges many examples upon that ſubject.

It were to be wiſhed that the general rule in queſtion were not liable to ſo many exceptions; for a young man well qualified for the war, who is given to drinking, gaming, and women, has ſomething to anſwer to thoſe who endeavour to reclaim him by repreſenting to him the ill conſequences of ſuch a courſe. You will never be able to command an army, ſay they to him; ſuch an employment is inconſiſtent with an unſurmountable inclination for a voluptuous life. Why ſo? will he ſay: why ſhould not I be in time like ſo many others, who have been debauched and laborious by turns, according to the poſture of affairs? Surena painted, and was attended by many concubines. Was he a worſe General for it? How many ſuch examples does antient and modern Hiſtory afford? Montgomery, who performed ſo many noble exploits in the XVIth century, was extremely careleſs in his office, for he loved an eaſy life and gaming; but when he was once got into the ſaddle, he was the moſt valiant and careful captain that ever was ſeen (20). Many Generals avoid being ſurprized, and perform actions that require an extreme diligence, though they love drinking, and make long meals; and their enemies are often miſtaken in the conſequences they draw from it. Granvelle, Biſhop of Arras, made

(14) Horat. Od. xix, lib. ii.

(15) Plut. in Catone majore, pag. 338. See alſo Livy, lib. xxix, pag. m. 532.

(16) Valer. Maximus, lib. iii, cap. vi, num. 1, pag. m. 298, 299.

(17) Plut. in Q. Flaminio, pag. 378.

(18) Montagne, Eſſays, book. iii, in the laſt chapter, pag. m. 595.

(19) Horat. Od. vii, ver. 30, lib. i.

(20) Brantome in his Encomium upon the Prince of Condé, Tom. iii, of his Memoirs, pag. m. 234.

on horſeback, and ſoon after they cut off his head. This perfidiouſneſs was attended with inſults and deriſion [B] : but Surena did not long enjoy the pleaſure of the victory ; for the King of the Parthians grew jealous of him, and cauſed him to be put to death (d).

(d) Plut. in Craſſo, p. 565.

made a very imprudent anſwer, as it appeared by the event. It (21) was repreſented to the Emperor Charles V, that Duke Maurice was not to be truſted ; but Granvelle anſwered that there was no occaſion to ſuſpect thoſe great drinkers, becauſe their heads being always clouded with thick vapours, were not clear enough to carry on a nice intrigue (22). Maurice made it appear that he was more cunning than the Italians and Spaniards.

A voluptuous young man, who conſiders the examples I have mentioned, grows more incorrigible, and expoſes himſelf to great inconveniencies. The beſt way is to follow the rule, without truſting to exceptions.

[B] This perfidiouſneſs was attended with inſults and deriſion.] Surena ſent the head and the hand of Craſſus to the King his maſter ; ‘ but himſelf by his meſſengers ſcattered a report, That he was bringing Craſſus alive to Seleucia, and made a ridiculous proceſſion, which, by way of ſcorn, he called a triumph. For one Caius Patianus, who of all the priſoners was moſt like to Craſſus, being put into the habit of a woman like the Barbarians, and inſtructed to take the title of Craſſus, and Emperor, from thoſe who ſpoke to him, was brought ſitting upon his horſe, preceded by a parcel of trumpeters and lictors upon their camels ; the girdles and purſes of the Romans were hung at the end of the bundles of rods, and the heads of the ſlain, freſh bleeding, at the end of the axes ; after them followed the Seleucian minſtrels, making abundance of ſcurrilous and abuſive reflexions upon the effeminacy and cowardlineſs of Craſſus, with a muſical cadence : and this ſhow was ſeen by every body. But Surena calling together the Senate of Seleucia, ſhewed to them a wanton book of Ariſtides, called his Mileſiæ ; neither was this a forgery, for it was found amongſt the ſpoils of Ruſtius, and furniſhed Surena with ſufficient matter of deriſion upon the profligate manners of the Romans, who were not able even in time of war to forbear ſuch wanton writings and practices. But the Senate of Seleucia had reaſon to commend the wiſdom of Æſop, who tells us that every man carries a wallet acroſs his ſhoulder, putting into the pouch before the faults of others, and into the pouch behind his own, when they ſaw their General Surena had put the looſe book of Ariſtides into the pouch before, and into that behind a long train of Parthian luxury, which he dragged after him in ſuch a number of chariots filled with concubines, that he ſeemed to lead, as it were, an army of vipers, whoſe furious front appeared terrible, where nothing was ſeen but lances, javelins, bows, and ſteeds ; but all ended in a train of wenches, inſtruments of muſic, dancing, ſinging, and the whole night conſumed with harlots in riotous banquets (23).’

This conduct of Surena plainly ſhews that the Parthians deſerved to be called Barbarians, as they were by the Greeks and Romans ; for none but brutiſh people, who are uncapable of civility, will treat an enemy in ſuch a manner, much leſs an enemy overcome by a ſhameful treachery. Take notice that Plutarch blames that Ruſtius, who brought the leud books of Ariſtides to the army. People are not now ſo rigid ; and if Boccacio's novels, or La Fontaine's tales were found in the baggage of an officer, no notice would be taken of it. I do not think the moſt biting and the moſt burleſque news-writers would reflect upon him for it. Much leſs would they cenſure thoſe, who ſhould have a looking-glaſs among their things. But in Juvenal's time they were more ſevere in that reſpect : an Emperor was laughed at for having a looking-glaſs in the camp (24). It is true that glaſs did belong to a man who painted, and by reaſon of that circumſtance, it afforded a better occaſion for railleries and inſults. I am ſure the reader will excuſe me for mentioning this particular, ſince it concerns a Roman like Surena in that part of effeminacy, who nevertheleſs ſhowed a great courage (25) ; ſo that this is a new example to be added to thoſe, which I have mentioned (26). Juvenal does very much exclaim againſt Otho's inequality.

Nimirum ſummi ducis eſt occidere Galbam,
Et curare cutem ſummi conſtantia civis :
Bebriaci campo ſpolium affectare Palati,
Et preſſum in faciem digitis extendere panem.
Quod nec in Aſſyrio pharetrata Semiramis orbe,
Mœſta nec Actiaca fecit Cleopatra carina (27).

Galba to kill he thought a General's part,
But as a courtier us'd the niceſt art,
To keep his ſkin from tan : before the fight,
Would paint and ſet his ſoil'd complexion right :
A ſoftneſs which Semiramis ne'er knew,
When once ſhe had the field and foe in view,
Nor Egypt's Queen, when ſhe from Actium flew.

TATE.

The courage Otho expreſſed, when he killed himſelf, appeared the more admirable, becauſe he took care to paint and trick up himſelf like a woman. Read theſe words of Suetonius. ‘ Munditiarum vero pene muliebrium : vulſo corpore : galericulo capiti propter raritatem capillorum adaptato & annexo, ut nemo dignoſceret. Quin & faciem quotidie raſitare, ac pane madido linere conſuetum : idque inſtituiſſe à prima lanugine, ne barbatus umquam eſſet. Sacra etiam Iſidis ſæpe in lintea religioſaque veſte propalam celebraſſe. Per quæ factum putem ut mors ejus minime congruens vitæ, majori miraculo fuerit (28). - - - He imitated a female nicety in his dreſs. His body was plucked quite ſmooth ; and, on account of his baldneſs, he had a perriwig, ſo well fitted to his head, and clapt on in ſuch a manner, as not to be diſtinguiſhed from his own hair. He ſhaved his face very cloſe every day, and then laid moiſt bread upon it. This he began to do, as ſoon as he had any down upon his cheeks, to prevent his ever having a beard. He was frequently wont to celebrate the holy rites of Iſis in public, having on a religious garment made of linnen. For theſe reaſons it came to paſs, in my opinion, that his death being not at all ſuitable to his life, was reckoned ſo much the more ſtrange and wonderful.’

(21) The Duke of Alba repreſented it. See Melvil, ubi infra.

(22) Melvil, Memoirs, p. 40.

(23) Plut. in Craſſo. p. 564.

(24) See, above, citation (41), of the article APULEIUS.

(25) See his Life in Suetonius, and Tacitus, Hiſt. lib. ii.

(26) In the foregoing remark.

(27) Juven. Sat. II, ver. 104.

(28) Sueton. in Othone, cap. ult. pag. m. 642.

SURGIER (Francis) a Friar in the monaſtery of Sainte Croix at Paris, was puniſhed in the year 1595, for having preached in a ſeditious manner. He had ſtuffed one of his ſermons with invectives, calling Queen Elizabeth frequently by the name of Jezabel, and upbraided with the name of Sectaries the Allies of that Queen [A]. The parliament of Paris, having cauſed him to be put in priſon, condemned him to retract upon upon his knees and bare-headed theſe raſh and inconſiderate words, and to aſk pardon of God, of the king, and of juſtice. They forbade him to preach till ſuch time as the court had ordered otherwiſe, and prohibited him upon pain of death to ſpread about diſcourſes that were injurious to the princes in alliance with his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, or to ſay any thing that tended to ſedition. This was done privately in the court of criminal cauſes, and they ſhewed ſuch indulgence to him, out of regard to his profeſſion, and to the memory of his father, who had taught the inſtitutes at Paris, and whoſe ſcholars ſeveral members of that court had been (a).

[A] He upbraided with the name of Sectaries the Allies of Queen Elizabeth.] It is impoſſible to deſcribe ſufficiently the ravings of the Roman Catholic biggots, who took upon them to decry Henry IV and his ſucceſſor, for protecting the Proteſtants in Holland and Germany againſt the houſe of Auſtria. The books that were publiſhed againſt the alliance of France with the Proteſtant-States are without number, and it is certain there was a great deal of oddneſs in the conduct of that crown ; for while it laboured to extirpate the Huguenots in its own dominions, it ſupported the Proteſtants elſewhere, and enabled them not only to keep their own ground, but likewiſe to aggrandize themſelves. I have, in another place (1), taken notice of this contradiction, and I ſhall now confirm what I ſaid there by a remarkable paſſage. I find it at the end of an obſervation concerning the letters which Pope Pius V writ into France, to condemn the treaties of

(1) See the remarks [P] and [R], of the artilce FRANCIS I.

(a) Taken from Thuanus, book cxiv, pag. m. 702, ad ann. 1595.

of peace between the Roman Catholics and Heretics. ‘ Sed præcipue tangunt Gallorum fœdera cum Exteris ‘ Patrocinium Genev. Unde Auctor lib. Geſta Imperiorum (2) per Francos, p. 8. adeo excandeſcit, & ‘ ſe comprehendere poſſe negat, quomodo cum Chriſtianiſſimi apellatione conveniat Genevæ protectio & Patrocinium ſuſceptum jam ab a. milleſimo quingenteſimo ‘ ſeptuageſimo nono, & ſemper continuatum ad hæc uſque ‘ tempora. Quod monſtrum, quod portentum, quæ Chimæra? Quæ conventio lucis ad tenebras? quæ communicatio Chriſti cum Belial; quid arcæ Dei cum ‘ Dagon, quid Sioni cum Babilone? quid ſanctitati cum ‘ impietate, quid Chriſto cum Beelzebub, quid Chriſtianiſſimis cum Geneva? Tum Fœdus Gallorum Belgicum, de quo Idem pag. 10. Putabam fingi vix ‘ quidquam poſſe Chriſtianiſſimi nomine indignius, nec ‘ quidquam Chriſtianiſmo exitialius, quam Genevæ tutelam & patrocinium, uti ſupra oſtenſum eſt: veruntamen poſtea conſideranti Fœdus Hollandicum, quod jam ‘ pridem Gallia ſtudioſiſſime excoluit, tanto illud pernicioſius eſſe religioni viſum eſt, quanto plures in Statibus ‘ illis Hollandicis ineſſe Genevas cernit ſentitque incredibili ſuo malo Eccleſia. De fœdere Gallo-Suevico, ‘ pag. 16. Ab Aquilone pandetur omne malum. ‘ Reviviſcunt in uno Gothorum & Wandalorum Rege ‘ (quem nunc Sueciæ vocant) Alarici & Genſerici, ‘ qui rurſus Imperium & Eccleſiam Dei miſerrimè diripiunt, deformant, lacerant; non illi quidem à ‘ Ruffino & Eudoxia exciti, qui ambo poſtea hujus ‘ evocationis pœnas ultori Numini juſtiſſimas dederunt; ſed (quis credat?) à Gallia Chriſtianiſſima ‘ animati facto fœdere cum mortalium furioſiſſimo, ‘ conſilio, pecunia, armis adjuti (3). - - - - But the ‘ leagues which the French have entered into with ‘ foreign Princes chiefly relate to the protection of Geneva. ‘ Upon which the author of a book called Geſta Imperiorum per Francos falls into a violent paſſion, and ‘ ſays that he cannot underſtand, how the protection of ‘ Geneva, undertaken from the year 1579, and continued down without interruption to the preſent ‘ times, is conſiſtent with the title of Moſt Chriſtian. ‘ What a monſtruous thing, what an abſurdity, and ‘ what a chimera is this? For what agreement can ‘ there be between light and darkneſs? What communication can Christ have with Belial; the ‘ ark of God with Dagon, or Sion with Babylon? ‘ What has holineſs to do with impiety, Christ ‘ with Beelzebub, or the moſt Chriſtian Kings with ‘ Geneva? Next as to the league between the French ‘ and Dutch the ſame author ſays. I imagined that ‘ nothing could be conceived more unworthy of the ‘ title Moſt Chriſtian, nor any thing more fatal to ‘ Chriſtianity, than the protection of Geneva, as I ‘ have ſhewed above: but afterwards when I conſidered the league with the Dutch, which France has ‘ long cultivated with the utmoſt care, I took that ‘ to be ſo much the more deſtructive to religion, ‘ as the Church, to her incredible ſorrow, ſees many ‘ Geneva's ariſe out of the States of Holland. Concerning the league between the French and Swedes, he ‘ adds. All manner of evils ſhall come from the North. ‘ For in one King of the Goths and Vandals (now called ‘ King of Sweden) the Alarics and Genſerics revive, ‘ and a ſecond time miſerably waſte, disfigure, and tear ‘ to pieces the Kingdom and Church of GOD. Nor are ‘ theſe ſtirred up by Ruffinus and Eudoxias, who both ‘ ſuffered the puniſhment of their crime by the juſt vengeance of the Deity: but (who would believe it?) ‘ they are ſet on by the moſt Chriſtian country of France, ‘ and aſſiſted with advice, arms, and money, a league ‘ being ſtruck up with the moſt furious man alive.’

(2) I believe that there is an error of the preſs here, and that we ought to read Impiorum, inſtead of Imperiorum.

(3) Hoornbeeck, Diſput. ad Bullam Innocentii X, pag. 265.

SUSSANNEAU (a) (Hubert) was born at Soiſſons in the year 1514 [A]. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his Latin verſes, and publiſhed ſome Grammatical tracts (b), that met with a good reception. He taught Philological learning at Turin, before he had a beard (c). He taught it alſo at Paris. He ſtiles himſelf Doctor of Law and Phyſic.

(a) See citation (94) of the article ERASMUS.

(b) See the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, pag. 362.

(c) See the remark.

[A] Was born at Soiſſons in the year 1514.] La Croix du Maine, who ſays he was born there (1), was better informed of the place than of the time of his birth. He pretends that he flouriſhed in the year 1520; which is not true; for Suſſanneau ſays he was only twenty-four years of age, in a book publiſhed by him in 1538. He ſpeaks thus in his Poem upon the ſiege of Perone (2).

Taurinum nuper ſtudiis ignobilis oci
Juriſque & legum florebat: ubi impiger artes
Ingenuas docui, Muſarum gratus alumnis,
Tum cùm nulla genas veſtiret barba decoras:
Quæ nunc in flavo pulchrè ſedet hiſpida mento,
Ad quintum quanquàm luſtrum, mihi deficit annus *.

It appears from thoſe verſes that he taught the Belles Lettres at Turin. He was ſent thither when the French had made themſelves maſters of Piedmont in the year 1536. He made no long ſtay in that country: it appears from the collection of the Latin Poems, which he publiſhed in 1538, that he had already begun again his public lectures upon the Æneid at Paris. This advertiſement is to be found in the twenty-ſecond leaf.

Fixit ab Italia Luteciam reverſus.

Venit ab Italia Gallorum redditus oris
  Hubertus, ſacri maxima cura chori.
Qui cras doctiloqui repetet compendia vatis,
  Unde tibi Ænean Æneadaſque canit.

Hubertus who is dear to the Muſes is returned from Italy to France, and to-morrow reſumes his lectures on the Eneid.

He obſerves, that in order to make himſelf more capable of explaining Virgil, he had been at Rome to examine the antient monuments of that place, and had ſucked in the air of Mantua (3).

(1) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franç. p. 171.

(2) Hubert Suſſannæus, in Ludorum Libris, fol. 81, Edit. Pariſ. 1538.

* Suſſ. annos 24 natus, cum hæc ſcriberet.

(3) Mox diverſitum laute ſacra Mantua cepit, Plenaque Virgilii mens nova menta fuit. Suſſan. Ludor. lib. ii, fol. 22.

SUTCLIFFE (a) (Matthew) an Engliſhman, and a Proteſtant Divine, flouriſhed towards the latter end of the XVIth century, and beginning of the XVIIth. He publiſhed ſeveral controverſial books, ſome in Latin, and others in Engliſh, and made it his chief buſineſs to confute Cardinal Bellarmin. He alſo wrote ſomething againſt againſt the Preſbyterians. He did not put his name to a book which treats of the conformity of Popery and the Turkiſh Religion [A].

(a) In Latin Sutclivius.

[A] A book, which treats of the conformity of Popery and the Turkiſh religion.] He publiſhed it at London in the year 1604. It is the confutation of a book printed at Antwerp in the year 1596 (1), and at Cologne in 1603, with this title, Calvino-Turciſmus, id eſt, Calviniſticæ perfidiæ cum Mahumetana collatio, & dilucida utriuſque ſectæ confutatio. There is hardly any book more violent than this Calvino-Turciſmus: it was the work of two Engliſh Catholics, who left their country: one of them was William Raynolds or Reginaldus, and the other William Gifford. The firſt died while he was compoſing it; the ſecond put the laſt hand to it, and publiſhed it (2). The latter was a Prieſt, who had ſeveral times encouraged ſome aſſaſſins to kill Queen Elizabeth (3), and who was well beloved by the Flemiſh women (4). He had fled to Liſle. William Raynolds had been formerly a miniſter (5), and expreſſed a great zeal for the Proteſtant religion. Afterwards he turned Papiſt. He was brother to John Raynolds (6), Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford, who wrote excellent books againſt the Roman Catholics. I have mentioned in another (7) place what is reported of theſe two brothers, viz. that they were brought up out of their country, John in the Church of Rome, William in the Proteſtant religion, and that meeting together one day, they diſputed with ſo great force, that both of them changed their religion. I very much doubt this (8). William was Profeſſor of Divinity in the Engliſh college of Rheims, He is ſaid to be the author of a very ſeditious book, dedicated to the Duke of Mayenne, and written according to the moſt furious maxims of the league, and in a moſt violent rage againſt Henry III, and the King of Navarre. My edition is that of Antwerp, apud Joannem Keerbergium 1592, in 8vo. Here is the title of that book. De juſta Reipub. Chriſtianæ in Reges impio, & Hæreticos Authoritate; juſtiſſimaque Catholicorum ad Henricum Navarræum, & quemcunque hæreticum à regno Galliæ repellendum confœderatione. G. Guilelmo Roſſæo Authore. Sutcliffe affirms (9) that William Raynolds wrote that book. Moreri (10) ſays ſo too, and quotes Pitſeus, nay he adds that it is one of the beſt (11) performances of this writer. But others aſcribe it either to William Gifford, or to John Boucher, or to a Jeſuit, or to Genebrard (12). The ſureſt way is to aſcribe it to the author of the Calvino-Turciſmus. Boucher's book has another title, as you may ſee above in the remark [B] of the article BOUCHER.

The title of Sutcliffe's anſwer runs thus. ‘De Turco-Papiſmo, hoc eſt, de Turcarum & Papiſtarum adverſus Chriſti Eccleſiam & fidem conjuratione, eorumque in Religione & moribus conſenſione & ſimilitudine; liber unus. Eidem præterea adjuncti ſunt, de Turco-papiſtarum maledictis & calumniis, adverſus Gulielmi Giffordi famoſi Pontificum Rom. & Jeſuitarum ſupparaſitaſtri volumen illud contumelioſiſſimum, quod ille Calvino-Turciſmum inſcripſit, libri quatuor. In quibus non tantum hujus hominis leviſſimi, ſed etiam aliorum importuniſſimorum ſcurrarum adverſus Orthodoxam Chriſti Eccleſiam continenter latrantium, malitia & petulantia reprimitur, hominumque piorum fama ab eorum calumniis vindicatur. - - - Of the Mahometan Popery, or a treatiſe of the Conſpiracy of the Turks and Papiſts againſt the Church and Faith of CHRIST, of their agreement and reſemblance in religion and morals. To which are added four books concerning the ſlanders and calumnies of the Mahometan Papiſts, in anſwer to that moſt defamatory libel, intitled, Mahometan Calviniſme, written by William Gifford, a notorious and vile flatterer of the Popes and Jeſuits. In which books are detected the malice and inſolence not only of this worthleſs man, but likewiſe of other buſy ſlanderers, continually railing againſt the orthodox Church of CHRIST, and the reputation of pious men is vindicated from their calumnies.’

(1) Sutclivius knew not that edition.

(2) See the preface to the Calvino-Turciſmus.

(3) Sutcliffe, ubi infra.

(4) Sacrificus, ut aiunt, comptus & calamiſtratus, & apud mulieres Belgicas gratioſus. Sutlivius, in Præf. Turco-Papiſmi.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Rivetus, in Jeſuita vapulante, cap. xi, num. 14, pag. 531, Tom. iii, Operum.

(7) In the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for July 1685, Art. vi, pag. 769.

(8) This ſeems to me inconſiſtent with a letter of John Raynolds to his brother, which is to be found in Whitaker's anſwer to a book of William Raynolds.

(9) Sutcliffe, in Præf. Turco-Papiſmi.

(10) Upon the word Reginaldus.

(11) The word beſt has been left out in the Dutch editions.

(12) See Placcius, de Pſeudonym. pag. 249, 250, and the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for June 1684, Art. iii, and Deckherr de Script. Adeſpotis, pag. 337, 389. Edit. 1686.

T.

TABOR (JOHN OTTO) a famous German Civilian, was born at Bautzen (a) the capital of the Upper Luſatia, the third of December 1604. He went through his ſtudies in Philoſophy and Civil-Law at Leipſic; and before he was twenty years of age rendred himſelf capable of explaining to his comrades the Paratitles of Weſenbecius. He went from the univerſity of Leipſic to that of Straſburgh, and afterwards made a journey to France at the time of the taking of Rochelle. He was ſcarce returned home, when he undertook to travel into Italy, with two young gentlemen, as their governour; but there aroſe ſome obſtacles to this journey. He was admitted Doctor of Law at Straſburgh November the 10th 1631. The wars of Germany deprived him of part of his patrimony, and reduced his birth-place to aſhes, in the year 1634. Where he then diſcharged the office of advocate and ſyndic of the city. He was invited a few days after this diſaſter to ſucceed Joachim Clutenius, who had left vacant a profeſſor of Law's chair at Straſburgh. He accepted of that profeſſorſhip, and was ſoon after honoured with the chief poſt in the faculty of the Law. He continued in that city till the year 1656, though he had the offer of a great many very honourable employments from divers places; but about the end of this year he found himſelf more diſpoſed to remove. The reſtoration of the peace, the regret of having loſt a wife, with whom he had lived twenty-two years, the diſtaſte he took againſt the place where ſhe died, and ſome other diſcontents, to which perſons of great merit are uſually expoſed (b), brought our Tabor to the country of Mecklemburgh, to be chancellor to the Duke. He ſoon quitted this poſt, to devote himſelf intirely to his books; but before he could regain the repoſe of he ſtudy, he was obliged to go to the court of Saxony, and to that of the Emperor, about ſome affairs of that duke. He retired to Gieſſen in 1659, and was there chancellor of the univerſity, and counſellor to the Landgrave of Heſſe-Darmſtad (c). Several reaſons obliged him to remove again, which he did in 1667, in order to retire to Francfort, where his ſon was advocate. He was not exempt from troubles there any more than in other places. He died the twelfth of December 1674. He publiſhed at different times ſeveral books on law ſubjects, which had ſold very well: this was the reaſon that the copies were grown very ſcarce; and therefore a profeſſor of Leipſic, named Mylius, made a collection of them as exactly as he could, which he publiſhed in two volumes in folio (d) in the year 1688. Mr Praſchius, an antient Burgomaſter at Ratiſbon, and ſon-in-law to Tabor, printed in 1675, a little piece containing an account of the life of his father-in-law (e) [A].

(a) In Latin Budiſſina.

(b) Reſtituta pax, erepta conjux, & hinc innatum loci tædium, tum cauſſæ aliæ quæ inſectari ſolent magnas virtutes. Mauſol. Jo. Otton. Taboris.

(c) They give him theſe qualities in the title of the new edition of his works.

(d) Lipſiæ, apud Joh. Frider. Gleditſchium.

(e) It is intituled Mauſoleum Jo. Ottonis Taboris, J. C.

[A] Mr Praſchius ... printed ... an account of the life of his father-in-law.] In ſome reſpects there is no fault to be found with it for want of particulars; but in thoſe things, concerning which the public might have moſt curioſity, the author has confined himſelf to general notions, and contents himſelf with telling us, ‘Si tantas virtutes aliquo vitiorum confini olæſit, ſi in ‘vita nonnunquam vel doctrina offendit, aut juſtam ‘cauſam paulo acrius defendit, exemplo docuit illuſtri ‘nihil in humanis rebus perfectum, aut ſuperbiæ con‘ceſſum eſſe, quo maneat SOLI DEO GLORIA. - - - ‘If he tarniſhed ſuch great virtues with a tincture of ‘vice, if he ſometimes offended in his life or doctrine, or ‘vindicated a juſt cauſe a little too warmly, he has ‘proved, by an eminent example, that in human af‘fairs there is no ſuch thing as perfection, or room for ‘pride, but a reſervation of all GLORY TO GOD ‘ALONE.’ This is the concluſion of Mr Praſchius's account, from which I have taken this article.

TABOUÉ, or TABOUET (JULIAN) in Latin Tabœtius, would have deſerved a place among the learned of the XVIth century, if he had not ſullied by his ill actions all the merit of his eloquence, learning, and wit. He was born at Chantenai four leagues from Mans (a). . . . . [A].

(a) La Croix du Maine, pag. 278.

[A] . . . . . .] Note, that this affair of Taboüé is not to be met with in all the editions of John Papon's Arrêts. I could not find it in the Latin edition, publiſhed at Geneva, Sumptibus Samuelis Criſpini, in 1624, in folio, and in book XXIV, title I, page 734, you have theſe words; Hanc ad rem notatu dignum eſt Arreſtum Tabouei, ſuprà, tit. de author. rer. judic. &c. which ſhews that they who ſuppreſſed the Arrêt againſt Taboüé, forgot to expunge the paſſage in book XXIV, where reference is made to this Arrêt. Such overſights as theſe too frequently happen to thoſe who undertake the correction of a work. They ſtrike out certain things in one place, and leave elſewhere a quotation of the very ſame things. . . . . See, concerning Taboüé, the hiſtory of the Biſhops of Mans, by Antony le Courvaiſier, pag. 854, and correct his omiſſions; that of Thuanus, lib. XVII. pag. 357 (it is pag. 952 of du Rier's tranſlation); Papon eſpecially; and Menage's hiſtory Sablé.

TABOUROT (Stephen) See Accords.

TACFARINAS, General of the army in Africa againſt the Romans in the time of Tiberius, was by nation a Numidian (a). He ſerved at firſt amongſt the auxiliary troops of the Romans, and having deſerted, got together a band of vagabonds and robbers, and betook himſelf to making incurſions, and to plundering. Afterwards he diſciplined this band of highwaymen, and divided them into companies, according to the art of war. At length he became General of the Muzulans, a potent nation near the deſerts of Africa, and confederate with the Moors of the neighbourhood. Theſe were commanded by Mazippa, and formed a flying camp, carrying fire and ſword, and terror on all ſides; whilſt Tacfarinas, with the choiceſt of the troops, encamped after the manner of the Romans, and accuſtomed them to military diſcipline. The Cinithians, another conſiderable nation, entered in the ſame intereſts. Furius Camillus, Proconſul of Africa, informed of theſe motions, marched againſt the enemy, and put them to flight. This procured him the honour of a triumph (b). This happened in the year of Rome 770 (c). Tacfarinas renewed his robberies ſome time after, and laid ſiege to a caſtle where Decrius was commander, and defeated the garriſon which went out to engage him in the open field. Decrius performed the part of a very brave and experienced warriour: the wounds he received, by one of which he loſt an eye, did not hinder him from making head againſt the enemy till he was ſlain: his ſoldiers had betaken themſelves to flight. The Proconſul Apronius puniſhed them for their cowardice very ſeverely, for he put every tenth man to death. This had ſuch an effect, that five hundred ſoldiers, having charged the ſame troops of Tacfarinas, who were beſieging a place, routed them. After this Tacfarinas reſolved not to ſtand an engagement with the Romans; he detached his men into different places; and when he was purſued he betook himſelf to flight, and when the Romans retired, he charged them in the rear. But, having ſtopped in a camp, he was there beaten, and forced to fly into the deſarts (d). This was for no long time, for he quickly after appeared again in the field; and this news being brought to Rome, they ſent into Africa againſt him Junius Blæſus, uncle to Sejanus (e). This new Proconſul acquitted himſelf very well in his office (f) [A]; and yet Tacfarinas repaired his loſſes ſo well, that he had the boldneſs to ſend deputies to Tiberius to demand that he would aſſign him a country; otherwiſe he threatned him with a perpetual war. The Emperor was ſo provoked at this inſolence, that he gave order to Junius Blæſus to take Tacfarinas

[A] Junius Blæſus, uncle to Sejanus. This new Proconſul acquitted himſelf very well in his office.] The emperor acquainting the ſenate with Tacfarinas's new irruptions, exhorted them to make choice of a new Proconſul, very well ſkilled in war, and capable to undergo the fatigues of it (1). The ſenators referring this choice to the Emperor's care (2). This prince (3) gave them an oblique reprimand, for throwing all difficult affairs upon him, and named to them two perſons, Manius Lepidus, and Junius Blæſus, that they might chooſe one of them to ſend into Africa. Lepidus deſired that he might be excuſed from undertaking that employ; Junius ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe; but it was eaſy to perceive the difference of their language, and that Lepidus ſpoke his mind, but Blæſus did not. The reaſons which Lepidus alledged were very well underſtood, as well as that which he did not alledge, and which was the chief, namely the ſuperiority of Junius Blæſus, who was uncle to the favourite. Prudence required him not to be his competitor in this affair; and that it was better for him not to commit himſelf to the deciſion of the ſuffrages: ſo the proconſulſhip was confirmed to Blæſus, as if he had been the only perſon the emperor had named. I ſay nothing but what reſults from the words of Tacitus. 'Tum audita amborum verba, intentius excuſante ſe Lepido, cum valitudinem corporis, ætatem liberum, nubilem filiam obtenderet: intelligereturque etiam quod ſilebat, avunculum eſſe Sejani Blæſum, atque eo prævalidum. Reſpondit Blæſus ſpecie recuſantis, ſed neque eadem adſeveratione; & conſenſu adulantium auditus eſt (4). - - - - Then they were both heard, Lepidus with great earneſtneſs excuſing himſelf, under pretence of his infirm ſtate of health, the age of his children, and a daughter juſt marriageable: what he thought proper not to mention was alſo underſtood, that Blæſus was the uncle of Sejanus, and therefore too powerful for him. Blæſus alſo made ſome ſort of excuſe, but not with that earneſtneſs; and was favoured by all the court flatterers.' This uncle of the favourite is an example which proves, that the relations of a prime miniſter are ſometimes very worthy of thoſe offices, which are conferred upon them purely on account of their relation. He took the beſt way that could be thought of to ſubdue Tacfarinas (5), and we read in Tacitus, that the triumphal honours, which were granted him, were truly deſerved by him; tho' Tiberius declared, that he granted them in conſideration of Sejanus. Neque multo poſt Cæſar cum Junium Blæſum Proconſulem Africæ triumphi inſignibus attolleret, dare id ſe dixit honori Sejani, cujus ille avunculus erat. Ac tamen res Blæſi dignæ decore tali fuere (6). Note, that this emperor commanded the legions to honour Junius Blæſus with the title of Imperator. This title, conferred by the acclamations of the ſoldiers, was very glorious. This had been a cuſtom in the wars of the Romans, in the time of the Republic; but it grew almoſt out of uſe under Auguſtus, and was entirely aboliſhed under Tiberius; for Junius Blæſus was the laſt that was honoured with this ſalutation. This whole matter deſerves to be related in Tacitus's own words. 'Tiberius pro confecto (Bello) interpretatus, id quoque Blæſo tribuit, ut Imperator à legionibus ſalutaretur: priſco erga duces honore, qui bene geſta Republica gaudio & impetu victoris exercitus conclamabatur: erantque plures ſimul Imperatores, nec ſuper ceterorum æqualitatem. Conceſſit quibuſdam & Auguſtus id vocabulum; ac tunc Tiberius Blæſo poſtremum (7). - - - Tiberius looking upon the war to be concluded, granted alſo to Blæſus that he ſhould be ſaluted Imperator by the legions: an antient honour paid to the General for his ſervices to the Common-wealth, by the acclamations of a rejoicing and victorious army: and there were ſeveral who enjoyed this title at the ſame time, nor yet did this make any difference in their rank. Auguſtus had granted this title to ſome; and Tiberius had now beſtowed it, for the laſt time, on Blæſus.' The firſt words of this paſſage inform us, that Tiberius thought the war with Tacfarinas to be ended, altho' Blæſus returned into Italy before he had cruſhed all the ſeeds which might revive it again (8). Tiberius, thinking the buſineſs was over, recalled the ninth legion out of Africa. Tacfarinas gave out, that they were drawn off out of neceſſity to a diſtant place, becauſe ſome other nations were invading the Roman empire; and that therefore, it would be an eaſy matter to hem in thoſe Roman troops that were left, provided that all thoſe, who preferred their liberty before ſervitude, would readily re-unite their forces. He was joined and aſſiſted by a great many people, and gave a

---

(a) Tacit. Annal. lib. ii, cap. lii.

(b) Taken from Tacitus, ibid.

(c) It was the 17th of the Chriſtian Æra.

(d) Ex eod. ibid. lib. iii, cap. xx, xxi.

(e) Id. ibid. cap. xxxii, xxxv.

(f) Id. ibid. cap. lxxiii.

(1) Judicio patrum deligendum Proconſulem, gnarum militiæ, corpore validum, & bello ſuffecturum. Tacit. Ann. lib. iii, cap. xxxii.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Id. ibid. cap. xxxv.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) See Tacitus, ibid. cap. lxxiv.

(6) Tacit. ibid. cap. lxxii, lxxiii.

(7) Id. ibid. cap. lxxiv.

(8) Fratre ejus (Tacfarinatis) capto regreſſus eſt, properantius tamen quam ex utilitate ſociorum, relictis per quos reſurgeret bellum. Id. ibid.

Tacfarinas whatever it coſt. This war was not ended till the year of Rome 777, and it was the Proconſul Dolabella, who finiſhed it. The army of Tacfarinas was defeated; they endeavoured to take the General, but he choſe rather to loſe his life in a courageous defence than to fall alive into the hands of the Proconſul (g). The faults of the ſupplement to Moreri ſhall be obſerved below [B].

great deal of trouble to the new Pro-conſul, Dolabella, who, at length, totally vanquiſhed this enemy (9). He demanded the honour of a triumph, but could not obtain it; for Tiberius, out of complaiſance to Sejanus, refuſed to conſent to what might eclipſe the glory of Junius Blæſus. This refuſal added more to the glory of Dolabella, than to that of the uncle to the favourite. Tacitus took care not to ſuppreſs this remark. ‘ Dolabellæ petenti abnuit triumphalia Tiberius Sejano tribuens, ne Blæſi avunculi ejus laus obſoleſceret. Sed neque Blæſus ideo inluſtrior, & huic negatus honor gloriam intendit. Quippe minore exercitu, inſignis captivos, cædem ducis, bellique confecti famam deportarat (10). - - - Tiberius refuſed to Dolabella the triumphal honours, which he did in complement to Sejanus, that the honours paid to his uncle Blæſus might not be impaired. But neither was Blæſus on that account the more glorious; his rival being rather ſet above him by this very refuſal. For with a ſmaller army, he had come off with the reputation of having taken many illuſtrious priſoners, killed the General, and finiſhed the war.’ It was a great injuſtice, to refuſe to Dolabella, who had concluded this war, what had been allowed to the half-conquerors of Tacfarinas (11).

[B] The faults of the Supplement to Moreri.] He was in the wrong to ſay, I. That Tacfarinas was a ſlave. II. That he retired into Africa. III. That out of the robbers aſſembled by him, he formed a powerful army of Saracens (12). IV. That he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed King. V. That he beat the Roman army, commanded by Decius, Pro-conſul of Africa. VI. That he wounded him in the eye. VII. That he was afterwards vanquiſhed by Camillus. VIII. And that Tacitus relates all this in his ſecond book. Here are eight capital errors, too many certainly for an article of ten lines, and which beſides is ſo defective. Tacitus ſays nothing which can induce us to believe, that Tacfarinas was a ſlave, or that he had ſerved out of Africa in the Roman army. It was in Africa that he bore arms for them, in all appearance; and by conſequence he did not retire into Africa after he had deſerted. As for this army of Saracens, I believe I am not miſtaken in my conjectures, if, I ſay, that the word Muzulani, which Tacitus makes uſe of, made the continuator of Moreri think that Tacitus meant the Muſulmans; and becauſe the followers of Mahomet go by that name, and have alſo been known by that of Saracens, he fancied it was indifferent to ſay an army of Saracens, or an army of Muſulmans. Tacitus does not ſpeak of a Pro-conſul named Decius, but of one Decrius, who commanded in a caſtle; the gariſon of which conſiſted of a cohort (13), which is here converted into an army of Romans, commanded by the Pro-conſul Decius. Now, ſince Decrius was killed, Moreri's continuator ſhould not have been contented to ſay, that Tacfarinas wounded him in the eye. Camillus's victory preceded this defeat of Decrius. He ſhould have cited the ſecond, third, and fourth books of Tacitus's Annals; for theſe words, Tacitus, lib. 2. refer you as readily to the ſecond book of his Hiſtory, as to the ſecond book of his Annals: and after all, whatever ſecond book you take, you will not find there all the things which you are told of Tacfarinas.

TACHUS, King of Egypt, in the time of Artaxerxes Ochus (a). The government of the Perſians was ſo odious to the Egyptians, that it was no hard matter for Tachus to cauſe an inſurrection; but he ſtood in need of the ſuccours of Greece, to maintain him in the dignity with which he was inveſted. He was not ignorant of the valour and experience of Ageſilaus, King of the Lacedemonians; and therefore took him into his ſervice. Ageſilaus, though above eighty years of age, did not refuſe it. He raiſed troops with the money which he received from Tachus, and led them into Egypt, without conſidering that he might be blamed for accepting an employ ſo inferiour to his rank and reputation. He was ſoon diſguſted at Tachus, who, inſtead of giving him the command of his whole army, left him only the command of the foreigners, giving the dignity of Admiral to Chabrias the Athenian, and retaining to himſelf the character of Generaliſſimo. Ageſilaus waited a favourable opportunity to ſhow his reſentment, which ſoon offered itſelf, and he as readily embraced it. Nectanabus, a relation of Tachus, commanded part of the army; he drew them off from their obedience to Tachus, and procured himſelf to be choſen king by the Egyptians. This made him ſend ambaſſadors to King Ageſilaus, to deſire him to joyn with him, and he failed not to make him magnificent promiſes. Tachus, on the other hand, did not forget any thing to retain him. Each of thoſe competitors ſent their deputies to Lacedæmon. Ageſilaus alſo ſent ſome thither, but much more to recommed the intereſt of Nectanabus, than that of Tachus. He received full power, to act as he ſhould think moſt expedient for the good of his own country, and he thought it more advantageous for the Lacedæmonians to abandon Tachus, than to ſupport him; and ſo he went into the ſervice of Nectanabus with the troops he commanded: which, as his hiſtorian has obſerved, deſerves to be called no better than treaſon, howſoever it may be ſcreened under the pretence of the public good. Tachus, being thus abandoned, fled where he could (b), and I do not believe that he is found any more in Hiſtory. Some (c) ſay he retired into Perſia. He muſt needs have been at a loſs for a ſafe place of refuge, if he fled to a prince, who could not but look upon him as a ring leader of rebels. Athenæus aſſigns a very different cauſe of Ageſilaus's reſentment from that which has been juſt given: but in this matter I ſhould much ſooner chuſe to truſt Plutarch than Athenæus [A].

[A] In this matter I ſhould much ſooner chuſe to truſt to Plutarch than Athenæus.] The latter attributes the whole to a jeſt: he would have it (1), that Tachus, bantering Ageſilaus, upon ſeeing his ſmall ſtature, ſaid to him, A mountain has been in travail, Jupiter has been in great fears about it, it has brought forth a mouſe: ὠδινεν ὄρος, ζεὺς δ' ἐφοβεῖτο, τὸ δ' ἔτεκεν μῦν. He adds, that Ageſilaus fell into a paſſion, and anſwered, You ſhall one day find that I am a lion. He was as good as his word; for an inſurrection happening againſt Tachus, he ſaw himſelf abandoned by Ageſilaus, and forced to fly into Perſia. I ſee no probability in this. Firſt, Plutarch, who gives a large account of the contempt which the Egyptians ſhewed Ageſilaus, upon obſerving his ſorry equipage and mien, and finding his indifferent taſte, by the choice he made of the preſents that were ſent him, doth not ſay, that Tachus uſed any ſuch jeſt. He does indeed ſay, that the great concourſe of people who went to the ſea-ſide to ſee this great captain, ſo much celebrated by fame, applied to him the fable of the mountain that brought forth a mouſe; but he doth not ſay, that Ageſilaus made any anſwer to it, and Tachus was not there. The ſharp ſaying, which Athenæus aſcribes to this king of Lacedæmon, would no doubt have found a place among the apophthegms, which Plutarch has left us of this prince, had it been founded upon good authority. Beſides, is it probable, that a man who had ſo much occaſion for the aſſiſtance of Ageſilaus, would be ſo imprudent as to exaſperate him by ſo ſevere a jeſt? I do not deny, but that Plutarch has obſerved, that Tachus's vanity made Ageſilaus uneaſy. Ἔπειτα τὴν ἄλλην ἀλαζονείαν καὶ κενοφροσύνην τοῦ Αἰγυπτίου βαρυνόμενος. Deinde reliqua Ægyptii inſolentia & vanitate fatigatus (2). But once more, this Hiſtorian would not have forgot in this place the ſtory of the mountain, and the quick repartee of Ageſilaus. I verily believe, that Athenæus's narrative ought to be reduced to this. It was told this king of the Lacedæmonians, that the Egyptians, after they had ſeen him ſo little, of whom they had formed ſo great an idea, had mentioned the mountain that brought forth a mouſe: he probably replied, they ſhall ſoon ſee, the mouſe they ſaw on the ſea-ſhore fight like a lion. He did not pretend to threaten Tachus, but to fill him with hopes. I have heard ſay, that ſome French Generals, being in Germany, and obſerving, that the Germans had no good opinion of ſome of their regiments, becauſe the ſoldiers were not tall, large, ſtout, and well-cloathed, encouraged them with theſe words; You ſhall ſee theſe little, lean, and meagre ſoldiers, fall on like lions, and make thoſe great giants truckle. However that be, one may learn by this account of Athenæus, true or falſe, a very important leſſon; which is, that princes ſhould never offend any body with railleries (3): it may ſometimes coſt them dear.

(g) Id. ibid. lib. iv, cap. xxiii, & ſeq.

(9) Ex eod. ibid. lib. iv, cap. xxiii, & ſeq.

(10) Id. ibid. cap. xxvi.

(11) Priores duces, ubi impetrando triumphalium inſigni ſufficere res ſuas crediderant, hoſtem omittebant. Jamque tres laureatæ in Urbe ſtatuæ, & adhuc raptabat Africam Tacfarinas. Id. ibid. cap. xxiii.

(12) This has been ſtruck out in the Dutch editions.

(13) Which was about 600 men.

(a) About the CIVth Olympiad.

(b) Taken from Plutarch, in Vita Ageſilai.

(c) Theopompus, & Lyceas Naucratites, apud Athenæum, lib. xiv, pag. 616.

(1) Athen. lib. xiv, pag. 616.

(2) Plutarch. in Vita Ageſilai, pag. 617.

(3) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for the month of March 1684, pag. 47.

TACITUS (CAIUS (a) CORNELIUS) a Roman Hiſtorian, who flouriſhed in the firſt century. We know nothing of his anceſtors, and probably the dignity of his family began in his own perſon. His firſt employ is ſaid to have been that of procurator to Veſpaſian in Gallia Belgica [A]. Being returned to Rome, he received from the Emperor Titus a more honourable poſt (b). He was Prætor under the empire of Domitian [B], and Conſul under Nerva [C]. But all theſe dignities gave him but very little glory, compared with that which he procured to himſelf by the performances of his pen. His Annals, and his Hiſtory [D] are ſomething admirable, and one of the greateſt efforts of the human mind; whether you conſider the ſingularity of the ſtyle, or attend to the beauty of the thoughts, and to that happy pencil, with which he knew how (a) Others give him the prænomen of Publius, and are blamed for it.

(b) See the remark [A].

[A] Of Procurator to Veſpaſian in Gallica Belgica.] You will find theſe words in the life of Tacitus, compoſed by Juſtus Lipſius. ‘Initium dignitatis illi ſub ‘Veſpaſiano fuit, à quo Plinio auctore, procurator da‘tus Galliæ Belgicæ rationes principis adminiſtra‘vit. --- The beginning of his promotion was under ‘Veſpaſian, by whom, as we have it from Pliny, being ‘made procurator in Gallia Belgica, he had the care of ‘that prince's revenues.’ I ſhall cite below (1) what Pliny ſays, and we ſhall there ſee, that he makes no mention of Veſpaſian. Why then is he cited as an author who informs us, that this emperor gave Tacitus that employ? Is it becauſe Tacitus exerciſed this office under the empire of Veſpaſian? But does this give a right to aſcribe to authors what they never ſaid? However it be, there is little doubt but that Tacitus enjoyed this employ under Veſpaſian; which is grounded upon this: ‘Dignitatem noſtram à Veſpaſiano inchoatam, à ‘Tito auctam, à Domitiano longius provectam non ‘abnuerim. (2) --- I do not deny but that my advance‘ment was begun by Veſpaſian, ſeconded by Titus, and ‘carried to a far greater height by Domitian.’ They are Tacitus's own words. We ſhall ſee below (3) whether this opinion be well founded or not.

[B] He was Prætor under the Emperor Domitian.] Vertranius places this prætorſhip under the ninth conſulſhip of this emperor (4), but he ſhould have placed it under the 14th; for it falls in with the time in which Domitian celebrated the ſecular games: Now it is certain, that he celebrated them when he was conſul for the 14th time (5), Let us cite Tacitus. ‘Is (Do‘mitianus) quoque edidit ludos ſæculares; iiſque inten‘tius affui ſacerdotio quindecimvirali præditus, ac tum ‘prætor. Quod non jactantia refero, ſed quia collegio ‘quindecimvirum antiquitus ea cura, & magiſtratus ‘potiſſimum exſequebantur officia cærimoniarum (6). ‘--- Domitian alſo ſolemnized the ſecular games; at ‘which I gave a conſtant attendance in regard to my of‘fice, being one of the college of prieſts, and at the ſame ‘time prætor. Which I do not mention out of vanity, ‘but becauſe antiently that college, and eſpecially that ma‘giſtracy had always the direction of the ceremonies.

[C] .... and Conſul under Nerva.] He was ſubſtituted in the place of Virginius Rufus, who died in his third conſulſhip, in the year of Rome 850 (7), and he honoured him with a funeral oration. ‘Laudatus ‘eſt à conſule Cornelio Tacito, nam hic ſupremus fæ‘licitati ejus cumulus acceſſit, laudator eloquentiſſi‘mus (8). --- His funeral oration was ſpoken by Corne‘lius Tacitus, his good fortune met with this finiſhing ‘ſtroke, a moſt eloquent Orator.

[D] His Annals and his Hiſtory.] He wrote the Hiſtory before the Annals; for he refers us to his Hiſtory in the eleventh book of the Annals; he refers us thither, I ſay, about ſome things concerning Domitian. ‘Utriuſque Principis rationes prætermitto, ‘ſatis narratas libris quibus res Imperatoris Domi‘tiani compoſui (9). --- I omit the purpoſes of both ‘thoſe Princes, having ſufficiently explained them in my ‘work concerning the Hiſtory of Domitian.’ Now it is certain (10) that his Hiſtory extended from the reign of Galba incluſively to the reign of Nerva excluſively. He deſigned a particular work for the reigns of Nerva and Trajan, and that was the buſineſs he reſerved for his old age: but I believe he never was able to put his deſign in execution. ‘Quod ſi vita ‘ſuppeditet, principatum Divi Nervæ, & Imperium ‘Trajani, uberiorem ſecurioremque materiam ſenectuti ‘ſepoſui: rara temporum felicitate, ubi ſentire quæ ‘velis, & quæ ſentias dicere licet (11). --- But if my ‘life will permit, I ſhall reſerve the reigns of Nerva ‘and Trajan, as a more copious and ſecure ſubject for ‘my old age; as we enjoy that rare felicity to think ‘what we pleaſe, and ſay what we think.’ Theſe words ſhew, that he began his Hiſtory, after the death of the Emperor Nerva, and during the life of Trajan: and therefore he gives the title of Divus to the firſt, which he does not give to the ſecond. We have now but five books of his Hiſtory left, which is but a very ſmall part of it; for they do not contain above a year and an half, when the whole work ought to contain about twenty-nine years. Thoſe who number theſe five books, as the continuation of the Annals divided into ſixteen books, are to blame; for the Annals ought to be conſidered as a ſeparate work. The author compoſed them after he had finiſhed his Hiſtory (12), they began at the death of Auguſtus, and were continued to that of Nero. We have but part of them left, namely, the four firſt books, ſome pages of the fifth, all the ſixth, from the eleventh to the fifteenth, and part of the ſixteenth: The two laſt years of Nero, and part of the foregoing year are wanting. Theſe were the laſt books of the work. The five firſt books were found in Germany, by a Receiver of Leo X. He carried them to that Pope, and received a gratification of 500 crowns. ‘Corbeiæ, quod ad Viſurgim Monaſterium eſt, à quæ‘ſtore Pontificio fuere inventi, qui eos ad Leonem X. ‘detulit, ac ἀντιδώρου loco quingentos accepit aureos ‘(13). --- At the abbey of Corwey, which is a mona‘ſtery on the Weſer, they were found by one of the Pope's ‘Receivers, who preſented them to Leo X, and received ‘from him a reward of 500 gold crowns.’ Philip Beroaldus had orders to publiſh them (14). I remember to have heard the late Mr Faure, Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris, ſay, that Leo X having publiſhed a brief, by which he promiſed not only indulgences to thoſe who ſhould diſcover Tacitus's manuſcripts, but alſo money, and honour (15); there was a German, who ſearched all the libraries, and at laſt found

(1) In the remark [K].

(2) Tacitus, Hiſtor. lib. i, cap. i.

(3) In the remark [K].

(4) Lipſius, in Vita Taciti, cenſures him for it.

(5) It was in the year 841, of Rome, according to Lipſius, or 840, according to Calviſius.

(6) Tacitus, Annal. lib. xi, cap. xi.

(7) 849 according to Calviſius.

(8) Plinius, Epiſt. I, lib. ii.

(9) Tacitus, Annal. lib. xi, cap. xi.

(10) See Tacitus, at the beginning of his Hiſtory.

(11) Tacitus, Hiſt. lib. i, cap. i.

(12) See the proofs which Lipſius gives of it in the preface to his Commentaries on Tacitus.

(13) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. i, cap. xxx, pag. 159.

(14) They were printed at Rome, an. 1515.

(15) That is, that their names ſhould be prefixed with an elogy to what they ſhould find out.

how to paint the diſguiſes and cheats of Politicians, and the weakneſs of the paſſions. Not but that he may be cenſured for the affectation of his language, and for his inquiring into the ſecret motives of actions [E], and conſtruing them to be criminal; but it is a great compliment to his underſtanding, to remark the eſteem which ſeveral princes have had for his works [F]. A modern author has paſſed this judgment on them: Tertullian charges him with telling us a great many falſhoods. He was not only an enemy to the true religion; but it appears from ſeveral paſſages that he had none at all. His ſtyle is certainly very obſcure; nay it is ſometimes harſh, and has not all the purity of good authors in the Latin tongue. Nevertheleſs, his art of comprizing a great deal of ſenſe in a few words; his vivacity found ſome books of the Annals in the monaſtery of Corwey. He went and preſented them to the Pope, who received them with great pleaſure, and aſked him what recompence he deſired. The German was content to be re-imburſed the charges he had been at in going to view thoſe libraries, and in his journey to Rome. Leo thought that was too little, and gave him more; and in order to procure him both honour and profit, he would have had him take the care of publiſhing this Tacitus. But the German excuſed himſelf, on acccount of his wanting the neceſſary abilities (16).

[E] Not but that he may be cenſured for the affectation of his language, and for his enquiring into the ſecret motives of actions.] Muretus has made three Orations (17) in anſwer to thoſe who have criticized Tacitus. Their criticiſms were too ſharp, and unjuſt in ſome reſpects: Therefore it was no hard matter for the apologiſt, who was a good Orator, and a ſubtile Rhetorician, to elude them. You may ſee in thoſe Orations what Tacitus is cenſured for. You will find the ſame thing alſo in Strada's Proluſiones (18). He is one of the moſt formidable enemies of Tacitus: he thereby diſpleaſed Paganinus Gaudentius (19), who not only criticized (20) many places of his Hiſtory of the Low-Countries; but alſo undertook to juſtify Tacitus. This Gaudentius was no very ſtout champion: he underſtood a little of many things, but nothing perfectly. ‘Magis literis tinctus quam imbutus .... nihil in ingenio ſolidum, cum per artes & diſciplinas peregrinaretur nulli penitus inſiſtens (21). - - - He was rather ſuperficially than deeply learned .... his judgment was not ſolid enough to dwell long upon any thing in the courſe of his ſtudies.’ In my opinion, Cardinal du Perron has too much deſpiſed Tacitus (22).

The book intituled, Anonymiana, or Miſcellanies of Poetry, Oratory, and Learning, which was printed at Paris in 1700, contains a diſcourſe which is not very much in favour of our Hiſtorian. This is the judgment the author paſſes upon his ſtyle (23): ‘Tacitus's Latin is very good, but too obſcure to expreſs what he would write. His difficult and contracted ſtyle might be eſteemed any where elſe but in a Hiſtory, where the whole ought to be clear and well eſtabliſhed; and where the diſtance of facts, their variety, their epochas, and their changes, continually controverted, render it obſcure enough in itſelf, without being made more ſo by the ſtyle....... (24) It is a miſtake to pretend, that Tacitus's way of writing is commendable: if ſome wines are eſteemed for a little bitterneſs, it is becauſe that is occaſioned by ſome good quality; but a harſh and rough way of writing will never gain reputation in a Hiſtory. It is ſo far from raiſing the mind to greater knowledge, as this learned man pretends (25), that it perplexes and diſcourages it. Will any one ſay, for example, that Cæſar would have excited more attention, if he had been more obſcure, and leſs natural? Does not he raiſe the mind to his own thoughts, which in reading his Hiſtory ought to be always the juſt bounds of ours? Whereas in an obſcure manner of writing, the mind of the reader roves where it pleaſes, when it is not tired, and forms imaginations which frequently have no exactneſs or proportion to the things. Cæſar, by his clearneſs, never gives occaſion to deſire more light in the actions he deſcribes.’ I could readily ſubſcribe to this judgment; and, in my opinion, what the author adds concerning the other affectation of Tacitus, is no leſs judicious (26). ‘(27) Tacitus was an able Politician, and a yet more judicious writer: he has drawn very juſt conſequences from the tranſactions of the reigns, of which he wrote the Hiſtory, and has formed maxims from them for the well governing of a ſtate. But if he has ſometimes aſſigned to the actions and commotions of the republic their true principles, if he has rightly unravelled their cauſes, it muſt be owned, that he has often ſupplied with too much nicety and penetration, thoſe actions which had none: ſo true is it, that men characterize themſelves in whatever they do, and that the writing of Hiſtory never is in the hands in which it ought to be, when thoſe who undertake it, being ignorant of the true cauſe of an action, aſſign to it that cauſe which they imagine to be the leaſt ſenſible, and moſt concealed from the eyes of the people. They often happen to repreſent that as a particular ſecret, in the breaſt of the Prince, which was a matter public to all the world: and this is a fault ſo familiar with Tacitus (28), that I dare venture to ſay, ſupported otherwiſe by a great many good reaſons, that it is paying him too great a compliment to take him for a very exact Hiſtorian, who has written according to rules...... (29) He has made choice of the niceſt actions, and the moſt ſuſceptible of the delicacies of art: thoſe reigns to which he has principally applied himſelf in his Hiſtory, are no ſmall proof of this. In that of Tiberius, which is without diſpute his maſter-piece, and in which he has beſt ſucceeded, he found a kind of government more adapted to the character of his genius. He loved, as I have ſaid, to unfold the intrigues of the cabinet, to aſſign their cauſes, to turn pretences into deſigns, and deceitful appearances into realities. A genius too ſubtile, who ſaw ſome myſtery in all the actions of this Prince. A ſincere deference of his deſigns to the judgment of the Senate, was ſometimes a ſnare laid for their integrity; ſometimes a nice way of becoming their maſter; and always the art of making them the accomplices of his deſigns, and of executing them without any reproach. When he puniſhed the ſeditious; it was an effect of his natural diffidence of the citizens, or ſome ſlight marks of anger ſpread among the people, to diſpoſe their minds for greater cruelties. Here the contrariety of humours of two Generals, is a ſecret method of croſſing the fortune of a competitor, and the means to leſſen him in the affection of the people. The honours conferred on thoſe that deſerved them, were genteel ways of removing a rival, or of deſtroying an enemy, and always fatal recompences. In a word, Policy has a hand in every thing, vice and virtue are there equally dangerous, and favours as fatal as diſgraces. Tiberius is never natural, he does not do the moſt ordinary actions of other men without deſign. His repoſe is never without conſequence, and his motions are always full of contrivances.’ The other things which I have read in this diſſertation of the author of the Anonymiana, are more liable, in my opinion, to be contradicted.

[F] The eſteem which many Princes have had for his works.] Pope Paul III, wore out his Tacitus by much reading of it. Coſmo de Medicis, the firſt Great Duke of Florence, accounted the reading of him his greateſt pleaſure. Muretus tells us this in finer words. ‘Paulus III P. M. quo nullum ſapientiorem ſenem noſtra vidit ætas, Tacitum ſæpè relegendo contriverat, neque ullum profanum ſcriptorem æquè libenter legebat. Coſmus Medices, qui primus Magnus Etruriæ Dux fuit, homo factus ad imperandum, qui eam, quæ vulgo fortuna dicitur, in conſilio & prudentiâ conſiſtere docuit, Taciti libros in deliciis habebat, eorumque lectione avidiſſimè fruebatur. Neque non hodie multi aut Principum, aut eorum, qui de ſummis rebus à Principibus in conſilium adhibentur, eundem ſtudioſiſſimè legunt, & quaſi pro magiſtro quodam prudentiæ habent (30). - - - - Pope Paul III, the moſt learned man of our age, wore out his

(16) Note, that Mr Faure ſaid, that he had read this Narrative in the preface to the firſt edition of theſe books of Tacitus. See an elogy on Mr Faure in the Journal des Sçavans, November 16, 1693, pag. 673, Dutch edition.

(17) The xvith, xviith, and xviiith, of the ſecond volume, in the Leipſic edition 1672.

(18) Lib. i, Proluſ. II.

(19) Profeſſor at Piſa. He was of the country of the Griſons, if I am not miſtaken.

(20) See his book, de Candore Politico, printed at Piſa, ann. 1646.

(21) Octav. Ferrarius, in Proluſione cui Titulus, Literatorum funus.

(22) See the Perroniana at the word Styles.

(23) Anonymiana, pag. 7.

(24) Ibid. p. 9.

(25) That is to ſay, La Mothe le Vayer.

(26) This is to be underſtood in general. See citation (28).

(27) Anonymiana, pag. 10.

(28) The author ſhould not therefore have ſaid, that he was thought a more judicious writer, than an able politician.

(29) Anonymiana, p. 16, & ſeq.

(30) Muret. Orat. XVI. Vol. ii, pag. 342, Edit. Lipſ. 1672. See Oration. Heinſii, pag. 5, and the preface of Arma Anſerina; and Paquier, Lettres, Tom. ii, pag. 442, & ſeq.

vivacity in painting out events; the ſagacity with which he penetrates through the darkneſs of the corrupt heart of men; the force and ſuperiority of genius, which appear throughout the whole, makes him looked upon at this day almoſt univerſally as the chief of Hiſtorians (c). There have been ſo many tranſlations of him, and ſo many comments upon him [G], that they alone might compoſe a tolerable library. I ſhall take notice of ſome faults in Juſtus Lipſius [H], la Mothe le Vayer, and Moreri [I]; and you will find in my remarks,

'his Tacitus by frequently reading him, nor did he meet with ſo much pleaſure in peruſing any other profane writer. Coſmo de Medicis, who was the firſt Great Duke of Tuſcany, and formed for governing, who taught that what is commonly called Fortune, conſiſts in council and prudence, held the works of Tacitus in high eſteem, and read them with the greateſt delight. And at this very day, there are ſeveral Princes, and privy-counſellors to Princes, who read him with great application, and regard him as a ſort of Oracle in Politics.' I ſhall ſubjoin to this Latin paſſage, one from Balzac. It is taken from a letter he wrote to d'Ablancourt, the 4th of June 1643. 'Tacitus being become your's, my ill opinion of him can ſubſiſt no longer. I cannot hate a man whom you love; and, to tell you the truth, I do believe, that he is become more agreeable, and leſs thorny, by paſſing through your hands. The beſt of all is, that you have not defiled yourſelf by meddling with dirty matters, and that among thoſe excrements of Policy, your Morality is preſerved in its purity. A Stoic Philoſopher of the laſt century, as you may call Juſtus Lipſius, had the ſame taſte for him that you have. A great General, as you may call, the Marquis of Spinola, has alſo tranſlated him into his mother tongue, though his tranſlation has not been publiſhed; and I inform you of this as a ſecret which I learned from one of his moſt intimate confidents (31).' Add to this a paſſage of Guy Patin: Cornelius Tacitus, who is a State-breviary, or the firſt or chief maſter of the Secrets of the Cabinet, and whom Mr de Balzac calls ſomewhere, the antient original of modern Policy, ſays, ſpeaking of Tiberius, &c (32). We muſt remember in this place the great zeal of Leo X: I have taken notice of it above (33).

Let us join Queen Chriſtina to the examples I have already given. Mr Chanut ſays, that ſhe made the Greek tongue only her diverſion in ſpare hours; and that the reading of this language, and others, did not keep her from her ſerious ſtudies, ſo ſhe called, among others, Tacitus's hiſtory, ſome pages of which ſhe read conſtantly every day. This author, who exerciſes the moſt learned, was very familiar to her (34).

[G] There have been ſo many verſions of him, and ſo many comments upon him.] Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie, who has tranſlated the ſix firſt books of the Annals into French, has prefixed to his tranſlation a critical diſcourſe, where you may find the names of a great many perſons, who have laboured on this writer. There you may ſee the judgment that is paſſed on their labours, and on Tacitus's ſtile and morals. All this is very curious. But you muſt not ſuppoſe that this French tranſlator ſpeaks in general of all thoſe who have written on Tacitus, or who have tranſlated him into other languages; he only ſpeaks of the principal ones. I wiſh Peter Andrew Canonheri had named the eleven Commentators that he points at in theſe words: 'Præter hos ſunt undecim qui Tacitum notis & commentariis illuſtrarunt (35). - - - - Beſides theſe there are eleven who have illuſtrated Tacitus with notes and commentaries.' He had juſt before given a long liſt of thoſe, qui ex profeſſo de jure ſtatus conſcripſerunt. That liſt contains eight pages in 4to. I know ſome perſons of good judgment, who make a great account of the critical commentaries on Tacitus, ſuch as is that of Juſtus Lipſius, and ſlight very much the political commentaries with which Italy has infatuated Germany: for ſince the Germans have ſeen the diſſertations of Scipione Ammirato, tranſlated into Latin by Chriſtopher Pflugius, a gentleman of Miſnia, they have been a little too much inclined to comment on Tacitus's works after that manner. Not but that one may profit by their writings, chiefly by thoſe of Boeclerus (36). That which Berneggerus compoſed on the ſame Hiſtorian, is intermixed with Literature and Politics. He has therefore intituled it, Quæſtiones Miſcellaneæ. The French did not bite at the hook, when John Baudouin added to his tranſlation of Tacitus (37), accompanied with notes, a tranſlation of Scipione Ammirato.

[H] I ſhall take notice of ſome faults in Juſtus Lipſius.] I. I have already obſerved (38), that he makes Pliny ſay more than he ſhould have done. II. He chuſes rather to believe, that Tacitus was the firſt of his family who enjoyed any honours, and that this family was not very illuſtrious, than to believe, that his father had any office: and nevertheleſs, in another place, he underſtands of his father, what Pliny ſays of Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman knight, and procurator of the demeſns in Gallia Belgica. Let us compare theſe two paſſages of Lipſius together. Here is the firſt. 'Pater avuſque honores geſſerint, & ad remp. acceſſerint, necne, ut re vetuſtâ & incertâ nihil adfirmem: proprius à verò abeſt, ipſum primum jus imaginis & honores in familiam non nimis illuſtrem intuliſſe. Initium dignitatis illi ſub Veſpaſiano fuit, à quo, Plinio auctore, procurator datus Galliæ Belgicæ, rationes Principis adminiſtravit, quæ dignitas equeſtri ordini diu peculiaris fuit (39). - - - - Whether his father and grandfather were honoured with any offices, or had any employments in the common-wealth, I cannot take upon me to determine, this being a point of great antiquity and uncertainty: it is moſt probable, that the grandeur and honours of his family, not before that time over illuſtrious, were wholly owing to himſelf. His firſt advancement was under Veſpaſian, by whom, according to Pliny, he was made Procurator of Gallia Belgica, and had the care of that Prince's revenues, which was a dignity long peculiar to the equeſtrian order.' Here is the other, which ſerves for a commentary on theſe words of Tacitus; Dignitatem noſtram à Veſpaſiano inchoatam; - - - Our dignity begun by Veſpaſian. How can this be, ſays Lipſius? 'Quomodo, quiane Procurator ſub illo Belgicæ? E Plinio id ſuſpicêre, ſed ſuſpicêre tantum, imò veriùs id ceperis de hujus patre. Intellige ergo dignitatem ejus inchoatam à Veſpaſiano, quòd ab eo laticlavius factus, & relatus in ordinem primum (40). - - - - What, becauſe he was under him Procurator of Gallia Belgica? This account of Pliny is to be ſuſpected, nay, more than ſuſpected, for it will be more truly underſtood of his father. The meaning therefore of his dignity being begun by Veſpaſian, is, that he made him a ſenator, and ranked him in that ſupreme order.' Lipſius will have it, in the firſt of theſe two paſſages, that Pliny ſays, that Tacitus was honoured with a commiſſion by Veſpaſian; and in the other he will have it, that this is meant of Tacitus's father. According to this laſt caſe, this Hiſtorian had for his father a knight promoted by the Emperor to honourable employments; and that which to Lipſius did not appear likely, would nevertheleſs be very true. No body can deny, but that this office of Procurator was very honourable; they attributed to it, under the Emperor Claudius, the authority of Judicature, and that without appeal (41). Conſult the learned Gutherius (42): and tho' Auguſtus had conferred this office on ſome freed-men (43). Tacitus did nevertheleſs look upon it as an appennage of knighthood; 'Utrumque avum procuratorem Cæſarum habuit (Agricola) quæ equeſtris nobilitas eſt (44). - - - - Both Agricola's grandfathers were procurators under the Cæſars, which is an honour belonging to the equeſtrian order.' III. Lipſius aſſerts, that Tacitus being grown grey-headed at the bar, devoted his old age to the writing of hiſtory. Hiſtoriæ ſcribendæ ſenex demum vacavit, cum reliquum ætatis in foro & cauſis orandis egiſſet. But if it be ſo, how comes it, that Tacitus declares, that he undertakes to write a hiſtory which is to extend from the death of Nero to that of Domitian; and that he reſerves for his old age the empire of Nerva and Trajan? Quod ſi vita ſuppeditet, principatum divi Nervæ, & imperium Trajani, uberiorem ſecurioremque materiam ſenectuti ſepoſui (45). One may here apply to Lipſius the proverb, Sorex ſuo indicio periit, - - - He has betrayed himſelf. He tells us (46), that he has very nearly made out

propius

(c) Tillemont, Hiſtory of the Emperors, Tom. ii, Part. i, pag. 351, of the Bruſſels edition.

(31) Balzac's Letter to d'Ablancourt. It is the xxiſt of book xii, and the xxiſt of the iiid book, of the iſt part of the choice Letters, p. 128, Amſterdam edition, 1656.

(32) Patin, Letter cxcvi, pag. 171, Tom. ii.

(33) In the remark [D].

(34) See Baillet's Life of Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 305.

(35) Petrus Andreas Canonherius, Philoſophiæ, Medicinæ, ac Sacræ Theologiæ Doctor Romanus, in Diſſertationibus Politicis ac Diſcurſibus variis in C. Cornelii Taciti Annalium Libros, pag. 66, Edit. Francof. 1610.

(36) I have ſeen a political Commentary, which he publiſhed anno 1643, on the fifteen firſt chapters of the firſt book of Tacitus's Annals, and a like Commentary which he publiſhed, anno 1648, on the Hiſtory of the ſame author.

(37) Printed at Paris in 4to, ann. 1628.

(38) In the remark [A].

(39) Juſt. Lipſius in Vita Taciti in limine Commentar. ad Tacitum.

(40) Lipſius, in Tacit. Hiſtor. lib. i, init. pag. 451.

(41) Eodem anno ſæpius audita vox Principis, parem vim rerum habendam à procuratoribus ſuis judicatarum, ac ſi ipſe ſtatuiſſet. Ac ne fortuito prolapſus videretur, Senatus quoque conſulto cautum, plenius quam antea & uberius. Tacitus, Annal. lib. xii, cap. lx.

(42) Gutherius, de Officiis Domus Auguſtæ, lib. iii, cap. xxxiii.

(43) Dio, lib. liii, pag. 506.

(44) Tacit. in Vita Agricolæ, cap. iv.

(45) Tacit. Hiſtor. lib. i, cap. i.

(46) Lipſius, in Vita Taciti.

remarks, ſeveral particulars, which relate to the life of Tacitus. He married the daughter out the year of Tacitus's nativity, which is thus: Pliny the younger, almoſt of the ſame age with Tacitus (47), was in his eighteenth year when his uncle died; that is to ſay, according to Lipſius, the ſecond year of the reign of Titus. He was therefore born in the year of Rome 816; ſo that Tacitus being a little older than he, muſt have been born the laſt year of the Emperor Claudius, or rather, the firſt year of Nero. Whereupon, I ſay, that he was therefore but forty-four years of age when Trajan aſcended the throne: and ſince nothing obliges us to put back the beginning of his work beyond the ſecond, or the third year of this prince, it manifeſtly follows, that he was not old when he began to apply himſelf to it. It is certain, ſuppoſing that he undertook this work in his forty-fifth year, that it may be much better conceived that he had time to finiſh it, and afterwards to go about his Annals, which he carried on from the beginning of Tiberius's reign, to the death of Nero. And obſerve, that in writing his Annals, he propoſed to himſelf a new enterprize when he ſhould have finiſhed them (48). Obſerve alſo, that his manner of writing required much time, every thing in it ſavours of pains, meditation, poliſhing, ſtudy, and the feſtina lente. And laſtly, obſerve, that the letters Pliny the younger wrote to him, either to intreat him to make mention of him, or to communicate to him ſome memoirs concerning the death of his uncle, ſeem to be of the year 102 or 103 (49); that is, of the fifth or ſixth year of Trajan. Now it is certain, that Tacitus was then writing his hiſtory; and ſince there is great likelihood that he was not far from the time when the fire of mount Veſuvius deſtroyed Pliny the Naturaliſt, in the firſt or ſecond year of Titus, we may fairly judge, that he did not long defer the beginning of his work after the inſtallation of Trajan. IV. Lipſius conjectures (50), that Tacitus's hiſtory contained twenty books. The ground he goes upon is this, that it contained an interval of twenty-one years; and that the five firſt books relate only the actions of a year and ſome months. This is a falſity in fact, and a prodigious forgetfulneſs of the rule of proportion. There are more than twenty-eight years between the death of Nero, and that of Domitian, which are the two boundaries of Tacitus's hiſtory: and no man that underſtands the Rule of Three would reaſon after this manner; If fifteen months take up five books, twenty-one years take up twenty books. Note, that the years that are loſt of the hiſtory of Tacitus, are not at all, in the main, leſs fruitful in events, than thoſe that are left. St Jerom ſays, that Tacitus compoſed the Hiſtory of the Emperors, in thirty books, from Tiberius to the death of Domitian (51). This teſtimony can be of no uſe, becauſe the Hiſtory of Tacitus does not begin at the death of Auguſtus; and there is no likelihood that this work and his Annals contained but thirty books. So that St Jerom has not well expreſſed himſelf. See the margin (52).

The greateſt part of theſe miſtakes of Juſtus Lipſius are to be found in the writings of the moſt learned men, who have ſpoken of Tacitus hiſtorically. I excuſe them: for who could believe, that ſo able a writer had committed them in a work very ſhort, and framed in ſuch a manner as to make us believe, that the author of it had very attentively weighed all his words? I do not think, that his conjecture concerning the year of Tacitus's nativity is amiſs, which ſhews a groſs errror of Francis Garaſſe, who believed, that Lucan's Pharſalia is later than Tacitus's Hiſtory (53). His words are theſe: The firſt objection ‘may be of thoſe who imagine, that GOD takes pleaſure in our calamities, and is delighted to ſee us expoſed to tempeſts, rebellions, and wars, as tho' we had a barbarous and revengeful GOD, who bathes himſelf in the blood of men. Such are, in ſome meaſure, the pompous objections, and atheiſtical ſentences of Tacitus and of Lucan, who was, in his time, accounted the father of Atheiſts: for they ſay in expreſs terms; Tot Romanæ Reipublicæ cladibus manifeſtum eſt fuiſſe curæ Diis VINDICTAM, non fuiſſe SALUTEM: that is to ſay, by ſo many calamities, and by the divers diſorders which have ſhaken the Republic of Rome, it plainly appears, that the gods take care to be revenged on us, and not to ſuccour us. Theſe are the words of Tacitus, in the firſt book of his Hiſtory; and Lucan, who perhaps had it from him, as an aſp, who borrows venom from the viper, ſays, in lofty terms,

Felix Roma quidem, civeſque habitura ſuperbos,
Si LIBERTATIS Superis tam cura fuiſſet,
Quàm VINDICTA placet, &c.

‘Rome, ſays he, would be the moſt happy city in the world, if GOD took as much care of our liberty, as he delights in revenge (54).’

[I] In la Mothe le Vayer, and Moreri.] The firſt of theſe two authors ſays (55), that the twelve laſt years of Nero are wanting in Tacitus's Annals. This is falſe: the two laſt years, and part of the preceding, are only wanting: this is the firſt fault. The ſecond, is to ſay, that this author's hiſtory reached to the happy government of Trajan. A new miſtake: it ended at the death of Domitian. III. It is not true, that, according to the conjectures of Lipſius, we have loſt ten books of Tacitus's hiſtory: for, according to his conjectures, this work comprehended twenty books; therefore, ſince there remain but five, we have loſt fifteen, according to the opinion of this Critic. IV. This author ſhould not have ſaid (56), that there are at leaſt twenty-one years from Galba to Nerva. This is a fault of Lipſius which I have refuted, and which Voſſius has alſo committed (57). V. It is not to be wondered at, if Tacitus having imitated Thucydides, and both of them Demoſthenes . . . . the firſt has retained I know not what harſhneſs or auſterity, which has always been obſerved in the ſtile of thoſe two Grecians (58). Theſe words of la Mothe le Vayer contain a prodigious anachroniſm; for Demoſthenes was much later than Thucydides. VI. The Emperor Tacitus, in that ſupreme dignity of the world, wherein he was placed, did, nevertheleſs, about two hundred years after the death of this Hiſtorian, of whom we ſpeak, glory in the name that was common to them both, eſteeming himſelf honoured to have him for his anceſtor, and to be taken for one of his poſterity. He cauſed his ſtatue to be ſet up in all libraries, and his works to be written out ten times every year; to the end that they might paſs from hand to hand, and from age to age, as they have done even to ours (59). This account is not exact: it ſuppoſes, that this emperor reigned a certain number of years; for otherwiſe it would be abſurd to ſay, that he cauſed ſuch or ſuch a thing to be done every year. However it is certain, that his reign laſted only about ſix months. Beſides, this account ſuppoſes the event anſwered this emperor's intentions; that is, that the books of Tacitus did paſs from age to age down to ours, according to the deſign of the Prince who cauſed them to be tranſcribed: and yet there remains with us but a very ſmall part of them. I do not much wonder, that the care of this emperor ſhould not have procured to us the preſervation of all the works of his anceſtor: for, conſidering the ſhort duration of his empire, I believe the execution of his orders went but a very little way. However it be, here is what he ordered (60): ‘Cornelium Tacitum, ſcriptorem hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ, quod parentem ſuum eundem diceret, in omnibus bibliothecis collocari juſſit: & ne lectorum incuria deperiret, librum per annos ſingulos decies ſcribi publicitus in evicis (61) archiis juſſit, & in bibliothecis poni. - - - - He commanded that Cornelius Tacitus, the Hiſtorian of the Cæſars, becauſe he owned him for his anceſtor, ſhould be placed in all the libraries: and that, to prevent his works from being loſt by the negligence of his readers, they ſhould be publickly tranſcribed ten times in every year, and put up in the libraries.’ VII. La Mothe le Vayer concludes this chapter with theſe words: ‘It is alſo well known, that Tacitus did not go about writing, till he was far advanced in years, after the empire of Nerva, and under that of Trajan, as we learn from himſelf (62).’ Here are two faults; for, in the firſt place, the Hiſtorian ſpeaks not one word of his age; and, in the ſecond place, it is very wrong to conclude that he was an old man, becauſe he compoſed his work under the empire of Trajan. See the preceding remark (63). VIII. The clamours of La Mothe le Vayer againſt two Civilians, who ſpoke ill daughter of Agricola, whoſe life he wrote. Several people believe he had a ſon, of whom Pliny relates a very extraordinary thing [K]. It is an idle fancy to pretend that Domitian

---

(47) See Epiſtle xx, of the 7th book of Pliny.

(48) Sed aliorum exitus, ſimul cetera illius ætatis memorabo, ſi effectis in quæ tendi, plures ad curas vitam produxero. Tacitus, Annal. lib. iii, cap. xxiv.

(49) Tillemont, Hiſtory of the Emperors, Tom. ii, Part. i, pag. 350.

(50) Lipſius, in Præfat. Comment. ad Hiſtor. Taciti.

(51) Hieronym. in Zachariam, lib. v, cap. xiv, apud Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 159.

(52) Note, that the book which we reckon the fifth in the Hiſtory of Tacitus, is cited as the fifth by Tertullian, in Libello de Spectaculis.

(53) Lucan died under Nero.

(54) Garaſſe, Somme Theologique, pag. 440, 441.

(55) La Mothe le Vayer, Judgment on the principal Hiſtorians, pag. 207, Tom. iii, Edit. in 12mo.

(56) Ibid. pag. 208.

(57) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 159.

(58) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi ſupra, pag. 209.

(59) Ibid. pag. 216.

(60) Vopiſcus, in Tacito Imperatore, cap. x, pag. m. 612, Vol. ii, Scriptorum Hiſt. Auguſtæ.

(61) This word is without doubt corrupted; the manuſcripts vary much; Caſaubon and Salmaſius have not ventured to decide any thing.

(62) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi ſupra, pag. 219.

(63) Numero III.

ill of Tacitus's Latin, appear to me very ill founded. He accounts thoſe two perſons, in this their delirium, more worthy of pity, than of an anſwer (64). He adds (65), If ever a ridiculous judgment was paſſed, this, without doubt, is one, and I dare ſay, out of the great indignation I have againſt ſuch unreaſonable opinions, that, in all probability, the meaneſt Cook or Groom of Tacitus ſpoke better Latin than Ferretus, or Alciatus, very learned men in the Law, but very bad judges of the thing we are ſpeaking of. . . Who can forbear wondering that ſome Barbarians ſhould be found at this preſent time, ſuch as Alciatus and Ferretus, with reſpect to the antient Romans, ſo raſh as to ſay, that an author of ſo great account, did not know how to ſpeak his own native tongue? In truth, one muſt have a brazen face, and a great ſtock of aſſurance to advance ſuch propoſitions (66). What a noiſe and buſtle is here about nothing? For, after all, the whole crime of thoſe two Civilians conſiſts in having found out in Tacitus's ſtile ſeveral thorns, and little brightneſs and purity. Here are Alciatus's words; I take them from a letter that he wrote to Paulus Jovius (67): 'Illi porrò qui rerum & locorum notitia gaudent, nec affectatas exornationes admittunt, non repoſcent à te rationem, cur lacteam Livii ubertatem non ſis aſſecutus, poſtquam & te omnino piguerit Saluſtii ſobrietatem imitari, & ſatis tibi fuerit pauculos tantum flores ex Q. Curtii pratis, ſæpius quam ex Cor. Taciti ſenticetis, arguta manu decerpſiſſe. - - - - Beſides they who are well verſed in the knowledge of things and places, and exclude all affected ornaments, will never aſk you the reaſon, why you have not imitated the flowing copiouſneſs of Livy, ſince you could not bear copying the gravity of Salluſt, but contented yourſelf to gather, with a judicious hand, a few flowers out of the meadows of Q. Curtius, rather than from among the briars and thorns of C. Tacitus.' Note, by the way, that Voſſius had never read this letter; for had he met with it, he would have better repreſented the author's thought: he would not have attributed to him an exceſſive prepoſſeſſion, which engaged him to affirm, that in compariſon to the hiſtory of Paul Jovius, that of Tacitus was like a field covered with brambles. 'Imo & Alciatus vir ſane egregius non dubitat affirmare dictionem ejus præ illa Paulli Jovii eſſe ſenticeta. Condonemus tale judicium tanto viro, & cogitemus ex amore Jovii proficiſci (68). Alciatus alſo, a man truly learned, does not ſcruple to affirm, that the ſtile of Tacitus, compared with that of Paul Jovius, is a field of brambles. We muſt excuſe this judgment in ſo great a man, and aſcribe it to his friendſhip for Jovius.' This is ſpeaking at the third hand. Alciatus's letter is not very flattering, if it be well examined. Let us proceed to Ferretus's words. 'Tanto acumine, tantoque judicio res Romanas mandavit litteris Tacitus, ut nemo certè legatur in ſuo genere illi comparandus; nam quamvis caruerit nitore, & puritate linguæ, abeunte jam Romano ſermone in peregrinas formas, atque figuras, ſuccum tamen, & ſanguinem rerum incorruptum retinuit, idemque tam multa pauciſſimis complexus eſt, ut attenti lectoris in animo aculeos relinquat, indiligentem, ac aliud cogitantem fallat, ac prætereat (69). - - - - Tacitus wrote the Roman Hiſtory with ſo great ability and judgment, that certainly no author is to be compared with him in that way; for though he wants clearneſs and purity of ſtile, which was owing to the Roman language degenerating into foreign forms and figures, yet he preſerves the ſubſtance and eſſentials entire, and at the ſame time expreſſes ſo many things in few words, that he makes a laſting impreſſion on the attentive reader, and eludes the unattentive.' The author, who affords me this elogy, cites (70) a paſſage of Alciatus, wherein he beſtows great encomiums upon Tacitus. Upon a thorough examination, I am perſuaded we ſhall find, that theſe two Civilians went not beyond La Mothe le Vayer himſelf (71), who did not deny, that Tacitus had retained ſomething of the harſhneſs or auſterity of Thucydides, and that his manner of writing was a little rugged. Would he have us find in Tacitus the model of a pure and elegant Latin ſtile? Then we muſt burn Cicero and Livy; for ſo long as we can compare them with Tacitus, the latter will neceſſarily appear to us very much corrupted. He had therefore no reaſon to fall into ſo great a paſſion againſt Alciatus and Ferretus. He ſhould not have exaggerated the clamours and invectives of Muretus (72). He neither ſpoke the truth, nor his own thoughts, when he ſaid, that the cooks and mule-drivers of the antient authors ſpoke, and underſtood the Latin tongue better, than the moſt learned among the Moderns, either ſpeak or underſtand it. Quorum coqui & muliones multo melius quam omnes nos Latine & intelligebant & loquebantur (73). He would have been offended at this hyperbole, if another perſon had offered to include him in it; and there is no doubt but that he believed himſelf much more maſter of the Latin tongue than the common citizens of antient Rome. He might be alſo in the right; for it is certain, that there are ſome foreigners, who without having ſeen France, ſpeak and underſtand our tongue better than ſeveral Frenchmen: And I am ſure, that Caſaubon and Salmaſius wrote better in Latin, than in their own tongue. If Mr de Tillemont (74) were to be treated at this time, as Alciatus was, there would appear a great deal of pedantry in ſuch a cenſure. Balthaſar Bonifacius, a great admirer of Tacitus, does nevertheleſs own, that his ſtile is harſh. 'Stylus magis gravis quam elegans, aſper enim parumque duriuſculus eſt, atque à Latinæ linguæ candore diſcedens (75). - - - - - - His ſtile is rather grave than elegant, being a little harſh and rough, and degenerating from the purity of the Latin tongue.'

As for what concerns Mr Moreri, he may be blamed, firſt, for having a little too much exalted Tacitus's birth. II. For having aſſerted, that Tacitus was very old when he began his Hiſtory under the empire of Trajan. III. And that the author himſelf obſerves it. He has avoided the over-ſights of Charles Stephens; for he has not made this Hiſtorian flouriſh from the empire of Tiberius, the year of Rome 767, till the time of Veſpaſian, ann. 822 (76). He does not ſay that Tacitus, an illuſtrious Orator under Hadrian, lived to the time of the Veſpaſians, and that they promoted him to dignities, and that his Hiſtory extends from Auguſtus to Hadrian (77). Lloyd and Hoffman have adopted all theſe laſt faults. I believe Charles Stephens copied them from Geſner (78), who had copied them from Volaterranus (79).

[K] A ſon, of whom Pliny relates a very extraordinary thing.] Here it is, according to Du Pinet's verſion. 'We read in the Chronicles, that at Salamis one named Euthymenes had a ſon, who in three years grew three cubits: he was very unwieldy and heavy both in motion and underſtanding, and yet he had got a downy beard, and a ſtrong voice; but as ſoon as he was three years of age, he died ſuddenly with a contraction of the nerves. I have ſeen myſelf ſomething like this, ſetting aſide that he had no hair on the privities, in the ſon of Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman knight, and receiver and treaſurer of Gallia Belgica.' I quote the old French verſion, on purpoſe to have an opportunity of obſerving, that ſome people pretend, that the tranſlator did not well underſtand his original. Theſe are the words of Pliny, in the edition of Father Hardouin. Invenimus in monumentis Salamine Euthymenis filium, in tria cubita triennio adoleviſſe, inceſſu tardum, ſenſu hebetem, & jam puberem factum voce robuſta, abſumptum contractione membrorum ſubita, triennio circumacto. Ipſi non pridem vidimus eadem ferme omnia, præter pubertatem, in filio Cornelii Taciti Equitis Romani, Belgicæ Galliæ rationes procurantis (80). This ſignifies, as ſome would have it, that the ſon of Euthymenes, having grown three cubits in three years, began immediately to decreaſe, and was conſumed at the end of three years. He lived therefore ſix years. I ſhall not decide on theſe two verſions: but that of du Pinet does not ſeem to me the worſt (81). I inſiſt more upon what follows. It cannot be proved from this paſſage, that our Tacitus had an employ in Gaul; for it is not true that Pliny ſpeaks of him. Let us remember, that Tacitus did not marry till after Agricola, his father-in-law, had been conſul. Here is the proof of it. 'Conſul egregiæ tum ſpei filiam juveni mihi deſpondet, ac poſt conſulatum collocavit, & ſtatim Britanniæ præpoſitus eſt (82). - - - - 'The

(64) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi ſupra, pag. 209.

(65) Ibid. pag. 210.

(66) Ibid. pag. 212, 213.

(67) It is prefixed to the firſt volume of the Hiſtories of Paul Jovius.

(68) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latin. pag. 160.

(69) Æmil. Ferretus, in Caſtigat. ad Tacitum, apud Petr. Andream Canonherium, Diſcurſ. Polit. in C. Tacitum, pag. 2.

(70) Canonher. ibid. pag. 3.

(71) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi ſupra, pag. 209.

(72) See the 17th oration of the 2d volume of Muretus.

(73) Muret. ibid. pag. m. 354. The Abbot Pichon, Præfat. in Tacit. in uſum Delphini, ſays in like manner, that the cenſurers of Tacitus are rudes & barbari, præ equiſone aut colono ipſius Taciti.

(74) See his words in the text of this article.

(75) Theſe words are related as being of Balthaſar Bonafacius in the Prolegomena to Tacitus in uſum Delphini.

(76) Carol. Stephanus, in Diction. voce Cornelius.

(77) Id. ibid. voce Tacitus.

(78) Geſner, in Biblioth. voce Publius, folio 572, verſo.

(79) Volaterran. lib. xx, circa init. pag. m. 717, 718.

(80) Plin. lib. vii, cap. xvi, pag. m. 36, 37. Vide Senecam de Conſolatione ad Marciam. cap. xxiii, pag. 762.

(81) See Salmaſius in Solinum, Tom. i, pag. 44.

(82) Tacit. in Vita Agricolæ, cap. ix.

Domitian baniſhed him [L]; and perhaps it is another, to ſay that he lived eighty years [M].

‘ The Conſul agreed to marry his daughter to me, a young ‘ lady of great hopes, which he accordingly did as ſoon as ‘ his conſulſhip was finiſhed, and was himſelf immediately after made Præfect of Britain.’ The conſulſhip of Agricola, according to the moſt probable opinion (83), falls in with the 77th year of Jesus Christ; we muſt therefore hold, that Tacitus married in the 78th. Now Pliny died in the 79th or 80th year (84). Conſequently he could not have ſeen a ſon of Tacitus who had ſuch an extraordinary growth at three years. I do not bid you to obſerve, that he makes mention of this prodigious growth in the ſeventh book of his Natural Hiſtory, a work divided into 37 books: I have no deſign to infer from thence, that it is very probable he had ſeen this ſome years before he finiſhed that work; for it may be anſwered me, that he probably reviſed it after he had finiſhed it, and that he might every where make uſe of the time of that reviſion for the date of the whole piece. We find the ſame date in the fourth chapter of the fourteenth book, and in the ſecond chapter of the twenty-eighth book. The author in theſe two places points at the 830th year of Rome, which is the 77th of the Chriſtian Æra. This is enough to make my objection good. Beſides he ſays that he had ſeen, a long time before, this extraordinary growth, nos pridem vidimus (85). I know very well, that Father Hardouin has corrected theſe words, and has put non pridem vidimus. I ſhall let this correction of his paſs; it can do me no harm, for tho' it ſhould be ſuppoſed, that Pliny wrote this chapter of his Hiſtory a few days after he had ſeen this tall child, it is not poſſible, that this Roman knight, of whom he ſpeaks, ſhould be our Tacitus. And therefore I do confidently aſſert, that the reaſon for which this commentator reads non pridem inſtead of nos pridem, is frivolous; he goes upon the falſe ſuppoſition that Pliny means the Hiſtorian, of whom I am ſpeaking (86). He applies to him (87) the inſcription recited by Reineſius; but he ſhould have taken notice, that it was made by Cornelius Verus Tacitus (88). Now no body ever put Verus among the names of Tacitus. He may have had for his father, they are the words of Mr de Tillemont (89), Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman knight, intendant of Gallia Belgica, [that is probably] Cornelius Verus Tacitus, of whom there is an inſcription found in the country of Juliers, made † when he was going to exerciſe a ſecond intendantſhip. [Thus he had been intendant of Gallia Belgica, and the Lower Germany where Juliers is.] This intendant had a ſon, of whom Pliny ⸸ the Naturaliſt relates ſomething extraordinary, in taking notice, that he was dead at that time: [So that this is not the Hiſtorian.] Thoſe who from henceforward will attribute to Tacitus an employ in Gaul under Veſpaſian, will do well to look for better proofs than this paſſage of Pliny. How many learned men have been miſled by it? Lipſius (90) and Voſſius are not the only perſons. Nay, there are ſome, who might be cenſured, even though it could be reaſonably pretended, that Pliny ſpoke of our Tacitus; for they ſuppoſe he had great military preferments, and that he governed the Lower Germany in the quality of Pro-conſul. They even pretend that becoming at that time acquainted with the manners and laws of the Germans, he wrote concerning them, during his Pro-conſulſhip the work we now have. ‘ Floruit diutiſſime in militari ‘ urbanaque diſciplina & Proconſul Germaniam inferiorem obtinuit, quo tempore Germanorum mores, ‘ inſtituta, ritus, tanta diligentia perſcripſit, ut uni Tacito ſuam antiquitatem Germani acceptam ferant. ‘ - - - He enjoyed great poſts a long time both civil and ‘ military, and obtained the Pro-conſulſhip of the Lower ‘ Germany, at which time he wrote with ſo much accuracy concerning the manners, laws, and rites of the ‘ Germans, that the Germans owe the account of their ‘ antiquity to Tacitus alone.’ This is what Bodin ſays, in his treatiſe concerning the method of Hiſtory. Balthaſar Bonifacius (91) has tranſcribed him without any alteration. Mr Pichon meant without doubt that Tacitus was governor of Gallia Belgica. This title is too great. However it be, here is what he ſays, in his Epiſtle Dedicatory to his Tacitus In usum Delphini. ‘Hoc autem oportet eſſe Tibi Tacitum ‘ acceptiorem, quòd olim in Gallia tua, & quidem ‘ Belgica, quæ maximè rectoris impatiens, obtinuit ‘ Imperium, & quòd hic forſitan ea ipſa meditatus eſt, ‘ & uſu didicit, quæ ſcriptis mandaret ac poſteris relinqueret. - - - But Tacitus ought to be the more acceptable to you on this account, becauſe he himſelf formerly obtained the government of this your kingdom of ‘ France, which of all others is a country the moſt impatient of a ruler; and becauſe it is very probable that ‘ in this very place he ſtudied and became maſter of thoſe ‘ ſubjects, which he has left explained in his writings ‘ for poſterity.’

[L] It is an idle fancy to pretend, that Domitian baniſhed him.] There are ſome who are not content with aſſerting this, but even compute the duration of this exile; they make it amount to ten years, and then conclude it by the efficacy of an interceſſion that wrought upon Domitian. This exile in general is not founded on any proof; and as to the duration of it, it is invincibly refuted by the words of Tacitus, mentioned above in the remark [B]. They are thoſe wherein he tells us, that he exerciſed the Prætorſhip at Rome, when Domitian celebrated the ſecular games. They were celebrated in the ſeventh year of Domitian's reign, and after that time this Prince lived not quite eight years (92). We are beholden to Lipſius for having obſerved, that this miſtake owes its riſe to a vulgar cuſtom, which makes people fond of repreſenting illuſtrious men under remarkable misfortunes. This error might alſo proceed from a wrong method of reaſoning. It was concluded, that ſince Domitian ſet himſelf up as a perſecutor of good men, he did not ſpare Tacitus, who was a man of honour, and in great reputation. Theſe conſequences are too vulgar, and authors ought not to draw them. ‘ Exſulaſſe ſub ‘ Domitiano quidam tradiderunt, magis tamen ut opinor, pro more vulgi, qui magnis viris inſignes caſus adfingere amat, quàm quod ejus rei certus auctor ‘ ſit. Ego legendo non aliud comperio, quàm abfuiſſe ‘ eum aliquot annis ab urbe, idque eo ipſo tempore ‘ quo Julius Agricola ſocer ejus mortem obierit coss. ‘ Pompejo Conlega, & Cor. Priſco, non tam exſilii neceſſitate, ut arbitror, quàm tædio temporum & cupidine otii. Nam quod iidem, ut omni ex parte ‘ tam anxia diligentia conſtet, decennium in exſilio ‘ egiſſe ſcribunt, ac demum exorato Domitiano reſtitutum, Latinè ut loquar, inanis fabula eſt (93). - - - ‘ Some have ſaid he was baniſhed by Domitian, but ‘ more, in my opinion, in compliance with the vulgar ‘ notion, which loves to aſcribe eminent misfortunes to ‘ eminent men, than out of any juſt authority for it. I ‘ could never in all my reading diſcover any thing further, than that he was abſent for ſome years from ‘ Rome, and that this happened at the time of Julius ‘ Agricola his father-in-law's death, in the conſulſhip of ‘ Pompeius Conlega, and Cor. Priſcus, not ſo much, I ‘ think, becauſe he was forced to it, as from a diſlike of ‘ the times, and a deſire of eaſe. For what the ſame ‘ authors, are ſo buſy to ſay, that his baniſhment continued ‘ ten years, and that at laſt he was pardoned by the favour of Domitian, is, to ſpeak plainly, an idle tale.’ I obſerve alſo, that, though this Hiſtorian (94) has deſcribed the tyranny of Domitian in the ſtrongeſt colours, yet he has not in the leaſt inſinuated, that the ſtorm fell upon him perſonally. On the contrary, he acknowledges, that he had ſome obligations to that Prince; and is afraid that he ſhould be ſuſpected of ſuppreſſing the truth by way of gratitude (95). A man who had been baniſhed, would hardly have expreſſed himſelf after this manner.

[M] And it is perhaps another, to ſay that he lived eighty years.] The teſtimony I am going to cite is of no great weight. ‘ Vixit annos 80 ut legitur in lib. ‘ 3. Theſ. Hiſtor. (96). - - - He lived 80 years, as we ‘ read in Theſ. Hiſtor. B. 3.’

(83) See Tillemont, note 3, on the Hiſtory of Titus, pag. m. 853, 854.

(84) See ibid. note 4, pag. 855.

(85) Note, that Pliny, lib. x, cap. xliii, p. m. 435, ſhews that he began this work before the death of Agrippina.

(86) See the Notæ & Emendationes of Father Hardouin, on the ſeventh book of Pliny, num. 65, pag. 119.

(87) In his Commentary on thoſe words of Pliny, pag. 37.

(88) This would make me doubt, whether he was the father of the Hiſtorian.

(89) Tillemont, ubi ſupra, Tom. ii, Part. i, pag. 348.

† Rationatoris honore uſurus ſecundùm.

⸸ It appears, that this child died, aged three years, without ſtrength or ſenſe. Pliny had ſeen him a long time before, pridem. And ſo Tacitus his father, who had ſome children, before the year 77, in which Pliny wrote, is not the Hiſtorian, as Voſſius thinks de Hiſt. Lat. lib. i, cap. xxx, pag. 158.

(90) In the Life of Tacitus. But he judged better of the thing in his Commentary, in lib. i, Hiſt. init. See, above, citation (40).

(91) Balth. Bonifacius, de Scriptoribus Hiſtoriæ Romanæ.

(92) See Lipſius, in Vita Taciti.

(93) Lipſius, ibid.

(94) In Vita Agricolæ, cap. ii, pag. 44, 45.

(95) See the beginning of book I, of his Hiſtory.

(96) Canonherius, in Vita Corn. Taciti, in limine. Diſcurſuum Politicorum.

TAISNIER (John) in Latin Taiſnerius, was of Ath in Hainault (a). He was preceptor to the pages of Charles V, and followed this emperor in his expedition to Tunis. He read ſome Mathematical lectures at Rome and Ferrara; and after he had travelled a long time, he devoted himſelf entirely to the writing of books (b); but making choice of a ſubject very unworthy of a man of judgment, he loſt all his reputation (c). He betook himſelf to Chiromancy; and though he had gained the credit of being very ſucceſsful in it, nevertheleſs by the great bulk of his book [A], he tired thoſe who were deſirous to benefit themſelves by his inſtructions. Many perſons were ſo ſimple as to ſend him the picture of their hands, on purpoſe that he might tell them their fortunes (d). Conſult Moreri's Dictionary and Bullart's Academie. They ſpeak at large of our Taiſnerius; but whether with that order and exactneſs that is neceſſary, is what I ſhall examine another time. There is nothing to be found in them, concerning his being a Plagiary [B], of which he has been accuſed.

[A] He nevertheleſs tired by the great bulk of his book.] Conſult Jacobus Philippus Tomaſinus; there you will find theſe words: ‘Uno volumine quæcunque Chiromantiam attingerent complexus eſt. At creſcente illo in vaſtam molem factum eſt ut ſtudentium animos defatigarit quos ſibi propoſuerat erudiendos (1). - - - He comprized in one volume every thing relating to Chiromancy. But this ſwelling to a prodigious ſize, wearied out the patience of the perſons for whoſe inſtruction he had compiled it.’ If you would know the credit this man acquired by his Chiromantic Quackery, read this paſſage of the ſame author. ‘Divinandi munere ex manuum lineis temperamenti ſigna, & animi characteres varios colligebat, &, ſpretis geniturarum laborioſis ſupputationibus, ignaras curioſorum mentes, rerum ſuarum ſciſcitantes eventus, vaticiniis circumducebat. Jamque Viri quoque graviſſimi fide prædictionibus illius haberi cœptâ, ei typos manuum ſuarum lineis effigiatarum undiquè demandabant, & ab ejuſdem ore, ut de privatis rebus ſtatuerent, pendebant (2). - - - By his art of Divination, he found out the ſeveral temperaments, and diſpoſitions of the mind, from the lines on the hand, and deſpiſing the tedious method of calculating nativities, he drew after him by his predictions, the ignorant minds of ſuch as were curious to know their fortunes. And now even the moſt ſerious perſons alſo, from the credit his art had obtained, ſent him from all parts the figures of their hands, with the lines marked upon them, and depended, for the conduct of their private affairs, on what he ſhould pronounce.’

[B] Concerning his being a Plagiary, of which he has been accuſed.] It is pretended that he did not content himſelf to ſteal ſome thoughts, but that he appropriated to himſelf entire books, which others had publiſhed. Gabriel Naudæus reproaches him with this, with reſpect to a book of Bartholomew Cocles, concerning Phyſiognomy; and with reſpect to a book of Peter Peregrinus, concerning the loadſtone. He defames him, as he deſerves, for thoſe thieveries committed with ſuch aſſurance. This was not committing petty-larceny, or acting the part of a pick-pocket in the Republic of Letters; but that of a notorious highwayman, or of a corſair of Barbary: this caſe deſerved immediate puniſhment on Parnaſſus. Let us ſee after what manner Gabriel Naudæus exerciſes juſtice. ‘Inter recentiores qui artem ejuſmodi (criſim Phyſiognomicam) ſcriptis explicarunt, potiores ſemper habe Auguſtinum Niphum, & Camillum Baldum, eruditiſſimos Ariſtotelis commentatores: Bartholomæumque Coclitem Bononienſem cujus integrum librum convaſavit, ac in ſuum opus mathematicum tranſtulit, Joannes Taiſnerus, plagiarius inſignis, & imprudentior longe Horatii Corniculâ, cum præterea tractatum etiam de Magnete, à Petro Peregrino Gallo quondam editum, furto vendicarit. Quod equidem velut per tranſennam obſervandum eſſe duxi, ut ſuus bene de Republica literaria meritis honos aſſeratur, & ipſe Taiſnerus,

Regali conſpectus in auro nuper & oſtro,
Migret in obſcuras furaci mente tabernas (3).

- - - Among the moderns who have wrote upon this Art (judicial Phyſiognomy) you ought to eſteem Auguſtinus Niphus; and Camillus Baldus the chief, thoſe moſt learned Commentators on Ariſtotle: as alſo Bartholomæus Cocles of Bononia, whoſe whole book was pyrated, by Johannes Taiſnerus, that notorious Plagiary, far more ridiculous than Horace's crow; having beſides this ſtolen a whole treatiſe concerning the loadſtone, written by Petrus Peregrinus, a Frenchman. Which is indeed an obſervation I thought proper to make by the way, that thoſe who have juſtly merited of the Republic of Learning may have their due honours vindicated, and that even Taiſnerus himſelf,

Who lately ſuch a noble figure made,
With ſtolen robes, may ſeek his native ſhade.

Thomaſius was not ignorant of this public accuſation, againſt Taiſnerius; he has mentioned it in his liſt of Plagiaries (4): but he did not know, nor perhaps Naudæus neither, that in the year 1574, an Italian Mathematician, publiſhed ſevere reflexions, and a terrible invective againſt the ſame Plagiary. All that he has ſaid about it deſerves to be repeated in this place. It will furniſh us both with ſome univerſal inſtructions, relating to theſe thieves, and ſome particulars concerning the perſon we are ſpeaking of. Beſides, the book from which I have taken all this is very ſcarce. ‘Si hos non laudamus qui aliquid ab aliis ſunt mutuati, quid de manifeſtis furibus dicemus, qui vel ipſa integra aliorum volumina ſibi imprudentes adſcribunt, & quaſi ſteriles ac ſceleſti plagiarii, viventium filiorum (eſt enim haud dubiè legitima proles quicquid fecundum ingenium longo ſtudio concepit, & peperit) miſerandas infligunt piis parentibus orbitates, & ſe, ſumma cum jactantia, eorum operum authores mentiuntur, quæ magna cum infamia rapuerunt, ut fecit impuriſſimus omnium Joannes Taiſnerus Hannonius. Qui opuſculum noſtrum, demonſtrationis proportionum motuum localium contra Ariſtotelem, & alios philoſophos, jamdiu antea à nobis editum, & iterum impreſſum Venetiis anno ſalutis 1554, ita integrum ſibi deſumpſit, ut nihil præter authoris nomen immutaverit, quid enim mutaviſſet, qui nec percipere poterat, quæ in ea diſputatione continerentur? Homo vanus ab omni mathematica facultate alienus, qui meritò propter craſſiſſimam ignorantiam verebatur, ne vel aliqua Syllaba ſublata, aut addita totius tractationis inficeretur ſubſtantia. Credidit (ut opinor) me jam vita functum qui furti nunquam argui poſſe confidit, & non intellexit ſuam temeritatem, qui ſeipſum mille argumentis qualis eſſet prodidit; dum utre inflato inanior ſeſe juris doctorem, & ſimul etiam muſici ſacelli rectorem aſſeruit, quaſi jura docere ſit muſici, aut juriſperiti ſacellum regere, & dum de magnete, & motibus, tractatus emiſit, nuſquam in titulis ſe mathematicum nominavit, ſed poëtam, eo quod crediderit poëtæ, aut muſici, aut juriſperiti, eſſe de naturalibus motibus corporum diſſerere. Debebat ſaltem & in hoc mentiri infamis impoſtor, ut ſe mathematicum in titulis prædicaret, ut in præfatione ad lectorem ejuſdem uſurpati opuſculi fecit, dum ſe matheſeos publice legiſſe Ferrariæ, & alibi, trecentis, & pluribus auditoribus prædicat, cujus numeri auditorum ne ſextam quidem partem, quiſpiam vidit in Italia, in auditorio cujuſvis (etiam primi nominis) mathematici: quis inquam hos infames laudaverit in Flaviam legem committentes? ac non potius juxta Conſtantini Cæſaris ſententiam, ad Celſum Aphricæ Vicarium reſcribentis, beſtiis ſubjiciendos cenſeat (5). - - - If thoſe who borrow from others are not to be commended for it, what ſhall we ſay of direct thieves, who either ridiculouſly aſſume to themſelves the whole works of others, and like barren and wicked Plagiaries, baſely rob the true parents of their living offſpring, (for whatſoever the ingenious mind has by long ſtudy conceived and brought forth, may undoubtedly be eſteemed a legitimate offſpring) and falſely ſet up themſelves with great

(a) Valer. Andreas Deſſelius, Bibl. Belg. pag. 570.

(b) Jacobus Philippus Tomaſinus, Elog. Virorum illuſtrium, pag. 161, 162, Edit. Patav. 1630.

(c) Bullart, Acad. des Sciences, Tom. ii, pag. 288, 289.

(d) See the remark [A].

(1) Jacob. Philippus Tomaſinus, Elog. pag. 162.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 161.

(3) Gabriel Naudæus, Bibliographia Politica, pag. m. 62, 63.

(4) Thomaſius, de Plagio Literario, pag. m. 246.

(5) Jo. Baptiſta Benedictus, Patricius Venetus, Philoſophus, in Præfatione Libri de Gnomonum Umbrarumque ſolarium uſu. This book was printed at Turin, ann. 1574, in folio. Voſſius ſays nothing of this author in his de Scientiis Mathematicis. He has been miſtaken for two perſons in the Oxford Catalogue: there he is ſpoken of firſt under the name of Joh. Baptiſta de Benedictis, and afterwards under that of Joh. Baptiſta Benedictus.

‘arrogance to be the authors of theſe works, which they have moſt infamouſly ſtolen, as was done by Johannes Taiſnerius of the country of Hainault the moſt impudent of them all. He claimed to himſelf a work of mine, containing a demonſtration of the proportions of local motions, againſt Ariſtotle and other Philoſophers, which I had long ſince publiſhed, and a ſecond edition of which was printed at Venice in the year 1554, and that ſo entirely, as to change no part of it, but juſt the name of the author; for what could he change, who did not ſo much as underſtand one word of that controverſy? A vain wretch, ſo throughly unacquainted in Mathematics, that he very juſtly apprehended from his groſs ignorance that the taking away or adding the leaſt ſyllable, would deſtroy the ſubſtance of the whole diſcourſe. He believed, I ſuppoſe, that I was dead, and took it for granted, that no body could convict him of the Plagiariſm, not being aware of his own raſhneſs, which betrayed him in a thouſand inſtances; while, more vainly puffed up than a blown bladder, he affirms himſelf to be a Doctor of Law, and at the ſame time alſo, a Maſter of Muſic in a Chapel, as if it were the buſineſs of a Muſician to teach law, or of a Lawyer to regulate the choir of a chapel; and while he publiſhed diſcourſes on the loadſtone, and motion, he no where in the title page calls himſelf a Mathematician, but a Poet, as believing it to belong to a Poet, or Muſician, or Lawyer, to treat of the natural motions of bodies. This infamous impoſtor ought at leaſt to have framed a lie on the title page by calling himſelf Mathematician, as he has done in his preface to the reader before that pyrated work, where he pretends to have read Mathematic Lectures at Ferrara, and elſewhere to three hundred and more auditors, the ſixth part of which number was never known in Italy to attend the audience of any Mathematician even of the greateſt name. Who, I ſay, would commend theſe notorious offenders againſt the Flavian Law? And not rather rank them below brutes, according to the judgment of the Emperor Conſtantine, writing to Celſus his Lieutenant in Africa.’

TAKIDDIN, a Mahometan author. I ſhall mention but one thing relating to him; which is, that he ſaid, the Caliph Almamon would be infallibly puniſhed by GOD, for having diſturbed the devotion of the Muſſulmans, by the introduction of Philoſophical ſtudies (a). This thought has nothing ſingular in it. It has appeared in all the countries of the world and in all ages; and at this very day we find an infinite number of people complaining of Des Cartes, and other modern Philoſophers of the firſt rank, as having occaſioned the contempt which ſo many perſons expreſs for devotion, and the myſteries of Chriſtianity. This might afford matter for a large commentary [A].

(a) Fieri non poſſe quin Deus certas de Almamone pœnas ſumeret, quod ſcientiis philoſophicis introductis Mohammedanorum pietatem interpellaverit. Sephadius, in Commentariis ad Tograi Poëma, apud Pocockium, Notis in Specimen Hiſtor. Arabum, pag. 166.

[A] This might afford matter for a large commentary.] A thouſand things might be ſaid upon this ſubject, both as to the fact itſelf, and the reaſon for it. However I ſhall be ſhort, for I have already more copy than I want to make an end of this volume. As to the matter of fact, I ſhall be content with ſaying, that Philoſophers have been at all times ſuſpected of having but little religion. The antient Rhetoricians after having ſaid, that among probable propoſitions, ſome were grounded upon what generally happens, and others upon the common opinion, alledged immediately theſe two examples: Mothers love their children: Philoſophers do not believe the exiſtence of the gods. ‘Probabile eſt id quod ferè fieri ſolet, aut quod in opinione poſitum eſt. . . . . In eo genere, quod fere ſolet fieri, probabile hujuſmodi eſt: SI MATER eſt, diligit filium: SI AVARUS eſt, negligit juſjurandum. In eo autem, quod in opinione poſitum eſt, hujuſmodi ſunt probabilia: Impiis apud inferos pœnas eſſe præparatas: Eos, qui philoſophiæ dent operam, non arbitrari deos eſſe (1). - - - That is probable which is confirmed by general experience, or which is commonly believed. Among the firſt ſort from general experience, are theſe examples following; A MOTHER loves her child; A MISER never regards an oath. Among the latter from common belief, are theſe: infernal puniſhments are prepared for the wicked; Philoſophers do not believe there are any gods.’ Apuleius obſerves, that almoſt all the antient Philoſophers were accuſed either of denying the exiſtence of the gods, or of applying themſelves to Magic. ‘Hæc fermè communi quodam errore imperitorum philoſophis objectantur: ut partim eorum, qui corporum cauſas meras & ſimpliceis rimantur, irreligioſos putent, eoſque aiant Deos abnuere; ut Anaxagoram, & Leucippum, & Democritum, & Epicurum, cæteroſque rerum naturæ patronos: partim autem, qui providentiam mundi curioſiùs veſtigant, & impenſiùs Deos celebrant, eos verò vulgò Magos nominent: quaſi facere etiam ſciant, quæ ſciant fieri: ut olim fuere Epimenides, & Orpheus, & Pythagoras, & Oſthanes (2). - - - Theſe things are generally by the ignorant vulgar, objected againſt the Philoſophers; that one part of them who are for enquiring into the firſt and ſimple cauſes of bodies are irreligious, and deny the being of the gods; as Anaxagoras, Leucippus, Democritus, Epicurus, and other patrons of nature: that the others who ſearch more curiouſly into the conduct of providence in the world, and worſhip the gods with greateſt zeal, are commonly ſtiled Magicians; as if they themſelves had found out how to do thoſe things, which they find to be done; as formerly Epimenides, Orpheus, Pythagoras, and Oſthanes.’ Our Takiddin would not have delivered over to divine juſtice the great Almamon, that protector of learning, who introduced the ſtudy of Philoſophy, had he not obſerved the ill effect of that ſtudy. It had raiſed doubts in the minds of men; it had diſcovered to a great many people the fooleries of the Mahometan ſect: and by that means the public worſhip, piety, and devotion, had laboured under a ſurprizing diſcouragement. Some learned men maintain, that the Arabian Philoſophers profeſſed only Mahometiſm outwardly, and laughed at the Alcoran in reality, becauſe they found in it ſome things contrary to reaſon (3). A great many people are not to be beat out of the notion, that Des Cartes and Gaſſendus believed the real preſence in the Euchariſt, as little as the fabulous ſtories of old Greece. It is no leſs difficult to perſuade the world, that the followers of thoſe two great Philoſophers are good Catholics; and that, if they were allowed to teach publickly their principles, they would not quickly undermine all the foundations of the Romiſh religion. The Proteſtants have not a better opinion of Des Cartes's doctrine. Generally ſpeaking, the Carteſians are ſuſpected of irreligion, and their Philoſophy is thought to be very dangerous to Chriſtianity: ſo that, according to the opinion of a great many, the ſame perſons, who have removed in our age the darkneſs which the ſchoolmen had ſpread all over Europe, have increaſed the number of freethinkers, and made way for Atheiſm, or Scepticiſm, or the diſbelief of the greateſt myſteries of Chriſtianity. But irreligion is not only aſcribed to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, but alſo to Philology; for it is pretended, that Atheiſm never began to diſcover itſelf in France till the reign of Francis I, and that the firſt appearance of it in Italy, was when Philological learning was revived there. The leſs foreign learning we have, ſays a Catholic writer, the greater ſubmiſſion we expreſs for the Chriſtian Faith; and the moſt learned ages, ſays Baronius, have often proved the moſt unbelieving. The Aladiniſts appeared only under the reign of Almanſor, who was the moſt learned monarch of his age; and I find no Atheiſts in France before the reign of Francis I, nor in Italy till after the taking of Conſtantinople, when Argyropilus, Theodorus Gaza, Georgius Trebizontius, with the moſt celebrated men of Greece, retired to the Dukes of Florence (4). It is certain, that moſt of the wits and learned Philologers, who ſhined in Italy, when the Belles Lettres began to revive there, after the taking of Conſtantinople, had but little religion. But, on the other hand, the reſtoration of the learned languages, and polite literature, made way for the Reformation; as the Monks, and their adherents clearly foreſaw, who continually inveighed againſt Reuchlin, Eraſmus, and the other ſcourges of ignorance. Thus whilſt the Roman Catholics deplore the fatal conſequences of the ſtudy of good literature, the Proteſtants have

(1) Cicero, de Inventione, lib. i, fol. m. 29.

(2) Apuleius, in Apologia, pag. 291.

(3) Toſtatus, in cap. xxiii. Ex. Quæſt. XX, refert quod Philoſophi inter Saracenos non recipiant propter hoc Alcoranum. Idem probat Calixtus in Diſp. de Verit. Religion. Chriſt. ex Averroë, diſputante contra deſtructiones Algazelis, & Avicenna, Metaph. lib. ix, cap. vii. Annotata ad Religionem Medici, lib. i, §. xxii, pag. m. 146, in hæc verba, Cum Philoſophia pugnantibus.

(4) Clavigny de Sainte Honorine, Diſcernement & Uſage des Livres ſuſpects, pag. 82. Note, that I do not alledge what he ſays as matter of fact.

have all the reaſon in the world to praiſe GOD for it (5). They are not ſo much beholden to the new Philoſophy, which demonſtratively overthrows Tranſubſtantiation, and all its dependencies; becauſe the ſame weapons are made uſe of againſt the moſt eſſential doctrines. In a word, ſo unhappy is the fate of man, that the knowledge which frees him from one evil, throws him into another. Drive away ignorance and barbarity, and you put an end to ſuperſtition, and the fooliſh credulity of the people, ſo profitable to their leaders, who afterwards employ their gain only to plunge themſelves into idleneſs and debauchery: but by putting men in a capacity of diſcovering ſuch diſorders, you raiſe in them a deſire of examining every thing; and at laſt they are ſo much for enquiring and ſcanning, that they find nothing that will ſatisfy their miſerable reaſon.

However it be, I have heard ſome wiſe men ſay, that the too common affectation of charging the Philoſophers with impiety, is very imprudent: for how great a ſcandal would it be for ignorant people, if they took the pains to conſider it with due attention, to find that, according to the opinion of a great many Divines, there is but little religion among great Philoſophers; that devotion is chiefly to be found among the vulgar; and that thoſe who have moſt carefully examined the marks of the divine authority of the holy ſcripture, are commonly leſs pious and devout than others (6). It were much more edifying to teach, with Plutarch (7), that Philoſophy is a remedy for impiety and ſuperſtition; and, with Origen, that no man can be truly pious without Philoſophy. Omnino nec pium erga communem omnium Dominum eſſe abſque Philoſophia quemquam cenſebat (8). The mixture of good and evil, that is to be found in all human things, appears on this occaſion in a particular manner. The Arabian Philoſophers came to know, by their Philoſophy, that the Alcoran was a falſe Revelation; but on the contrary many Jews forſook their religion, and embraced the Pagan Philoſophy, which diſcovered to them, as they pretended, that Moſes had preſcribed them needleſs laws. ‘Multis è Judæorum gente adeo perſuaſa ‘eſt olim hæc opinio, quòd, ſub initia regni Saracenici ad Philoſophiam Ethnicam defectionem fecerint, quòd iis leges haud paucæ inutiles & ſupervacaneæ viderentur (9). - - - This opinion was formerly ‘ſo ſtrongly maintained by a great many Jews, that about ‘the beginning of the Saracen empire, they were drawn ‘over to the Pagan Philoſophy, by their looking upon ſeveral parts of the law as uſeleſs and ſuperfluous.’ Thus the ſame principle, which is ſometimes ſerviceable againſt error, is ſometimes prejudicial to truth.

(5) See Mr Jurieu's Reflexions, Apologie pour les Réformat. pag. 66, & ſeq. of the firſt volume in 4*to. upon what Maimbourg had ſaid*, Hiſt. du Calvin. pag. 4, that the courſe taken by Francis I, to revive learning in his kingdom . . . proved, by a miſfortune he did not foreſee, an occaſion of bringing in hereſy into his kingdom.

(6) Jurieu, apud Saurin, Examen de la Théolog. pag. 98. See Mr Saurin's Reflexions upon this, ibid.

(7) See Plutarch, de Iſide & Oſiride, pag. 378.

(8) St Cyran quotes that paſſage of St Gregory of Neocæſárea, in Panegyr. in his work againſt Father Garaſſe's Somme Théologique, Tom. ii, pag. 33, & 70.

(9) Joan. Spencerus, de Legibus Hebræorum, lib. ii, cap. iii, §. i, ſub fin. pag. 225, Edit. Hag. 1686. He confirms this by the teſtimony of Gulielmus Pariſienſis, Lib. de Legibus, p. 3, 4.

TALAUS, King of Argos, ſon of Abas or Bias, and grand-ſon of Lynceus one of the fifty ſons-in-law of Danaus, loſt his crown and his life by the plots of Amphiaraus (a). His ſon Adraſtus was forced to fly to Sicyon, where ſome ſay he married the daughter of King Polybius, and ſucceeded him. But others will have it, that he ſucceeded him, becauſe his mother was the only daughter of Polybius. See the article of ADRASTUS. Some tell us, that he, whom Amphiaraus dethroned and put to death, was Pronax the ſon of Talaus. See the ſcholiaſt upon the ninth Nemean Ode of Pindar, wherein we are told upon what the pretenſions of Amphiaraus were grounded: namely that Melampus having cured the daughters of Prœtus King of Argos, who were grown mad, received, as a reward, one half of the kingdom of Argos, which he divided between him and his brother Bias. But Melampus left behind him a ſon called Antiphates, who was Oïcles's father, and Amphiaraus's grand-father.

(a) Schol. Pindari. in Od. VIII Pyth. & IX Nem.

TAMIRAS, was ſent for from Cilicia into the iſle of Cyprus, to teach the art of the Haruſpices or of divining by looking into the entrails of the ſacrifices. The temple of Venus at Paphos was conſecrated by Cinyras; and it was ſaid, that this goddeſs, conceived and born in the ſea, had landed in that place; but application was made to this inhabitant of Cilicia for the eſtabliſhment I have been mentioning. Things had been ſo ordered, that the deſcendants of Cinyras and Tamiras were to preſide over the ceremonies; but, that the royal family might have ſome pre-eminence, the family of Tamiras quickly reſigned their ſhare to them [A]; ſo that from thence no other prieſt was conſulted, but of the family of Cinyras (a).

[A] The family of Tamiras quickly reſigned their ſhare.] Nevertheleſs, Heſychius mentions certain Prieſts of the iſle of Cyprus, called Ταμιράδαι, Tamiradæ. This Orthography in Heſychius's manuſcripts gave Meurſius a juſt occaſion to obſerve, that the word Thamyras in Tacitus, ought to be read Tamiras (1).

(a) Ex Tacito, Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. iii.

(1) Meurſius, in Cypro, pag. 50.

TANAQUIL, the wife of Tarquinius Priſcus King of Rome, was born at Tarquinii in Tuſcany. Where ſhe was married to Lucumon, the ſon of a perſon who fled thither, being expelled from Corinth his native place. Lucumon inheriting his father's whole eſtate, became a very rich man; and the family of Tanaquil being one of the nobleſt in the town, he hoped to raiſe himſelf to ſome dignities; but being a ſon of a foreigner, he met with great obſtacles (a). Tanaquil, being provoked by the ſlight put upon her huſband, and being unwilling to loſe the rank ſhe was born to reſolved to leave Tarquinii, in hopes of advancing herſelf in ſome other place (b). She therefore repreſented to her huſband that their beſt way was to go and ſettle at Rome, where men of merit, of whatſoever country they were, might hope for the nobleſt preferments. Lucumon followed her advice, and had preſage of his great fortune before he got to Rome. That preſage was explained to him by his wife [A], for ſhe had great ſkill that way. He took the name of Tarquinius. He gained the eſteem and affection of the

[A] That preſage was explained to him by his wife.] When they came to the Janiculum, an eagle lighted gently upon their chariot, and took off Lucumon's hat, and after having ſome time hovered over their chariot, with a great outcry, reſtored the hat very orderly to the ſame place. Tanaquil, ſitting by her huſband, embraced him, and aſſured him of very great fortune, explaining to him the circumſtances of that preſage. Upon this they entered Rome, full of high expectations. Ad Janiculum forte ventum erat: ibi ei carpento ſedenti cum uxore, aquila ſuſpenſis demiſſa leniter alis pileum aufert: ſuperque carpentum cum magno clangore volitans, rurſus velut miniſterio divinitus miſſa, capiti apte reponit: inde ſublimis abiit. Accepiſſe id augurium læta dicitur Tanaquil; perita, ut vulgo Etruſci, cæleſtium prodigiorum mulier. Excelſa & alta ſperare complexa

(a) Taken from Livy, lib. i, pag. m. 23.

(b) Cum divitiæ jam animos facerent, auxit ducta in matrimonium Tanaquil, ſummo loco nata, & quæ haud facile iis, in quibus nata erat, humiliora ſineret ea, quæ innupſiſſet. Spernentibus Etruſcis Lucumonem exule advena ortum, ferre indignitatem non potuit, oblitaque ingenitæ erga patriam caritatis, dummodo virum honoratum videret, conſilium migrandi ab Tarquiniis cepit. Livius, ibid.

the Romans; and inſinuated himſelf into the king's favour in ſuch a manner, that the offices he obtained from him enabled him to aſpire to the crown, and to ſucceed in his ambitious deſign. He was killed in his palace in the thirty-eighth year of his reign. Tanaquil was not diſcouraged by this ſevere blow; ſhe managed things ſo dexterouſly, that ſhe ſettled the crown upon Servius Tullius her ſon-in-law, whoſe good fortune ſhe had foretold [B] long before (c). Her memory was in veneration at Rome for ſeveral ages: her handyworks were preſerved there [C], and great virtues were aſcribed to her girdle complexa virum jubet: eam alitem ea regione cæli & ejus Dei nunciam veniſſe: circa ſummum culmen hominis auſpicium feciſſe: levaſſe humano ſuperpoſitum capiti decus, ut divinitus eidem redderet. Has ſpes cogitationeſque ſecum portantes, urbem ingreſſi ſunt (1).

[B] She had foretold the good fortune of Servius Tullius.] He was born and educated in the palace of King Tarquin. One day a fire was ſeen about his head whilſt he ſlept: the great noiſe that was made at the ſight of this prodigy, obliged that Prince to go and ſee what was the matter. Some body had a mind to throw water upon the fire, but Tanaquil prevented it, and ordered that the child ſhould not be diſturbed, till he awaked of himſelf. He awaked ſoon after, and the fire was no more ſeen. Then the Queen took her huſband aſide, and told him that this child would one day ſupport the royal family in their adverſity, and that he ought to be bred up as a perſon of high expectation. This advice was followed, great care was taken of the education of that child, who became ſo accompliſhed that none was thought more worthy of being the King's ſon-in-law. He ſucceeded Tarquin accordingly (2). Some believe, that his mother was the wife of Servius Tullius, who was killed in defending his principality of Corniculum (3). They add, that this woman was with child, and that being known among the other women-ſlaves, regard was had to her quality. Tanaquil ſet her at liberty, and received her into her palace, where ſhe was delivered of a boy. This is likely enough, but not wonderful enough for all ſorts of Hiſtorians: for which reaſon ſome pretended that the birth of a King of Rome, of ſuch a mean extraction, was to have ſomething more myſterious in it. Therefore they ſuppoſed, that Ocriſia, widow of the Prince of Corniculum, was for ſome time a ſlave in Tanaquil's palace before ſhe was made free; and that while ſhe was a ſlave ſhe perceived in the chimney the figure of a man's privy parts. She acquainted the King and Queen with it. When the King ſaw this prodigy he was amazed at it: the Queen, who was as well ſkilled in preſages as the beſt Augur in Hetruria (4), told her huſband, that it was decreed by fate, that a perſon of merit more than human, ſhould be born in the palace; and that the figure, which appeared in the chimney, was to be his father, and that the woman who ſhould have to do with that figure, would be his mother. Tarquin being informed by ſome men well ſkilled in ſuch things, that Tanaquil gave a right explication of that prodigy, reſolved to make the woman, who had ſeen that member firſt, to lye with it: ſhe was therefore dreſſed up like a bride, and brought into the chamber where that figure was. They left her alone, and ſhe was enjoyed by ſome Genius, whether it was Vulcan, or the houſhold god. That figure was never ſeen afterwards. Ocriſia was got with child, and brought to bed at the uſual time (5). The ſame thing almoſt has been ſaid of Romulus's mother (6). If there had not been Annaliſts at Rome a long time before Rhetoric was taught there, I ſhould be apt to think, that the declamations which the Sophiſts put their ſcholars upon, had been converted into hiſtorical relations; for it is very likely that the young Rhetoricians were allowed to feign whatever they had a mind to, in their Panegyrical eſſays. The deſign of thoſe fictions was to diſcover whether they had any invention, and whether they were able to turn and handle a common-place with dexterity. They were therefore not blamed for their ſuppoſing a divine, miraculous, and very ſurprizing origin. But this muſt have occaſioned great abuſes, if the moſt ingenious pieces of thoſe young men had been preſerved in the archives, and looked upon, ſome ages after, as hiſtorical relations. How do we know but that moſt of the antient fables owe their original to a cuſtom of making Panegyrics upon the ancient Heroes, on their feſtival days, and preſerving thoſe pieces that appeared to be the beſt. See what will be ſaid about Martyrologies, in the article VALERIUS.

[C] Her handy-works were preſerved.] Varro, contemporary with Cicero, affirms, that he had ſeen in Sangus's temple, Tanaquil's diſtaff and ſpindle, with the wool upon it which ſhe had been ſpinning; and that they kept in the temple of Fortune, a royal robe which ſhe wrought, and Servius Tullius wore. Pliny, who relates it, adds, that this was the reaſon why the maids, who married, were followed by a perſon, who carried a diſtaff and a ſpindle, with wool and yarn upon them. He alſo ſays that this queen was the firſt who wove that ſort of garment, which was given to young lads to wear, when they put on the Toga Virilis, and to maids when they married. Moreri has committed a groſs miſtake: he takes the tirones in Pliny to mean new ſoldiers, inſtead of underſtanding by that word the boys, who had lately left off the gown of childhood, the prætexta. Here follows the whole paſſage of Pliny (7). ‘Lanam in colo & fuſo Tanaquilis, quæ ‘eadem Caïa Cæcilia (8) vocata eſt, in templo Sangi ‘duraſſe, prodente ſe, auctor eſt M. Varro: factamque ab ea togam regiam undulatam in æde Fortunæ, ‘qua Ser. Tullius fuerat uſus. Inde factum, ut nubentes virgines comitaretur colus compta, & fuſus ‘cum ſtamine. Ea prima texuit rectam tunicam, ‘quales cum toga pura tirones induuntur, novæque ‘nuptæ. - - - - We have M. Varro's authority, that ‘the diſtaff and ſpindle of Tanaquil, who was alſo ‘called Caïa Cæcilia, was remaining in the temple ‘of Sangus, where he himſelf met with them; and ‘that there was in the temple of Fortune a royal ‘robe made by her in a waving form, which Servius ‘Tullius had made uſe of. From whence it came that ‘virgins, in their matrimonial ceremony, were attended ‘with a diſtaff full of wool, and a ſpindle of yarn. She ‘firſt of all wove the ſtrait veſt, which the young lads ‘wear with the toga virilis, and brides on their wedding-day.’ I do not know why Father Hardouin prefers Plutarch's opinion to that of Varro, and Verrius. ‘Verius Plutarchus in quæſt. Rom. pag. 271. ‘uxorem ait fuiſſe (Caïam Cæciliam) unius è Tarquinii liberis: eidemque in templo Sanci ſtatuam priſcis ‘temporibus poſitam cum ſandaliis & fuſo, quæ domi ‘actæ vitæ induſtriæque argumento eſſent (9). - - - Plutarch with greater truth affirms, that Caïa Cæcilia ‘was the wife of one of Tarquin's ſons: and that a ſtatue ‘had been of old erected in honour to her in the temple of ‘Sancus, with ſandals and a ſpindle, which were emblems of her induſtrious and domeſtic life.’ It is more reaſonable to think, that this Caïa Cæcilia, whoſe ſtatue in braſs, with ſandals and ſpindle, were to be ſeen in Sancus's temple, was the wife of the firſt Tarquin, than to think ſhe was the wife of one of Tarquin's ſons. I know Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus ſuppoſes (10) that the firſt Tarquin had a ſon, who was married, and was the father of the two ſons-in-law of Servius Tullius; but neither he, nor any other Hiſtorian ſays one word concerning the merit of the woman, who married that ſon of Tarquin. And yet ſhe muſt have been very illuſtrious, if the Romans paid her the honour mentioned by Plutarch. Was ſhe the wife of one of the laſt Tarquin's ſons? The Romans could never have had ſuch a veneration for the daughter-in-law of a tyrant, whom they had expelled with his whole family, and whoſe memory was always execrable to them? Was ſhe the firſt wife of Tarquinius Superbus? I know very well ſhe was a good woman (11), but her merit is not to be compared with that of Tanaquil. She never was queen at all, ſhe died young, and therefore had not the opportunities of ſhewing her excellencies, as Tanaquil had, who lived a long time on the throne. We may therefore ſay, that the monuments preſerved in Sancus's temple, belonged to that queen, and not to the wife of one of Tarquin's ſons, and boldly affirm that Feſtus and Pliny, or rather Verrius and Varro, have been more exact than Plutarch;

(c) Taken from Livy, lib. i, pag. m. 23.

(1) Titus Livius, lib. i, cap. xxxiv, pag. m. 23. See alſo Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, lib. iii, cap. lxx, where the thing is more particularly related than by Livy.

(2) Taken from Livy, ibid.

(3) A town of Italy, which was beſieged, taken, ranſacked, and burnt by Tarquinius Priſcus. Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. iii, cap. lxxiii.

(4) Τὴν δὲ Τανακυλίδα τάτε ἀλλὰ σοφὴν οὖσαν, καὶ δὴ καὶ τὰ μαντικὰ οὐδενὸς χεῖρον Τυῤῥηνῶν ἐπισταμένην, εἰπεῖν πρὸς αὐτόν. Taniquilem, uxorem, & alioqui ſapientem, & divinandi ſcientia nulli Etruſcorum ſecundam, dixiſſe. Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. iv, circa init. pag. 207.

(5) See Plutarch, in Vita Romuli, pag. 18.

(6) Taken from Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, lib. iv, init.

(7) Plin. lib. viii, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 228, 229.

(8) Feſtus obſerves, that Tanaquil, being at Rome, took the name of Caïa Cæcilia. Her huſband, to comply with the cuſtom of the Romans, called himſelf Lucius Tarquinius, as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus obſerves, lib. iii, cap. lxxi.

(9) Harduinus in Plinium, ibid.

(10) Lib. iv, cap. iv.

(11) Idem, Dionyſ. Halicarn. ibid. cap. xxxiii, pag. 823, Edit. Lat. in 8vo. 1615.

girdle [D]. St Jerom obſerves, that Tarquin was not ſo well known as his wife (d). He adds, that the admirable virtue of that queen is too ſtrongly impreſſed on the memory of all ages, ever to be forgotten. Yet it ſeems one might infer from ſome paſſages in antient authors, that ſhe was looked upon as a woman, who had been too imperious [E]. It is not true that ſhe was alive when Tarquinius Superbus put his brother to death, nor that ſhe was the mother of this Tarquin [F]. The Hiſtorian, who ſhews Plutarch; this may be placed among the miſtakes of the latter, which are very numerous. Perhaps it will be objected to me, that thoſe ſandals, and that ſpindle, do not ſuit with a queen ſo intriguing as Tanaquil. The deſign of thoſe monuments was to honour the memory of a woman, who ſeldom went abroad, and kept cloſe to her diſtaff: but was this Tanaquil's character? I anſwer, that ſhe was indeed an able queen, and a ſtateſwoman, and that ſhe ſhewed a great deal of conduct and reſolution upon proper occaſions; but this was no hindrance to her applying herſelf to her diſtaff and her needle, for her ordinary employments.

[D] Great virtues were aſcribed to her girdle.] If I had ſaid that it was preſerved in order to work miracles I ſhould have expreſſed myſelf wrong; for the Romans had not recourſe to this girdle as to a Moral cauſe, but as to a Phyſical one. They ſuppoſed that Tanaquil had found out excellent remedies againſt diſtempers, and that ſhe had encloſed them in her girdle. And therefore thoſe who got ſome ſcrapings of it, believed they ſhould be cured by them, not becauſe the ſoul of that queen would reward their faith, but becauſe they had ſome particles of the remedies contained in that girdle. So that no exact parallel can be made between thoſe who had recourſe to Tanaquil's ſtatue, in order to rub her girdle,, and thoſe who endeavour to obtain a piece of St Hubert's ſtole, or to have their beads touched by ſome relic. There is a great deal of credulity on both ſides. I leave it thoſe, who have leiſure, to examine whether old Rome equalled the new in this reſpect; and to aſſiſt them a little in their enquiry, I ſhall relate the words of my author. ‘ Prædia Verrius vocari ait ea remedia quæ Caja Cæcilia uxor ‘ Tarquinii Priſci inveniſſe exiſtimatur, & immiſcuiſſe ‘ zonæ ſuæ qua præcincta ſtatua ejus eſt in æde Sancti ‘ qui Deus Dius Fidius vocatur, ex qua zona periclitantes ramenta ſumunt: ea vocari ait prædia quod ‘ mala prohibeant (12). - - - - Verrius ſays, that thoſe ‘ remedies are called prædia, which Caïa Cæcilia, the ‘ wife of Tarquinius Priſcus, is ſuppoſed to have found ‘ out, and incorporated with her girdle, which is placed ‘ about her ſtatue in the temple of Sancus, who is a god, ‘ known by the name of Dius Fidius; from which girdle ‘ thoſe who are in any danger take ſome of the ſcrapings: ‘ he ſays they are called prædia, becauſe they prevent ill ‘ accidents.’ What Pliny relates of Pelops's rib, is much more miraculous. It was ſhewn as a remedy, ‘ Elide ſolebat oſtendi Pelopis coſta quam eburneam ‘ affirmabant (13). - - - - At Elis uſed to be ſhewn Pe- ‘ lops's rib, which they affirmed to be ivory.’ Here is a relic which wrought miracles among the Heathens: for Pliny had been ſaying, that certain members of ſome people have the virtue of curing diſeaſes (14), he muſt therefore mean that this part of Pelops had that faculty. So that Charles Stephens is only to be blamed, for his making no diſtinction between what he infers from Pliny's words, and what Pliny himſelf ſays. Such a diſtinction ought never to be neglected: thoſe, who take no care to obſerve it, occaſion many authors to quote, as the words of an antient writer, what is but a paraphraſe, or a conſequence drawn by ſome Modern. Theſe are Charles Stephens's words (15): ‘ Ad quem quidem humerum ‘ (16) poſt ejuſdem Pelopis mortem varia morborum ‘ ſanabantur genera, & multiplicia edebantur miracula. ‘ Plin. libro decimo nono, capite tertio. - - - - By ‘ which ſhoulder, after Pelops's death, various kinds of ‘ diſtempers were cured, and a great many miracles per- ‘ formed.’ Lloyd and Hoffman have not rectified this paſſage in the leaſt, nor even the falſe citation contained in it.

A French author, who lived in the XVIth century, tells a ſtory which he would never have been able to prove. The Tarquins, ſays he (17), cauſed a ſtatue to be erected in the middle of their palace, with only ſlippers on, a diſtaff and a ſpindle, that thoſe who ſhould ſucceed their family, might imitate their aſſiduous diligence, in minding domeſtic concerns, without ſtirring abroad. Thus you ſee how the paſſage I have cited from Pliny, concerning Tanaquil's ſtatue, has been miſrepreſented. Every body takes upon him to alter ſome circumſtance in what he quotes: by this means matters of fact are corrupted, and ſoon perverted by thoſe who cite them.

[E] She was looked upon as a woman who had been too imperious.] This is what many perſons infer from theſe words of Juvenal:

Conſulit ictericæ lento de funere matris,
Ante tamen de te TANAQUIL tua .... (18).

Your Tanaquil would from the wizzard know
Her mother's fate, but firſt when you're to go.

And from theſe words of Auſonius:

.... Tanaquil tua neſciat iſtud.
Tu contemne alios .... (19).

If from your Tanaquil the tale you hide,
You're very ſafe from all the world beſide.

This ſeems to ſignify, that the wives, who took too much upon themſelves, were called Tanaquils. It is Scaliger's opinion. ‘ Uxorem ſanctiſſimam Paulini, ‘ cujus meminit Ambroſius Epiſt. XXXXVI vocat ‘ Tanaquilem Auſonius, ridens ſcilicet: quia ei erat ‘ addictus Paulinus. Et, ut ex eodem loco Ambroſii ‘ cognoſcimus, videtur ſecutus uxoris conſilium Paulinus in ſeceſſu Nolano. Quare vocat eam fœminam ‘ Tanaquilem poëta noſter: quia illis temporibus ita ‘ ſolerent uxores vocare, quæ imperabant maritis (20). ‘ - - - - The pious wife of Paulinus, mentioned by Am- ‘ broſius, Epiſt. XXXXVI, is, by Auſonius, by way of ‘ banter, called Tanaquil; becauſe Paulinus was very ‘ obſequious to her. And from the ſame paſſage of Am- ‘ broſius we find, that Paulinus followed his wife's ad- ‘ vice in his retirement to Nola. This was the reaſon ‘ of our Poets calling his wife Tanaquil; becauſe that ‘ was the name commonly given in thoſe days to wives ‘ who governed their huſbands.’ He confirms it by a paſſage in Sidonius Apollinaris, wherein Chilperic's wife, who had a great aſcendant over her huſband, is called Tanaquil; ſhe is alſo compared with Agrippina. ‘ Quod principaliter medetur afflictis, temperat Lucumonem noſtrum Tanaquil ſua, & aures mariti viroſa ‘ ſuſurronum fæce completas, opportunitate falſi ſermonis eruderat, cujus ſtudio factum ſcire vos par eſt, ‘ nihil interim quieti fratrum communium apud animum communis patroni juniorum Cybiratarum venena nocuiſſe, neque quicquam (Deo propitiante) nocitura; ſi modo, quandiu præſens poteſtas Lugdunenſem Germaniam regit, noſtrum ſuumque Germanicum præſens Agrippina moderetur (21). - - - Her ‘ principal care was to relieve the afflicted, and our Lu- ‘ cumon was ſo far governed by his Tanaquil, that ſhe ‘ guarded his ear againſt the venomous inſinuations of ‘ whiſperers, by the ſharpneſs of her diſcourſe; nor is it ‘ amiſs for you to know that it was owing to her, that ‘ the malice of the junior Cybirates was hindred from do- ‘ ing the brotherhood of Fryers any ill, and by the favour ‘ of Heaven will always be hindred; ſo long as the pre- ‘ ſent French government ſhall ſee the preſent Agrippina ‘ continue her aſcendant over her and our Germanicus.’ Here is a prince under his wife's direction; but becauſe ſuch a direction proved advantageous to his ſubjects, it is to Tanaquil's honour. It ought to be inferred from it, that if the firſt Tarquin was governed by his wife, it was no misfortune. Another Commentator upon Auſonius obſerves, that Paulinus was not well pleaſed to have his wife compared with a queen, ambitious, and addicted to Magic (22); he would have liked better to have had her compared with Lucretia (23).

[F] It is not true that ſhe was living, when .... nor that ſhe was the mother of this Tarquin.] The two daughters of Servius Tullius and of Tarquinia, the daughter

---

(d) Notior eſt marito ſuo Tanaquil, illum inter multa regum nomina jam abſcondit antiquitas, hanc rara inter fœminas virtus altius ſæculorum omnium memoriæ, quàm ut excidere poſſit, infixit. Hieronym. adverſ. Jovinian.

(12) Sextus Pompeius Feſtus, de verborum ſignificatione, voce Prædia.

(13) Plinius, lib. xxviii, cap. iv, pag. m. 568.

(14) Quorundam partes medicæ ſunt ſicuti diximus de Pyrrhi regis pollice.

(15) In Dictionario, voce Pelops.

(16) Pliny ſays coſta, and not humerus; But he is the only author, who mentions the ivory rib of Pelops. All the reſt ſpeak of the ſhoulder. Humeroque Pelops inſignis eburno. And Pelops for his ivory ſhoulder fam'd. Virgil. Georg. lib. iii, ver. 7.

(17) Franc. Tillier, of Touraine, in his Philogame, p. 120, Paris 1578.

(18) Juvenal. Sat. VI, ver. 563.

(19) Auſon. Epiſt. xxiii, ver. 31.

(20) Scalig. in Auſon. Epiſt. xxiii, pag. m. 678.

(21) Sidon. Apollinar. Epiſt. vii, lib. v, pag. m. 328.

(22) Moleſte tuliſſe videtur Paulinus in Epiſtola ad Auſonium prima & ſecunda: & Lucretiæ illi pudiciſſimæ matronæ comparari maluit, quam iſti Tanaquili, ambitioſæ mulieri, & ſagæ. Vinetus in Auſonium, Epiſtola xxiii, pag. 678.

(23) Nec Tanaquil mihi, ſed Lucretia conjux. - - - Nor is my wife a Tanaquil, but a Lucretia, ſays he in another place.

ſhews the falſity of it, has been more ſucceſsful in confuting his predeceſſors [G] than in avoiding daughter of Tarquinius Priſcus and of Tanaquil, were married to Lucius Tarquinius, and Aruns Tarquinius. Thoſe two brothers were not like one another in any thing, any more than their two wives: one of them was an honeſt man, and the other a profligate: one of the Tullia's was an honeſt woman, and the other worthleſs. The latter was married to the honeſt man; and the other to the profligate. The wicked Tullia propoſed to the wicked Tarquin to marry her: ſhe promiſed him to make away with her huſband, and made him promiſe her to kill his wife: and before they parted, they committed inceſt. Ἀσμένως δέχεται τὰς αἱρήσεις ὁ Ταρκύνιος, καὶ αὐτίκα δοὺς αὐτῇ πίστεις, καὶ λαβὼν τὰ πρωτόλεια τῶν ἀνοσίων γάμων, καὶ διαπραξάμενος, ἀπέρχεται. Libenter conditionem accepit Tarquinius, moxque data & accepta fide, ac delibato inceſtarum nuptiarum fructu, abiit (24). Aruns Tarquinius was ſoon after poiſoned by his wife, and the eldeſt Tullia by her huſband; and then the two murderers were not long without marrying together; rather without the king's oppoſition, than with his conſent, magis non prohibente Servio quam approbante (25). Fabius Pictor had ſaid, in his Roman Hiſtory, that Tanaquil buried Aruns Tarquinius. For which he is ſeverely cenſured by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (26), who ſhews, that Tanaquil muſt have been at that time 115 years old. Here is the proof of it. Tarquinius Priſcus was at leaſt twenty-five years of age, when he went to ſettle at Rome (27). It is very probable his wife was twenty. Now they came to Rome the firſt year of the reign of Ancus Martius, according to ſome Hiſtorians, or the eighth, according to others. Let us take the latter opinion; for if they did not come to Rome ſooner, they did not certainly come later; ſince all the Hiſtorians are agreed, that Ancus Martius, in the ninth year of his reign, ſent Tarquin againſt the Latins, in quality of General of the horſe. Since therefore that prince reigned twenty-four years, it follows, that when he died Tarquin had attained his forty-ſecond year, or thereabouts, and Tanaquil the thirty-ſeventh year of her age. To which if you add the thirty-eight years of this Tarquin's reign, you will find that he died at eighty years of age, and that he left Tanaquil ſeventy-five years old. Now Aruns died the fortieth year of the reign of Servius Tullius, who ſucceeded this Tarquin. Ἐν ταῖς ἐνιαυσίαις ἀναγραφαῖς κατὰ τὸν τεσσαρακοστὸν ἐνιαυτὸν τῆς Τυλλίου ἀρχῆς τὸν Ἀρούνταν τετελευτηκότα παρειλήφαμεν. In annalibus invenimus anno regis Tullii quadrageſimo defunctum Aruntem (28). If therefore Tanaquil had been then alive, ſhe muſt have been 115 years old. Nothing can be more exact than this computation of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, nor more reaſonable than the liberty he takes of cenſuring the negligence of Fabius Pictor. Οὕτως ὀλίγον ἐστὶν ἐν ταῖς ἱστορίαις αὐτοῦ τὸ περὶ τὴν ἐξέτασιν τῆς ἀληθείας ἀταλαίπωρον. Adeo parum laboris hic ſcriptor impendit perquirendæ veritati hiſtoricæ (29). - - - So little pains appears in the hiſtory of this author towards the diſcovering of truth. He proves the ſame Fabius Pictor, and ſeveral other Hiſtorians, guilty of the like careleſſneſs, who affirm, that the two Tarquins, the ſons-in-law of Servius Tullius, were the ſons of King Tarquin. This was giving relations of things without regarding the abſurdities that might follow from them. Πανταπασι γὰρ ἀπερισκέπτως καὶ ῥαθύμως οἱ συγγραφεῖς αὐτῶν ταύτην ἐξενηνόχασι τὴν ἱστορίαν, οὐδὲν ἐξητακότες τῶν ἀναιρούντων αὐτὴν ἀδυνάτων τε καὶ ἀτόπων. Omnino enim inconſiderate ac negligenter hiſtoriam hanc prodiderunt ſcriptores Latini, non excuſſis abſurdis & impoſſibilibus quibus fides ipſorum elevetur (30). - - - For their writings have delivered this hiſtory altogether inconſiderately and raſhly, not in the leaſt examining what impoſſibilities and abſurdities lie againſt it. Let us ſee his proofs. Since Tanaquil was ſeventy-five years old, when ſhe loſt her huſband, the youngeſt of her ſons muſt have been at that time twenty-five years of age: for women leave off child-bearing, by that time they are fifty years old. The other ſon muſt have been twenty-ſeven years of age. Would they have been ſo ſilly as to ſuffer Tanaquil to deprive them of the crown, in favour of Servius Tullius? Would ſhe have been ſo fooliſh and unnatural as to exclude them from it? All theſe abſurdities are ſtrongly repreſented by the author. He adds, that if Tarquinius Superbus had been twenty-ſeven years of age, when Tarquinius Priſcus was killed, he muſt have been above ſeventy when he dethroned his father-in-law, and above ninety-five when he was expelled from Rome, and about 110 when he left off making war in perſon with the Romans. And yet he is repreſented as a man, who was in the flower of his age, when he uſurped the throne. He commanded at the ſiege of Ardea, when the Romans dethroned him. He endeavoured, for the ſpace of fourteen years, to recover the throne, being preſent at ſeveral battles (31), and diſcharging all the functions of a General. Some Hiſtorians, being ſenſible of theſe abſurdities, have ſuppoſed, that he was not the ſon of Tanaquil, but of one Gegania, the ſecond wife of Tarquinius Priſcus. But, beſides that they have no proof for it, there being no monuments extant, wherein Gegania is mentioned, they involve themſelves in ſeveral difficulties: they muſt advance, that Tarquinius Priſcus being about eighty years of age, and having two daughters married, did, nevertheleſs, marry again, and had children by his ſecond wife. Theſe laſt objections of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus are not very ſtrong; for it might be anſwered, that Gegania was married before Tarquin was extremely old, and that ſhe would not have been the only woman that has born children by a huſband about eighty years old: and that a king, who has only daughters, is willing, tho' he be never ſo old, if he finds himſelf not quite decayed, to try whether he can get ſons. This Hiſtorian had forgot one of the ſtrongeſt objections which he could have made uſe of; he does not take notice that, according to the general tradition, Tanaquil did ſo cunningly manage matters, after Tarquin's death, that ſhe raiſed Servius Tullius to the throne. Which ſhows what is ſaid of Gegania, to be fabulous and romantic. How ſurpriſing is it after all this, that Dionyſius (32) ſhould have found out but one author (33), who ſaid that the two ſons-in-law of Tullius were not the ſons of the firſt Tarquin, but his grandſons. The opinion of this ſingle author has been adopted by that great Hiſtorian. Livy was not ſo judicious; he rather choſe to follow the croud (34), and thereby involved himſelf in a great many difficulties, injurious to his memory. See Laurentius Valla's Diſſertation upon that ſubject. One can hardly apprehend how ſo great a man as Livy ſhould commit ſo many faults, in his account of the Tarquins. The greateſt objections that can be raiſed againſt Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus is this, that Tanaquil would not have endeavoured to place her ſon-in-law, Servius Tullius, on the throne, had ſhe had two grandſons: but it may be anſwered, that they were in their cradle, and that the ſtate of affairs required a ſucceſſor, of an age that might enable him to reign vigorouſly, and by himſelf. She was obliged therefore to prefer her ſon-in-law to her grandſons.

[G] The Hiſtorian . . . . . has been more ſucceſsful in confuting . . . . than in avoiding miſtakes himſelf.] He fell into his own ſnare; for he aſcribes to Tanaquil a daughter, of whom it is no leſs abſurd, that ſhe ſhould be the mother, than that Lucius Turquinius, and Aruns, ſhould be her ſons. He pretends (35), that Brutus was the ſon of Tarquinia, the daughter of Tarquinius Priſcus, and of Tanaquil; and ſays, that Brutus was very young, when his father and eldeſt brother were put to death, by order of Tarquinius Superbus. Let us turn his arguments againſt himſelf. If the mother of this Brutus was Tanaquil's daughter, ſhe was twenty-five years of age, when her father was aſſaſſinated, and ſixty-nine when Tarquinius Superbus uſurped the crown. Brutus muſt then have been nineteen years of age at leaſt. It is not likely that Tarquin put to death his brother-in-law, and his nephew, the ſame year he took away Servius Tullius's life. It is probable he had the policy to leave ſome intervals between his great crimes. We may therefore ſay, that Brutus was at leaſt twenty years of age, when his father was put to death; but if he had been of that age, would he not have had an opportunity ſhewing his parts? Whoever undertakes to conceal a great courage, a noble ſoul, and a great deſign, under the outſide of a fool, muſt needs be a man of a great genius to do it conſiſtently. Brutus did admirably ſucceed in hiding thoſe things, under the falſe appearance of ſtupidity. He therefore had a great addreſs, and noble qualifications: theſe

(24) Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. iv, pag. 234, Edit. Lipſ. 1691.

(25) Livius, lib. i, pag. 29.

(26) Dionyſ. Halicarn. ubi ſupra.

(27) Idem, lib. iii, pag. 211.

(28) Idem, lib. iv, pag. 234.

(29) Id. ibid.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 211.

(31) According to Livy, lib. ii, pag. 48, he drove his horſe againſt the Roman Dictator, at the head of his army, and was wounded.

(32) Lib. iv, pag. 213.

(33) Lucius Piſo Frugi.

(34) Hic L. Tarquinius, Priſci Tarquinii regis filius neposne fuerit, parum liquet: pluribus tamen auctoribus filium crediderim. Titus Livius, lib. i, pag. m. 29, A.

(35) Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. iv, pag. 264.

avoiding miſtakes himſelf.

theſe he muſt have diſcovered before his father's death; and therefore would have had the ſame fate with his eldeſt brother: the tyrant would have deſtroyed them both, for fear they ſhould revenge the death of their father. It muſt therefore be ſaid, that Brutus had not yet diſcovered his natural endowments, conſequently he was not nineteen years of age, when Tullius was dethroned. Let us allow him to be fifteen, as I have done in his article (36), according to which ſuppoſition he will appear to be born in the fifty-fourth year of his mother's life, which will deſtroy ſome of the objections of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus.

(36) See the remark [D] in that article.

Laurentius Valla urges againſt Livy, the argument taken from the age of Tarquin's ſons, as if that Hiſtorian had ſaid, that Brutus and they were of the ſame age: but I do not find that Livy ſays ſo, nor that it can be inferred from Brutus's going with them to Delphi. This would prove a very ſtrong argment againſt Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, who tells us, that the marriage of Tarquin and Tullia falls in the fortieth year of Servius Tullius's reign (37); from whence it follows, that Tarquin's children were but two or three years of age, when their father uſurped the throne. If therefore it was neceſſary for Brutus to be nearly of the ſame age, he muſt have been born in the 65th, or 66th year of his mother's life. I would not much inſiſt upon this proof: for tho' that Hiſtorian informs us, that Tarquin would have Brutus to be bred up with his own children, it is not allowable to charge him with having pretended that they were not a great deal younger than Brutus. Διαιτᾶσθαί τε μετὰ τῶν οἰκείων παίδων ἐπέτρεπεν, οὐ διὰ τιμὴν, ὡς ἐσκήπτετο πρὸς τοὺς πέλας, οἷα δὴ συγγενὴς, ἀλλ᾽ ἵνα γέλωτα παρέχῃ τοῖς μειρακίοις, λέγων τε ἀνόητα πολλὰ, καὶ πράττων ὅμοια τοῖς κατ᾽ ἀλήθειαν ἠλιθίοις. Verſarique inter liberos ſuos patiebatur, non honoris cauſa, ut videri voluit, quaſi cognatum; ſed ut ridiculis dictis factiſque oblectamento eſſet adoleſcentibus, quemadmodum ſolent veri fatui (38). A youth of eighteen or twenty years may be placed with Princes of ſeven or eight years of age, to be their companion; eſpecially when ſuch a familiarity, a vain piece of honour, is only deſigned for their diverſion. In reality, it muſt of neceſſity be acknowledged, that they were younger than he; for he had children old enough to engage in a conſpiracy, when (39) the eldeſt of Tarquin's ſons was not yet thirty years of age. I muſt take notice of a miſtake in theſe four propoſitions of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus: I. That if Tarquinius Superbus had been the ſon of the firſt Tarquin, he would have been twenty-ſeven years old, when the firſt Tarquin was killed. II. That Servius Tullius would have been only three years older than he. Τρισὶ μόνον ἔτεσι θατέρου πρεσβύτερος ἦν. Triennio tantum eorum alterum antecederet (40). III. That Servius Tullius was forty years in poſſeſſion of the crown, which was placed upon his head, after the death of the firſt Tarquin. IV. And that therefore, Tarquinius Superbus would have been above ſeventy years old, when Servius Tullius was dethroned. This is a very falſe conſequence; and rather than aſcribe it to the Hiſtorian, I ſhould chuſe to ſay, that the tranſcribers ſkipped the word τέτταρας, quatuor; for he could not be ignorant that Servius Tullius reigned forty-four years.

(37) Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. iv, pag. 234.

(38) Id. ibid. pag. 264.

(39) The year in which Tarquin was expelled. But he was expelled the 25th year of his reign and he began to reign four years after he married Tullia; for Servius Tullius was dethroned the 44th year of his reign.

(40) Ibid. pag. 212.

Have you obſerved, ſaid one to me the other day, that Henry Glareanus (41), having read Valla's Diſſertation, and Dionyſius's Arguments againſt Fabius Pictor's opinion, does nevertheleſs adopt that opinion? It is upon this foot he has branched out the pedigree of the Tarquins. He makes the two ſons-in-law of Servius Tullius to be the ſons of the firſt Tarquin: he gives him alſo Brutus's mother for his daughter. I do not much wonder, that Stephen Paſquier (42) has committed the ſame fault (43), for, perhaps, he never heard of Valla's book, nor took any notice of the diſpute of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus againſt Fabius Pictor, and the other Roman Hiſtorians. I know Glareanus acknowledges, that the opinion of Dionyſius is grounded on good reaſons, multis id ac digniſſimis aſtruens argumentis. Generally ſpeaking, they are the ſame with thoſe made uſe of by Laurentius Valla. However, I believe, with Glareanus, that he did not ſteal them from this antient Hiſtorian: he had read the old authors: but after all, more learned men than he are not aware while they are compoſing, that ſuch or ſuch things are to be found in Plutarch, or Diodorus Siculus, &c. He proteſts, he knew not that Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus had made uſe of thoſe arguments, and he is much more ingenuous than Perottus and Politian in acknowledging from what authors he takes what is not his own. 'Niſi quis Dionyſium 'ab eo non lectum, atque eum ſuopte hoc ingenio ex'piſcatum contendat, quod ipſe fatetur in priore de'fenſione adverſus Benedictum Morandum quendam. 'Nam ut de Valla aliud ſuſpicer ejus candor obſtat. 'Liberè enim ac ingenuè ubique fateri ſolet, per quos 'profecerit, & unde habuerit quod ſcripſerit: ſecus certè 'atque Perottus in ſuo cornu, aut in ſuis operibus Poli'tianus, gloriolæ ac popularis auræ captatores, ut 'mihi quidem viſum eſt, etſi bonæ literæ eis multum 'debent (44). - - - - Unleſs any one will inſiſt that he 'had never read Dionyſius, but had fiſhed this out by 'his own ingenuity, as he confeſſes in a former defence 'againſt one Benedictus Morandus. For to ſuſpect any 'thing elſe of Valla, his candor forbids. Since he freely 'and ingenuouſly every where owns the authors he is be'holden to, and from whom he borrows what he writes: 'a conduct certainly very different from that of Perottus 'and Politian in their works, who ſeem to me to be am'bitious of a little glory and popular applauſe, tho' other'wiſe the learned world is not a little indebted to them.' I heard this perſon out patiently, and afterwards ſhewed him, that Glareanus declares plainly enough againſt Livy, and acquaints his readers, that he gives the genealogy of the Tarquins only according to the plan of that author. I farther alledged a very probable reaſon againſt thoſe, who charge Valla with Plagiariſm in this particular, viz. that he did not make uſe of an obſervation which might have ſtrengthned his arguments, and was to be met with in Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (45).

(41) Glareanus, in Annotationibus ad Librum I T. Livii, pag. m. 40.

(42) In the 7th Letter of the 9th book, pag. m. 546.

(43) Except that he ſays, pag. 548, that Brutus was Tarquin's couſin-german; wherein he is miſtaken.

(44) Glareanus, ubi ſupra.

(45) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus ſhews, that Lucumon went to Rome the 8th year of Ancus's reign at the fartheſt; from whence it follows, that he lived 16 years at Rome before he was a king. But Valla ſays he lived there only ten years.

TANDEMUS (a), an Heretic, who roſe in Germany, under the Emperor Henry V, about the year 1124, and ſpread his errors particularly among the citizens of Antwerp. He was a lay-man, who had his tongue well hung, and in ſubtilty of wit, eloquence, and many other reſpects, exceeded the greateſt ſcholars of his time. He was magnificent in his apparel [A], kept a good table, and was attended by three thouſand armed men; by whoſe means he brought about what the charms of his language could not effect. He had infatuated his followers to ſuch a degree, that they drank the water in which he bathed himſelf, and preſerved it as a relic. One may very well wonder, though perhaps it is no wonder at all, how he could ſeduce many people with doctrines and actions ſo ſhocking as his were. He maintained, that it was no ſenſual action, but rather a ſpiritual one, to lye with a maid in her mother's preſence, and with a wife in the ſight of her huſband, and he himſelf practiſed that doctrine. He killed thoſe whom he could not convince. He aſcribed no virtue to the ſacrament of the Euchariſt, and acknowledged no diſtinction between lay-men, and thoſe who had taken orders. A prieſt

(a) He is alſo called Tanchelinus.

[A] He was magnificent in his apparel.] This is a killing blow for Moreri, who ſays (1), that Tandemus revived the Hereſy of the Adamites. Theſe had for their diſtinguiſhing character the doctrine of nakedneſs: but no body obſerves, that Tandemus was for having every one to ſhew his whole body, as Adam

and

(1) At the word Adamites.

prieſt he happened to meet with in a boat, gave him a blow on the head, which killed him. His errors were not quickly extirpated; but at length thoſe erring people were brought back into the pale of the Church. Norbert (b) was the chief inſtrument of their converſion; and ſo moved both men and women that they brought back the hoſts they had kept for the ſpace of ten years in ſome holes or trunks (c).

(b) He was the founder of the order of the Premonſtratenſes.

(c) Prateolus, voce Tandemus, ex Sigeberto.

and Eve did theirs before the Fall. On the contrary, he loved to be richly dreſſed. ' In pretioſo habitu, ' & veſtibus deauratis incedens (2). - - - He went in ' rich habits adorned with gold.'

(2) Prateol. in Elencho Hæreſ. voce Tandemus.

TAPHIANS. A people ſituate towards Acarnania, the ſame with the Teleboes. See the remarks in the article TELEBOES.

TAPPERUS (RUARDUS) a native of Enchuyſen in Holland, lived in the XVIth century. He ſtudied Philoſophy and Divinity at Louvain, where he was profeſſor of Divinity thirty-nine years, and Dean of St Peter's Church about twenty-four years. He was alſo chancellor of the univerſity. He followed ſometimes the court of the Emperor Charles V, and was conſulted by that prince upon ſeveral important occaſions (a). Some ſay, that thoſe avocations hindered him from throughly ſtudying the doctrine of Grace [A], and that not having read St Auguſtin carefully, and being deſirous of keeping at too great a diſtance from the Proteſtants, he approached too near Pelagianiſm [B]. He was deputed to the council of Trent as the Emperor's Divine, in the year 1551 (b), where he diſcovered a great capacity (c), and immediately upon his return, he ſet up for a party-leader againſt Michael Baius (d), who ſtrictly adhered to St Auguſtin's doctrine on the articles of Predeſtination and Free-will. He died at Bruſſels the ſecond of March 1559, at ſeventy-one years of age [C], and was buried at (a) Valer. Andræas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 802.

(b) Opera Baii, Part. ii, pag. 191, Edit. 1696.

(c) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 803.

(d) Opera Baii, ibid. pag. 207, 217.

[A] Thoſe avocations hindered him from ſtudying throughly the doctrine of Grace.] ' He would never ' have departed from the common doctrine of the uni- ' verſity (1), had not his attendance at court, and ' extraordinary occupations, deprived him of the ' time he ought to have ſpent in reading St Auguſtin, ' before he filled his head with the notions of a new ' Divinity.' This is what I find in page 48 of a book printed in 1688, with this title, Apologie Hiſtorique de deux Cenſures de Louvain & de Douay ſur la matiere de la Grace.

(1) That is the univerſity of Louvain.

[B] Being deſirous of keeping at too great a diſtance from the Proteſtants, he approached too near Pelagianiſm.] ' The deſire of being always, and in every thing, of a ' contrary opinion to the new Heretics, was a com- ' mon temptation at that time, which made ſome ' great men depart from tradition. Tapperus was one ' of them. . . . . Peter Soto, that learned Dominican, ' Confeſſor to Charles V . . . wrote a long and learned ' letter to Tapperus, wherein he ſhewed him, that he ' could not follow thoſe new opinions, without run- ' ning into Pelagianiſm (2).' Soto was in the right to addreſs him in theſe terms; for Tapperus taught, in expreſs words, that man is able to do many good actions by the meer ſtrength of nature, and without the aſſiſtance of Grace; Sine Gratia ex viribus naturæ multa bona ab hominibus fieri poſſe (3), and that the wicked and the infidels might glorify and worſhip GOD, and avoid ſin, without any other aſſiſtance than that of nature. ' Quòd Impii & Infideles per ſolam ' naturæ legem, ſicut Deum cognoſcere, ita eum ſo- ' lum adorare & glorificare potuerunt: & quòd Impius ' & Infidelis ſolis naturæ talentis naturalibuſque viribus ' relictus poſſit vitare peccata: quia, inquit, diſcernit ' inter multa licita atque illicita, ita pro tempore & lo- ' co poteſt non peccare, nolle fornicari, ex eo quod ' judicat illa eſſe illicita. OMNE ENIM QUOD MA- ' LUM ESSE NOVIT, ODISSE ATQUE ABOMI- ' NARI POTEST (4). - - That the wicked, and the In- ' fidels, by the law of nature only, as they were able know ' GOD, ſo might they worſhip and glorify him; and ' that a wicked man, or an Infidel, left only to his natu- ' ral ſtrength and talents, might avoid ſin: becauſe, ſays ' he, he can diſtinguiſh between the lawfulneſs and un- ' lawfulneſs of a great many things, and conſequently can, ' at the proper times, and occaſions, avoid ſinning, reſolve ' againſt fornication, from his judging them to be unlaw- ' ful. FOR EVERY THING WHICH HE KNOWS ' TO BE EVIL, HE MAY HATE AND ABOMI- ' NATE.' He maintained, that a man would not be guilty of ſin in not being converted, if he wanted the grace neceſſary for his converſion. ' Sic igitur deeſt ' gratia, quâ opus eſt, ut ad Deum cor converti poſ- ' ſit, NEC PECCATUM EST quòd quis non con- ' vertitur; quia non poteſt pro tunc ad Deum converti, ' & neceſſariò non convertitur, & per conſequens non ' liberè (5). - - - - If therefore the grace be wanting, ' without which the heart cannot be converted towards ' GOD, NEITHER IS IT A SIN for one not to be ' converted; becauſe it is not in his power at that time ' to be converted, and he is of neceſſity not converted, and ' conſequently not of his own free will.' Some other propoſitions of this nature, extracted out of Tapperus's book, may be ſeen in the new edition of Michael Baius's works, at page 218 of the ſecond part.

(2) Gery, Apologie Hiſtor. des Cenſures, p. 49.

(3) Ruard. Tapper. in Art. vii, contra Proteſtantes, apud Opera Mich. Baii, Part. ii, p. 218, Edit. 1696.

(4) Oper. Baii, ibid.

(5) Ibid.

[C] He died . . . . the ſecond of March 1559, and at ſeventy-one years of age (6).] It will be ſaid, perhaps, by ſome, that Moreri has here committed two miſtakes: I. In putting 1559 in the room of 1558. II. In affirming, notwithſtanding this, that Tapperus died at his return from the council. Would he have ſaid ſo, if he had known, that Tapperus returned from Trent to Louvain in the year 1552? He found the firſt miſtake in Valerius Andreas; but how came he not to find there alſo the correction of that miſtake? The two Latin verſes wherein the numeral letters point out the day and the year of that Doctor's deceaſe, give us the year 1558. Moreri quotes them after Valerius Andreas, and therefore ought to have concluded from them, that 1559 was a fault of the preſs. Beſides, Valerius Andreas obſerves, that Tapperus's Apotheoſis was printed in the year 1558 (7). This is what may, I think, be objected to Moreri: but I have ſomething to ſay in his vindication, as to the firſt head; for he was in the right to place Tapperus's death in the year 1559: and becauſe the nature of his work did not oblige him to make any criticiſms, he may be excuſed for keeping to the Bibliotheca Belgica, without entring upon the diſcuſſion of the faults. The author of that Bibliotheque is not exact enough, he confounds his reader, and throws him into diſagreeable perplexities. He acquaints us, that the two verſes mentioned by him, point out the year in which Tapperus died; but they point out the year 1558. I add, that the Apotheoſis of that Doctor was printed in the year 1558, how can thoſe things be reconciled with the year 1559, in which he ſays Tapperus died? Why does he not remove ſuch a difficulty? Should he not have acquainted us, that the author of thoſe two verſes began the year at Eaſter? According to this reckoning, the ſecond of March, 1558, mentioned by him, is, in effect, the ſecond of March 1559. I think Valerius Andreas knew nothing of this ſolution. Note, That the author of Tapperus's Apotheoſis (8) ſuppoſes, that Tapperus died after Charles V. It is certain that this Emperor died in September 1558: which proves, that

(6) This does not agree with his Apotheoſis, where it is affirmed, that he was born the 15th of February 1485.

(7) It is certain, that the Bookſeller, who printed that Apotheoſis, put 1558, at the end of the advertiſment to the reader.

(8) Fol. m. A5 verſo.

at Louvain (e). He left his eſtate to the poor, and his books to the Faculty of Divinity (f). I will give the catalogue of his works [D], and ſome extracts of that doctor's Apotheoſis [E]. His violent zeal againſt the Proteſtants did not prevent his declaring that that the ſecond of March, on which Tapperus died, belongs to the following year, and that the Apotheoſis was not printed till the year 1559 (9).

[D] I ſhall give the catalogue of his works.] He publiſhed in two volumes in folio, at Louvain, 1555; Explicationes in articulos circa Eccleſiaſtica dogmata hoc ſæculo controverſa, à Facultate Theologica Academiæ Lovanienſis Caroli V. Imp. juſſu collectos. His Orationes Theologicæ una cum corollario de veris calamitatum Belgii cauſis atque remediis, were publiſhed by Lindanus at Cologn in the year 1577, in 8vo. An edition of his works in folio was printed in the ſame town, in the year 1582. The original of his treatiſe, de Providentia Dei & Prædeſtinatione is kept at Louvain; but it is written in ſo bad a hand that no body could ever decypher it (10).

(E) . . . . And ſome extracts of his Apotheoſis.] The edition I make uſe of is that of Baſil 1567, in 8vo. The title of it runs thus (11). D. Ruardi Tappart Enchuſani, hæreticæ pravitatis primi & poſtremi per Belgicum inquiſitoris, Cancellarii Academiæ Lovanienſis, Apotheoſis: Gratiano vero autore: Lege lector funeſtiſſimam eccleſiaſticorum tyrannidem, qua quid profecerint demonſtrabit, niſi Deus avertat, totius tandem inferioris Germaniæ excidium: liber ante octo annos primum editus fuit, ſed ita ut omnia iſta, quæ nunc præſentibus motibus gliſcunt, tanquam in ſpeculo oſtenderit. Tuum igitur eſt collatis omnibus inter ſe, judicium facere quàm nihil autorem præſagientem fefellerit. It is a dialogue between Tapperus, a Genius, and St Peter. We find in it, that Tapperus aſpired to the biſhopric of Louvain (12). That when he delivered, in the ſame town, a panegyric upon Maximilian King of Bohemia, that prince ſilenced him with theſe words; I have heard what he will ſay, as well as what he has already ſaid; that he had an extream averſion to thoſe who talked of permitting the clergy to marry, and exhorted the latter to beg of God, that he would be pleaſed to deliver them from the temptation of the fleſh by ſome dreams; or, if ſuch a remedy was not ſufficient, to be prudent, when they could not be chaſte: Ad cœlibatum ſervandum, vitandumque conjugium ſoleo noſtris orgiis initiatos hortari ut quoties ſentirent deſiderio humanitatis intumuiſſe venas, orarent Deum, ut ab ea imbecillitate liberaret ipſos per ſomnia, & nocturnas pollutiunculas. Si ne hoc quidem prodeſſet, quod non poſſent caſtè, facerent cautè, nec admitterent ullo pacto in animos ſuos flagitioſam cogitationem de conjugio ſacerdotum: That his firſt exploit againſt the ſectaries, was to cauſe John Vordenas to be burnt at the Hague, who maintained, that he had done well to marry, though he was a prieſt: That the city of Antwerp, for fear of loſing their trade, did not approve that the heretics ſhould be perſecuted; and that he adviſed the King of Spain to order it to be burnt, that the other towns might be terrified by ſuch a ſevere puniſhment: That he was deputed to Trent, where he ſpoke firſt as being the eldeſt of his colleagues: That the Spaniards themſelves laughed at his ſpeech: That he loſt a great many books in his return to Louvain: That, after his return, he and his colleagues cauſed all the tranſlations of the ſcripture to be condemned, except the Vulgar: That they endeavoured to deſtroy all the works of Eraſmus, but could not ſucceed in it, being thwarted by the Preſident of Brabant, and the Biſhop of Arras: That Sleidan's hiſtory proved a moſt pernicious poiſon, which every body greedily ſwallowed: That it was tranſlated into all ſorts of languages: That the emperor commended that Hiſtorian for his faithfulneſs, and was ſurprized to find in it ſo many hidden truths (13). That it could not be put into the Index of prohibited books, before it had been read over and over by every body: ‘ Tunc demum (ſi diis placet) Sleydani nomen ridiculè adjectum eſt catalogo noſtro, cum omnes (inquam) ut ungues ſuos tenerent, aut potius ſatietate nauſearent. Antè nihil impetrari potuit (14). - - - - Then at laſt (as Heaven would have it) Sleidan's name was ridiculouſly added to our Index, when every body, I ſay, had got him by heart, or rather were grown tired with him. Before this nothing could be obtained.' That the great care taken to get the books of the Proteſtants condemned, was not ſufficient to prevent the artifices of the Bookſellers: That by altering or leaving out the names of the authors, many dangerous books were put off, and the Inquiſitors impoſed upon; and that it fell out ſometimes, that they condemned a book, which they had before approved of. ‘ Quanquam ne ſic quidem cavere potuimus quin typographi, homines verſutiſſimi impoſuerint nobis: mutatis autorum nominibus, vel omiſſis, vel inverſis, vel etiam Græcè redditis quæ erant Latina, & è contrà: ut ſæpe coacti ſimus quæ antè approbaveramus, ea damnare poſt, vix auſi profiteri apud regem noſtram ſimplicitatem. Nam ex titulis librorum æſtimanda nobis omnia erant, cùm non vacarit perlegere quæ intus erant, quorum quædam ita etiam erant obſcura & ingenioſa (qua fraude ſemper hæretici abundarunt) ut quid ſcriberetur, non aſſequeremur. Ad quem modum turpiter nos decepit Philippi Melanchthonis libellus de Theologia Chriſtiana, qui titulo Hippophili Melangæi paſſim ſenatorum, præſidum, & noſtrorum etiam Baccalaureorum manibus tritus eſt: donec amici, qui in Germania adhuc ſynceri erant, admonuerunt, ut habita ſynodo conſuleremus lexica noſtra, fore enim ut idem eſſe Philippum & Hippophilum deprehenderemus (15) . . . Idem accidit in Cœlii Secundi de providentia libello quidem non magno, ſed peſtilentiſſimo: quem ille nebulo tum primum innoteſcens Areneum inſcripſerat. Nos enim rati eſſe poeticum, aut grammaticum figmentum, non ante olfaciebamus fucum quàm omnia exemplaria eſſent Lovanii diſtracta. Taceo de Hutteno, Calvino, Urbano Rhegio, & aliis (prò dolor) multis, quos nobis oſcitantibus neſcio quibus titulis, ex metamorphoſi opinor Ovidiana petitis, inſinuaverunt (16). - - - - Altho' even all this care was not ſufficient to prevent the Bookſellers, who are a very cunning ſort of people, from impoſing upon us: by changing authors names, omitting, tranſpoſing, or even tranſlating into Greek what was Latin, & vice verſa; ſo that we were often forced to condemn what we had before approved, and ſcarce durſt own our ſimplicity before the king. For all the judgment we could be able to make, was only from the titles of the books, as we had not time enough to read their contents, and there were ſome of them ſo obſcurely and artfully contrived, the Heretics being always ready at this ſort of deceit, that we could not be certain what ſubject was treated of. We were baſely impoſed upon in this manner by Philip Melanchthon's book de Theologia Chriſtiana, which, under the name of Hippophilus Melangæus, paſſed every where currently thro' the hands of our ſenators, preſidents, and even the bachelors of our univerſity, till ſome of our orthodox friends in Germany, adviſed us to call a ſynod, in order to conſult our Lexicons, for that we ſhould find Philippus and Hippophilus to mean the ſame thing. . . . . The like impoſition happened in regard to Cœlius Secundus's book concerning Providence, not great indeed, but very pernicious: which the vile author then firſt appearing intitled Areneus. We believing it to be ſome poetical or grammatical fiction, did not diſcover the cheat, till all the copies brought to Louvain, were ſold off. I omit Hutten, Calvin, Urban Regius and others, alas too many, whoſe works they ſold under our noſes, by I know not what titles borrowed: I think from Ovid's Metamorphoſis.' Afterwards Tapperus tells us, that he forced ſeveral ſtudents in Louvain to recant, and pay a fine: That he cauſed ſome others of them to be burnt and beheaded: That ſome women of good families were by his order buried alive (17). That he perſecuted Perſevald, a Rhetorician, who ſpoke ill of the inquiſitors: That, fearing this accuſed perſon would prove his innocence, ſince he was favoured by ſeveral people, he brought againſt him a charge of Sodomy, which deprived him of moſt of his protectors (18). That he privately condemned him to perpetual impriſonment; but, that in order to avoid the charges of maintaining this priſoner, or the odium of having let him ſtarve, he delivered him to a gentleman, who interceded for him: That afterwards he forced that gentleman to anſwer for the guilt of that interceſſion, and condemned him to forfeit his whole

---

(e) Valer. Andr. ibid.

(f) Id. ibid.

(9) It is ſaid in the title of the edition of 1567, that this work had been printed eight years before.

(10) Taken from Valerius Andreas, ubi ſupra, pag. 803. See alſo Poſſevin, Appar. Tom. ii, pag. 316.

(11) You will find the title of the firſt edition at the end of this remark.

(12) Epiſcopatum Lovanienſem ſperaſti. Apopb. circa init. But how can this be, will ſome ſay, ſince Louvain is not an epiſcopal town? The anſwer is, that the abbots of Aſlebem, St Bernard, and Tongerlo, who oppoſed the erection of the new biſhoprics, endeavoured to reduce them to one only, which was to be at Louvain. See Brandt, in his Hiſtory of the Reformation, Tom. i, p. 239.

(13) Ipſe Cæſar delectatus lectione obſtupuerat ſecretiſſimarum (quas videbat) rerum narratione, & commendabat veritatem. Apoth. Ruardi Tappart, folio D verſo.

(14) Ibid.

(15) Ibid. folio D 2 verſo.

(16) Ibid. fol. 3 verſo.

(17) Mulieres primarias & optimis in urbe prognatas terra obruendas (ut vivæ erant) curavi. Ibid. fol. E verſo.

(18) Homini cæco & deformi maſculi amoris infamiam affinxi, ſtatimque ocius Euro à favore cauſæ pleroſque deterrui. Ibid.

that what is ſaid in the ſixth chapter of St John's Goſpel does not concern the Lord's-Supper, though the Fathers have applied the words of this Evangeliſt to that myſtery in their ſermons (g). This opinion of his was confuted (h). He eſteemed Fauſtus Regienſis to be orthodox [F]. Lindanus beſtowed ſingular praiſes upon him, and believes, that Tapperus was endowed with the gift of prophecy [G].

whole eſtate. I omit a long account of the proceedings againſt Angelus Emphlitius, a Paris divine. Fraud and violence had here an equal ſhare. It is obſerved, in the preamble to that account, that Bartholomew Latomus compared the Chriſtian Church to a bear's cub, which could not receive its true ſhape, till it had been licked for many ages: Perinde ac ſi religionem Chriſtianam urſa aliqua peperiſſet, quam non una mater tamen lambendo detergeret atque efformaret, ſed mille quingentorum annorum ſomnia (19). Here follows a reflexion of the author of the Apotheoſis. 'O cæci! Chriſti lex æterna eſt, nec eget maturatione temporum, ut ſtabilitatem conſequatur. Alioqui primis eccleſiæ membris magna fuiſſet injuria facta, ſi quid ad illorum inſtitutionem defuiſſet cujus percipiendi edentula iſta mundi ſenecta demum capax fuiſſet. - - - - O ye blind! The law of Chriſt is eternal, and it wants not to be ripened by time to gain its perfections. Otherwiſe the firſt members of the Church muſt have ſuffered great hardſhip, if any had been wanting in their inſtitution, which the toothleſs old age of the world might afterwards have been capable of perceiving.'

Let us here, by the way, take notice of the fate of controverſies. At that time the objections of the Proteſtants forced Latomus to maintain, that the beginning of Chriſtianity was a chaos, which had been diſentangled by degrees (20). The Proteſtants were continually ſaying, that things ſhould be brought to the firſt inſtitution; and that whatever was not preſcribed in the ſcripture ſhould be aboliſhed. What courſe did he take to anſwer them? He bethought himſelf of this hypotheſis, that the Church had attained to perfection only by degrees. The above-mentioned reflexion, which was the Proteſtants reply, is the foundation of a book which the Biſhop of Meaux wrote againſt them, an hundred and forty years after (21). What courſe did M. Jurieu take to anſwer him? He revived Latomus's hypotheſis (22). What an exchange is this? Sors omnia verſat.

Note, it is ſuppoſed, that Tapperus confeſſes he had performed the part of a midwife in a boat, without knowing what he did, and without having heard that children came into the world in that manner; believing ſtill what his mother had told him, that they came out of the parſley-bed. 'Ecce auditus vagitus eſt (ut ſit verbo venia) neſcio quo loco . . . . . . Dii talem terris avertite peſtem: ego inde prodire infantulos putaſſem? . . . . . . Mater mihi perſuaſerat apud nos è proximis arundinetis dari mulieribus (23). - - - - Behold I heard a ſqualling (you will pardon the expreſſion) I know not from what quarter . . . . . . Ye gods avert ſo dreadful a ſcene: could I have ever believed children to come from thence . . . . My mother had perſuaded me that women had them from among the reeds.' Note alſo, that, though he is made to confeſs, that he felt, ſince that time, the motions of luſt, and looked upon his ſervant-maids, with ſome ſort of temptation (24.) Yet he is not contradicted, when he proteſts, that he had never lain with a woman, nor even ſaluted any (25). He did not come off with being inſtrumental in the delivery of one: For at his coming out of the boat, he was ſurrounded by a great number of country women, who hurried him into a tavern, and forced him to be god-father to the child, and to pay the reckoning. He had not one penny left, when he had paid for the entertainment that was made at his coſt: 'Emunctus ſum omni pecunia: nec potui redimere ubi navem appuliſſemus quin fierem compater hominis quem nunquam vidi. Pertrahebant me in diverſorium paluſtres mulierculæ bibaciſſimæ, vocatus ſacrificus æque ſobrius . . . . . omnes certatim paſcebantur tanti compatris largitate . . . . nunquam nudior, nec ſordidior redii domum (26). - - - - I was chouſed of all my money: nor could I get aſhore again, without becoming goſſip to the child of a man I never ſaw. I was dragged to a tavern by ſome drunken jades who belonged to the fens, the prieſt was called, who was no ſoberer . . . . . . they all fell to as if for a wager, at the coſt of my god-fatherſhip . . . . I never got home in a poorer or dirtier condition.' His exploits againſt the Anabaptiſts are not forgotten in the Apotheoſis, nor his pernicious maxims, or methods of inquiſition. Take notice, that Valerius Andreas confeſſes, that this piece does very well diſcover Tapperus's conduct. 'Cæterum, ſays he (27), Apotheoſin R. Tappero ſcripſit Henr. Geldorpius, editam ann. 1558 in 4to. Verum ſannis & ſcommatibus plena genium auctoris ſui prodit: ex qua alioqui ſummi illius viri ACTA DILUCIDE PATENT. - - - - But Henry Geldorpius wrote Tapperus's Apotheoſis, publiſhed in the year 1558, in 4to. But the ſatire and banter it is full of, ſhews the genius of its author; tho' otherwiſe that great man's ACTIONS ARE TRULY EXPOSED in it.

This article being ready to be ſent to the preſs, I met with a copy of the firſt edition of the Apotheoſis. I ſhall ſet down the title of it, that it may be compared with the title of the ſecond. Clariſſ. Theologi D. Ruardi Tappart Enchuſani, hereticæ pravitatis primarii & generalis inquiſitoris, cancellarii celeberrimæ academiæ Lovanienſis, pridem inconſolabili ſuorum luctu vita functi, apotheoſis: Gratiano vero Theologiæ Baccalaureo autore. Reperies in hoc ſcripto, lector, non parum multa ſcitu digniſſima, & paucis hactenus cognita inquiſitorum hæreticæ pravitatis conſilia atque ſecreta: quæ omnibus tandem cognoſcenda proponi, in primis intereſſe reipublicæ duximus.

[F] He believed Fauſtus Regienſis to be orthodox.] He quoted him, 'calling him an venerable man: Whereupon, being informed by one of his brethren, that Fauſtus had been condemned, as being full of errors; he was very much ſurprized at it, and could not believe it, as Eſtius relates in a Theological diſcourſe, pronounced at Douay, in 1609. He had it from the doctor himſelf, who gave that information to Tapperus (28)' Here is another authority for it: 'Ut quantum Pelagianis faverit, neminem lateret, Fauſtùm regienſem epiſcopum, qui Semipelagianorum fuit anteſignanus, & cujus libri à ſancto Gelaſio papa in concilio Romano è Catholicorum albo deleti ſunt, paſſim commendat & inter patres adducit (29). - - - - That all the world might know how much he favoured Pelagianiſm, he every where commends and ranks among the Fathers Fauſtus Biſhop of Reggio, who was the leader of the Semipelagians, and whoſe works were ſtruck out of the catholic liſt by St Gelaſius the Pope, in a council at Rome.

[G] Lindanus beſtowed ſingular praiſes (30) upon him, and believed that Tapperus was endowed with the gift of prophecy.] Theſe are his words: 'Hoc ipſum certè tam vita, quam voce, cum apud nos mortalis ageret, magis præ ſe ferebat, diſerte tantum non prophetans, quæ modò peccatorum noſtrorum cauſa Belgici patimur, ſicuti & his ipſius orationibus perſpicuè prædixiſſe cernitur (31). - - - This very thing moſt certainly he more evidently pointed out while he continued with us in this mortal ſtate, both by his life and doctrine, almoſt expreſsly propheſying what we in Holland have ſuffered for the ſake of our ſins, which from theſe very orations he appears to have clearly foretold.' There was no need of being a very great prophet, to foretel, that the conduct of the Roman Catholics againſt the new religion, would occaſion great diſorders; and that a civil war would be the conſequence of their tiring out the patience of the Proteſtants.

(g) Poſſev. in Appar. Tom. ii, pag. 358.

(h) Id. ibid.

(19) Ibid. folio E 3.

(20) Ne vacillent argumenta Latomi quum rudem indigeſtamque molem vocat primitivam Eccleſiam. Ibid.

(21) See the Preface to his Hiſtoire des Variations.

(22) See his Paſtoral Letters, wherein he deſcribes the doctrine of the antient Fathers.

(23) Apotheoſ. fol. G 2.

(24) Ab eo die nunquam carui neſcio quo pruritu, nec æquis oculis aſpexi famulas meas. Ibid.

(25) Ibid. fol. G verſo. See below, citation (31), the paſſage of Lindanus.

(26) Ibid. folio G 2 verſo.

(27) Valer. Andr. ubi ſupra, pag. 803.

(28) Gery, Apol. des Cenſures, pag. 50.

(29) Opera Mich. Baii, Part. ii, pag. 218, 219.

(30) Ornamentum hujus ſæculi noſtri ſingulare . . . ſobrietatis perpetuæ exemplum, inviolatum caſtitatis & ejus virginalis ſpeculum, prudentiæ norma, eximiæ pietatis in pauperes ſpecimen, ... jejuniis frequentioribus aſſiduiſque deditus . . . . modeſtiæ regula, temperantiæ amuſſis, tolerantiæ, patientiæ, charitatis Chriſtianæ, omnis denique virtutis magiſter abſolutiſſimus. Lindanus, ubi infra, pag. 27.

(31) Lindanus, in Præfat. Orationum Theolog. Ruardi Tapperi, pag. 26. He has alſo theſe words: A Prophetarum gratia minime vacuus pleriſque piis viris crederetur: . . . . alienum à vero dixiſſe non videatur qui eum ſpiritu prophetiæ divinitus præditum fuiſſe pronunciet.

TARPA (SPURIUS METIUS, or MÆCIUS) was a Licencer, or a Critic, of the Poems, that were to be recited on the Stage. He had four colleagues, and it was neceſſary that one of them ſhould approve thoſe pieces before they were produced in public [A]. In order to it, the Poets were appointed to meet in the temple of Apollo Palatinus, where they read their works, and then the Critics paſſed their judgment upon them. Good judges were not always pleaſed with Tarpa's judgment, as appears from a paſſage of Cicero; which may be ſeen at the end of the laſt remark of this article. However it is true, that Horace, who was no flatterer, ſays nothing of that Critic but what is more in his favour than to his prejudice [B].

[A] It was neceſſary that one of them ſhould approve thoſe pieces, before they were produced in public.] This particular is to be found in one of the ſcholiaſts upon Horace, on theſe words of the tenth ſatire of the firſt book.

> .... Hæc ego ludo
> Quæ nec in æde ſonent certantia judice Tarpa,
> Nec redeant iterum atque iterum ſpectata theatris.

> Theſe lines ſhall ne'er before the audience come,
> From Tarpa's judgment to receive their doom,
> Nor ſhall they entertain the ſtage of Rome.

'Metius Tarpa, ſays he, fuit judex criticus, auditor 'aſſiduus poematum & poetarum in æde Apollinis ſeu 'Muſarum, quo convenire poetæ ſolebant ſuaque ſcripta 'recitare, quæ niſi à Tarpa aut alio critico, qui nu'mero erant quinque, probarentur, in ſcenam non de'ferebantur. - - - - Metius Tarpa, ſays he, was a cri'tical judge, a conſtant hearer of the poems and poets in 'the temple of Apollo, or of the Muſes, whither the poets 'uſed to aſſemble to recite their works, which unleſs they 'were approved by Tarpa, or ſome other critic, there be'ing five in number, were not admitted on the Stage.' This office might be compared with that of the cenſurers of books, in the countries where there is an inquiſition. It was very troubleſome, both becauſe ſo many readers were to be heard, and becauſe the cenſurers were expoſed to a double danger: For the pieces, which they rejected, made the authors very angry with them, genus irritabile vatum (1); and thoſe, that were approved, might not pleaſe the people, or perſons of judgment.

(1) Horat. Epiſt. ii, lib. ii, ver. 102.

[B] Horace .... ſays nothing of that Critic, but what is more in his favour, than to his prejudice.] Horace mentions him again in his de Arte Poetica *. And here are ſome of his words.

* Ver. 386.

> Si quid tamen olim
> Scripſeris, in Meti deſcendat judicis aures
> Et patris, & noſtras.

> If you have wrote ſome piece in poetry,
> Read it to Tarpa, to your ſire, and me.

Voſſius (2) after having obſerved, that Achilles Statius (3) confeſſes he does not remember to have read any thing concerning that Metius Tarpa any where, except in the tenth ſatire of the firſt book of Horace, ſays, that he is alſo mentioned in the tenth ſatire of the firſt book, and repeats what Horace ſays there about Tarpa. This is plainly the effect of a great abſence of mind. Voſſius remembered, that Horace mentions this Critic twice; in the tenth ſatire of the firſt book, and in his de Arte Poetica; But he forgot, that the paſſage known to Statius was that of the tenth ſatire; which is the reaſon why he refers him to it. I do not know whether he perceived that miſtake when the book was printed off; for, tho' there are many things in his Addenda which he deſires to be inſerted in the page, where Achilles Statius is mentioned, and though the paſſage concerning Metius, in Horace de Arte Poetica, is one of thoſe things; yet the reader is not told, that there is any correction to be made in that page. Here is the paſſage of Cicero, which I have promiſed to ſet down: 'Reliquas partes diei tu conſumebas his de'lectationibus quas tibi ipſe ad arbitrium tuum compara'ras: nobis autem erant ea perpetienda quæ ſcilicet 'Sp. Mæcius .... probaviſſet (4). - - - The remaining 'part of the day you employed in ſuch diverſions as you 'had been pleaſed to prepare; but we were forced to 'bear thoſe which Mætius Tarpa had approved.'

(2) Voſſius, de Imitat. & Recitat. Veterum, pag. 53.

(3) Notis ad Hor. Sat. X lib. i.

(4) Cicero, Epiſt. i, lib. vii, ad Famil.

TARRUNTIUS (a) (LUCIUS) ſirnamed Firmanus, becauſe he was a native of Firmum, a town of Italy, in the country of the Picentini, flouriſhed at the ſame time with Cicero, and was one of his friends (b). He was a Mathematical Philoſopher (c); I mean, that he pretended to a great ſkill in Judicial Aſtrology. He would be little known, had he not drawn up two Horoſcopes, mentioned by the antients, one was that of Romulus, the other that of Rome [A]. Thoſe Horoſcopes were retrograde, and we

(a) Some call him Tarrutius, being deceived by the Greek word Ταῤῥούτιος. See Salmaſius, in Solin. pag. 15.

(b) See the remark [A], citation (2).

(c) See the remark [C], citation (21), and the remark [A], citation (1).

[A] One was the Horoſcope of Romulus, the other that of Rome.] Plutarch gives the following account of it. 'Varro, who was the moſt learned of the Romans in 'hiſtory, had a particular friend named Tarrutius, 'who being both a great Philoſopher and Mathema'tician, applied himſelf out of curioſity to draw ho'roſcopes by the means of Aſtronomical tables, and 'was eſteemed the moſt eminent in his time. He 'propoſed to him to find the day and hour of the 'birth of Romulus, from the known actions of his 'life, as the ſolution of Geometrical problems is per'formed by analyſis from the data firſt laid down; for 'he maintained, that the ſame art which from a given 'nativity could predict the life which was to follow, 'might, and ought, with ſtronger reaſon, from a known 'life, exactly determine the nativity which had pre'ceded. Tarrutius performed what Varro requeſted. 'After having conſidered the inclinations and actions 'of Romulus, the time of his life, and manner of 'his death, and compared all theſe accidents toge'ther, he very poſitively pronounced, that he was 'conceived the firſt year of the IId Olympiad, the 'twenty-third day of the month which the Egyp'tians call Choiak *, about the third hour of the 'day, at which there was a total eclipſe of the ſun; 'that he was born the twenty-firſt day of the month 'Thot †, about ſun-riſing; and that the founda'tion of Rome was laid by him the ninth day of 'the month called Pharmouthi ‡, between the ſecond 'and third hour; for theſe people pretend that there 'is a certain time fixed, which governs the fortune of 'cities, as well as that of men, and that by the poſition 'and different aſpect of the ſtars may be diſcovered 'the firſt moment of their foundation (1).' Cicero relates more particularly what concerns the Horoſcope of the city of Rome, and very juſtly laughs at it. 'L. quidem Tarutius Firmanus familiaris noſter, in 'primis Chaldaicis rationibus eruditus, urbis etiam 'noſtræ natalem diem repetebat ab iis Parilibus, qui'bus eam à Romulo conditam accepimus: Romam'que in jugo quum eſſet Luna, natam eſſe dicebat, 'nec ejus fata canere dubitabat. O vim maximam 'erroris, etiam ne urbis natalis dies, ad vim ſtellarum '& lunæ pertinebat? Fac in puero referre ex qua 'affectione cœli primum ſpiritum duxerit, num hoc 'in latere, aut in cæmento, ex quibus urbs effecta eſt, 'potuit valere (2)? - - - Lucius Tarutius Firmanus, in'deed my very good friend, eminently ſkilled in the Chal'dean Aſtrology, ſearched back for the birth-day even of 'our city, from the circumſtances with which we have 'been

* December.

† September.

‡ April.

(1) Plutarch, in the Life of Romulus.

(2) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. ii, cap. xlvii.

we find ſcarce any examples of them; for there are very few Aſtrologers, who pretend to find out the moment of any perſon's birth, from the conſideration of his adventures [B]. Tarruntius, at Varro's requeſt, took that courſe, and boldly gave his anſwer as to the hour of the birth. There is reaſon to believe that he is quoted by Pliny [C].

‘ been told it was formed by Romulus: and declared ‘ that it was begun when the moon was in Libra ‘ nor did he ſcruple to predict its fortune. O the ‘ ſtrength of error, to ſuppoſe that even the birth of ‘ cities can have any relation to the influence of the moon ‘ and ſtars! if we grant that in the caſe of a child, it ‘ may be of ſome conſequence, under what diſpoſition of ‘ the Heavens it draws its firſt breath; can this have ‘ any influence over brick and mortar, the materials of ‘ a city? ’ We may obſerve a conſiderable difference between the account of Cicero and that of Plutarch. According to Cicero, Rome was founded on the day of the Palilia, that is the 21ſt of April, and therefore Tarruntius followed the common opinion (3): but according to Plutarch, he did not follow it; for he placed the foundation of that city on the ninth day of an Egyptian month (4), which day, according to ſome learned Chronologers (5), anſwered to the fourth of October. Some (6) Chronologers conjecture, that the year which the inhabitants of Alba, and Romulus made uſe of, was out of order; that the month of April correſponded with the Autumn; and that after King Numa had given a new form to the Roman year, the feſtival of Pales, which was celebrated the twenty-firſt of April, correſponded with the Spring. According to this conjecture, it might be true at the ſame time, that Rome was founded the twenty-firſt of April, of the year of the Albans, and the ninth of an Egyptian month, which correſponded with the month of October. However, Varro would not have exactly followed his friend Tarruntius, if he had ſaid poſitively that Romulus began to build Rome the twenty-firſt of April, that is, in the Spring. Note alſo, that Plutarch does not tell us in what year the city of Rome was founded, according to Tarruntius. However, it is ſaid that this Aſtrologer fixed on the third year of the VIth Olympiad. I take this opinion to be grounded upon Tarruntius's placing the conception of Romulus in the firſt year of the IId Olympiad; and upon a ſuppoſition, that, according to the common opinion, he ſaid, that Romulus built the city of Rome at eighteen years of age. Beſides, it is ſuppoſed that Varro followed Tarruntius's opinion; which is a further reaſon why it is commonly believed, that he placed the foundation of that city in the third year of the VIth Olympiad.

I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, after many Chronological computations, fixed upon the firſt year of the VIIth Olympiad for the epoch of the foundation of Rome (7). Father Labbe therefore expreſſes himſelf very ill, when he ſays (8), that ſome aſcribe that epoch to Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. An eminent Divine (9) tells us, that he was followed therein by Tarruntius and Velleius Paterculus; but that Varro had pitched upon an epoch later by two years, that is the fourth year of the VIIth Olympiad. He muſt give me leave to obſerve three or four things. I. Tarruntius wrote before Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus; for it appears from the manner in which Cicero ſpeaks of the Horoſcope of Rome that Tarruntius was then dead; and we know that Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus compoſed his Hiſtory after he had reſided twenty years at Rome (10): now he came thither ſoon after the entire defeat of Marc Antony. II. Tarruntius's opinion does not agree with that of Dionyſius; for, as we have already ſeen, he placed the foundation of Rome in the third year of the VIth Olympiad. III. Velleius Paterculus places it in the ſame year (11); and therefore does not follow the opinion of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. IV. The moſt learned Chronologers aſcribe the ſame hypotheſis both to Varro and Tarruntius, and therefore Varro's epoch is not later by two (12) years than that of Dionyſius.

[B] There are very few Aſtrologers, who pretend to find out the moment of any perſon's birth, from the conſideration of his adventures.] I do not underſtand what reaſon Mr Dacier could have to ſay; that it is always the ſureſt way to draw retrograde Horoſcopes; for an Aſtrologer may boldly infer from known actions the time of the conception and birth. Who will contradict him (13)? I anſwer, that there is nothing more eaſy than to contradict him. In moſt families the birth-day of each perſon is well known; and as for men of note, one may eaſily learn their nativity, by having recourſe to the public monuments. So that a miſtaken Aſtrologer would be quickly convicted of his error; which is the reaſon why thoſe cheats will not venture upon it. They may ſafely determine at what hour a modern king was born, for they know it and may read it in Hiſtory; and therefore they are not conſulted about ſuch things. I ſhall occaſionally take notice of a miſtake of Amyot, which Mr Dacier has not avoided. Plutarch ſays there was an eclipſe of the ſun on the day that Rome began to be built. Σύνοδον ἐκλειπτικὴν ἐν αὐτῇ γενέσθαι σελήνης πρὸς ἥλιον (14). Xylander is wrong in tranſlating thoſe Greek words thus: quo ſubiens ſolis orbem luna defecit. Amyot has not been more ſucceſsful, on which day, ſays he, there was an eclipſe of the moon. Mr Dacier renders it, and that there was an eclipſe of the moon. There is no obſcurity in the original; it expreſſes a conjunction of the ſun and moon. Now that is a time when the moon cannot be eclipſed, and the only one when the ſun can be eclipſed. An obſervation ſhould have been made upon the parentheſis, immediately following the Greek words, juſt now quoted out of Plutarch. That parentheſis runs thus: (ἦν ἔτει τρίτῳ τῆς ἕκτης ὀλυμπιάδος συμπεσοῦσαν εἰδέναι καὶ Ἀντίμαχον οἴονται τὸν Τήιον ἐποποιόν,) that is, it is thought, that the Poet Antimachus, a native of the iſle of Teos, ſaw that eclipſe of the ſun, which happened in the third year of the VIth Olympiad. The whole note of Mr Dacier (15) amounts to this, that the Poet Antimachus, mentioned by Plutarch, is the ſame, whom others will have to be a Clarian or a Colophonian, and who lived in Plato's time. If this note was right, Plutarch muſt have been groſsly miſtaken; for how could Antimachus, cotemporary with Plato, obſerve an eclipſe ſo long before he was born? To juſtify that Hiſtorian it muſt either be ſuppoſed, that he ſpeaks of an Antimachus different from him, who was cotemporary with Plato; or that he only remarks in his parentheſis, that Antimachus, cotemporary with Plato, ſpeaks of an eclipſe, which is the ſame with that of the third year of the VIth Olympiad. It is certain this is not the ſenſe of his Greek text. Father Labbe perhaps had been more in the right to cenſure Plutarch upon this account, than upon ſome other things. He obſerves (16), after Petavius, that not only in the month Pharmuthi, but alſo in the whole Julian year 3961 of the Julian period, there was no eclipſe of the ſun, that might have been obſerved in Aſia, much leſs in Italy, by that Poet Antimachus of Teos. And then he adds: ‘ Plutarch is miſtaken in ‘ this; for having ſaid that Tarruntius affirmed that ‘ Rome was built when the ſun and moon were in ‘ conjunction, he adds, of his own head, that this ‘ new moon was a true ecliptic one.’ This cenſure is falſe in ſome reſpects; for Plutarch does not ſay, that Tarruntius affirmed that the ſun was eclipſed on the day of the foundation of Rome. Tarruntius ſays this only of the day of Romulus's conception. And therefore Petavius (17) ſhould not have affirmed, that Tarruntius ſaid ſo both with reſpect to that day, and that of the foundation of Rome.

[C] There is reaſon to believe that he is quoted by Pliny.] It is in moſt editions, ‘ L. Arruntio qui ‘ Græce de aſtris ſcripſit, Cæſare Dictatore qui item ‘ (18). - - - Lucius Arruntius who wrote in Greek about ‘ the ſtars, Cæſar the Dictator who did the ſame.’ Which might make one think that Pliny ſpeaks of Arruntius, a celebrated Hiſtorian; but becauſe the beſt manuſcripts have it, L. Tauruntio, it is eaſy to gueſs at the true reading; which is, Lucio Tarruntio (19). There is a quite contrary miſtake in Solinus's manuſcripts, where we find L. Aruntius inſtead of L. Tarruntius (20); for it is plain Solinus ſpeaks of the Mathematician, who drew up the Horoſcope of Rome at Varro's requeſt. ‘ Ibi Romulus manſitavit qui au‘ ſpicato fundamenta murorum jecit duodeviginti natus ‘ annos undecimo Kalendas Majas hora poſt ſecundam ‘ ante tertiam plenam: ſicut Lucius Tarruntius pro‘ didit Mathematicorum nobiliſſimus (21). - - - There

‘ Romulus

(3) See, below, citation (21), what I quote out of Solinus, who aſcribes alſo to Tarruntius the common opinion.

(4) According to Xylander, Amyot, and Mr Dacier, the month Pharmouthi anſwered to the month of April. But Petavius is of a different opinion. See the next citation.

(5) Petavius, in Rationario Temporum, Part. ii, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. m. 157.

(6) See Father Labbe's French Chronology, Tom. i, in the introduction, ch. ix, num. 5.

(7) Dionyſ. Halic. lib. i, pag. m. 60.

(8) Labbe, Chronol. Françoiſe, in the Introduction, ch. ix, num. 5.

(9) Jaquelot, de l'Exiſtence de Dieu, pag. 11.

(10) Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. i, pag. m. 6.

(11) Sexta Olympiade poſt duos & viginti annos quam prima conſtituta fuerat Romulus. . . . . Romam urbem Parilibus in Palatio condidit. Vell. Paterc. lib. i, cap. viii.

(12) He ſhould have ſaid three years.

(13) Dacier, remarks upon the Life of Romulus, pag. m. 178.

(14) Plutarch, in Romulo, pag. 24.

(15) Dacier, Remarques ſur la Vie de Romulus, pag. 178.

(16) Labbe, ubi ſupra, num. 6.

(17) See his Rationarium Tempor. Part. ii, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. m. 159. where he refers to the 48th chapter of the ninth book of his work de Doctrina Tempor.

(18) Plin. lib. i, in Indice Autorum, lib. xviii.

(19) See Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 447.

(20) Voſſius, ibid. See alſo Salmaſ. in Solin. pag. 15.

(21) Solin cap. i, pag. 2, Edit. Salmaſ.

‘ Romulus reſided, who very auſpiciouſly laid the foundation of the walls at eighteen years of age, on the eleventh of the Kalends of May, between the ſecond and third hour: as Lucius Tarruntius, the Prince of Aſtrologers, has diſcovered.’ Note, that Pliny places our Tarruntius before Cæſar; which confirms what I have ſaid, that this Aſtrologer lived before Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus.

TARTAGLIA (NICOLAS) a native of Breſcia in Italy, lived in the XVIth century. The poverty of his parents did not prevent his becoming very illuſtrious (a). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf extremely by his knowledge in Mathematics, and compoſed among other works [A], a large treatiſe on numbers and meaſures, divided into ſix parts, which gained him a very great reputation. He taught in Milan, and frequently diſputed there with the famous Cardan [B], who did not find his account in it (b). He was afterwards called to Breſcia, and there explained Euclid, but he had ſo many reaſons to be diſſatisfied with his country, that he quitted it, and retired to Venice where he was very much eſteemed. He there met with perſons of generoſity: and received large preſents from the Senators and Ambaſſadors. Some of his books were dedicated to Henry VIII, King of England, and others to Francis Donato, Doge of Venice (c). He died at Venice towards the end of the year 1557, if we believe Thuanus (d) [C]. I ſhall take notice of a French tranſlation of his Arithmetic, and ſhall mention ſome encomiums beſtowed upon him by the tranſlator [D]. I ſhall alſo correct a miſtake in Thuanus [E].

(a) Ghilini Teatro, Tom. ii, pag. 200.

(b) Leonardo Cozzando, Libraria Breſciana, pag. 271.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Thuanus, lib. xix, circa fin.

[A] He compoſed among other works.] You will find the title of his works in Voſſius (1), Ghilini (2), Mr Teiſſier (3), and in Cozzando (4), &c. which I ſhall therefore omit. Note, that Tartaglia wrote in his mother-tongue.

[B] He frequently diſputed with . . . Cardan.] Thuanus has not expreſſed this very clearly: and his tranſlator has made it ſtill more obſcure. Hieronymi Cardani æmulatione varias quæſtiones ingenioſè pertractavit (5): that is to ſay, according to the tranſlation given by Mr Teiſſier, he has, in imitation of Cardan, ingeniouſly treated a great many different queſtions (6). This was not a bare emulation, much leſs an imitation only, but a direct quarrel. See Cozzando, at page 271 of his Libraria Breſciana nuovamente aperta, printed at Breſcia in the year 1685 in 12mo.

[C] He died . . . . towards the end of the year 1557, if we believe Thuanus.] This date is refuted by two Italian authors, Ghilini (7), and Cozzando (8), who aſſure us that he flouriſhed about the year 1560. Paulus Freherus (9), falſely charges Ghilini with ſaying that he died that year. Mr Konig (10) places his death in the year 1566.

[D] I ſhall take notice of the French tranſlation of his Arithmetic, and ſhall mention ſome encomiums beſtowed upon him by the tranſlator.] William Goſſelin has tranſlated out of Italian into French, Tartaglia's Arithmetic divided into two parts, whereof the firſt part contains ſeventeen books, and the ſecond eleven. Theſe are the two firſt parts of his great work on numbers and meaſures. This tranſlation was printed at Paris by Gilles Beys in the year 1578 (11) in 8vo, and dedicated by the author to Margaret of France, Queen of Navarre. The Epiſtle Dedicatory of the firſt part is dated from the college of Cambray in Paris the ſecond of November 1577; and that of the ſecond the twelfth of the ſame month. The firſt of thoſe two epiſtles tells us that the Queen loved Mathematics, and that on this account ſhe had retained Mr Goſſelin, the author's father, as one of her houſhold. She is exhorted to embrace with the ſame fondneſs all the other parts of Mathematics, as ſhe had done Aſtronomy and Aſtrology.

The tranſlator's Preface deſerves to be conſidered. He ſays that Luke du Bourg, an Italian Fryar, and Stephen de Ville-Franche, a Frenchman, have opened a way for us to Arithmetic; ‘ however the Italian in my ‘ opinion has greatly ſurpaſſed the Frenchman, as well ‘ in his practical rules, as in his treatiſe of irrational ‘ numbers, and of this divine Algebra; after theſe two ‘ maſters who flouriſhed much about the ſame time, ‘ have followed diſciples and ſcholars without number, ‘ who like little rivulets have all their original ‘ from theſe two fountains, but yet fall much ſhort ‘ of the depth of their ſpring heads, either for the ‘ want of capacity, or ſufficient application.’ He names ſome of the principal writers who have treated of Arithmetic, and diſtinguiſhes them by their native countries (12): but he is miſtaken in placing Tonſtal among the French, for he was an Engliſhman. He affirms that ſeveral of the moderns have decked themſelves with the ſpoils of Tartaglia; that he himſelf would not follow their example, nor rob him of the honour due to him; that it is Tartaglia who has diſpelled our wretched ignorance, and introduced ſuch a method of practice, that the whole world cannot poſſibly produce one ſhorter and eaſier; that he is an author, in compariſon with whom that great Mathematician, Luke Paccioli (13), is no more than a wart compared with a mountain . . . .; that Friar Luke, Piſano (14), and Ville-Franche, have opened the door, but committed a great many errors, and falſities; and that Nicolas Tartaglia has entered, put all their inventions into form, given a colour to the groſs out-lines they drew and projected; and laſtly, made an infinite improvement of their diſcoveries, laid open their falſities, and introduced truth. He pretends that ‘ all the ſucceeding Arithmeticians, have only ‘ tranſlated word for word the rules of the Italian ‘ authors, and principally of Tartaglia, and publiſhed ‘ them under their own name; and, what is worſe to ‘ prevent this from being diſcovered, they have inverted ‘ the whole order of our author's work, tho' ‘ they have ſtole only the moſt common things, with ‘ which they have ſtuffed their writings very confuſedly; ‘ which is the reaſon that we have at preſent in ‘ French only pieces of Arithmetic, which have their ‘ practical rules borrowed from Italian ingenuity, the ‘ order only, or rather the diſorder, is French, the obſcurity ‘ is French, the clearneſs Italian; and this was ‘ abſolutely neceſſary; for it would have been too ‘ notorious a thing to have ſeen the method, rules, ‘ examples, and brevity, of an author publiſhed under ‘ another's name: ſo that we are obliged to confeſs, ‘ to our ſhame, that the knowledge of this ſcience is ‘ hitherto ingroſſed in the hands of ſtrangers.’ He concludes with ſhewing what he has added new to this tranſlation, and which conſiſts, among other things, in the demonſtrations he has invented, or borrowed from Peter Nunes a Spaniard.

Here is an inſtance of ſincerity: he frankly confeſſes the inferiority of the French, their Plagiariſm, the ſuperiority of the Italians, &c. but he finds in this ſincerity, diſadvantageous to his country, his own particular advantage: he raiſed himſelf by this means above the level of others.

[E] I ſhall . . . . correct a miſtake in Thuanus.] We read at the end of the ninteenth book of that Hiſtorian theſe words: Qui (Tartalea) multa in eo genere a Luca Brugenſi Monacho ſolertiſſime inventa illuſtravit, multa correxit. That is to ſay, according to the tranſlation of Du Rier, Tartaglia has explained a great many things which Luke of Bruges a Monk had ingeniouſly invented, and has corrected a great many of them (15). I am inclined to believe that Thuanus had written Burgenſi, and that the Printer had changed the word to Brugenſi. This miſtake occaſioned the tranſlator to put Luke de Bruges in his tranſlation; and this might induce us to believe that the mathematical writings of this author have been corrected by Tartaglia. Nothing is more falſe. The author whoſe inventions he has adjuſted, was a Franciſcan Friar, called Lucas Paciolus, and a native of Borgo di S. Sepolcro, a town in Italy, called in Latin Burgum, or Burgus ſancti Sepulchri. There was printed at Venice in 1509, a collection of his mathematical works in Italian, in folio. He has tranſlated into Italian the books of Euclid (16).

---

(1) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 331, ex Poſſevini Bibl. Selecta, lib. xv, cap. viii.

(2) Teatro, Part. ii, pag. 200.

(3) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Elog. Tom. i, p. 119, 120, of the ſecond edition.

(4) Cozzando, Libraria Breſciana, pag. 272.

(5) Thuan. lib. xix, in fin. pag. m. 396.

(6) Teiſſier, Additions aux Elog. Tom. i, pag. 119.

(7) Ghilini, Teatro, Part. ii, pag. 200.

(8) Cozzando, ubi ſupra.

(9) Freher. in Theatro, pag. 1459.

(10) In Bibliotheca, pag. 792.

(11) I have ſaid in the article GOSSELIN, remark [A], after Du Verdier, that it was printed in the year 1577, but I here follow a copy which I have now before my eyes.

(12) He reckons among the Germans, Januer, Stifel, Achilin, Volummie, Shebellion, & Gemme Phriſien. Some of theſe names appear to be wrong ſpelt.

(13) This is the ſame with Friar Luke.

(14) It is Leonardus Piſanus who ſhould have been named before Friar Luke. For the latter has taken ſeveral things from the former.

(15) See Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 120.

(16) See Geſner's Epitome, pag. m. 549.

He has publiſhed in the ſame language a volume of Arithmetic, in which he has inſerted a treatiſe of Algebra, which is partly that of Leonardus Piſanus, the firſt of the moderns who has written on Algebra, but whoſe work was in Latin, and never yet printed (17).

(17) Blancanus in Mathematicorum Chrenologia, pag. 59.

TASSO (TORQUATO) an Itatian Poet, one of the greateſt wits of the XVIth century. See his life written by the Abbot Decharnes. It is a very curious piece (a), and may be eaſily met with. I have collected a great many faults committed by ſeveral authors in ſpeaking of this Italian author; but I am obliged to reſerve them to another opportunity. You will find an abridgment of the life of this great Poet prefixed to his Moral Treatiſes, tranſlated into French by Baudouin (b).

(a) Printed at Paris in the year 1690, and reprinted in Holland. See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, for December 1690, pag. 160.

(b) They were printed at Paris in the year 1632, in 8vo.

TAVEAU (RENATA) only daughter and heireſs of Leon Taveau, Baron of Mortemart (a), Lord of Luſſac &c (b), was married to Francis de Rochechoüart Lord of Tonnai-Charente in the XVIth century. She lived a holy life, and as ſhe was exhauſted with a long exerciſe of prayers and penitence, ſhe fell into ſo ſtrong a trance that every body believed her dead, and ſhe was accordingly buried: one of her domeſtics having obſerved that ſhe was put in her coffin with a diamond ring of great value upon her finger, got into the vault in the night to ſteal it, and found her alive . . . . . . She lived to have children afterwards. She had a very great ſhare in the good graces of Catherine de Medicis (c); but ſhe forfeited them by an incident which deſerves to be related [A]. She was mother of Renatus de Rochechoüart Baron of Mortemart, great-grandfather of the Marſhal de Vivonne [B].

(a) Anſelme, Palais d'Honneur, pag. 582.

(b) Mercure Galant, of October 1702, pag. 107.

(c) Ibid.

[A] She forfeited the good graces of Catherine de Medicis by an incident which deſerves to be related.] The firſt occaſion of her diſgrace with that Princeſs was this: happening to be one day with her in the church of St John en Greve at a ſermon of Menot, the famous Franciſcan, ſhe laid hold of the diſpoſition which ſhe found the Queen was put into by this diſcourſe of Menot, which was extremely ſtrong and pathetical, upon the irregularities of the Great, and gave her ſome good advice upon the conduct of the ladies of her court, and upon the inclination ſhe had for Aſtrology. The Queen who had ſhed a great many tears at this ſermon (to the great ſurprize of the audience, becauſe it was not at all uſual to ſee her ſhed tears upon ſuch ſubjects) received her advice kindly at the time that her ſpirits were terrified with the truths this bold Franciſcan had been pronouncing; but theſe ideas of terror being by degrees diſſipated, the advice of the Lady de Mottemarr was no longer ſeaſonable, and ſhe was ſent away to Poitou (to which place ſhe was baniſhed) to beſtow it upon ſome perſons of more ſcrupulous conſciences (1).

(1) Mercure Galant, October 1702, pag. 108, & ſeq.

[B] She was mother of Renatus de Rochechoüart . . . . great-grandfather of the Marſhal de Vivonne.] 'Who 'in 1570 married Jane de Saulx, daughter of Gaſ'pard, Lord of Tavannes, Marſhal of France, and of 'Frances de la Baume Montreuil, who was ſo learned, 'and ſo perfect a miſtreſs of the holy ſcriptures, that 'ſhe had the honour to convert a famous Rabbi 'whom ſhe overcame in a regular diſputation (2).' Let her therefore be placed from henceforth in the catalogue of learned women. Renatus de Rochechoüart was father of Gaſpard de Rochechoüart, Marquis de Mortemart, who married Louiſa de Maura, a lady of great virtue and beauty (3). She was daughter and heireſs of Charles Count de Maure (4), and of Diana Deſcars who was eſteemed one of the fineſt wits of the XVIth century (5). Gaſpard de Rochechoüart was father of Gabriel, in favour of whom the Marquiſate of Mortemart was erected in Duché-Pairie, and who was the firſt gentleman of the King's bed-chamber, and governor of Paris, and died in 1673, father of Marſhal Vivonne, and of Madam de Monteſpan, Madam de Thianges, and the Abbeſs of Fontevrard (6).

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 106.

(3) Idem, pag. 105.

(4) Le Pere Anſelme, Palais d' Honneur, pag. 584.

(5) Mercure Galant, October 1702, pag. 105.

(6) Idem, pag. 103, 104.

TAVERNIER (JOHN BAPTIST) Baron d'Aubonne [A], one of the greateſt travellers of the XVIIth century, was born at Paris in the year 1605 (a). His natural inclination to travel was very much increaſed by what he daily ſaw and heard in his father's houſe [B]. He began ſo early to gratify that paſſion, that at twenty-two years of age he had ſeen the fineſt countries in Europe; as, France, England, the Netherlands, Germany, Swiſſerland, Poland, Hungary, and Italy (b). He travelled ſix times into Turkey, Perſia, and the Eaſt-Indies, during the ſpace of forty years, and by all the different routs it was poſſible to take (c). He was making a ſeventh journey when he died at Moſcow in July 1689 (d). He had got a great eſtate by dealing in jewels; and yet he found himſelf in low circumſtances towards the latter end of his life, by reaſon of the miſconduct of one of his nephews, who had in the Levant the direction of a cargo made in France, amounting to two hundred twenty-two thouſand livres prime coſt; which ought to have produced above a million (e). It is thought he undertook his laſt journey in hopes of making up that loſs. He had collected a great many obſervations (f); but he had never learned either to ſpeak or write good French, and therefore the relations he has given us were drawn up by another hand [C]. In one of them he ſpeaks very ill

(a) It appears from his Print prefixed to the firſt volume of his Travels, that he was 74 years old in 1679.

(b) Tavernier, Preface to the firſt volume of his Travels.

(c) See the title of the ſame volume.

(d) Mercure Galant, for February 1690. The author is miſtaken, when he ſays that Tavernier was 89 years old in July 1689.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Some of which are meer fables, which they made him believe to impoſe upon his ſimplicity. See Doctor Gio: Franceſco Gemelli Careri, pag. 138, 139, of the ſecond Tome of his Giro del Mondo, printed at Naples in the year 1699, in 12mo.

[A] Baron d'Aubonne.] Being made noble by the King of France, he bought that Barony, ſituated in that part of the Canton of Bern called le païs de Vaud, near the lake of Geneva. He was obliged to part with it, either to pay his debts, or to make the neceſſary preparations for his laſt voyage into the Eaſt Indies. Mr du Queſne (1) bought it, and retired thither after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He is ſtill in poſſeſſion of it, and reſides there, preferring that retirement to the great employments he might have pretended to by changing his religion.

(1) Eldeſt ſon to Mr du Queſne the greateſt ſeaman that ever was in France.

[B] By what he daily ſaw and heard in his father's houſe.] His father, a native of Antwerp, ſettled at Paris, where he had a great trade in Geographical maps. The curious, who bought them of him every day, uſed to diſcourſe very much of foreign countries. His hearing all thoſe diſcourſes, and ſeeing ſo many maps, increaſed in young Tavernier his inclination for travelling.

[C] The relations he has given us were drawn up by another hand.] They appeared (2) in two volumes in the year 1679, and contain his ſix voyages. After this ill of the Dutch (g). In ſome others he ſhews himſelf a down-right Plagiary [D]. He was grievouſly abuſed in a book intitled l'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld: and it is thought he would have made his application to the Civil or Eccleſiaſtical courts of Holland, in order to have ſatisfaction for that affront, had he not conſidered that his adverſary would have ſheltred himſelf under the pretence of having done it to vindicate the country and religion. Thoſe, who approved this reaſon of his patience, wondred that he did not pay ſome author to revenge him [E]. Mr Chappuzeau, who was abuſed in the ſame book upon his this he publiſhed an account of the Seraglio, and ſome particular tracts, viz. an account of Japan and the kingdom of Tunquin; the Hiſtory of the conduct of the Dutch in Aſia, &c (3). It is in this laſt tract that he violently inveighs againſt the Directors of the Eaſt India company: and it is but juſt to obſerve, that he declares at the very beginning, that he does not blame the conduct of the Dutch in general (4); on the contrary he commends them very much. What I ſay, adds he, does not concern the States-General, for whom I have a due reſpect: I ſpeak only of private men, for whom I am not obliged to have any regard, ſince they have been ſo unjuſt to me upon ſeveral occaſions. If you deſire to know who put his memoirs into order, you need only read the following words of Mr Chappuzeau (5). ‘At his return in the year 1668, having a great eſtate, he (6) thought fit to buy the Barony d'Aubonne in the Canton of Bern: to that end he came to Geneva, and lodged for ſome time in my houſe. Our friendſhip was then renewed, but upon a very heavy condition; which was, to give a form to his chaos, as you rightly call the confuſed memoirs of his ſix voyages; which he had taken partly from one Father Raphaël a Capuchin, who had been a long time at Iſpahan. For above two years, I amuſed him with hopes of taking my pen in hand for him; but at laſt loſing all manner of patience, and meeting with me at Paris, whither I went upon private occaſions; how unwilling ſoever I was for a great many reaſons to grant him his requeſt, as ſeveral of my friends can teſtify, he at laſt found means to engage me in that work by a ſuperior power. For this purpoſe he made uſe of the intereſt of the firſt Preſident de Lamoignon, who having ſpoke to the King about it, as he gave me to underſtand, told me, that his majeſty deſired to ſee Tavernier's voyages; and that, ſince he could not find any body elſe, whoſe aſſiſtance he could aſk in this work, I ſhould not put him off any longer. Mr de Lamoignon, and Mr de Baville his ſon, loved to hear him tell ſtories of his voyages; and the firſt being beſides curious of medals, had received a great many from Tavernier, as the latter often told me, which obliged him in gratitude to eſpouſe his intereſt. Thus, Sir, if you knew how much I was mortified, not to ſay put to the rack, for above a year that this wretched work laſted, by the bluntneſs of the huſband, and the ridiculous humour of the wife, doubtleſs you would not have been ſo cruel as to inſult me about a thing which I did in ſpite of myſelf, terribly againſt my will, and without any profit. This is what a great many honeſt men can ſtill witneſs. Beſides, I muſt acquaint you, Sir, that when I came to that chapter, relating to the conduct of the Dutch in Aſia, the friends to whom Mr Tavernier communicated his memoirs, which he generally truſted to his memory, and dictated to me in bad French, having nothing in writing but what he had from the Capuchin, did whatever they could to diſſuade him from harping upon that ſtring. I did the ſame, and when I ſaw that neither they nor I could prevail upon the man, whom you have well deſcribed, I told him plainly, that he might look for ſome body elſe to write down ſuch a diſcourſe. After the high encomium, I had beſtowed upon the Dutch nation, with no leſs gratitude, than juſtice, twenty years before, in the firſt volume of my Europe vivante, which has been printed twice in French, and tranſlated into the German language: after all theſe encomiums, I ſay, ſo ſincere and ſo well-grounded, ſhould I have been ſo baſe as to contradict myſelf, and be guilty of ſuch a ſhameful complaiſance? Upon my refuſal, therefore, which occaſioned our falling out for ſome days, and was like to have occaſioned our falling out for ever, Mr Tavernier made his application to Mr de la Chapelle, Secretary to Mr de Lamoignon before-mentioned. This Secretary undertook to write for him; and it is he, who, after my return to Geneva, wrote the third volume of Tavernier's relations, which contains the Hiſtory of Japan; and wherein, either out of imprudence or malice he introduces a Proteſtant ſpeaking the language of a Roman Catholic. I can eaſily prove that I was at Geneva with my family, and not at Paris, when that volume was written and printed.’

(2) At Paris in 4to, they have been reprinted in Holland in 12mo.

It will not be improper to acquaint the reader, that the Jeſuits complained of Tavernier's relations (7). See what Mr. Arnauld has ſaid to them by way of anſwer (8).

[D] In ſome others he ſhews himſelf a downright Plagiary.] Dr Hyde (9) having quoted a long paſſage of the relation of that author, informs us (10), that Tavernier took it, like a downright plagiary, out of a book printed at Lyons, in the year 1671, in 8vo, and written by a perſon who had been thirty years in Perſia. ‘Sciendum eſt Tavernierum ad inſtar Plagiarii hocce de Gavris paragraphum (& forte multa alia) deſumpſiſſe ex alio itinerario Gallico ed. Lyons 1671, in 8vo, cujus autor eſt P. G. D. C. i. e. Pater Gabriel de Chinon, qui 30 annos in Perſia tranſegit (11). - - - It is to be obſerved that Tavernier, like an errant Plagiary, has ſtolen what he ſays of the Gavri, (and perhaps a great many other things) out of a French book of travels publiſhed at Lyons 1671, in 8vo, whoſe authors name is P. G. D. C. that is, Father Gabriel de Chinon, who lived 30 years in Perſia.’

[E] They wondred that he did not pay ſome author to revenge him.] Although Tavernier did not write the books that came out under his name, yet he was obliged to look upon himſelf as the author, and to act accordingly in regard to thoſe who would criticize him. I mean, that regularly, and according to the laws of the commonwealth of learning, he ought to uſe no other weapon but pen againſt pen. The cenſuring of a book, is, properly ſpeaking, an action brought againſt an author before his true judges. He is ſummoned to appear before the public to be told, either that he argues wrong, or that he underſtands certain things in a wrong ſenſe. He is therefore cited before a lawful tribunal; for it belongs to the public to give judgment on ſuch ſort of accuſations, both in the firſt and laſt inſtances. He ought not therefore to appeal to other judges. This would be too plainly betraying his own weakneſs; this would be changing the order of things, and endeavouring to ſupply his want of knowledge by the favour he hopes his intriguing may procure him before the tribunal of the magiſtrates (12). But I except out of this rule thoſe authors, who are wounded in their reputation: For if a critic is not contented to cenſure a wrong verſion, a falſe principle, a wrong conſequence, an unfaithful quotation, &c. if he will alſo charge a blot in the family, a robbery, an adultery, a ſtate-crime, &c. it is very allowable to bring him before the ſecular Judges. The accuſed perſon, let him be never ſo learned, may without appearing to miſtruſt his pen, very well remove the cauſe from one tribunal to another, and declining the juriſdiction of the publick, have recourſe to the magiſtrates and the laws eſtabliſhed by ſovereigns againſt defamatory libels. I do not ſay that he is obliged to have recourſe to them; for he may be contented with the ſhort way of giving the lie, in imitation of Father Valerian (13): He may with a mentiris impudentiſſime, - - - thou art a moſt impudent liar, confound his accuſers, and fully juſtify himſelf, unleſs they make out their accuſations. So that every author, ſtruck with this thunder-bolt of honeſt Father Valerian, will be accounted a public calumniator by all equitable judges, if he does not clearly prove the ſcandalous facts he has broached againſt the honour of his neighbour. His ſilence is a full vindication of thoſe whom he accuſes, actore non probante abſolvitur reus, if the proſecutor brings no proof

(g) See the remark [C].

(3) At Paris in 4to, in the year 1681, reprinted in Holland, in 12mo.

(4) Tavernier, Hiſtoire de la conduite des Hollandois en Aſie, ch. i, pag. 241, of the third volume of his relations, Dutch edition.

(5) Défenſe du Sr. Samuel Chappuzeau contre une Satire intitulée l'Eſprit de Mr Arnaud, pag. 7.

(6) That is to ſay, Mr Tavernier.

(7) In the the 2d volume of the Defenſe des nouveaux Chrétiens.

(8) At the end of the third volume of the Morale Pratique.

(9) Hyde, de Religione veterum Perſarum, in Appendice, pag. 535, & ſeq.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 545.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Compare what ſhall be ſaid in the remarks of the article THOMAS.

(13) See the article MAGNI, remark [C].

his account, has not been altogether ſilent [F].

proof, the criminal is acquitted in courſe. And therefore, as the inſult offered to Tavernier in the book intituled, L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, went beyond a criticiſm, and did very much ſavour of a defamatory libel, that author had a right to make his application for redreſs to the magiſtrates or conſiſtories. He was not neceſſarily obliged to it, but he might have done it without breaking the rules which an author who is criticized upon ought to obſerve. He made a noiſe (14) in the taverns and ſtreets, he threatned, and even named the very day and hour when he would apply to the Walloon conſiſtory of Rotterdam, to demand execution of the canonical laws againſt the miniſter who had diſhonoured him: but his threatnings came to nothing; he retired very peaceably, and never commenced any proſecution at all. And, to ſay the truth, it was not in his power to obtain any ſatisfaction for the inſult, whether we conſider his accuſer's great intereſt, or the pretence he might have alledged in his vindication. He would not have failed exaggerating the injurious reflexions contained in the tract concerning the conduct of the Dutch. This circumſtance would have rendered his cauſe more favourable; though judicious men know very well the difference there is between an author who reflects upon the Dutch in general, or the ſupreme power of the Seven United Provinces; and an author who blames the conduct of a handful of Dutchmen, trading in another world, two thouſand leagues from their maſters. Tavernier was only guilty of the latter (15). And accordingly the flights and ſallies of the author of L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, againſt that famous traveller, were ſcarce approved by any body. What was the motive of the writer of that ſatire, ſaid moſt people, who required it at his hands? Had he received a ſpecial commiſſion to write an anſwer? If he undertook to do it of his own head, why did not he take the method of oppoſing hiſtory to hiſtory, and facts to facts, inſtead of heaping up perſonal ſcandal. What is moſt ſtrange, is, that he has in a few words reflected upon the Dutch very little leſs than Tavernier, as Mr Chappuzeau has proved upon him (16). Note, that Tavernier being in Holland after the publication of his third volume, was treated there with civility and kindneſs. See what Mr Leti ſays upon it (17); the thing is curious enough. See alſo, concerning this queſtion, whether Tavernier had not a great deal of patience, the Entretiens ſur la Cabale chimerique (18).

But if he is excuſable for not proſecuting the author of L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, before the civil or eccleſiaſtical Judges, it is ſurprizing that he did not at leaſt make uſe of the weapons of an author, the pen, I mean a borrowed one; for as to himſelf he was not able to write three lines without terrible barbariſms. For ten piſtoles he might have met with one that would have revenged him with a witneſs. No book ever gave a fairer handle for cenſure than the L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, and the author of it might have been eaſily confounded. And yet, by an inſtance of impunity never before ſeen, and which perhaps will never be ſeen again, that work has remained without anſwer. There are a great many curious things to be ſaid upon this ſubject: I had a mind to have ſaid ſomething, or rather a great deal, upon it; but the remaining ſheets of this volume are too few in proportion for the materials of yet greater importance, which I would make uſe of, but am obliged to refer part of them till another time for want of room. I therefore ſuppreſs whatever I had collected concerning this article.

[F] Mr Chappuzeau . . . . has not been altogether ſilent.] He was defamed in a moſt terrible and cruel manner in the book entitled, L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, and yet he continued ſilent for the ſpace of ſeven years, though he had a great many good things to ſay in his own vindication, as he made appear at laſt in 1691, in a piece which he publiſhed at the Hague (19). This conſiſted of two letters addreſſed to the Sieur Peter Jurieu the author of the libel. He convicts him of falſhoods in ſeveral articles; and though he is pretty ſharp upon him, he does not exceed the bounds of prudence and moderation: Nay, he repreſents to him the goſpel-duties in a charitable and Chriſtian manner. In a word, one would think him a miniſter, not in the leaſt offended, ſpeaking to a layman; and not a layman offended ſpeaking to a miniſter, by whom he has been offended.

(14) See the Entretiens ſur la Cabale Chimerique, pag. 202, & ſeq.

(15) See, above, remark [C], citation (4).

(16) Chappuzeau, Défenſe, &c. pag. 8.

(17) In his Diſſertation prefixed to Monarchia Univerſale del Re Luigi XIV, printed at Amſterdam 1689.

(18) Pag. 201, & ſeq.

(19) It conſiſts of two letters which contain but ten pages in 4to, in two columns. I have ſet down above, citation (5), the title of this pamphlet.

TAULERUS (John) a famous author among the Myſtical Votaries, flouriſhed in the XIVth century. Neither the year nor the place of his birth are known: for thoſe who ſay he was born at Cologn are not able to prove it; but we know he was a native of Germany. He embraced a monaſtic life in the order of the Dominicans, and acquired a great character in Philoſophy and School-Divinity; but he applied himſelf principally to Myſtical-Divinity: and becauſe he was thought to be favoured with divine revelations, he was ſirnamed the Inlightened Divine. He had great talents for preaching, and no preacher in his time was more followed than he. He reproved with great zeal and freedom the faults of every perſon and this rendred him odious to ſome Monks, whoſe perſecutions he bore patiently and courageouſly. He ſubmitted with the ſame patience and conſtancy to the trials which it pleaſed God to bring upon him for the ſpace of two years, though they were ſo great that his very friends looked upon him with deriſion. It is thought he was thus viſited by God, in order to prevent his growing proud of the extraordinary gifts which Heaven had beſtowed upon him. The two principal towns where he preached are Cologn and Straſburgh. He died in the latter after a long ſickneſs, and was there honourably interred in the academical college, near the winter-auditory. His tomb is ſtill to be ſeen there. If his epitaph had been carefully conſulted, there would not be ſo many different opinions about the year in which he died [A]: it would be unanimouſly placed on the ſeventeenth of May 1361 (a). He wrote ſeveral books [B], concerning [A] So many different opinions about the year in which he died.] According to ſome (1) he died in the year 1355. Others (2) will have it that it was the 15th July 1379. Others (3) are of opinion that he departed this life in the year 1380.

(a) Taken from a public Theſis maintained at Wittemberg the 31ſt of March, 1688, intituled. Memoria Joh. Tauleri reſtaurata, &c. composed by Georgius Fridericus Heupelius, Argentoratenſis.

[B] He wrote ſeveral books.] He wrote them in his mother-tongue: The moſt conſiderable were tranſlated into Latin by Surius, and publiſhed at Cologn, in the year 1548, in the following order. Hiſtoria vitæ & converſionis Joannis Tauler. Conciones de tempore. Conciones de Sanctis. De veris virtutibus, inſtitutionibuſque divinis. Epiſtolæ devotionem, divinumque amorem ſpirantes. Propheticæ de plagis noſtri temporis. Cantica quædam ſpiritualia animæ Deum impendio amantis. De novem rupibus ſive gradibus Chriſtianæ perfectionis. Speculum lucidiſſimum & exemplar Domini noſtri J. Chriſti. Convivium M. Eckardi jucundum & pium. Colloquium Theologi & Mendici. Oratio fidelis præparatoria ad mortem. Præparationes quatuor notabiles ad mortem felicem. Notabilis alia ad mortem felicem præparatio. De decem cæcitatibus, & quatuordecim divini amoris radicibus libellus. Note, that all the works, whoſe titles I have ſet down, except the ſermons, are collections out of Taulerus, and intermixed with the writings of ſome other authors (4). Note alſo, that the work intituled, Sermones quibus explanatio evangeliorum quæ diebus Dominicis ac feſtis ſanctorum enarrari ſolent, comprehendi- was printed at Augſburg, in folio, in the year 1508, at Baſil

(1) Teſte Spondano, ad ann. 1355, num. 17, pag. m. 534.

(2) Hottinger. Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. Part. iii, p. 707.

(3) Stratemannus, Theatr. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. pag. 847, apud Georg. Frideric. Heupelium, in Memoria J. Tauleri reſtaurata, pag. ult.

(4) Taken from Father Labbe, Diſſert. de Scriptor Eccl. Tom. 1, pag. 608, 609.

concerning which there are different opinions: they are blamed by ſome Catholics, and commended by ſome Proteſtants [C]. It cannot be denied that he corrupts ſeveral of his readers by leading them into Fanaticiſm [D]. We ſhall ſee below the character which a man

Baſil in 1521 and 1522 in folio, at Francfort in 1681 in 4to, and that the Augſburg edition does not contain all the ſermons that are to be found in the other editions (5). Some will have it, that Taulerus is the author of a book intituled, Theologia Germanica, printed in 1518, 1519, 1520, 1528, 1681, &c. No body doubts that the perſon who tranſlated it into Latin, under the name of Johannes Theophilus, was Sebaſtian Caſtalio. Many are of opinion, that Taulerus is not the author of that book: For, ſay they, he is quoted in it, and the author ſtyles himſelf prieſt and warden of the order of the Knights of the Teutonic order, in their houſe at Francfort (6). James Thomaſius has made a collection of ſeveral encomiums beſtowed upon that book (7). But ſee particularly the Preface to the French edition (8) of Theologia Germanica, and the letter concerning myſtical authors at the end of that edition. You will find in the preface many particulars concerning the book tranſlated into Latin by Caſtalio, and the following paſſage may be ſeen in the letter. ‘ Taulerus wrote in old German, which is rarely to be met with. Surius made a Latin tranſlation of it, printed ſeveral times at Paris, and at Cologn, till the year 1615, which now ſerves inſtead of the original. There are many German editions of it, publiſhed both by the Roman Catholics and the Proteſtants: The Flemings have alſo printed it ſeveral times; but the old Flemiſh edition of Francfort in 1565, is altered, as well as that which M. Serrarius publiſhed at Hoorn, about forty years ago, though otherwiſe the latter contains more pieces of the author than any other. The beſt is that of Antwerp 1685: However, his inſtitutions, his letters, and his exerciſes upon the paſſion, are wanting in it; but they are to be found by themſelves, the two firſt with this title Medulla Animæ, of which there is an old French edition, but inferior to a new and very fine tranſlation, both of his Inſtitutions, printed at Paris in 1668, and of his Exerciſes upon the paſſion, printed in the ſame place the next year, with the Exerciſes of the pious ESCHIUS, upon the purgative, illuminative, and unitive life, thereunto ſubjoined. Father Mabillon, in the catalogue inſerted at the end of his Traité des Etudes Monaſtiques, places Taulerus's works among the ſpiritual books, tranſlated into French. I never ſaw his Sermons among his works, though they are the moſt conſiderable part of them: And I am ſure that this treatiſe concerning the poor life of Jeſus Chriſt is much leſs to be found there, ſince it is wanting in Surius's Latin tranſlation, and is only to be found in German and Flemiſh (9).

[C] They are blamed by ſome Catholics, and commended by ſome Proteſtants.] Eccius ſaid that Taulerus was a doating man, ſuſpected of hereſy, and one who ought always to have remained in obſcurity. Vocavit Eccius Taulerum ſomniatorem, hæreſeos arguit, & ut prorſus lateret, & nunquam in monaſteria involaret optavit (10). Bloſius vigorouſly oppoſed this cenſure. ‘ Eccio ſtrenue ſe oppoſuit Ludovicus Bloſius Abbas Lætienſis qui Taulerum Catholicæ fidei integerrimum cultorem appellavit, dixit ea quæ ſcripſit ſana & plane divina eſſe, optavitque in nomine domini, ut Taulerus ubique gentium cognitus eſſet, & à pluribus diligentiſſime legeretur: addit minus circumſpectum Eccium, Taulerum nondum ſatis à ſe lectum damnaſſe (11). - - - - Eccius was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the Abbot Ludovicus Bloſius, who called Taulerus a moſt hearty maintainer of the Catholic Faith, and ſaid, that his writings were not only ſound but even divine, and wiſhed in God's name, that Taulerus were known all over the world, and moſt diligently read: he adds, that Eccius had been too haſty and condemned Taulerus before he had ſufficiently read him.’ This judgment of Bloſius Poſſevin mentions and approves (12). Spondanus takes Taulerus's part, and ſays he foretold Wickliff's hereſies, and praiſes Bloſius his apologiſt. ‘ Cujus (Tauleri) extant ſermones, & alii tractatus unctionem divini ſpiritus referentes: prædixitque hæreſes contra Sacramenta & Dogmata Eccleſiæ Catholicæ brevi ab Wickleffo orituras. Contra cujus obtrectatores apologiam ſcripſit Ludovicus Bloſius, recentior ejuſdem Spiritus Sancti devotiſſimus diſcipulus (13). - - - - Taulerus's ſermons are extant and other treatiſes, which ſeem as if inſpired; he alſo foretold the hereſies which Wickliff ſhould ſoon broach againſt the ſacraments, and the doctrines of the Catholic Church. His apology, in anſwer to thoſe who cenſured him, was written by Ludovicus Bloſius, a later and moſt zealous diſciple of the ſame holy Spirit. Sixtus Senenſis highly commends the devotion of our Dominican (14). I have read in Hottinger (15), that ſome Catholics call Taulerus an Hereſiarch, and ſay that ſeveral people doubted of his ſalvation; but an apparition removed their doubts. Luther was one of thoſe, who beſtowed great encomiums upon Taulerus. ‘ Hunc doctorem, ſays he (16), ſcio quidem ignotum eſſe Scholis Theologorum, ideoque forte contemptibilem, ſed ego plus in eo (licet totus Germanorum vernacula ſit conſcriptus) reperi Theologiæ ſolidæ & ſynceræ quam in univerſis omnium univerſitatum Scholaſticis Doctoribus repertum eſt, aut reperiri poſſit in ſuis ſententiis. - - - - This doctor, ſays he, I know is not taken notice of in the ſchools of Divinity, and therefore perhaps deſpiſed, but I have found more ſolid and ſound Divinity in him, though all his works are written only in the German language, than in all the ſcholaſtic doctors the univerſities ever produced, or than can be found in their opinions.’ Let us ſee what he wrote to Spalatinus (17). ‘ Si te delectat puram ſolidam antiquæ ſimillimam Theologiam legere in Germanica lingua effuſam, ſermones Joh. Tauleri prædicatoriæ profeſſionis comparare tibi potes. Neque enim ego vel in Latina vel in noſtra lingua Theologiam vidi ſalubriorem, & cum evangelio conſonantiorem. - - - - If you like to read pure ſolid Divinity, ſuch as the primitive was, expreſſed in the German tongue, you may conſult the ſermons of Joh. Taulerus, that famous preacher. Nor have I, either in the Latin or our own tongue, met with ſounder Divinity, or more agreeable to the Goſpel.’ Luther's encomiums upon Taulerus have been prefixed more than once to the works of that myſtical Divine (18). Some affect to ſay, that Luther ſpoke of him in this manner, either before he made his attack againſt Popery, or during the firſt years of his reformation, and afterwards grew more reſerved in praiſing that writer. Poſt illa tempora ubi B. viro datum fuit tenebras papales magis magiſque ſuperare, & negotium cum novis prophetis interceſſit in Taulero ejuſque Theologia commendandis cæpit eſſe parcior (19). Nay, they quote a ſermon, wherein he cenſures him for a pernicious doctrine, namely, that we ought not to pray to God. ‘ Taulerus exemplo neſcio quo docere vult eſſe à precibus deſiſtendum: ſed hac doctrina nihil eſt pernicioſius: nimis enim ad intermittendas preces jam antea propenſi ſumus (20). - - - - Taulerus, I know not by whoſe example, teacheth, that we ought to deſiſt from praying: but nothing is more pernicious than this doctrine: for we are too apt already to forget our prayers.’ However it be, Michael Neander, Nicolas Hunnius, Dorſcheus, Quenſtedt, Spener, Arndius (21), and ſome other Lutherans, have beſtowed fine encomiums upon Taulerus; and Flacius Illyricus places him among the witneſſes of the truth (22). Let us conclude this remark with the words of a modern Myſtic. ‘ Every good man that knows him muſt needs like and approve him. Hence it is, that the wiſeſt Proteſtants, Dr Arndius, Dr Mullerus, and many others, without excepting Luther and Melancthon, have commended him no leſs than the Roman Catholics, as may be ſeen at the beginning of the German edition of his Sermons, procured by the pious Arndius, and alſo before that of all the works of this author which was publiſhed by the famous Dr Spener, and re-printed ſeveral times (23) at Francfort *.

[D] It cannot be denied that he corrupts ſeveral of his readers, by leading them into Fanaticiſm.] Beza deſpiſed him very much: Sainte Aldegonde looked upon him as an Enthuſiaſt: Voëtius took him only for a man, who, without being a downright Enthuſiaſt, ſaid many things that made way for the Enthuſiaſm of ſome ſectaries (24). Here follows a paſſage of Hoornbeeck: ‘ Fuerunt ſub Papatu, qui vel inſcii, vel imprudentes a man well ſkilled in theſe matters gives of him [E]. We ſhould do him wrong, did we not diſtinguiſh him from thoſe myſtical men, who have taught in Chriſtianity ſomething like the errors of the Eaſtern Philoſophers [F], which I have mentioned in the article of Spinoza (b).

---

(5) Georg. Fridericus Heupelius, in Memoria J. Tauleri reſtaurata, fol. B.

(6) Ex eod. ibid.

(7) Thomaſ. Schediaſma Hiſtor. de Philoſoph. Gentili, Gnoſticorum Hæreſi, & Theologia Myſtica, pag. 75, apud eund. ibid.

(8) Amſterdam 1700, printed by Henry Wetſtein.

(9) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, pag. 12, 13.

(10) Georg. Frid. Heupelius, folio B verſo. He cites Poſſevin. Apparat. Sacr. Tom. i.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Spondanus, ad ann. 1355, num. 17.

(14) Sixtus Senenſis, lib. iv, Biblioth. Sanctæ, pag. 336, Edit. Colon. 1626, apud Heupelium, ubi ſupra, fol. B 2.

(15) Hottinger. ubi ſupra: He cites Bzovius an. Chriſ. 1355. S. 21, 22.

(16) Luther. Tom. i, Latin. Jenenſ. pag. 86, 6, apud Heupelium, folio B verſo.

(17) Idem, Tom. i. Epiſt. Epiſtol. xxiii, ad Spalat. A. 1516. dat. pag. 32. fac. a, apud Heupelium, ibid.

(18) Chriſtoph. Heinric. Loeber. in brevi Judicio Theologico de Libello Germanico. That piece of Loeberus was printed at Iena in 1681.

(19) Id. ibid. fol. A 3.

(20) Luther. in Concion. domi & publico habitis Dominica Reminiſc. Edit. Wanckelianæ, pag. 545, apud Loeberum, ibid. folio A 2 verſo.

(21) See their quotations in Heupelius, ubi ſupra, fol. B 3.

(22) See the ſame Heupelius, fol. ult.

(23) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, pag. 11.

* In 1680, and 1692, &c.

(24) See the ſame Heupelius, fol. B 2.

‘ viam multùm ſtraverunt Enthuſiaſticis illis, ſuâ Theologiâ myſticâ, quemadmodum loquuntur, & libellis pietatis, quibus terminis & phraſibus duris, myſticis & allegoricis, tum inſpirationis, tum deificationis, &c. utebantur, & ab aliis pro enthuſiaſmis ſuis habiti vel accepti poſtea fuerunt. Quales, Johannes de Schoonhovia, Joh. Taulerus, quem inter Pontificios, Eckius; inter noſtros Marnixius carpunt: defendit autem Lud. Bloſius, ſingulari pro eo apologia (25). There were ſome under the Papacy, who either ignorantly, or imprudently, very much paved the way for thoſe Enthuſiaſts, by their myſtical Divinity, as it was called, and by books of piety, wherein were uſed the harſh myſtical and allegorical terms and phraſes of inſpiration, deification, &c. which were afterwards borrowed and received by others in their Enthuſiaſms. Such as Johannes de Schoonhovia, Joh. Taulerus, who has been cenſured by Eckius, among the Roman Catholics, and by St Aldegonde among us: but he is vindicated by Lud. Bloſius in a particular apology.’ Nicolas Hunnius, and ſome other Lutherans, had the ſame opinion of Taulerus. ‘ Ex quibus & permultis ſimilibus .... proclive eſt judicium ferre, an non Taulerus per ſe, minimum per accidens, Schwenckfeldianorum, Anabaptiſtarum, & Weigelianorum figmentis anſam dederit (26). ---- From which, and a great many others of the like kind: ... it is eaſy to judge, whether Taulerus of himſelf, and not at all by accident, has not given a handle to the fictions of the Schwenckfeldians, the Anabaptiſts, and the Weigelians.’ Heupelius, ſo often quoted by me, reduces his whole diſputation to theſe two propoſitions: 1. That Taulerus deſerves to be recommended to the ſtudents in Divinity. 2. That he ought to be read with caution; for, ſays he, there are ſome falſe doctrines in his works, and ſome phraſes that ſeem to favour the Enthuſiaſts and Quietiſts. Quod non ſolum haud pauci in eo reperiantur errores approbati, qui in ſermonibus edit. Francof. 1621, & 1681, diligenter ſunt annotati, ſed etiam non raro dictionibus & formulis loquendi utatur, quæ videntur Enthuſiaſtis nominatim Weigelianis, & quos non ita pridem D. Michael de Molinos in Italia excluſit, Quietiſtis favere (27).

[E] The character, which a man, well-ſkilled in theſe matters, gives of him.] ‘ The character of that myſtical author (28), in my opinion, is this, That the ſoul, by the mortification of her paſſion, and vices, by the practice of virtue, by the denial and renunciation of herſelf, of her deſires, of her will, ſelf-love, and of her whole activity, and of all created beings, ſhould return into her internal ſtate, looking for GOD there, and finding him at laſt, who manifeſts himſelf there, by the birth of his divine Word, and the inſpiration of his holy Spirit: and that afterwards, by a laſting and continual introverſion, ſhe ſhould continue in that ſtate of interiority, in which GOD may work in her his will, his wonders, and his ſpecial direction; of which nevertheleſs that author ſpeaks but generally (29).’ Theſe are the words of the author of the new edition of the Theologica Germanica.

[F] Something like the errors of the Eaſtern Philoſophers.] It is ſurpriſing that theſe myſtical Chriſtians, and theſe Heathen Philoſophers, ſhould have had ſo exactly the ſame notions, that one would think they had agreed among themſelves to vent the ſame follies, ſome in the eaſt, and ſome in the weſt. What a wonderful concert there is between people who never ſaw, and never heard of one another! I am going to cite a paſſage, which will ſhew us that ſome myſtical men have taught the transformation of all things into GOD, and an identification, which would reduce the Creator and the creatures to a kind of nothingneſs, that is, to an eternal inaction. This is very like the Nireupan of the Siameſe (30). Theſe myſtical men ſuppoſed the doctrine of the Trinity, and aſcribed the whole action to the three Perſons, and ſo they believed that the divine Eſſence itſelf did nothing; and that when the ſoul is transformed into GOD's Eſſence, and raiſes herſelf above the three Perſons, ſhe enjoys as great a reſt as if ſhe were annihilated. Ruyſbroch ſhall be my witneſs. ‘ Itaque, ſays he (31), ne quis aliquo implicetur ac ſeducatur errore, diligenter falſos hoſce Prophetas, me eos depingente, animadvertat. Qui primi generis ſunt, Dei eſſentiam ſe eſſe ajunt ſupra divinitatis perſonas, adeoque ſe eſſe ocioſos, ac ſi non eſſent: quandoquidem Dei eſſentia non agit, ſed Spiritus Sanctus operatur. Putant ergo ſe ipſo Sancto Spiritu eſſe ſuperiores, & ſe neque ipſo, neque ejus gratia habere opus: dicunt enim non modo nullam creaturam, ſed nec ipſum quidem Deum quicquam eis vel conferre vel auferre poſſe. Quidam etiam ejus ſunt ſententiæ, ut animas ſuas ex Dei ſubſtantia creatas affirment, cumque mortui fuerint, rurſum ſe futuros eſſe id quod antea fuerant: perinde ut ſcyphus aquæ hauſtus ex fonte, ſi in ipſum fontem refundatur, idem eſt quod fuit prius. Ajunt præterea, ſi quis per cœlum omne pervagetur, nullum eum neque angelorum, neque animarum, neque ordinum, neque gloriæ, neque præmiorum diſcrimen diſtinctionemque reperturum; ſiquidem nihil illic, niſi ſimplicem quandam beatamque eſſentiam, omni actione vacantem, eſſe arbitrantur: Addunt his, poſt extremum judicii diem omnes omnino homines, malos æque ac bonos, & ſimul Deum ipſum, non niſi unam eandemque Dei eſſentiam, quæ in omnem æternitatem abſque ulla actione ſemper ocio vacatura ſit, eſſe futuros. Atque eam ob rem nihil neque ſcire, neque cognoſcere, neque velle, nec amare, nec cogitare, non gratias agere, non laudare, ſed nec deſiderare, nec habere volunt. Nam ſupra Deum & ſine Deo eſſe, nec in ulla re Deum quærere nec invenire, atque demum ab omnibus prorſus immunes eſſe volunt. Et hoc ipſi perfectam appellant ſpiritûs paupertatem. Verum ejuſcemodi paupertas in cœlo minimè invenitur, neque in Deo, neque in angelis, neque in ſanctis, ſed nec in hominibus bonis toto orbe terrarum. Itaque non niſi diabolica & tartarea paupertas eſt. ---- Therefore, ſays he, let every every one in order to prevent their being ſeduced and led away into error, diligently attend to my deſcription of theſe falſe prophets. Thoſe of the firſt kind affirm themſelves to be the divine Eſſence, ſuperior to the perſons of the Divinity, and therefore to be unactive as if they were not in being; becauſe the Divine Eſſence is at reſt, and the Holy Ghoſt only operates. They hold themſelves therefore to be ſuperior to the Holy Ghoſt itſelf, and to be in no want either of the Holy Ghoſt, or of it's influence: for they ſay that not only no creature, but not even GOD himſelf can add to, or take from them in any reſpect. Some alſo have embraced ſuch an opinion, that they affirm their ſouls to be created out of the divine ſubſtance, and that after death they are again to return from whence they came, as a glaſs of water taken out of a fountain, if it is poured again into the fountain, is the ſame with what it was formerly. They ſay moreover, that if any one was to traverſe the whole Heavens, he would find no difference nor diſtinction among angels, ſouls, orders, glories, or rewards; for that they believe nothing to be there but a certain ſimple and happy eſſence, void of all action: they add farther, that after the day of judgment, all men univerſally, the bad as well as the good, together with GOD himſelf, will make up only one and the ſame divine Eſſence, which will enjoy an abſolute reſt and inaction to all eternity. And for this reaſon, that they will neither know, underſtand, will, love, think, return thanks for, nor praiſe, no nor ſo much as deſire, or have any thing. For they will have themſelves to be ſuperior to and independant of GOD, and in no reſpect wanting to ſeek or to find GOD, but, in ſhort, abſolutely exempt from all things. And this they call a perfect poverty of ſpirit. But this ſort of poverty is not to be met with, neither in GOD, nor in the angels, nor in the ſaints, nor even in good men, any where upon the face of the earth, therefore this poverty is only diabolical and helliſh.’ Our Taulerus always differs from theſe doaters, and very ſolidly confutes thoſe who fancy they are only a meer paſſive inſtrument in the hand of GOD (32).

(b) See remark [A], of the article SPINOZA.

(25) Hoornbeeck, Summa Controv. lib. vi, pag. m. 408.

(26) Nicolas Hunnius, in Conſider. novæ Paracelſ. & Weigel. Theol. apud Heupelium, ibid. fol. B 3.

(27) Heupelius, ibid.

(28) That is, Taulerus.

(29) Lettre ſur les Auteurs Myſtiques, pag. 11, 12.

(30) See, above, the remark [A], of the article SOMMONA-CODOM.

(31) Ruyſbrochius, in Libro de vera Contemplat. cap. xix, pag. 445. apud Giſb. Voëtium, in Exercitiis Pietatis, cap. iii, pag. 86.

(32) See the paſſage of Taulerus, quoted by Voëtius, ubi ſupra, pag. 78, 79.

TAURELLUS

TAURELLUS (Nicolas) a Phyſician, and a Philoſopher, was born at Montbelliard, the twenty-ſixth of November 1547. He was admitted Maſter of Philoſophy at Tubingen in the year 1565, and when the magiſtrates of Nuremberg founded an univerſity at Altdorf, in the year 1581, they gave him the profeſſorſhip in Phyſic (a). He diſcharged it with great ability: but becauſe he departed from the opinions commonly received, he had ſome enemies, and fell out with the Divines. Thoſe of Heidelberg cried him down as an Atheiſt [A]. He died at Altdorf in September 1606 (b). It was a time of peſtilence; and as ſoon as he ſaw that one of his ſervant-maids had got the plague, he left his houſe in the night-time, but came home again ſoon after, and died the ſame day (c). He publiſhed ſome books which made a noiſe [B].

He was a little man; hence it was that a Poet, alluding to the word Taurellus, a diminutive of Taurus, beſtowed this encomium upon him, that he was Taurellus in body, but Taurus in mind, Corpore Taurellus, Taurus es ingenio. It is one of the verſes of an elegy, that was made in his praiſe when he was admitted to the degree of Doctor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Baſil (d).

(a) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Medicorum, pag. 403.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Paulus Freherus, in Theatro Virorum illuſtrium, pag. 1320.

(d) Taken from Scioppius in Scaligero Hypobol. fol. 196, verſo.

[A] The Divines of Heidelberg cried him down as an Atheiſt.] Giſbertus Voëtius tells us what was the occaſion of it. He puts the queſtion to him (1). 'Cur Theologi Heidelbergenſes ante annos aliquot Nicol. Taurellum Philoſophum non ignobilem dixerint Atheum Medicum, in Literis (2) ad Deputatos Synodi Holland. ſuper libro & cauſâ Conr. Vorſtii perſcriptis? Et an non falcem miſerint in alienam meſſem, & indignè traduxerint iſtius aliorumque ſimilium magnorum virorum inventa ad illuſtrandam & perficiendam Philoſophiam. - - - Why did the Heidelberg Divines, ſome years ago call Nicolas Taurellus, that eminent Philoſopher, an Atheiſtical Phyſician, in their Letters to the Deputies of the Dutch ſynod, written on the occaſion of the book and cauſe of Vorſtius? And did they not meddle in a matter no way belonging to them, and unworthily traduce him, and other great mens inventions, towards illuſtrating and improving Philoſophy.' And he anſwers it thus: 'Arbitror eus reſpexiſſe paradoxa non pauca quæ imprimis Compendio Metaphyſico, & Triumpho Philoſophiæ inſpargit; & ad divina ac Theologica paſſim applicat; quibus limites communes hodierno Chriſtianiſmo Theologiæ tranſiliri, & dogmata nonnulla conquaſſari, atque adeo Scepticis, Libertinis, aliiſque fanaticis & ſecundi generis Atheis cauſam nimis tradi non immerito metuendum eſt. De intentione illius viri nolumus judicare, nec cætera ejus inquirimus. Aliter etiam judicamus de ingenioſis ipſius diſputationibus, in naturalibus contra Piccolomineum, Cæſalpinum, alioſque phyſicos: ubi omnem libertatem Socraticam tollere nolimus: nec theologici hoc fori eſt, ſed medici, phyſici, mathematici: quomodo vice verſa, metaphyſica, pneumatologica, & theologica naturalia non tam, nedum ſolius, phyſico-medici & mathematici fori ſunt, quam theologici. Videant ergo juniores, ut cum judicio legant philoſophemata ejus, quæ naturalia tranſcendunt. - - - - - I imagine they had an eye to the ſeveral paradoxes, which he has advanced, eſpecially in his Compendium Metaphyſicum, and Triumphus Philoſophiæ; and has every where applied to Divine and Theological ſubjects: which there is too much reaſon to fear may be made uſe of in modern Chriſtianity to break through the uſual bounds of Divinity, to ſap the foundation of ſome of it's doctrines, and conſequently to make too great conceſſions to Sceptics, Libertines, and other Fanatics, and Atheiſts of the ſecond rate. I ſhall form no judgment as to his invention, nor enquire into other particulars of him. I have a quite different opinion of him as to his ingenious diſputations in Natural Philoſophy, againſt Piccolominæus, Cæſalpinus, and other Naturaliſts: in which I am for allowing the freedom of Socrates: nor does this regard Divinity, but Phyſic, Natural Philoſophy, and Mathematics: as, on the contrary, Metaphyſics, Pneumatology, and Natural Theology, belong not ſo properly, much leſs ſolely, to Phyſic, Natural Philoſophy, and Mathematics, as to Divinity. Let therefore the young readers peruſe with candor his Philoſophical reflexions, which are above nature.' Tho' that famous author would not plainly condemn the Heidelberg Divines, he gives us room to believe that they were too haſty. Such accuſations ought to be very rarely preferred. It appears, on the other hand, that he does juſtice to that profeſſor, who was certainly a man of great parts, and a ſubtile diſputant. I have quoted, in another place (3), a paſſage wherein it is ſaid, that the ſame Divine charged him with Atheiſm: but I muſt obſerve here, that the terms of the original are not ſo ſtrong: he only calls him an aſſertor of paradoxes, Aſſertio παραδοξολόγου Taurelli (4).

[B] He publiſhed ſome books which made a noiſe] A Method of Prognoſtics in Phyſic; notes upon the works of Arnaldus à Villanova: Diſcuſſiones Phyſicæ de mundo contra Piccolomineum: Diſcuſſiones Phyſicæ & Metaphyſicæ de cælo adverſus eundem: Alpes cæſæ, it is a book againſt Cæſalpinus: de infiniti continui ſectione: de rerum æternitate. I have quoted in another place (5) a book, wherein he advances a particular opinion, concerning the ſouls of beaſts. See the titles inſerted in a paſſage out of Voëtius, in the foregoing remark.

He had begun a book de Uſiis per ſe ſubſiſtentibus, ſome pieces whereof were printed after his death, with a new edition of the tract de Cælo & Mundo. Picart, his colleague, took care of that edition at Amberg, in 1611, in 8vo. It appears from theſe fragments that Taurellus underſtood very well the nature of ſubſtance, and wherein it is diſtinguiſhed from accidents. It is ſomewhat ſtrange that the liberty he took to confute Ariſtotle ſhould have expoſed him ſo much to the hatred of Divines: for he principally confuted the doctrines of Ariſtotle that are contrary to religion. This we may ſee particularly in a book of his, printed at Marpurg, in 1604, in 8vo, and intituled, De Rerum æternitate: Nicolai Taurelli Montbelgardenſis, Med. & Phyſices in Altdorffenſi Noricorum Academia Profeſſoris, Metaphyſices Univerſalis partes quatuor. In quibus placita Ariſtotelis, Valleſii, Piccolominei, Cæſalpini, Societatis Conimbricenſis, aliorumque diſcutiuntur, examinantur atque refutantur. He therein clearly and ſolidly confutes Ariſtotle's opinion, concerning the eternity of the world. He was certainly one of the beſt Metaphyſicians of that age.

(1) Giſb. Voëtius, Diſput. Select. Tom. i, pag. 200.

(2) That letter is dated from Heidelberg the 26th of Auguſt 1610. It is the 149 among thoſe publiſhed by the Remonſtrants in the edition of the year 1684.

(3) In the article of GORLÆUS.

(4) Voëtius, in Theologico-Philoſophicis Corollaris.

(5) In the article SENNERTUS.

TAUVRY (Daniel), Doctor of Phyſic, of the Faculty at Paris, was born at Laval, and there maintained a general Theſis in Philoſophy at ten years of age. He was Phyſician of the Faculty at Angers, at the age of fifteen. He compoſed ſeveral works in Anatomy, and Phyſic [A], and was an illuſtrious member of the Royal Academy of Sciences. He died at Paris the firſt of March 1701, at thirty-two years of age (a).

(a) Mercure Galant, for March 1701.

[A] He compoſed ſeveral works in Anatomy and Phyſic.] That which is intituled, Nouvelle Anatomie raiſonnée, was printed at Paris in 1690 in 12mo (1): it has been tranſlated into Engliſh (2). His new practice in acute Diſeaſes, and in thoſe which depend upon the fermentation of liquids, was publiſhed at Paris in 1698, in two volumes in 12mo. See the Journal des Savans of the fourteenth of July, 1698. In the ſame place was publiſhed, in 1699, a new edition of the Traité des Medicamens, which he had reviſed, corrected, and enlarged. The tenth Journal des Savans of the ſame year takes notice of it (3).

(1) See the xxxiſt Journal des Sçavans, 1690, pag. 548, Dutch edition.

(2) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, March 1702, pag. 357.

(3) Pag. 189, Dutch Edition.

TECMESSA.

TECMESSA, the daughter of a Phrygian Prince [A], was made a priſoner when the Grecians ravaged all the countries adjacent to Troy. Ajax liked her ſo well that he made her his concubine. She forgot, by degrees, the fall of her family, and conceived ſuch an affection for Ajax, who promiſed to make her a queen (a), that ſhe was extremely afflicted at his death [B]. He had by her a ſon called Euryſaces, who reigned in Salamis, after the deceaſe of Telamon, Ajax's father. Teucer, the ſecond ſon of Telamon, had a mind to return into Salamis, after he had ſettled in the iſle of Cyprus; but Euryſaces prevented him (b). The Athenians had a particular veneration for Ajax and his ſon. Pauſanias ſays (c) that the honours, which had been decreed to them, continued even to his time, and that there was ſtill to be ſeen at Athens an altar of Euryſaces. We find in Plutarch (d) the privileges granted to the tribe of Æantides, and the encomiums on that tribe. I find nothing concerning the other ſon of Ajax, mentioned by Dictys Cretenſis, whom he calls Achantides (e). His mother's name was Glauca. He was put into Teucer's hands, as well as Euryſaces, when the Grecians took ſhipping in order to go home (f). Some have ſaid (g) that Telamon grew angry with Teucer, becauſe he did not bring back with him Tecmeſſa and Euryſaces. He embarked on board a veſſel which made more haſte than the reſt. Pauſanias obſerves (b) that Ajax's poſterity was not very illuſtrious, and the private life of Ajax is the reaſon he gives for it; this, I think, is a falſe reaſon [C], I do not believe that, Leſcaloperius had any grounds for ſaying, that Julius Cæſar compoſed a tragedy intitled, Tecmeſſa [D].

[A] A daughter of a Phrygian Prince.] Dictys Cretenſis (1) calls him Teuthrantes. He ſays, that Ajax killed him ſolitario certamine. Every body will tranſlate theſe words as he thinks fit, and perhaps ſome readers will underſtand them of a duel. Afterwards Ajax took, plundered, and burnt the town of that Phrygian, whoſe daughter, Tecmeſſa, was carried away, with the reſt of the booty, and adjudged to Ajax, when the booty was divided. Poſt paucos dies expugnata atque incenſa civitate magnam vim prædæ abſtrahit, abducens Tecmeſſam filiam regis . . . . Ac deinde Ajaci ob egregia laborum facinora Teuthrantis filiam Tecmeſſam concedunt. If we believe Horace, the captive won Ajax's heart by her beauty (2). Sophocles (3) does not agree with Dictys in every particular: for he ſays, that Tecmeſſa's father was already dead (4), when his dominions were laid waſte by Ajax: and that it was his widow, who was killed when the town was taken. Tecmeſſa ſpeaks to Ajax in theſe words:

Σὺ γάρ μου πατρίδ' ἠΐστωσας δορὶ
Καὶ μητέρ' ἀλλ' ἡ μοῖρα (5) τὸν φύσαντά με
Καθεῖλεν ᾅδου θανασίμους οἰκήτορας.

Tu enim mihi patriam vaſtaſti bello,
Matrem ſuſtuliſti, mors vero patrem
Abripuit ad manes qui apud inferos ſunt.

My country wretched by your ſword was made,
My mother murther'd, while my father's ſhade,
Far from your reach had been by death convey'd.

[B] Extremely afflicted at his death.] Sophocles and Quintus Calaber furniſh her with very moving expreſſions. The firſt ſuppoſes that ſhe uſed many entreaties to prevent his killing himſelf; that ſhe begged of him not to leave her expoſed to a thouſand misfortunes by his death, and that ſhe preſſed it by reminding him of the pleaſures he had enjoyed with her.

Ἀνδρί τοι χρεὼν
Μνήμην προσεῖναι, τερπνὸν εἴ τι που πάθοι.

Decet enim virum
Memorem eſſe, ſi quid illi ſuave accidit (6).

With ev'ry man who bears a grateful mind,
Each ſingle pleaſure muſt rememb'rance find.

The ſcholiaſt obſerves upon this, that Tecmeſſa puts Ajax in mind of what had paſſed between them in bed, and that ſhe does it modeſtly, and like a chaſte woman (7). and not ſo bluntly as Hecuba in Euripides. Ὁ δέ γε Εὐριπίδης μαστροπικώτατα εἰσάγει τὴν Ἑκάβην λέγουσαν Ποῦ τὰς φίλας δῆτ' εὐφρόνας δείξεις ἄναξ; Ἡ τῶν ἐν εὐνῇ φιλτάτων ἀσπασμάτων χάριν τίν' ἕξει παῖς ἐμή, κείνης δ' ἐγώ; What will my daughter get by the amorous embraces ſhe will afford you in her bed? The French ſtage is more nice than that of Athens. The moſt excellent pieces of Racine would be hiſſed at for ſuch a plainneſs.

[C] This, I think, is a falſe reaſon.] I will not object to Pauſanias, that he ſays (8) Ajax ſucceeded his grand-father by the mother's ſide, who was King of Megara (9): I would readily agree with him, that Ajax lived always in a private capacity, becauſe he died before his father Telamon: But I deny that this can be the reaſon why his deſcendants were leſs illuſtrious than thoſe of Teucer, the ſecond ſon of Telamon: Theſe latter reigned in the iſle of Cyprus till Evagoras at leaſt, and therefore ſome deſcendants of Telamon made a great figure for many ages. Why? Becauſe Teucer reigned; but becauſe Ajax did not reign, his deſcendants were not very illuſtrious. This is Pauſanias's way of arguing. I repeat it again, this is a falſe way of reaſoning; for Euryſaces, Ajax's ſon, ſucceeded to the kingdom of Salamis after the death of Telamon, juſt the ſame as if he had been a king's ſon (10.) But here is the reaſon why his deſcendants made no great figure in the world. He had a ſon called Philæus, who gave away the kingdom of Salamis in order to be made a citizen of Athens: This we find in Pauſanias (11). From that time the poſterity of Ajax, being diveſted of ſovereign authority, could not poſſibly ſhine like that of the other ſon of Telamon. They had in the perſon of Miltiades, deſcended from that ſon of Euryſaces, all the luſtre that a family, not poſſeſſed of a kingdom, can have; but after all, they did not ſway the ſcepter as Teucer's poſterity did. I muſt obſerve, that Philæus, who, according to Pauſanias, was Euryſaces's ſon, and Ajax's grand-ſon, was Ajax's ſon, according to Herodotus (12). He was, according to the ſame Hiſtorian, the ſtem of the Athenian Æacides, from whom Miltiades deſcended. Plutarch (13) will have it, that Philæus and Euryſaces, both Ajax's ſons, reſigned the property of the iſle of Salamis to the Athenians, in order to be made citizens of Athens. He adds, that Euryſaces reſided at Brauron in Attica, and Philæus at Melita (14); and that Philæus gave his name to the Philaides, a people of Attica, from whom Piſiſtratus derived his original. Stephanus Byzantius ranks the Philaides under the tribe called Ægeides (15), and ſays, that Philæus, from whom that people had their name, was the ſon of Ajax and Lyſide, the daughter of Caronus, the ſon of Lapithus.

[D] Leſcaloperius . . . . . . ſays, that Julius Cæſar compoſed a tragedy intitled Tecmeſſa.] This Jeſuit obſerves, that the Romans inſerted the vowel u in ſeveral Greek words; which was practiſed to the time of Julius Cæſar, who was the firſt author of a tragedy, intituled, Tecmeſſa. Theſe are his words. ‘ In Alcumena, Alcumæon, Tecumeſſa, Hercules, Æſculapius, ‘ & aliis ejuſmodi Græcis nominibus, vocalis u à priſcis Latinis interjecta eſt, non tantùm ubi carmen exigeret, ut ait ille; ſed ubique paſſim, quòd ita mos ‘ ferret, etiam in ſolutâ oratione. Atque ille mos ‘ tenuit uſque ad Julium Cæſarem, qui Tragœdiam de ‘ Tecmeſſa primus ſcripſiſſe fertur, & ita pronunciari ‘ juſſiſſe. Itaque poſt Tecmeſſam cœptum eſt dici, uti ‘ hodieque dicimus, Alcmena, & Alcmæon: verùm ‘ Hercules & Æſculapius prævaluere, & adhuc intercalariam retinent vocalem (16). - - - In Alcumena, Al- ‘ cumæon

(a) Quint. Calaber, lib. v, ver. 546.

(b) Juſtin. lib. xliv, cap. iii.

(c) Lib. i, pag. 33.

(d) Plut. in Sympoſ. lib. i, cap. x.

(e) Dictys, Cret. lib. v, See hereafter the remark [C].

(f) Dictys, ibid.

(g) Apud Servium, in Æneid. lib. i, ver. 619. where inſtead of Theomiſſam read Tecmeſſam, and inſtead of Turiſacen read Euryſacen.

(b) Lib. ii, pag. 71.

(1) Lib. ii.

(2) Movit Ajacem, Telamone natum,
Forma Captivæ dominum Tecmeſſæ.
The Heart of Ajax Telamon,
Was by his captive's beauty won.
Horat. Od. IV, lib. ii.

(3) In Ajace.

(4) He calls him Teleutas.

(5) Here is what the Scholiaſt ſays upon that word. Ὡς τούτου ἰδίῳ θανάτῳ τετελευτηκότος, τὸ δὲ ἀλλὰ, ἀντὶ τοῦ δέ. See Camerarius's notes upon that place.

(6) Compare with this the words of Dido, Si bene quid de te merui, fuit aut tibi quicquam Dulce meum. If once I ever merited or pleas'd. Æn. lib. iv, ver. 317.

(7) Αἰδημόνως δὲ αὐτὸν ὑπομιμνήσκει τὰ τῆς εὐνῆς.

(8) Lib. i, pag. 40.

(9) His name was Alcathous.

(10) Juſtin. lib, xliv, cap. cap. iii.

(11) Lib. i, pag. 33.

(12) Lib. vi, cap. xxxv.

(13) In Vita Solonis, pag. 83.

(14) It was part of Athens, where among other buildings, there was a temple of Euryſaces, according to Mr Spon, Voyage de Grecs, Tom. ii, pag. 442.

(15) Mr Spon, ibid. pag. 476, ſhews by an ancient marble inſcription, that they ought to be placed in the tribe called Oeneïdes.

(16) Leſcaloperius, Commentar. in Ciceron. de Nat Deor. lib. iii, pag. 624.

‘ Alcumæon, Tecumeſſa, Hercules, Æſculapius, and other ‘ Greek words of that kind, the vowel u was inſerted by ‘ the antient Latins, not only where it was required in ‘ verſe, but every where throughout; becauſe it was cu- ‘ ſtomary, even in proſe. And this cuſtom continued down ‘ to Julius Cæſar, who is ſaid to be the firſt writer of ‘ a tragedy on Tecmeſſa, and to have directed the word ‘ to be ſo pronounced. Therefore after Tecmeſſa, it became ‘ the faſhion to pronounce, as we now do, Alcmena and ‘ Alcmæon: But Hercules and Æſculapius kept their ground, ‘ and yet retain the inter-placed vowel.’ The Grammarian Victorinus, was contented to ſay, that Julius Cæſar began to contract thoſe words. If Leſcaloperius had read the book of one of his brethren, he would there have found the following paſſage: ‘ Scribit ‘ Victorinus, lib. 1. veteres nunquam c, & m conjun- ‘ xiſſe, uſque ad Julium Cæſarem, qui primus Alc- ‘ mæon, Alcmena, Tecmeſſa, quos prius Alcumenam, ‘ Tecumeſſam Alcumæonem ſcribebant (17). - - - - Vi- ‘ ctorinus writes, that the antients never joined c and ‘ m together, till the time of Julius Cæſar, who firſt ‘ wrote Alcmæon, Alcmena, Tecmeſſa, which before were ‘ written Alcumæon, Alcumena, and Tecumeſſa.’ I do not think Suetonius would have forgot this dramatic piece of Julius Cæſar, if there had been any ſuch.

(17) Martinus, del Rio Syntagmat. Tragici, Parte Ultima. Mr du Rondel pointed out that paſſage to me.

T E L A M O N, the ſon of Æacus and Endeis [A], is one of the principal heroes of fabulous Hiſtory. He had two brothers, namely Peleus and Phocus; but the latter was his brother only by the father's ſide (a). There aroſe ſuch a jealouſy between Phocus and the two others, that they plotted to kill him. They took their time as they were playing together at quoits. Some ſay, that Peleus killed Phocus, by throwing his quoit at his head (b); others ſay Telamon did it (c): and it is generally agreed that he who did not kill him, was nevertheleſs an accomplice in that action (d). Æacus thought ſo [B], for he drove out Peleus (e), as well as Telamon. The latter retired into the iſle of Salamis, where Cychreus reigned, who gave him in marriage his daughter Glauca, and made him his ſucceſſor (f). Others ſay, that having no children he adopted Telamon for his heir (g). However it is certain, that Telamon reigned in the iſle of Salamis. After the death of Glauca, he married Peribœa, the daughter of Alcathous, ſon of Pelops, and King of Megara [C]. From this marriage iſſued Ajax [D] that great

(a) Apollodor. lib. iii, pag. m. 230.

(b) Pauſan. lib. ii, pag. 72. Note, that according to Diodorus Siculus, Peleus did it inadvertently.

(c) Apollod. ubi ſupra, Plutarch. in Parall. cap. xxv.

(d) Apollodor. ibid.

(e) He reigned in the iſle of Ægina.

(f) Diodor. Sicul. lib. vi, cap. x.

(g) Apollodor. ibid.

[A] The ſon of Æacus and Endeis.] The children of Telamon had a divine original by ſeveral deſcents. Æacus was Jupiter's ſon. Endeis was the daughter of the centaur Chiron, ſon of Saturn. Peribœa, the wife of Telamon, and the mother of Ajax, was the daughter of Alcathous. The latter was the ſon of Pelops, whoſe father was Tantalus, the ſon of Jupiter.

[B] Æacus thought ſo.] It will not be improper to mention what Pauſanias ſays of it (1). Some time after the flight of thoſe two brothers, Telamon ſent a deputy to Æacus, to aſſure him that the murther had been committed thro' inadvertency. Æacus, returned anſwer, that he ſhould take care not to come into the iſland; but that, if he had a mind to juſtify himſelf, he might ſpeak on board a ſhip, or upon ſome bank which he ſhould erect for that end. Telamon pitched upon the laſt expedient, and erected a bank near the port, where he pleaded his cauſe; but not being judged innocent, he retired again.

[C] He married Peribœa the daughter of Alcathous...... King of Megara.] Though the account which Plutarch (2) had borrowed from Aretades, concerning Telamon, is come down to us miſerably imperfect; yet one may perceive he meant to ſay, that Telamon, having too much ſported with Peribœa, thought it proper to make his eſcape. The father of this young woman, diſcovering the affair, and thinking that one of his ſubjects had debauched her, ordered one of his guards to throw her into the ſea. The guard, moved with compaſſion, choſe rather to ſell her: The ſhip on board which ſhe was, landed at Salamis, where Telamon bought Peribœa, who was brought to bed of Ajax. A learned man (3) is of opinion, that inſtead of Εὔβοιαν, we ought to read Μέγαραν in that paſſage of Plutarch, ſince moſt authors are agreed, that Ajax's mother was the daughter of Alcathous, King of Megara. They are not ſo unanimous as to the name of that lady: Some call her Peribœa (4), and others Eribœa (5). It is plain this difference proceeds only from the fault of ſome tranſcriber, who left out, or added a letter to the name of Ajax's mother. Thoſe who tranſcribed his copy, retained that fault, which occaſioned a different reading; and afterwards authors followed the copy they had bought. The name Melibœa, which Ajax's mother yet bears in Athenæus, proceeds from the ſame cauſe. That author ſays, ſhe was married to Theſeus in due form (6). He names ſome other women, whom Theſeus took by force; he names two other wives of that prince who are mentioned by Heſiod; and at laſt he ſays, that, according to Pherecydes, he had alſo another wife called Pherebœa. Thoſe four women ought to be reduced to one; Peribœa, Eribœa, Melibœa, and Pherebœa, are four names of one and the ſame woman, which have been multiplied by the fault of the tranſcribers. If Theſeus's polygamy was not more certain, with reſpect to other women, than as to Melibœa, mentioned by Athenæus, and Pherebœa, mentioned by Pherecydes, I ſhould poſitively aſſert, that he was a Monogamiſt, even according to the rigid ſenſe of Tertullian. There is more difficulty in what follows. Ajax's mother was the lawful wife of Theſeus; but when? Was it after Telamon's death, or before ſhe married Telamon? If the firſt, it muſt be ſaid, that Theſeus ſurvived the deſtruction of Troy, which is falſe; and that he had a very extravagant deſire of marrying, ſince he pitched upon ſo old a woman, which is very improbable. It is better therefore to ſay, that he married Peribœa before her marriage with Telamon. But then, what ſhall we we do with the ſtory, mentioned by Plutarch? Inſtead of a young woman, whom Telamon thought he had debauched, we ſhould ſay that he took up only with another man's leavings, either with a widow or a divorced wife. Nothing of this quadrates with Plutarch's narrative, nor can it be ſupported from other authors. It appears by a paſſage in Pindar (7), that Telamon was married to Peribœa, when Hercules deſired him to follow him in his expedition againſt Laomedon. At this rate Theſeus muſt needs have divorced his wife ſomewhat early. However it be, we ought to remember, that Peribœa was one of the virgins, whom the Athenians were obliged to deliver to Minos (8). Theſeus was delivered to him at the ſame time, and boldly oppoſed Minos's attempt upon Peribœa's honour. This may make us believe, that Theſeus fell in love with the maid during his voyage, for ſhe was very handſome; and that he married her ſoon after. I cannot tell whether he contained himſelf till after his return; for the heroes of Greece were very dangerous fellow-travellers for a maid, they got children apace. They were very well qualified to preſerve the fair ſex from the violence of a fierce tyrant: but women ran no leſs danger in the hands of ſuch deliverers; and it was never more neceſſary than in reſpect to them to aſk this queſtion, ‘ Sed quis cuſtodiet ipſos cuſtodes ‘ (9)? - - - But who, I pray, the guards themſelves ‘ ſhall guard?’ Let us ſee how Theſeus ſpoke to Minos. ‘ Dicitur cum Theſeus Cretam ad Minoa ‘ cum ſeptem virginibus & ſex pueris veniſſet, Minoa ‘ de virginibus Periboeam quandam nomine, candore ‘ corporis inductum comprimere voluiſſe, quod cum ‘ Theſeus ſe paſſurum negaret, ut qui Neptuni filius ‘ eſſet, & valeret contra tyrannum pro virginis inco- ‘ lumitate decertare, &c (10). - - - It is ſaid that when ‘ Theſeus was come to Crete with ſeven virgins and ſix ‘ youths, Minos charmed with the beauty of one of the ‘ virgins named Peribœa, would have debauched her, ‘ which Theſeus declaring he would not ſuffer, as being ‘ the ſon of Neptune, and able to encounter with Minos ‘ in defence of the maid, &c.’ Hyginus tells us afterwards

(1) Lib. ii, pag. 72.

(2) In Parallelis, pag 312, num. 27.

(3) Meziriac, upon Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 275.

(4) Apollodor. lib. iii, Pauſanias, lib. i, pag. 15, & 40.

(5) Sophocles, in Ajace. Pindar. Iſthm. Od. VI. Diodor. Siculus, lib. iv. Hyginus, cap. xcvii.

(6) Νομίμως δ' αὐτὸν γῆμαι Μελίβοιαν τὴν Αἴαντος μητέρα γυναῖκα. Juſtam vero illius conjugem fuiſſe Melibœam Ajacis matrem. Iſter, lib. iv, Rerum Attic. apud Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 557.

(7) Iſthm. Od. VI.

(8) Pauſanias, lib. i, pag. 15. See alſo pag. 40, where he con- concludes from Peribœa's being ſent to Minos, that Megara made in former times part of the ſtate of Athens. Diodorus Siculus ſays Alcathous was an Athenian.

(9) Juven. Sat. VI, ver. 345.

(10) Hygin. Poetic. Aſtron. lib. ii, cap. v.

great warriour; of whom I ſpeak in its proper place. We are told of a third wife of Telamon, by whom he had a ſon named Teucer. This wife was Heſione the daughter of Laomedon King of Troy, and ſiſter of Priam (b). That marriage happened in this manner. Telamon followed Hercules, when Laomedon was to be puniſhed for refuſing to pay Hercules what he had promiſed him. His capital city was taken by ſtorm; and becauſe Telamon was the firſt who ſcaled the walls of Troy, Hercules preſented him with Heſione. Telamon ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral other occaſions while he attended upon that General, as in the war with the Amazons (i), in that with the Meropes, and in the fight with the giant Alcyoneus (k). He was in the expedition of the Argonauts (l), and if he did not go to the ſiege of Troy, probably it was only old age that prevented him. He ſent thither his two ſons. Even in Pauſanias's time they ſhewed, near the port of Salamis, the rock on which he ſat (m), that he might view as far as poſſible, the ſhip on which they embarked to go to the general rendezvous of the Grecian fleet (n). He was ſtill alive when the Grecians returned from Troy. He was doubtleſs very ſorry for the death of his ſon Ajax; but he appeared more diſpleaſed that Teucer, his other ſon, had not prevented or revenged it (o). He would not receive him; but repulſed him with diſgrace. It has been obſerved of him, as well as of his brother Peleus, that he had a ſon who ſurpaſſed him (p). See the fate of Ajax's deſcendants in the article TECMESSA, and that of TEUCER's poſterity in the article of that name.

(b) Apollod. Bibl. lib. iii, pag. 72.

(i) Pindar. Nem. Od. III.

(k) Id. ibid. Od. IV, & Iſthm. Od. VI.

(l) Apollon. & Valer. Flaccus, Argon. paſſim.

(m) Pauſan. lib. i, pag. 34.

(n) It was at Aulis in the iſle of Eubœa.

(o) See the article TEUCER.

(p) Vinceris ut Ajax Præteriit Telamonem, ut Pelea vicit Achilles. You'll be out done, Like Telamon, and Peleus, by a ſon. Juvenal. Sat. XIV, ver. 213.

wards how Theſeus proved his divine original. It is a curious thing: there never was ſo difficult a proof of one's nobility.

[D] From this marriage iſſued Ajax.] I think Dares Phrygius is the only author, who ſays, that Heſione, the daughter of Laomedon, was Ajax's mother, and that Ajax and Hector, by reaſon of their kindred, after they had fought ſtoutly together, were very civil, and made preſents to one another. The generality of authors are of a quite different opinion, viz. that Peribœa or Eribœa, was the mother of Ajax, and Heſione the mother of Teucer. I do not regard the ſuppoſition of Sophocles (11), that Ajax's mother was alive, when that unfortunate Prince killed himſelf; for a Poet does not pretend to much exactneſs in writing a Tragedy: beſides that Telamon might have been married at the ſame time both to Peribœa and Heſione. It is certain Sophocles (12) ſays, that Teucer was a baſtard, born of a woman who had been taken captive in the war. This was Heſione, as Servius informs us. ' Ejus (Laomedontis) filia He-
' ſione, ſays he (13), belli jure ſublata, comiti Tela-
' moni tradita eſt qui primus aſcenderat murum, unde
' Teucer natus eſt, nam Ajacem ex alia conſtat eſſe
' procreatum. - - - Laomedon's daughter Heſione, ſays
' he, taken captive by the rights of war, was given to
' his companion Telamon, who firſt had ſcaled the wall,
' by whom he had Teucer, for it is certain he had Ajax
' by another.' The ſcholiaſt upon theſe words of Homer's Iliad (14), καὶ σε νόθον περ' ἐόντα, & te ſpurium licet exiſtentem, ſays, that Heſione, a priſoner of war, was given to Telamon, who had Teucer by her; and that this Trojan original was the reaſon why the child bore that name.

(11) In Ajace.

(12) Ibid.

(13) In Æn. lib. i, ver. 619.

(14) Lib. viii, ver 284.

TELEBOÆ, a people who inhabited an iſland in the neighbourhood of Acarnania, who perhaps had been long ſince forgotten, had it not been for the great relation they indirectly bore to the birth of Hercules; but by virtue of that relation they are become known in the very loweſt forms of the ſchools. Is there any ſchool-boy who does not know that Alcmena conceived Hercules, whilſt Amphytrion, her huſband, was making war with the Teleboæ, &c? The reaſon why he made war with them, is, that Alcmena had promiſed to marry the man, who ſhould go to war with them. But in order to know why ſhe hated that people, the matter muſt be traced a little higher. Meſtor, the ſon of Perſeus, had by his marriage with Lyſidice (a), a daughter named Hippothoe, whom Neptune ſtole and carried away into the iſlands called Echinades (b), where ſhe had a ſon by him, whoſe name was Taphius [A]. This Taphius ſettled a colony in Taphos, and named the inhabitants Teleboæ [B], becauſe of the great way he thought

(a) The daughter of Pelops, (and of Hippodamia) Apoll. lib. ii, pag. 97.

(b) They are now called Curzolari. And are ſituated at the entrance of the gulph of Lepanto.

[A] A ſon, whoſe name was Taphius.] We read in the ſcholiaſt upon Apollonius (1), that the ſon of Neptune and Hippothoe, was called Pterelaus, and that he had two ſons, namely Teleboas, and Taphus, who went to Electryon and demanded of him the eſtate of their grand-mother Hippothoe; and not being able to bring him to reaſon, they had recourſe to force, and killed a great many people. By this account we get a whole generation, and therefore this account is rather to be received. It is ſhocking to find in Apollodorus, that Electryon was attacked by the great-grand-ſons of the daughter of his brother Meſtor. There is another thing in Apollodorus, concerning Taphius, which is not well cleared up. This author ſays (2), that Taphius reigned at Mycænæ with Electryon, when the ſix ſons of Pterelaus went to Electryon and demanded of him Meſtor's kingdom for their grand-father by their mother's ſide. This grand-father was Taphius himſelf, who reigned at Mycenæ with Electryon: Electryon had no other kingdom; and therefore what kingdom could they demand of him for Taphius? Obſerve carefully, that, according to the ſcholiaſt upon Apollonius (3), the whole kingdom of Perſeus was poſſeſſed in common, after his death, by his four ſons, Alcæus, Sthenelus, Meſtor, and Electryon. Agreeably to this account, no juſt claim could be made to Meſtor's kingdom, in favour of Taphius, ſince Taphius was already in poſſeſſion of it. However it be, we read in this ſcholiaſt that Taphius, the ſon of Pterelaus, called the iſle of Taphos by his name; and that his brother Teleboas gave his to the people I am ſpeaking of in this article, whoſe chief habitation was in the iſle of Taphos. This is one of their Etymologies: I have already mentioned another; the reſt may be ſeen below. It is certain, that the ſame people were indifferently called Taphii and Teleboæ (4).

[B] And called the inhabitants Teleboæ.] Stephanus Byzantinus informs us, that the country of the Teleboæ, or Telebois, was part of Acarnania, and had its name from Teleboas, being formerly called Taphion. Ariſtotle (5) ſays partly the ſame thing, ſince he tells us, that the Teleboæ were poſſeſſed of part of Acarnania. He ſays alſo (6), that one Lelex, a native of Leucas, had a daughter, whoſe ſon, called Teleboas, had twenty-two ſons of that ſame name. What I have juſt now been citing out of Stephanus Byzantinus, is directly contrary to Strabo (7), who affirms, that the iſles of the Taphians, one of which was called Taphos, were originally called the iſles of the Teleboæ. He adds, that Amphitryon ſubdued them, and gave them to Cephalus an Athenian fugitive, who helped him to conquer them. Some have thought, that the iſle of Cephalonia was then given to Cephalus, who called it by that name (8), and became afterwards

(1) In Argonaut. lib. i, ver. 747.

(2) Pag. 99.

(3) Ubi ſupra.

(4) See Euſtath. in Odyſſ. lib. i.

(5) In Acarnanum Republica, apud Strabon. lib. vii, pag. 222.

(6) In Leucadiorum Repub. apud Strab. ibid.

(7) Lib. x, pag. 316.

(8) Ibid. pag. 314.

thought he had gone (c). He had a ſon called Pterelaus, who was the father of ſix ſons, and one daughter. Theſe ſix ſons going to Mycenæ to demand Meſtor's kingdom, could obtain nothing from Electryon King of Mycenæ the ſon of Perſeus, and brother of Meſtor. It was for this reaſon they plundered his country. The ſons of Electryon, endeavouring to repel force by force were all killed. Their father was preparing to revenge their death, when he was killed by a very ſtrange accident (d). His daughter Alcmena was forced to retire to Thebes; and not being willing to leave the death of her brothers unpuniſhed [C], ſhe promiſed to marry the perſon, who ſhould revenge it. Amphitryon offered himſelf to do it, and aſſembling all the troops he was able, made a deſcent upon the country of the Teleboæ. He laid waſte ſome of their iſlands, but could not take Taphos; till Comætho, who fell in love with him, had plucked off the golden hair from her father Pterelaus [D], which made him immortal. Amphitryon did not keep thoſe conqueſts for himſelf, but left them to Cephalus and Eleus, who had aſſiſted

(c) Τηλεβόας ἐκάλεσεν ὅτι τηλοῦ τῆς πατρίδος ἔβη. Teleboas vocavit, ideò quod procul à patria iverit. Apollod. ibid.

(d) See the article of AMPHITRYON.

---

wards maſter of Acarnania (9). He was the firſt who tried the leap of Leucas (10). We read, that the Teleboæ were great robbers (11). See the proofs of it in Bochart's Geographia Sacra, book 1. chap. xxiii. and the remark [F] of this article. I ſhall ſet down the words of the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius on a paſſage wherein that Poet calls the ſame people Teleboæ and Taphii. It is in the 747th verſe of the firſt book. The iſle of Taphos is one of the Echinades: it was inhabited by the Teleboæ, who before lived in Acarnania; they were great robbers (12): they went into the kingdom of Argos to carry off the oxen of Electryon, father of Alcmena. There happened an engagement, in which Electryon, and his ſons were killed. Wherefore Alcmena declared that her perſon ſhould be the reward of him, who ſhould revenge Electryon; and becauſe Amphitryon undertook it, ſhe married him. It is commonly ſaid in our Dictionaries, that Amphitryon revenged the death of Alcmena's brother. This is a fault, for ſhe loſt ſeveral brothers; and in Apollodorus it is the revenging her brothers, which ſhe demands of him who would be her huſband. In the ſcholiaſt upon Apollonius ſhe deſires the revenging her father. Some miſcopying, ſome error of the Preſs, might be the occaſion, that inſtead of patris, the authors whom Charles Stephens copies wrote fratris; and this fault ſtill continues. Here follow two Etymologies. Τηλεβόαι οὖν οἱ τάφιοι, ἤτοι ὅτι τῆλε οἰκοῦντες ἀπὸ ἄργους τὰ. βοῦς ἀπήλασαν· ἢ ἀπὸ Τηλεβόου τοῦ Πτερέλα τοῦ βασιλέως υἱοῦ (13). - - -The Taphians therefore were called Teleboans, becauſe they were perſons living a great way off, who carried away the oxen from the Argives: or from Teleboas the ſon of King Pterelaus. Lloyd aſcribes ſeveral things to the ſcholiaſt upon Apollonius which I do not meet with. 1. That Herodotus ſays, that Perſeus left four ſons. He ſhould have ſaid Herodorus. 2. That one of them was called Alarus: he ſhould have ſaid Alcæus. 3. That another was called Neſtor: he ſhould have ſaid Meſtor. 4. That Electryon was bound for a ſum of money for Hippothoe: the ſcholiaſt ſays no ſuch thing. 5. That Alcmena married Amphitryon, a very powerful Theban lord: the ſcholiaſt could not call him a Theban; Amphitryon was not a Theban. 6. That the kingdom of the Teleboæ, which was given to Cephalus, devolved to Ulyſſes by right of inheritance: I find nothing of this in the ſcholiaſt. See Lloyd at the word Taphiæ. His article is the ſame with that of Charles Stephens. It muſt not be forgot, that the Teleboæ ſettled in an iſland of Great Greece, in that iſland which Tiberius's retreat made ſo famous. This we find in Tacitus: ' Græcos ea tenuiſſe, Capreaſque Telebois habitatas fama tradit (14). - - - - ' They ſay that the Greeks poſſeſſed that country, and that the iſland Caprea was inhabited by the Teleboans.' Virgil ſays the ſame thing (15). And ſo do Auſonius, and Statius.

Quem generaſſe Telon Sebethide Nympha
Fertur, Teleboum Capreas cum regna teneret.

'Tis ſaid Sebethis him to Telon bore,
While he the Teleboan crown in Caprea wore.

Theſe are Virgil's words. As for Auſonius, he expreſſes himſelf thus: ' Virideſque reſultant Teleboæ ' (16). - - - And Teleboan groves reſound. He ſpeaks of the iſle of Caprea. And as to Statius (17) he deſcribes that iſle in this manner.

Seu tibi Bacchei vineta madentia Gauri,
Teleboumque domos, trepidis ubi dulcia nautis
Lumina noctivagæ tollit Pharus æmula lunæ.

Or where mount Gaurus fam'd for vines is ſhewn,
And Teleboan ſhores, by ſailors known,
Whoſe pharus, lanthorn, emulates the moon.

[C] To leave the death of her brothers unpuniſhed.] It has been ſhewn in the foregoing remark, that the ſingular number ought not to be uſed here, and that ſome authors, contrary to Apollodorus's account, ſay, that Electryon was killed with his ſons; ſo that Alcmena mentioned her father and not her brothers, when ſhe demanded that her future huſband ſhould be the inſtrument of her revenge.

[D] From her father Pterelaus.] Plautus ſuppoſes, that Amphitryon killed Pterelaus with his own hand (18); and that he had for his ſhare of the booty the golden cup of that Prince (19). Poets are allowed to ſuppoſe ſuch things, though they be ever ſo falſe. But as to the reſt, I do not think that the learned Mrs le Fevre had any grounds for charging Plautus with a ſmall anachroniſm. It is certain, ſays ſhe (20), that Pterelaus was not cotemporary with Amphitryon, ſince he was the ſon of Taphius, who was the ſon of a niece of Alcæus, father of Amphitryon; and conſequently the couſin-german of Amphitryon was Pterelaus's grandmother. This genealogy is taken out of Apollodorus: I have already ſaid, that this author is not ſo clear as the ſcholiaſt upon Apollonius. Nevertheleſs Plautus ought not to be cenſured upon this head; for ſince apollodorus ſays, that Pterelaus was alive when Amphitryon went to attack him, Plautus does not advance of his own head that thoſe two Princes lived at the ſame time; he might find it in hiſtorical monuments. It is not he therefore who is guilty of that Anachroniſm. It is much more ſurprizing, that the ſons of Pterelaus ſhould make war with Electryon, Amphitryon's uncle by the mother's ſide, as we read in Apollodorus.

OBSERVATIONS on the cup of Pterelaus.

Let us ſay ſomething of Pterelaus's cup. Jupiter made a preſent of it to Alcmena; and afterwards when the true Amphitryon looked for it among his things, to know whether it had been given to his wife, as ſhe affirmed, it occaſioned a very ſurprizing and diverting incident in Plautus's Comedy. This was not wholly the invention of the Poet; for ' (21) Charon of ' Lampſacus an Hiſtorian, who lived in the LXXVth ' Olympiad, that is, 478 years before Chriſt, ſaid, that ' the cup beſtowed upon Alcmena, was ſtill to be ſeen in ' his time in the Academy; that it was long, ſomewhat ' hollowed in the middle, with the edges a little turned down.' As Charon's works are loſt, I have conſulted Athenæus, who quotes him, and this is what I have met with in that author (22). He ſays Charon of Lampſacus affirmed, in his book of Frontiers, that the cup, which Jupiter preſented to Alcmena, when he put on the form of Amphitryon, was ſtill to be ſeen in his time at Lacedæmon. I do not find that Charon left a deſcription of that cup: it is Macrobius who has deſcribed it (23), building upon what Pherecydes had ſaid (24), that the veſſel which Jupiter preſented to Alcmena, was a Carcheſium. Athenæus tells us, that Pherecydes, and Herodorus of Heraclea ſaid ſo; and mentions Calixenus's deſcription of the Carcheſium. There is no room to doubt that Macrobius took from Athenæus what he ſays of it, and his words ought to be corrected by thoſe of that Greek author, as Caſaubon obſerves. Here follow Macrobius's words. ' Plautus inſuetum nomen reliquit, aitque aſſiſted him in that war. This is what we find in Apollodorus (e). What I have met with in other authors, that may ſerve to rectify or explain him, or to give a more diſtinct account of this matter, may be ſeen in the remarks. I ſhall there make ſome obſervations upon ſome paſſages of Plautus's Amphitryon [E], and upon Mrs

---

(9) Ibid. pag. 317.

(10) Ibid. pag. 315, 317. See the article LEUCAS.

(11) Strabo, pag. 316.

(12) Ἄνδρες ληστρικώτατοι τὸν τρόπον.

(13) Schol. Apollon. in lib. i, ver. 747. See alſo Euſtath. in lib. i, Odyſſ.

(14) Tacitus, Annal. lib. iv, cap. lxvii.

(15) Virgil. Æneïd. lib. vii, ver. 734.

(16) Apud Lipſium in Tacit. Annal. lib. iv, cap. lxvii.

(17) Silv. V, lib. iii, ver. 100.

(18) Ipſuſque Amphitruo Regem Pterelam ſua obtruncat manu. Plaut. Amphitr. Act. I, Scen. I, ver. 95.

(19) Poſt ob virtutem hero Amphitruoni eſt patera donata aurea. Qui Pterelea potitare Rex ſolitu'ſt. Ibid. ver. 104.

(20) Remarks upon the Amphitryon, pag. 251.

(21) They are Mrs le Fevre's words, ubi ſupra, pag. 276. If you compare them with the words of Macrobius, you will ſee whether ſhe hath rendred them well.

(22) Lib. xi, pag. 475.

(23) Meminit carcheſii Pherecydes in libris hiſtoriarum, aitque Jovem Alcmenæ precium concubitus carcheſium aureum dono dediſſe. - - - Pherecydes in his Hiſtorical Works, mentions the Carcheſium, and ſays that Jupiter preſented a golden one to Alcmena, in return for her favours. Macrobius, Saturn. lib. v, cap. xxi.

(24) Apud Athen. pag. 474.

que in fabula Amphitryone pateram datam: cum longe utriuſque poculi figura diverſa ſit: patera enim ut & ipſum nomen indicio eſt, planum ac patens eſt: carcheſium vero procerum & circa mediam partem compreſſum, anſatum mediocriter, anſis à ſummo ad infimum pertinentibus (25). - - - Plautus in his Amphitryon expreſſes it by an improper name, and ſays the preſent was a patera, whereas the figure of theſe two ſorts of cups was quite different: for the patera, as the name itſelf imports, is ſpreading and open: but the carcheſium is tall, and compreſſed about the middle, moderately handled, the handles reaching from the top quite down to the bottom.' Now ſee the text of Athenæus. Καλλίξενος ὁ Ρόδιος ἐν τοῖς περὶ Ἀλεξανδρείας φησὶν, ὅτι ποτήριόν ἐστιν ἐπίμηκες συνηγμήνον εἰς μέσον ἐπιεικῶς, ὦτα ἔχον μέχει τοῦ πυθμένος κατήκοντα. Calixenus Rhodius tradit in ſuis libris de Alexandria, carcheſium eſſe poculum oblongum, in medio leniter compreſſum, auribus utrinque ad fundum uſque deſcendentibus. - - - Callixenus the Rhodian in his books of Alexandria, deſcribes the carcheſium to be an oblong cup, moderately compreſſed about the middle, with handles on both ſides deſcending quite down to the bottom. It is plain the adverb mediocriter in Macrobius, refers to compreſſum, and not to anſatum. A tranſcriber who thinks that an adverb belongs to a certain adjective, makes no difficulty to put it either before, or after that adjective. No body thinks there is any harm in writing anſatum mediocriter, rather than mediocriter anſatum. But ſometimes it is of great importance, not to take ſuch a liberty; for inſtance, when the adverb does not belong to anſatum.

[E] Some obſervations upon ſome paſſages of Plautus's Amphitryon (26).] I. This Poet ſuppoſes, that it was Creon King of Thebes, who made war upon the Teleboæ, to revenge the Thebans, who had been very ill uſed by them.

. . . . Victis hoſtibus legiones reveniunt domum,
Duello extincto maximo, atque internecatis hoſtibus,
Qui multa Thebano populo objecerunt acerba funera.
Id vi & virtute militum victum atque expugnatum opidum 'ſt,
Imperio atque auſpicio heri mei Amphitruonis maxime.
Præda atque agro adoreaque affecit populares ſuos,
Regique Thebano Creonti regnum ſtabilivit ſuum (27).

The conqu'ring troops return in triumph home,
The war extinguiſh'd, and the foes cut off,
Who ſlew ſo many of our Theban people.
The town was taken by the ſoldiers valour,
By my victorious lord Amphytrion's orders.
He cheer'd his men with preſents and with ſpoils,
And fix'd King Creon on the Theban throne.

This is perverting Hiſtory; for authors are agreed, that Amphitryon undertook this expedition only to puniſh the Teleboæ, who had killed Alcmena's father, or at leaſt her brothers. He could not marry Alcmena without revenging her of the Teleboæ. This was the occaſion of the war, in which Creon engaged merely out of complaiſance to Amphitryon, or in acknowledgment of ſome ſervice he had received from him (28). This hiſtorical fact might have afforded many ornaments, if the Poet had been willing to improve it. He has debaſed the rank of his hero: he repreſents him as only commanding the troops of another Prince, in a war undertaken for the intereſt of that Prince; whereas, according to Hiſtory, Amphitryon acted in chief for his own intereſts, and had with him none but auxiliary troops, whoſe commanders he rewarded with the countries he conquered. II. Plautus makes the troops take ſhipping in the port of Eubœa, which he calls Perſicus by a too licentious anticipation. But this is not the worſt: it is a great deal more ſhocking that he does not find a port more convenient for people, who were to ſail towards the iſles called Echinades. Bleſs us, what a round about courſe muſt be taken to go thither from the iſle of Eubœa! III. The lying-in of Alcmena is an ill-contrived incident, which obliges the Poet entirely to overthrow tradition. All thoſe, who have mentioned Hercules's birth, ſuppoſe, that Jupiter in the ſhape of Amphitryon, lay with Alcmena a whole night which he took care to make longer than others. Plautus ſhould have built upon this ground, and adorned and embelliſhed it; but he ſhould not have ſuppoſed a ſecond viſit. Jupiter ſhould not have returned to his poſt, under the ſame ſhape the night before the lying-in. This is not only contrary to tradition, but alſo ſhocking to the hearers and readers. It is no longer gallantry but brutality (29): a woman, ready to be delivered of two boys, is not a fit object to be produced upon the ſtage; much leſs ought the greateſt of the gods to be repreſented ſo enamoured with ſuch an object, that the uſual length of the night is not ſufficient for him to ſatisfy his paſſion. If the charms he found in the embraces of that lady made him wiſh for a ſecond interview, he ſhould not have put it off till the day before her lying in. So great a forbearance exceeds probability. This objection cannot be got over; for to ſay, that Plautus makes his play laſt nine months, would be running into greater difficulties, and appearing ignorant of theſe words of Mercury:

HODIE illa pariet filios geminos duos (30).

TO DAY ſhall ſhe be brought to bed with twins.

This hodie refers to the ſame day that he turned out Soſia in the firſt ſcene. IV. I do not approve what ſome ſay, that Alcmena's delivery without pain is too plainly contrary to what we are told by the Greeks of Juno's artifices: it is a thing, ſay they, which ought not to be ſuppoſed, without an extreme neceſſity. A Poet, who takes the death of Polyxena for the ſubject of his tragedy, may be allowed to alter a great many things in the tradition: but if he ſhould ſuppoſe, that Achilles did not deſire to have her ſacrificed to him, if he ſhould trample upon the capital facts of that Hiſtory, he would offend againſt the rules. But of what ſervice is it to Plautus to make Alcmena feel no pain?

Dum hæc aguntur, interea uxorem tuam
Neque gementem, neque plorantem noſtrum quiſquam audivimus.
Ita profecto ſine dolore peperit (31).

While theſe things paſs'd, your wife
By none of us was heard to cry or groan.
So very free from pain was ſhe delivered.

This ſeems to me a weak objection; for it was neceſſary, in order to unravel the plot, that there ſhould appear ſomething miraculous in Alcmena's delivery. Her chaſtity was to be juſtified, and a jealous huſband was to be pacified; and therefore there was a neceſſity for the Poet to intereſt Jupiter in the caſe. He was allowed therefore, nay, he was obliged, to lay aſide what was ſaid of Lucina.

Quin nunc quoque frigidus artus
Dum loquor horror habet, parſque eſt meminiſſe doloris.
Septem ego per noctes totidem cruciata diebus,
Feſſa malis tendenſque ad cœlum brachia, magno
Lucinam ad nexos partus clamore vocabam,
Illa quidem venit, ſed præcorrupta, meumque
Quæ donare caput Junoni vellet iniquæ (32).

Cold chills my limbs while I the tale purſue,
And now methinks I feel my pangs anew.

Seven

(e) Biblioth. lib. ii, pag. 97, & ſeq.

(25) Macrob. ubi ſupra.

(26) Confer, above, remark [D].

(27) Plautus, in Amphitryone, Act. i, Scene i, ver. 33. Mercury had been ſaying in the prologue. Is nunc Amphitruo præfectu'ſt legionibus. Nam cum Telebois bellum 'ſt Thebano poplo.

(28) See Apollodorus, lib. ii, pag. m. 97, & ſeq.

(29) See above, the article ALCMENA, remark [D].

(30) Act. i, Scen. ii,

(31) Act. v, Scen. I.

(32) Alcmena, apud Ovidium. Metamorph. lib. ix, ver. 290. See alſo Pauſanias, lib. ix, pag. 290.

Mrs le Fevre's notes [F].

Seven days and nights amidſt inceſſant throes,
Fatigu'd with ills I lay, nor knew repoſe;
When lifting high my hands, in ſhrieks I pray'd,
Implor'd the gods, and call'd Lucina's aid.
She came, but prejudic'd, to give my fate
A ſacrifice to vengeful Juno's hate.

GAY.

[F] And upon Mrs le Fevre's notes (33).] She was of opinion (34), that Plautus made uſe of the word Nepos to ſignify nephew in this paſſage of the fourth ſcene of the fourth act. ‘ Ego idem ille ſum ‘ Amphitruo, Gorgophones nepos, Imperator Thebanorum. - - - I am that ſame Amphitryon the nephew ‘ of Gorgophone, commander of the Thebans.’ I cannot readily come into this opinion. It is true, that, according to the genealogy mentioned by Apollodorus, this was the ſole degree of kindred between Gorgophone and Amphitryon (35): but, ſince Plautus has not followed Apollodorus in ſome things, we ought to ſuppoſe that he had conſulted ſome other genealogies, wherein he found that Gorgophone was Amphitryon's grand-mother. There is more ſenſe in boaſting of being the grand-ſon of an illuſtrious lady, than in boaſting of being her nephew: it is therefore probable, that the Poet took the thing in the moſt advantageous ſenſe (36). I proceed to another fact: He has ſuppoſed, that the Teleboæ deſtroyed Electryon. I ſhall quote the whole paſſage, which contains a proof of what has been ſaid above concerning the robberies of that nation.

Ego idem latrones hoſtes bello & virtute contudi.
Electryonem perdiderant, noſtræ & germanos conjugis,
Achaiam, Ætoliam, Phocidem, per freta Ionium & Ægeum, & Creticum.
Vagati, vi vortebant piratica (37).

I too have triumph'd o'er thoſe villain robbers;
Who kill'd Electryon, and my ſpouſe's brothers,
And ravaged Achaia, Ætolia, & Phocis,
Scouring the Ionian, Ægean, and Cretan ſeas
With moſt audacious pyracy.

Mrs le Fevre (38) charges him with having altered the hiſtory in this point; ‘ for Electryon was not killed ‘ by his enemies. It was Amphitryon himſelf who ‘ killed him by accident, as he was throwing his club ‘ at an ox.’ I confeſs, that Plautus departs from Apollodorus in this; but there are ſome authors who have ſaid, that Electryon was killed by the Teleboæ (39). I ſhall conclude with this remark: ‘ (40) I ‘ have pitched upon Amphitryon, becauſe it is one of ‘ the fineſt pieces of Plautus; and it was ſo highly ‘ eſteemed by the Antients, that in Diocleſian's reign ‘ it was ſtill acted in times of a public calamity to ‘ appeaſe Jupiter's anger. Arnobius ſays in his ſeventh ‘ book; Ponit animos Jupiter, ſi Amphitryo fuerit actus, ‘ pronunciatuſque Plautinus? - - - What, will Jupiter be ‘ appeaſed, if Plautus's Amphitryon be acted?’ I do not believe Arnobius means that the Heathens pitched upon a time of a public calamity, ſuch as an irruption of Barbarians, a plague, or a famine, to act Amphitryon: but this ſeems to me to be his meaning. He thinks it wrong that the Pagans ſhould make the ſolemnity of their public games, one of their religious performances; and that they ſhould conſecrate thoſe games to a deity. He aſks the reaſon of this conduct, and ſuppoſes the anſwer to be, that the celebration of thoſe games was a means to be reconciled with the gods, and to make them forget the offences they might have received. Whereupon he aſks, by way of reply, Whether Jupiter ceaſes to be in an ill humour when Plautus's Amphitryon is acted? It is certain, that the inſtitution of the public games was owing to ſome public calamity, and to a deſign of worſhiping, for the future, in a ſolemn manner, the deity whoſe anger they dreaded: but afterwards the anniverſary celebration was not confined to the time of a public calamity: thoſe games were exhibited in time of plenty, as well as in time of ſcarcity; nay, they were carried on with much greater expence of every kind during the proſperity of the State, than during it's adverſity.

TELLIER (MICHAEL LE) Chancellor of France, died the thirtieth of October 1685. See his elogium in Moreri's Dictionary. He left behind him two ſons, one of whom has been very famous all over Europe, under the name of Marquis De LOUVOIS [A]. The other is one of the moſt illuſtrious prelates of the Gallican Church for his learning; and for the vigour wherewith he has always maintained the rights and privileges of his dignity (a) and checked the attempts of the Monks in his dioceſe [B]. He is Archbiſhop of Rheims, and has collected one of the fineſt libraries in France. See the catalogue of it, which he publiſhed in the year 1693 (b). He continues to enrich it every day (c) with all all ſorts of books, and all the curious have a free acceſs to that noble magazine of learning (§ α).

(a) See the Memoirs publiſhed by him, about the Cardinals ſitting in parliament; and againſt the erection of Cambray into a metropolis.

(b) Under the title of Bibliotheca Telleriana, in folio.

(c) I write this in June 1701.

[A] Under the name of Marquis de LOUVOIS.] He died at Verſailles the ſixteenth of July 1691, in his fifty-firſt year. He was Miniſter and Secretary of State, and had ſeveral employments. It is impoſſible to beſtow a finer elogium on him, than by ſaying, that all Europe was perſuaded, his death would be more advantageous to the allies, than the gaining of a compleat victory, and the conqueſt of two or three towns. Mr de Barbeſieux, one of his ſons, ſucceeded him in the office of Secretary of State, and died the fifth of January, 1701. The Abbot de Louvois, another of his ſons, is a great lover of learning. He was admired, in his younger years, by the anſwers he made to the difficulties he propoſed to him about Homer, in the preſence of a great number of perſons. Read this paſſage of the continuation of the Menagiana. The Abbot de L . . . . who, tho' ſo young, ſhews ſo great a ſkill in the Greek tongue, has been pleaſed to quote me upon that ſubject, and to praiſe me for the application of thoſe two verſes in an illuſtrious aſſembly, that was held at his houſe not long ago, in the preſence of the moſt learned men in the kingdom, who propoſed to him ſome difficulties upon Homer, which he anſwered with a wonderful preſence of mind. One of the moſt conſiderable was propoſed by the Abbot Faydit, viz. whether Homer had mentioned the Jews in his Iliad or his Odyſſey. He anſwered, that he had made no mention of them, and that the word Ιουδαῖοι was not to be found in Homer, &c (1). You may ſee in the original what was further urged by the Abbot Faydit, and the reply made to him. See alſo Mr Couſin concerning the Philoſophical theſis maintained by that Abbé on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, 1692 (2), and concerning the Actus Veſperiarum, or his diſputation in the Sorbonne before he was admitted Doctor of Divinity, on the ſeventeenth of March, 1700 (3).

I need not acquaint the reader, that the book publiſhed in Holland, in the year 1695, with this title, Teſtament politique du Marquis de Louvois, is a ſuppoſititious piece: but every body does not know that the author of that piece lives at Paris, and is a Roman Catholic.

[B] And checked the attempts of the Monks in his dioceſe.] I could give ſeveral inſtances of it; but I ſhall only refer the reader to what I have ſaid in the remark [N] of the article of FRANCIS of ASSISI, and in the remark [M] of the article MARIANA. See alſo the Lettres Hiſtoriques for July 1697.

[(§ α) This library was ſoon made up of the ſpoils of thoſe which ſeveral Proteſtants in Paris and Champaign were forced to leave behind them on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. To be convinced that this is it's proper epoch, we need only run over the Bibliotheca Telleriana,

---

(33) Confer above, remark [D].

(34) Notes, pag. 310.

(35) He ſays ſhe was the daughter of Perſeus, and that Amphitryon was the ſon of Alcæus, ſon of Perſeus.

(36) See the article GORGOPHONE, remark [A].

(37) Act IV, Scen. IV, ver. 54.

(38) Notes, pag. 311.

(39) Schol. Apollon. in Argon. lib. i, ver. 747.

(40) Mrs le Fever in her Preface.

(1) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 294, Dutch Edit.

(2) Journal des Sçavans, of September 8, 1692, pag 623, Dutch Edition.

(3) Idem, April 5, 1700, pag. 271.

Telleriana, the main part of this fine library conſiſting ſcare of any other than thoſe ſort of books, which the Proteſtants in France, whether men of letters, or only curious perſons, took care to purchaſe. Rem. Crit.]

TELMESSUS (a) a ſea-port town in the furtheſt part of Lycia (b), at the foot of a mountain of the ſame name, which makes part of Mount Cragus. That town was given to Eumenes by the Romans (c), when they defeated Antiochus; but the Lycians recovered it after the kingdom of Eumenes had been deſtroyed (d). The inhabitants of that town had naturally a prophetical ſpirit, which is the reaſon why it has been much talked of. Every body there was born a diviner [A]; their women and children received that gift from nature. It was to this place, Gordius went to know the meaning of a prodigy which made him uneaſy [B]: he had it explained to him without being obliged to go into the town; for meeting a handſome maid at the gate, he aſked her who was the beſt diviner he could apply to. The maid immediately deſired to know what he had to propoſe, and being acquainted with it, gave him the interpretation he wanted. And this was a very agreeable piece of news; for her anſwer was that the prodigy promiſed Gordius a crown. At the ſame time the propheteſs offered to marry him. He accepted the condition, as a beginning of the good fortune which was foretold him. Cicero thought that the reaſon why the inhabitants of Telmeſſus, and of the adjacent country, became ſuch great obſervers of prodigies, was becauſe they inhabited a fruitful country, which produced ſeveral extraordinary things [C]. But others go farther back, and tell us of one Telmeſſus a great diviner, who was the founder of that town, and whoſe relicks were in great veneration among the inhabitants. They lay under the altar of Apollo (e), who was his father (f). From hence, according to the conceits of the Pagans, muſt proceed this prophetical ſpirit, which became ſo remarkable in that place. Telmeſſus taught the art of propheſying in his life-time, and was to inſpire his votaries with it after his death. We muſt add, that his mother, the daughter of Antenor, was endowed with the ſame ſpirit. She had it from Apollo, when he lay with her, under the ſhape of a little dog (g). If the work of Stephanus Byzantinus was not ſo very much mangled, we ſhould find in it ſome particulars about Telmeſſus. We may conjecture from the remains of this author (h), that Telmeſſus founded the town I am ſpeaking of; and that he came from the country of the Hyperboreans, to the oracle of (a) Ptolemy, lib. v, cap. iii. calls it Τελμησσός. Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. m. 457, and Stephanus Byzantinus, Τελμισσός.

(b) Quæ Lyciam finit urbs Telmeſſus. Plin. lib. v, cap. xxvii. Mela, lib. i, cap. xv. Vide ibi Iſ. Voſſium.

(c) Livius, lib. xxxvii.

(d) Strabo, pag. 458.

(e) Sub Apollinis arula quæ Telmeſſi apud oppidum viſitur, Telmeſſum eſſe conditum vatem, non ſcriptis conſtantibus indicatur? Arnobius, lib. vi, pag. 193. See Suidas, voce Τελμισεῖς.

(f) Dionyſ. in Originibus, apud Suidam, ibid.

(g) Idem, Dionyſ. ibid.

(h) In voce Γαλεῶται. It is called there Τελμισσός.

[A] Every body there was born a diviner.] I do not deſire the reader to take this on my authority, and therefore I ſhall quote a conſiderable Hiſtorian for it. Τὸν δὲ (Γόρδιον) ἐκπλαγέντα τῇ ὄψει, ἴεναι κοινώσοντα ὑπὲρ τοῦ θείου παρὰ τοὺς Τελμισσέας τοὺς μάντεις. εἶναι γὰρ τοὺς Τελμισσέας σοφοὺς τὰ θεῖα ἐξηγεῖσθαι, καὶ σφίσιν ἀπὸ γένους δεδόσθαι αὐτοῖς καὶ γυναιξὶ καὶ παισὶ τὴν μαντείαν. Gordium ſpectaculo attonitum, Telmiſſenſes vates communicandæ rei cauſa adiiſſe, (eſſe enim Telmiſſenſes peritiſſimos prodigiorum interpretes, & vaticinandi ſcientiam ipſis pariter atque uxoribus & liberis ab ortu inſitam eſſe) (1). Pliny (2) ſeems to ſay, that the town of Telmeſſus, which he calls moſt religious, had been one of the principal ſeats of Magic; he does not ſcruple to join it with Theſſaly in that reſpect. But there never was a country more cried down for witchcraft than Theſſaly.

> Somnia, terrores magicos, miracula, ſagas,
> Nocturnos lemures, portentaque Thessala rides?
>
> Dreams, witchcraft, miracles, do you deſpiſe,
> Hobgoblins, and Thessalian prodigies?

Horace, who ſpeaks thus in the ſecond epiſtle of the ſecond book, frequently uſes the like expreſſion; and it appears from Lucan (3), that Theſſala, or Theſſalis, without any addition, denoted a witch. If the thing be rightly conſidered, the paſſage of Pliny expreſſes the character of the Telmeſſians, as fully as the paſſage of Arrian. See what I ſhall quote out of Cicero hereafter.

[B] It was thither Gordius went to know the meaning of a prodigy, which made him uneaſy.] This ſtory is to be found in Juſtin (4), if we change the uſual reading, and inſtead of vicinæ urbis, read Telmeſſi urbis, or Telmiſinæ urbis, according to the correction of the moſt able Critics (5). The paſſage runs thus: ‘Gordius cùm in his regionibus bubus conductis araret, ‘aves eum omnis generis circumvolare cœperunt. ‘Profectus ad conſulendos augures vicinæ urbis, obviam in porta habuit virginem eximiæ pulchritudinis; percontatus eam quem potiſſimum augurem conſuleret, illa audita cauſa conſulendi, gnara artis ex ‘diſciplina parentum, regnum ei portendi, reſpondit, ‘polliceturque ſe & matrimonii & ſpei ſociam. Tam ‘pulchra conditio, prima regni felicitas videbatur. - - - ‘While Gordius was plowing in this country with hired ‘oxen, birds of all kinds began to gather and fly round ‘him. Upon this, going to conſult the Augurs of a neighbouring town, he met in the gate a beautiful virgin; ‘ſhe, being aſked who was the moſt able Augur he could ‘apply to, and hearing the queſtion he had to propoſe, as ‘ſhe underſtood the art herſelf, by the inſtruction of her ‘parents, anſwered, That a kingdom was portended to ‘him, and promiſed to become his wife and partner of ‘his good fortune. So agreeable an offer ſeemed to be an ‘earneſt of his royalty. What ſtrongly confirms this correction is, that Arrian (6), relating this adventure of Gordius, ſays, in expreſs terms, that Gordius applied himſelf to the diviners of the town of Telmeſſus. What follows in Arrian does not agree in all the circumſtances with Juſtin's narrative; but this is of no great moment to the matter now in queſtion. I omit not, however, to obſerve, that the tranſlator of Arrian has thruſt in Telmiſſenſium in a wrong place. It was not to the aſſembly of the inhabitants of Telmeſſus that the chariot carried Midas, attended by his father and mother, but to that of the Phrygians.

[C] Cicero thought that the reaſon why the inhabitants of Telmeſſus . . . . became ſuch great obſervers of prodigies, was, becauſe they inhabited a country which produced ſeveral extraordinary things.] To prove this, I ſhall ſet down two paſſages of Cicero not far from one another. The firſt runs thus: ‘Licet videre & ‘genera quædam & nationes huic ſcientiæ deditas. ‘Telmeſſus in Caria eſt, qua in urbe excellit Aruſpicum ‘diſciplina. - - - We may ſee certain families, and nations, addicted to this ſcience. Telmeſſus in Caria is a ‘place famous for the teaching of Augury.’ This is the other: ‘Tum Caria tota præcipueque Telmeſſenſes ‘quos ante dixi, quod agros uberrimos maximeque ‘fertiles incolunt, in quibus multa propter fœcunditatem fingi gignique poſſunt, in oſtentis animadvertendis diligentes fuerunt (7). - - - - The whole country ‘of Caria, and particularly the Telmeſſians, whom I ‘have before-mentioned, becauſe of their inhabiting in a ‘moſt plentiful and fertile region, in which, by reaſon of ‘it's fruitfulneſs, many extraordinary things might be ‘invented and produced, were great obſervers of prodigies.’ As Telmeſſus was ſituated on the borders of Lycia,

(1) Arrian. de Expedit. Alexandri, lib. ii, p. m. 85, 86.

(2) Nec poſtea quiſquam dixit quonam modo veniſſet Telmeſſum religioſiſſimam urbem, quando tranſiſſet ad Theſſalas urbes. Plin. lib. xxx, cap. i. Father Hardouin, going upon the authority of good manuſcripts, reads matres inſtead of urbes.

(3) Lib. vi, ver. 451: vide Harduinum in Plinium, Tom. iv, pag. 771.

(4) Lib. xi, cap. vii.

(5) See Grævius's Juſtin, pag. 230.

(6) Lib. ii, pag. 86.

(7) Cicero, lib. i, de Divinat. cap. xli, xlii.

of Dodona with a fellow-traveller, who founded a town, whoſe inhabitants were all divines. There is a great preſumption, that the like virtue was beſtowed upon Telmeſſus, both for him and thoſe, who ſhould build about the altar he erected by the direction of the oracle. We ought to believe that this altar was in the temple of Apollo Telmeſſus (i). The inhabitants of Telmeſſus had in particular a very great faith in dreams [D]. Ariſtander, a native of this town, and one of the moſt able diviners of his time (k), wrote a book upon that ſubject. Probably it was he who negociated a treaty between his country and Alexander. Arrian has mentioned this treaty in his firſt book. I do not think the town of Termeſſus ought to be confounded with that of Telmeſſus [E]: it is better in my opinion, to diſtinguiſh them into two towns, and to preſerve the name of Telmeſſus [F] to that which is ſituate on the frontiers of Lycia.

(i) Τελμισσὸς ἐν Καρίᾳ ἦλθεν, ἔνθα Ἀπόλλωνος Τελμισσίου ἱερόν. Telmiſſus in Cariam venit, ubi Apollinis Telmiſſii templum Stephanus Byzant. in Τελμισσός.

(k) See his article.

Lycia, it muſt be very near Caria; which is the reaſon why Cicero places it in this laſt province. Stephanus Byzantinus places it there alſo; but he adds, that Philo and Strabo place it in Lycia, and that it is a frontier town to thoſe two countries.

[D] The inhabitants of Telmeſſus had very great faith in dreams.] This we find in Tertullian, Telmeſſenſes, ſays he (8), nulla ſomnia evacuant, imbecillitatem conjectationis incuſant. The meaning of which ſeems to be, that the inhabitants of Telmeſſus believe that all dreams ſignify ſomething; that none of them is vain; and that the imperfection of our knowledge is the cauſe why we do not underſtand the ſignification of each dream.

[E] I do not think the town of Termeſſus ought to be confounded with that of Telmeſſus.] Strabo ſo plainly diſtinguiſhes them from one another, that he leaves no room for any doubt about it. His way of deſcribing the ſituation of Termeſſus (9), ſhews that it was a town of Piſidia, near the deſile, by which they went over Mount Taurus in the way to Mylias; and therefore Alexander reſolving to clear that paſſage, which was commanded by the town of Termeſſus, cauſed it to be demoliſhed. As for what relates to Telmeſſus (10), that Geographer places it at the entrance into Lycia on this ſide of the river Xanthus, and even on this ſide of Phaſelis, a ſea-town, which he places near Mount Solymus, and Termeſſus, a town of Piſidia, ſays he (11). I ſhall confirm this by the authority of Arrian. After he had mentioned Alexander's entring Lycia, he ſays (12), that this conqueror got the town of Telmeſſus by a treaty; that afterwards he paſſed the Xanthus; that he took the town of that name, and ſeveral others which ſurrendered to him; that he advanced towards the province of Mylias; that he ſecured the place, from whence he ſent part of his troops to Perga over the mountains, and marched with the reſt along the ſea; that he advanced as far as Sida; that he went back to Aſpendus, becauſe the inhabitants of that place had not performed their promiſe; that he forced them to ſurrender; that he went to Perga, and from thence into Phrygia; but the town of Telmeſſus, inhabited by Barbarians, who were by nation Piſidians, being in his way, he was obliged to take it; that it proved no eaſy thing, becauſe that town ſtood upon a ſteep hill, and the inhabitants had poſſeſſed themſelves of a neighbouring hill, ſo that they were maſters of the ſtreight or deſile between thoſe two hills. This is the very town, which Strabo calls Termeſſus; and it is manifeſt Arrian ſpeaks of two different towns, when he ſays (13), that his hero concluded a treaty with Telmeſſus when he entred Lycia; and (14) that he beſieged Telmeſſus as he was marching from Perga towards Phrygia. All that remains to be known, is, whether thoſe two towns ought to be called Telmeſſus, as they are in Arrian, or whether that of Lycia ought to go by the name of Telmeſſus, and that of Piſidia by the name of Termeſſus, as in Strabo, Stephanus Byzantinus, and Suidas: for the opinion of ſome learned men, who reduce them both to one town, under the name either of Termeſſus or Telmeſſus, cannot be maintained. Bochart (15), who reads Telmeſſus in Strabo for Termeſſus, may be confuted by a medal (16), which has on the one ſide ΤΕΡΜΗΣΣΕΩΝ, and on the other ΣΟΛΥΜΟΣ: which plainly ſhews, that the town of Piſidia, called Τερμεσσὸς by Strabo, is rightly named; for ſince the hill on the promontory of Termeſſus, was called Solymus, and the Termeſſians were alſo called Solymi (17), it is plain, that the people who have this great affinity with the Solymi, ought to bear the name expreſſed in the medal: but it is the name of the Termeſſians; and therefore Bochart is in the wrong to read Telmiſſus and Telmiſſenſes in that paſſage of Strabo; and thus one of his etymologies comes to nothing. He ſays that Caſaubon found in the manuſcripts Τελμήσσεως inſtead of Τερμήσσεως. Theſe ought to be corrected by the medal. He adds, that Euſtathius, quoting Strabo, writes Τελμισσὸς; but he might have found in Salmaſius, that Euſtathius ſhould not have made uſe of that name (18), and that beſides he very much miſunderſtood the paſſage he quoted (19).

[F] It is better . . . . to preſerve the name of Telmeſſus.] As there are a great many medals (20) with the inſcription ΤΕΡΜΗΣΣΕΩΝ, what remains to be known is, whether the town of Lycia, which makes the ſubject of this article, ought to be called Termeſſus. I am of opinion, with ſubmiſſion to better judgment, that it ought to be called Telmeſſus; for otherwiſe we muſt look upon as corrupted, not only the paſſages already mentioned (21) of Polybius, Arrian, Ariſtides, St Gregory Nazianzen, Cicero, and Livy, but alſo many others of Plutarch, Ælian, Lucian, Ptolemy, Stephanus Byzantinus, Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Tertullian, Arnobius, &c. All thoſe places, where Ariſtander, the Soothſayer, is ſirnamed of Telmeſſus would, in that caſe, be faulty. This would be going too far. It is therefore better to admit of two names; that of Termeſſus for the town of Piſidia, and that of Telmeſſus for the town of Lycia, where all the people were ſo liable to be inſpired. Correct with Salmaſius the paſſage of Arrian, wherein the town of Piſidia is called Τελμισσὸς. Male apud Arrianum Τελμισσὸς vocatur quæ eſt Τερμισσὸς (22). - - - The town Termiſſus is very falſly in Arrian called Telmiſſus.

(8) Tertul. de Anima, cap. xlvi.

(9) Strabo, lib. xiii, ſub fin. pag. 434, & lib. xiv, pag. 458.

(10) Idem, lib. xiv, pag. 457, 458.

(11) Τέρμισσος Πισιδικὴ πόλις. pag. 458. Τερμησσός ἐστι Πισιδικὴ πόλις, pag. 434.

(12) De Expedit. Alexandri, lib, i, pag. 69, & ſeq.

(13) Pag. 69.

(14) Pag. 75, 76.

(15) Bochart, Geograph. Sacr. lib. i, cap. vi.

(16) Apud Ezechiel. Spanhem. de Uſu & Præſt. Numiſm. pag. 477, 478.

(17) Τῆς γοῦν Τερμήσσεως ἄκρας ὁ ὑπερκείμενος λόφος καλεῖται Σόλυμος· καὶ αὐτοὶ δὲ οἱ Τερμησσεῖς Σόλυμοι καλοῦνται. Et ſanè tumulus qui ſupra Termeſſium jacet promontorium, Solymus appellatur: ipſi Termeſſi vocantur, Solymi. Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 433.

(18) Male Τελμισσὸν vocat Euſtathius. Salm. Exercit. Plinian. p. 784.

(19) Mira heic ſupinitas Euſtathii in Strabonis verbis referendis. Ibid.

(20) Spanhem. ubi ſupra.

(21) Id. ibid. pag. 478.

(22) Salmaſ. ubi ſupra.

TENEDOS, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, near the continent of Aſia, over againſt Troy. Some ſay (a) it was uninhabited, and called Leucophrys, before Tenes, the ſon of Cygnus, landed upon it. It was he therefore who firſt brought inhabitants into that iſland. He reigned over them with ſo much equity, that great honours were paid to him in his life-time, and after his death he was placed among the gods, as I ſhall relate when I come to ſpeak of him. He built a town, and it was from him the iſland was called Tenedos (b). In proceſs of time the people rather choſe to ſay, that he did not bring thither the firſt colony; but that he landed there as it were by a miracle [A], and that the inhabitants immediately expreſſed ſo great a reſpect for a man, who was ſo manifeſtly

(a) Diodorus, Siculus, lib. vi, cap. xvii. Servius in Æn. lib. ii, ver. 21.

(b) Quaſi Τεννέδος, that is, Tenni ſedes. Stephan in Τένεδος.

[A] As it were by a miracle.] His father being impoſed upon by his wife's calumnies, put him into a cheſt, and threw him into the ſea. I ſhall ſpeak of him hereafter (1). I do not find in the authors I have conſulted, the circumſtances of his preſervation; but I find in Muretus (2) that Neptune, Tenes's grandfather, came to the aſſiſtance of his grand-ſon; and that the cheſt, being carried to the iſle of Leucophrys, was opened by the inhabitants, who no ſooner diſcovered what it contained, but they made Tenes king, &c.

(1) In the article TENES.

(2) Variarum Lect. lib. i, cap. xii.

[B] The

feſtly protected by the gods, and afterwards ſo great an admiration of his noble qualities, that they made him their king (c). Thus we ſee how all nations have aſcribed ſomething marvellous to their old traditions. However it be, what is related of Tenes, could not have happened before the time of Priam, ſince Tenes loſt his life when Achilles ravaged Tenedos, during the Trojan war (d). That iſland was then particularly conſecrated to Apollo Smintheus [B]. It was behind that iſland the Greecks concealed their fleet, when they made a ſhew of giving over their enterprize; and it is this has made Tenedos more famous, than any thing elſe [C], and even to this day makes it known all over the world. Neverthleſs that iſland was remarkable upon ſeveral better accounts. The adminiſtration of juſtice was very ſevere there (e): the beſt origanum in the world grew there (f): the moſt curious earthen veſſels were made there (g): the grapes, and ears of corn, and figure of Ceres, that appear on its medals (h), teſtify that it abounded with wine and corn, as it does to this day [D]: and the women of that iſland were the moſt beautiful in all the world [E]. I ſay nothing of the ſingularity of their cray-fiſh [F]. It was at Tenedos, according to ſome, that Paris landed after the rape of Helen [B] The iſland was particularly conſecrated to Apollo Smintheus.] Homer plainly intimates it, when he puts this prayer in the mouth of the Prieſt Chryſes:

Κλῦθί μευ ἀργυρότοξ᾽ ὃς χρύσην ἀμφιβέβηκας
Κίλλαν τε ζαθέην, Τενέδοιό τε ἶφι ἀνάσσεις Σμινθεῦ.

Audi me argenteum arcum gerens, qui Chryſam tueris
Cillamque valde divinam, Tenedoque fortiter imperas Smintheu (3).

O Smyntheus! ſprung from fair Latona's line,
Thou guardian power of Cilla the Divine,
Thou ſource of light, whom Tenedos adores
And whoſe bright preſence gilds thy Chryſa's ſhores.
Mr POPE.

Strabo (4) has confirmed from this paſſage what he had been ſaying, that there was a temple of Apollo Smintheus in the iſle of Tenedos. There were the like temples in ſome other neighbouring towns (5); and the common opinion is, that Apollo was worſhipped under that title, becauſe he had killed the rats, which deſtroyed the fruits of the earth. His ſtatue in the temple of Chryſa had a rat under its feet. According to the dialect of that country, σμίνθος ſignified a rat. Some other reaſons have been alledged, beſides thoſe which I have mentioned: See the learned collections of Cuperus upon this ſubject in his antient monuments (6).

[C] This has made Tenedos more famous than any thing elſe.] There is not a ſchool where the ſecond book of the Æneids is not got by heart; ſo that every ſcholar muſt have theſe verſes at his finger's end.

Eſt in conſpectu Tenedos notiſſima fama
Inſula, dives opum, Priami dum regna manebant,
Nunc tantum ſinus & ſtatio maleſida carinis.
Huc ſe provecti deſerto in litore condunt (7).

In ſight of Troy lies Tenedos, an iſle,
(While Fortune did on Priam's empire ſmile)
Renown'd for wealth, but ſince a faithleſs bay,
Where ſhips expos'd to wind and weather lay.
There was their fleet conceal'd.
DRYDEN.

Et jam Argiva Phalanx inſtructis navibus ibat
A Tenedo, tacitæ per amica ſilentia lunæ (8).

The Grecians had embark'd their naval pow'rs
From Tenedos, and ſought our well-known ſhores.
Safe under covert of the ſilent night . . . . .
DRYDEN.

The beginning and ending of the ſtory of the wooden horſe are more taking to ſchool-boys than any other part of that Romance, and conſequently make more laſting impreſſions.

[D] As it does to this day.] Mr Spon, who has been there, aſſures us (9), that the iſle of Tenedos is fruitful in good wines, wherewith it ſupplies Conſtantinople, and that its Muſcadine grapes are excellent; that there is game in abundance, eſpecially hares and patridges. Sir George Wheeler, his fellow-traveller, ſays (10), it abounds with corn and wine, eſpecially of the Muſcadine kind, the greateſt part whereof is exported to Conſtantinople. See the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

[E] The women of that iſland were the moſt beautiful in all the world.] One may very well wonder that a thing of this nature ſhould not be mentioned by ſeveral authors. Athenæus, who had read ſo much, and who quotes ſo many writers, would have quoted ſome other author beſides Nymphodorus, had he known of any other, who had made the ſame obſervation. However it be, theſe are his words: Καὶ Νυμφόδωρος δ᾽ ἐν τῷ τῆς Ασίας περίπλῳ, καλλίονας φησὶ γίνεσθαι γυναῖκας τῶν πανταχοῦ γυναίκων ἐν Τενέδῳ τῇ τρωϊκῇ νήσῳ. Nymphodorus autem in Aſiæ circumnavigatione Tenedias fœminas (ea Trojæ vicina inſula eſt) omnes alias ubivis terrarum mulieres pulcritudine ſuperare tradit (11). - - - Nymphodorus in his voyage round Aſia ſays, that the moſt beautiful women in all the world are born in Tenedos, an iſland in the neighbourhood of Troy. A witneſs who has made or deſcribed the tour of Aſia, is of great authority, and more to be credited than a hundred, who never travelled or ſtudied Geographical Hiſtory. Though Theophraſtus does not affirm what Nymphodorus advances, yet his teſtimony may be alledged; becauſe he ſays (12), that among the Barbarians there were judges appointed to inquire into the prudence and houſewifery of women, in order to declare which of them exceeded the reſt in theſe reſpects; there were likewiſe certain judges in the iſles of Tenedos and Leſbos, who did the ſame thing in relation to the beauty of women: For it was thought that the very gifts of fortune and nature ought to be honoured and reſpected. Thoſe judges of Tenedos had a very nice office. The gods themſelves refuſed it; and it had been well for Paris if he had imitated them: he paid dear for his ingenious contrivance (13), and for the poſſeſſion of Helen, whom he obtained as a reward for his ſentence. But that fabulous ſtory made no great impreſſion; for there were ſome perſons, who deſired to judge of beauty, not only in Leſbos and Tenedos, but alſo in a town of Peloponneſus, where there was every year a diſpute about beauty, and ſhe who overcame her competitors, carried the prize (14). This cuſtom continued down to Athenæus's time. Such an emulation was excuſeable in women; but it is very ſtrange that men ſhould alſo have contended for the prize of beauty (15).

[F] The ſingularity of their cray-fiſh.] Their ſhell repreſented an ax; for which reaſon, according to Plutarch (16), the inhabitants of Tenedos conſecrated an ax in the temple of Delphi. I ſhould rather think that they conſecrated it, becauſe the forms obſerved in their tribunals, which occaſioned the Proverb about the ax of Tenedos (17), induced them to pitch upon an ax for the arms of their country. It appears by their medals, that it was their conſtant ſymbol (18). Suidas mentions thoſe cray-fiſh of Tenedos, and ſays they were to be found in a brook in that part of the country

---

(c) See Diodorus Siculus, ibid.

(d) Plut. Quæſt. Gr. pag. 297. Pauſanias, lib. x, pag. 330.

(e) See the article TENES.

(f) Antiphanes, apud Athen. lib. i, cap. xxii. See alſo Julius Pollux, lib. vi, cap. x, and Euſtathius in Iliad. Λ.

(g) Plutarchus, init. Tractat. de vitando ære alieno, pag. 828, & Scholiaſt. Ariſtoph. in Nubib. Act. IV, Scene III.

(h) Vide Spanhem. Epiſt. ad Laurent. Begerum.

(3) Homer. Iliad. lib. i, ver. 37.

(4) Lib. xiii, pag. 415.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Ad calcem Harpocratis, Edit. 1687, pag. 212.

(7) Æneid. lib. ii, ver. 21.

(8) Ibid. ver. 254.

(9) Spon. Voiage, Tom. i, pag. 153.

(10) Wheeler, Voyage, p. 103.

(11) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 609.

(12) Apud Athen. pag. 610.

(13) He made the three goddeſſes pull off their ſhifts.

(14) Nicias, in Arcadicis, apud Athen. p. 609.

(15) Theophraſtus, apud Athen. ibid, ſays it was practiſed at Elea.

(16) De Pythiæ Oraculis, pag. 399.

(17) See hereafter the remark [H], and the article TENES.

(18) Vide Ez. Spanhem. Epiſt. ad Laur. Beger.

Helen, and with his careſſes ſoothed her uneaſineſs (i) [G]. The inhabitants of Tenedos finding themſelves too weak to preſerve their independency, ſubmitted to the city of Alexandria ſituated in Troas (k). They were rich in Cicero's time, as appears from his orations (l). Their cauſe concerning their immunities was determined at Rome with too great rigour [H]. Cicero protected them, but he was not ſufficiently ſeconded. That iſland is about ten leagues round, and lies not above two leagues and a half from the continent of Aſia (m). The Turks have a fortreſs there, which is only a tower, with a rampart defended by about fifteen pieces of cannon. The Venetians made themſelves maſters of it, during the war of Candia; but the Turks retook it by means of a tun of Sequins, with which they corrupted the commander (n). Ariſtotle wrote a book concerning the republic of the Tenedians (o). Zoilus compoſed a panegyric upon them, wherein he has publiſhed a great falſity, namely that the river Alpheus had its ſource in the iſle of Tenedos (p). That iſland was often mentioned in the Gazettes, whilſt the Venetians were in poſſeſſion of Chio, which they took in the year 1694.

(i) In portum Tenedon pervenit, ubi Helenam mœſtam alloquio mitigavit. Dares Phryg. de Excid. Trojæ.

(k) Pauſanias, lib. x, pag. 330.

(l) In Verrem, lib. iii.

(m) Wheeler, Voyage, pag. 103. Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 415, ſays it is 80 Strada in compaſs, and the canal that divides it from Aſia, 40.

(n) Spon, Voiage, Tom. i, pag. 153, Dutch Edit.

(o) Stephan. in Τένεδος.

(p) Strabo, lib. vi, pag. 187.

country called Aſſerina (19). Bochart (20) rightly obſerves it ſhould be read 'Αϛέειον, and not 'Ασσερίνα, becauſe Plutarch ſays in expreſs words, that the cray-fiſh of Tenedos, whoſe ſhell was like an ax, were to be found in a place called 'Αϛέειον. Beſides, according to Heſychius, the firſt inhabitants of that iſland were called 'Αϛέειοι, a name that might very well proceed from the place, which afforded thoſe cray-fiſh. This conjecture of Bochart, and the corrections he makes in that paſſage of Suidas, are a great deal better than all his imaginary Etymologies, ſtuffed with Hebrew, to derive the Tenedians from Phœnicia.

[G] He ſoothed her uneaſineſs.] Nothing can be more modeſt than the words of the pretended Dares Phrygius, 'alloquio mitigavit. - - - he ſoothed with 'his converſation.' The author, who wrote a Paraphraſe upon him in verſe (21), did not confine himſelf within ſuch narrow bounds: he has carried the thing as far as it can go, leaving nothing to be ſupplied by the imagination of the readers. It is true he leaves two ſtumbling-blocks in their way. One is, that he ſuppoſes Paris did not enjoy Helen till he had landed in the iſle of Tenedos; which is neither likely, nor conſiſtent with the Iliad, where the iſle of Cranaë, leſs diſtant than Tenedos from the place, where the rape was committed, is made the ſcene of the laſt favour (22). The ſecond difficulty is taken from the rich preſents Paris is obliged to make, in order to obtain his wiſhes. This is contrary to decorum, in the opinion of thoſe, who know the character of Helen: the author was ſenſible of it, and therefore he breaks out into an exclamation immediately after the verſes, wherein he deſcribes the preſents and the enjoyment (23).

Proh ſcelus! an tantis potuiſti peſſima votis
Indulſiſſe moras? expectabatque voluptas
Emptorem? O teneri miranda potentia ſexus!
Præcipitem in lucrum ſuſpendit femina luxum,
Nec niſi conducto dignatur gaudia riſu.

For ſhame! how coud'ſt thou, wretched fair, thus lay
Such cold demurrers in thy lover's way?
What, muſt he ſtay till ev'ry kiſs be bought?
To what ſtrange power will thy ſex be brought!
While thus, for lucre, you each wiſh reſtrain;
And even grudge a ſmile, except for gain.

[H] Their cauſe concerning their immunities was determined at Rome, with too great rigour.] This is what Cicero wrote about it to his brother. 'Tenediorum 'igitur libertas ſecuri Tenedia præciſa eſt, cum eos 'præter me & Bibulum & Calidium & Favonium ne'mo defenderet (24). - - - The liberty therefore of the 'iſland of Tenedos, was cut off with the ax of Tenedos, 'ſince it met with no other patrons beſides Bibulus, Cali'dius, Favonius, and myſelf.' The proverbial expreſſion of Cicero may be explained by Pauſanias or Stephanus Byzantinus. Τενέδιος πέλεκυς ἐπὶ τῶν ἤτοι πικρῶς ἢ καὶ μᾶλλον συντόμως ἀποκοπτόντων τὰ ζητήματα, καὶ τὰ ἄλλα πράγματα. Tenedia Securis, de iis qui vel aſperè vel etiam magis conciſe abſcidunt quæſtiones & alias res (25). - - - The ax of Tenedos is applicable to thoſe who either with much ſeverity, or little formality cut off queſtions and other matters. Pauſanias having ſaid that Tenes cut with an ax the rope, wherewith the ſhip of his father Cygnus was faſtened, adds, Ἐπὶ τȣ́τῳ μὲν ἐς τȣ̀ς ἀρνȣμένȣς ϛερεῶς λέγεσθαι καθέϛηκεν ὡς ὁ δεῖνα ὅϛις δὴ Τεννεδίῳ πελέκει τόδε τι ἀποκόψεις. Ex eo in Proverbii conſuetudinem venit ut quidquid quivis præfracte negaret, id Tenedia bipenni præcidiſſe dicatur (26). - - - From thence it became a common Proverb, whenever any thing was precipitately rejected, to ſay it was cut off with the ax of Tenedos.

(19) In Τενέδιος ξυνήγορος.

(20) Geograph. Sacr. Part. ii, lib. i, cap. ix.

(21) Joſephus Iſcanus, Anglus, who lived in the XIIIth century. See his Dares Phrygius de bello Trojano, lib iii, pag. m. 52, 53.

(22) See the remark [L], in the article HELENA.

(23) Hæc faciles emêre toros, domuere rebelles Amplexus, pepigere fidem, non jam oſcula reddit.
Non reddenda negat Helene, ſed pectore toto Incumbens, gremium ſolvit, premit ore latentem Furatur Venerem, jamque expirante Dione Conſcia ſecretos teſtatur purpura rores.
Proh ſcelus, &c.

(24) Cicero ad Q. fratrem, lib. ii.

(25) Steph. Byzant. voce Τένεδος.

(26) Pauſanias, lib. x, pag. 330.

TENES or TENNES,

TENES or TENNES, the ſon of Cygnus, gave his name to the iſle of Tenedos, where he landed, when his father expoſed him in a cheſt to the mercy of the ſea. Cygnus uſed him with that ſeverity, becauſe he had been too credulous in believing his wife, the ſtep-mother of Tenes [A]. She complained that Tenes had raviſhed her [B], and alledged the falſe evidence of a piper (a). This occaſioned the law, that was obſerved in the iſle of Tenedos, that no man of that profeſſion ſhould be admitted into

(a) Plutarch. Quæſt. Græc. num. 28, pag. 297, calls him Molpus.

[A] His wife, the ſtep-mother of Tenes.] We read in Pauſanias (1) that Cygnus, the ſon of Neptune, reigned at Colonæ in Troas, and that he had two ſons by Proclea, the daughter of Clytius, and ſiſter to Caletor, who was killed at the ſiege of Troy by Ajax, as it is mentioned in the Iliad. Thoſe two children of Cygnus were, a ſon named Tenes, and a daughter named Hemithea. After the death of their mother, Cygnus married Philonome the daughter of Craugaſus. This Philonome accuſed Tenes of having attempted to raviſh her, whereas ſhe on the contrary fell in love with Tenes, who refuſed to comply with her deſires. This therefore is an example, which may be added to thoſe of Theſeus and Conſtantine. Muretus has collected ſome others in the 12th chapter of the firſt book of his Variæ Lectiones. See the article FAUSTA.

[B] She complained that Tenes had raviſhed her.] I follow my author, who ſays, καταμαρτυρήσαντος αὐλητȣ̃ τινος βιάζεσθαι ταύτην. A certain Piper witneſſing againſt him that ſhe had been raviſhed. But as we have only ſome fragments of that work of Heraclides, which ſavour entirely of the careleſſneſs and precipitation of a writer who wants to huddle up an abridgment, there is no doubt but ſome words are wanting in this place. A wife does not uſe to complain to her huſband that ſhe has been raviſhed; ſhe is content to tell him that ſuch a thing has been deſigned. Though Stephanus Byzantinus has gone through the hands of a moſt terrible abbreviator, he does nevertheleſs inform us, that Philonome, Cygnus's wife, complained only of Tenes's ill deſign, and that the evidence of the Piper went no farther. Τὸν γὰρ αὐλητὴν ἡ Φιλονόμη πρὸς Κύκνον ἤγαγε μαρτυρȣ̃ντα ὅτι Τέννης αὐτὴν ἤθελε βιάσασθαι. Tibicinem enim Philonome ad Cygnum duxit, qui teſtabatur Tennem voluiſſe Philonomæ vim inferre (2). Pauſanias makes no

(1) Lib. x, pag. 329.

(2) Steph. Byzant. in voce Tenedus.

into the temple. Tenes, who probably was the author of that law (b), extremely proper to perpetuate the juſt hatred he had conceived againſt that falſe witneſs, ſhewed himſelf worthy of commanding by ſome other laws, which he enacted, and cauſed to be executed without any diſtinction of perſons. He condemned adulterers to be beheaded; and being aſked, what ſhould be done to his ſon, who had been guilty of that crime, he anſwered, let the law be put in execution. Upon this occaſion ſome medals were ſtamped [C], having on one ſide the figure of an ax, and on the other the faces of a man and a woman upon the ſame neck. This likewiſe, and what ſhall be ſaid below, was the reaſon why the ax of Tenedos became a proverb (c), to denote a great ſeverity (d). Tenes ordered another thing very remarkable, namely that there ſhould always ſtand behind the judge, a man holding an ax, in order to cut off the head of any one, who ſhould be convicted of falſity (e). Others ſay he ordered that the executioner, with his ax lifted up, ſhould ſtand behind the accuſers, in order to put immediately to death thoſe who ſhould be found guilty of a falſe accuſation [D]. Ariſtotle, ſays in general (f) that the King of Tenedos adminiſtring juſtice with an ax, made a quick diſpatch of thoſe, who had wronged any body. It is no wonder after this if the proverb, he is a man of Tenedos (g), denoted a man, whoſe looks ſtruck terror. Tenes extended his inflexibility even to his father. Cygnus having diſcovered his wife's calumny, was deſirous of repairing the injury he had done his ſon, and made a voyage to the iſle of Tenedos, to give him ſatisfaction (h). He faſtened his ſhip to a tree or a rock, but Tenes in a paſſion rudely cut the ropes with his ax. We are not told what became of Cygnus after this rough action mention of that evidence: he will have it that Cygnus gave credit to the bare complaints of Philonome; but he obſerves that ſhe complained only of the ill deſigns of her ſon-in-law. Ψεύδεται πρὸς τὸν ἄνδρα ὡς αὐτὴ μὲν οὐκ ἐθέλουσα, τὸν δὲ αὐτῇ Τεννην συγγένεσθαι θελήσαντα (3); that is, ſhe falſely complained to her huſband, that Tenes attempted to lie with her againſt her will. The Latin tranſlation of Romulus Amaſæus ſeems to me to go beyond the original, quod ille invitam & repugnantem conſtuprare conatus eſſet. The Latin words ſignify great endeavours; but the Greek may be underſtood only of a bare ſollicitation.

[C] Upon this occaſion ſome medals were ſtamped.] Mr Beger (4) has publiſhed one ſtamped at Tenedos having on one ſide two faces upon one and the ſame neck, and on the other an ax between a lyre and a bunch of grapes. Thoſe two faces repreſent a man and a woman. This author pretends, that the deſign of this medal was to denote the union, which ought to be between married people. The medal of Tenes, mentioned by the Antients (5) was not ſtamped with ſuch an intent; but rather to denote the capital puniſhment of a man and a woman, who had committed adultery, and to be a perpetual monument of the execution of the law upon Tenes's own ſon. It will be proper to ſee the anſwer a learned man gave to Mr Beger (6). What creates the greateſt difficulty, is, that there are ſome medals of Tenedos, on which one of the faces repreſents an old man, and the other a young woman; on others, the two faces repreſent young people, &c. Thoſe variations make it probable, that all theſe medals were not ſtamped agreeably to the firſt intent; but ſome for one purpoſe, and others for another: unleſs it ſhould be ſaid that as often as the law was put in execution, a new medal was ſtamped, and that the two heads upon one neck differed either as to the age or ſome other ornaments, according to the perſonal qualities of thoſe, who had been puniſhed. It would be no very great wonder if an old beard had been found in the fact with a young woman.

[D] That the executioner, with his ax lifted up, ſhould ſtand behind the accuſers, in order to put immediately to death thoſe who were guilty of a falſe accuſation.] Suidas affirms this: Ἐνομοθέτησε, ſays he (7), τοῖς τὰ ψευδῆ κατηγοροῦσιν ὄπισθεν παρεστάναι τὸν δήμιον πέλεκυν ἐπηρμένον ὡς ἐλεγχθέντας παραχρῆμα ἀναιρεῖσθαι. Legem tulit ut carnifex ſecurim ſublatam tenens à tergo aſtaret illis qui falſa crimina objicerent, ut convicti ex tempore occiderentur. - - - He made a law, that the executioner, with his ax lifted up, ſhould ſtand behind thoſe who brought falſe accuſations, that as ſoon as they were convicted they might be put to death. This puts me in mind of a maxim which has been commented upon by a French Civilian of the XVIth century. It imports, that a man, who goes about to oppoſe the prevailing religion, and which has been regularly eſtabliſhed for many ages, ought not to be heard, but upon this condition, that he ſhall be puniſhed with death, if he does not convince others, that his private opinion is more certain than the opinion of the public. Qui antiqua, legitima, atque ordinaria ſacra audet in controverſiam adducere, eum non audiendum eſſe, niſi periculo ſui capitis, ſi non perſuadeat veriorem eſſe ſuam ſententiam (8). Upon this occaſion he alledges a very remarkable example from Joſephus, in the ſixth chapter of the thirteenth book of his Jewiſh Antiquities. The Jews, and the Samaritans having a quarrel in the city of Alexandria about this queſtion, Whether the temple of Jeruſalem was to be preferred to that of Garizim; the cauſe was brought before the council of the King of Egypt (9), and before the caſe was argued, it was determined, that the advocates of the party caſt ſhould be condemned to death. The advocate of the Jews ſpoke firſt (10), and ſo clearly proved the juſtice of his cauſe, that he obtained ſuch a ſentence as he deſired; ſo that Sabbeus and Theodoſius, the two Advocates of the Samaritans, were condemned to loſe their lives. The ſame Civilian alledges (11) Zaleucus's law, by virtue of which, whoever propoſed any innovation, was to do it with a rope about his neck, that in caſe he ſhould not prevail to have the old cuſtoms aboliſhed, he might be hanged upon the ſpot: and he concludes with wiſhing that the ſame law were to be obſerved in France. He fancies that the factions and troubles, occaſioned by innovations in the kingdom of France, would have been prevented by that means. 'Quibus 'omnino rationibus atque conditionibus ſi nos, præ'ſertim hoc tempore uteremur, quo is demum nihil 'ſcire & illiberalis eſſe dicitur, cui non placent abſur'diſſima quæque, modò recentiſſima: non ita planè 'res incertæ eſſent ac turbulentæ, neque tam multi 'multarum patrium, factionum, opinionum auctores 'evaderent: cùm ſuo ſaltem periculo ea diſcerent 'amare, colere, pacem patriamque, leges ac magiſtra'tus, quæ odio ſanè proſequuntur (12). - - - If we were 'to make uſe of the ſame methods and conditions at this 'time, when every perſon is eſteemed to be entirely igno'rant and unpolite, who does not reliſh the moſt abſurd 'notions, provided they are but new; we ſhould not 'have that uncertainty and confuſion in things, nor would 'ſo many ſet up for heads of parties, factions, and opi'nions: ſince from their own danger, at leaſt, they would 'learn to reſpect and reverence peace and their country, 'the laws and the magiſtrates, thoſe things for which 'they now diſcover the moſt inveterate hatred.' It is plain he would have had the diſputes between the Romiſh prieſts and the Proteſtants determined like that of Alexandria: but was there in France in a tribunal like that of the King of Egypt? the latter was compoſed of men, who were neither Jews nor Samaritans; and therefore the contending parties might expect a deciſion without any partiality. Luther and Calvin, and their followers, could not have the ſame expectations, ſince the ſame perſons muſt have been both judges and parties. Conſequently neither Zaleucus's law, nor that of the King of Tenedos, can be extended to matters of religion.

(b) See the remark [H].

(c) See the remark [H], in the article TENEDOS.

(d) Ex Heraclide de Politiis.

(e) Suidas in Τενέδιος ἄνθρωπος.

(f) Apud Suidam, in voce ſequenti.

(g) See Eraſmus in the Proverbs, Tenedia bipennis. Tenedius homo. Tenedius patronus. Tenedius Tibicen.

(h) Paſanias, lib. x, pag. 330.

(3) Pauſanias, lib. x, pag. 329.

(4) Obſervat. in Numiſm. quædam, pag. 61.

(5) Heraclides, de Politiis, Ariſtoteles apud Stephanum de Urbibus, voce Τένεδος. Suidas, Voce Τενέδιος ξυνήγορος.

(6) Ez. Spanhemius, in ipſo Opere Begeri. Vide etiam Giſb. Cuperum, ad calcem Harpocratis, pag. 203, Edit. 1687.

(7) Suidas, in Τενέδιος ἄνθρωπος.

(8) Petrus Ærodius, Decretorum, lib. i, pag. xviii, Edit. Pariſ. 1573, in 8vo.

(9) Ptolemy Philometor.

(10) Note, that Joſephus forgot to obſerve, whether the advocates of the Samaritans pleaded their cauſe. One would think by his account, that judgment was given without hearing them. It is not likely that the King of Egypt ſhould have been guilty of that fault. Joſephus does not obſerve the laws of Hiſtory in this point.

(11) Petrus Ærodius, Decretorum, lib. i, pag. 20.

(12) Id. ibid.

action [E]; but we read that the father and the ſon were killed by Achilles, during the Trojan war: the firſt, when the Grecians landed (i), the ſecond, when Achilles went to ravage the iſle of Tenedos (k). Tenes came to the aſſiſtance of his dear ſiſter [F] Hemithea, who was purſued by Achilles; but he only got his death by it. This action was attended with many conſequences [G]. He was honoured as a god in the iſle of Tenedos [H]. See the article of that iſland.

(i) Ovidius, Metam. lib. xii.

(k) Plutarch. Quæſt. Græc. pag. 297.

[E] We are not told what became of Cygnus.] As I have only followed Pauſanias's narrative, I leave the account of that voyage very imperfect. It is plain, the principal deſign of that author was to deſcribe ſtatues and pictures, and that he did not always conſider whether the ſtories he mentioned, by the way, were lame or not. He makes Cygnus land in the iſle of Tenedos, and faſten his ſhip to a tree or a great ſtone, and then Tenes to come and cut the cable. This is all. He ſhould at leaſt have told us, whether the ſon permitted his father to live in Tenedos, or to go home. This adventure is better related by Conon (13), tho' we have but an abſtract of his book. Cygnus, ſays he, faſtened his ſhip, but did not land; he deſired his ſon to forget what was paſt, but he deſired it on board his ſhip. Tenes cut the cables with his hatchet to prevent his landing. We may eaſily ſee what became of Cygnus; he went home again.

[F] His dear ſiſter.] It is not without reaſon that I uſe this epithet, ſince Hemithea was ſo concerned at her brother's misfortune, that Cygnus ſhut her up in the ſame cheſt, in which he committed his ſon to the mercy of the ſea (14). What Suidas ſays of her is ſtill more in her commendation, for he tells us that ſhe voluntarily reſolved to run the ſame hazard with her brother (15). It was very reaſonable, that Tenes ſhould expoſe his life to prevent ſuch a ſiſter from being raviſhed; and yet he died in ſo juſt a cauſe; and it is pretended, that Hemithea was ſwallowed up by the earth; and that it was this only that put a ſtop to Achilles's attempts (16). The remedy was ſomewhat violent; and few people would think it more ſupportable than the evil itſelf. Hemithea was very handſome (17).

[G] His death was attended with many conſequences.] When Achilles came to know that it was Tenes whom he had killed, he was ſorry for it, and took care to get him buried. He killed a ſervant ſent him from Thetis, becauſe he had not juſtly executed Thetis's orders. She had not only ſtrictly charged her ſon to take care not to kill Tenes, but beſides ſhe had enjoined that ſervant to put Achilles in mind of her orders, when there ſhould be occaſion for it, leſt he ſhould diſobey his mother through inadvertency. Plutarch (18) gives no other reaſon for this care of Thetis, but that Tenes was beloved of Apollo: but others ſay, that he was his ſon, and that Cygnus was only his reputed father (19). Now, according to the Deſtinies, Achilles was to die as ſoon as he ſhould kill one of Apollo's ſons. As for the reſt. The inhabitants of Tenedos conceived ſo great an indignation againſt Achilles, that they ordered that no body ſhould mention his name in the temple of Tenes. They alſo prohibited all Pipers from entering into it (20). Diodorus Siculus (21) does not ſay, thoſe two prohibitions concerned the temple of Tenes, tho' he obſerves, that the inhabitants of Tenedos built a temple to him, and worſhipped him as a god. He tells us that Tenes himſelf ordered that the pipers ſhould not enter into the temple. He adds, that the temple which was re-built, when Achilles had deſtroyed the town, was that, in which it was not lawful to mention the name of Achilles. He, and Plutarch are therefore of a quite contrary opinion as to the place, which thoſe two prohibitions concerned. It is certain, that no temple was built to Tenes during his life.

[H] He was honoured as a god in the iſle of Tenedos.] I have juſt now quoted two authors who ſay ſo. Cicero may be added for a third: 'Jam vero, ſays he (22), in 'Græcia multos habent ex hominibus Deos, Alabandum 'Alabandi, Tenedi Tenem. --- And now in Greece there 'are men worſhipped as gods, Alabandus by the Alabandi, 'and Tenes by thoſe of Tenedos.' He was one of the deities that Verres ſtole. 'Tenedo, prætereo pecuniam quam 'eripuit, Tenem ipſum qui apud Tenedios ſanctiſſimus 'deus habetur, qui urbem illam dicitur condidiſſe, 'cujus ex nomine Tenedus nominatur, hunc, inquam, 'ipſum Tenem pulcherrimè factum, quem quondam 'in comitio vidiſtis, abſtulit magnò cum gemitu civitatis (23). --- I paſs over his extortions at Tenedos, 'where he ſeized even Tenes himſelf, who among that 'people is reverenced with divine honours, and is ſaid to 'have built that city, which is called Tenedus, after 'his name, this very Tenes, I ſay, a moſt beautiful 'ſtatue, which you have formerly ſeen in the Comitium, 'he carried away to the great grief of the inhabitants.' We may infer from thence, that the antient deity of Tenedos, namely, Apollo Smintheus, was, in a manner, forgotten, after Tenes was placed in the number of the gods: for it was not objected to Verres, that he had made an attempt upon the ſtatue of this Apollo; which plainly ſhews that it was not worth taking away, as that of Tenes was. Men ſeem to act in point of religion, as they do in point of friendſhip. None but the wiſe and the rational prefer old friends to new ones. The generality behave like coquets; the laſt comers are the moſt acceptable. In like manner the new ſaints makes the old ones forgotten. This has been complained of by ſome grave writers.

(13) Apud Photium, p. 437.

(14) Conon, ubi ſupra.

(15) Ἑλομένης δὲ τῆς Ἡμιθέας συγκινδυνεύειν τῷ ἀδελφῷ, ἑκατέρους κατεπόντωσιν. Cum autem Hemithea cum fratre periculum idem ſubire voluiſſet utrumque conjecit in mare.

(16) Tzetzes in Lycophr.

(17) Plutarch. Quæſt. Gr. pag. 297.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Tzetzes in in Lycophr.

(20) Plutarch, ubi ſupra.

(21) Lib. vi, cap. xvii.

(22) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. iii, cap. xv.

(23) Idem, in Verrem, lib. iii.

TEOS, one of the twelve cities of Ionia, acknowledged Athamas for its firſt founder (a) [A]. This Athamas, the grand-ſon of another Athamas, the ſon of Æolus, conducted a colony of Orchomenians to Teos, to which, in proceſs of time, were added ſome other colonies of Athenians and Bœotians. Herodotus ſays (b), that Teos was in the middle of Ionia; and that this was the reaſon why Thales adviſed the Ionians to make it the ſeat of their general aſſemblies. Strabo, who places it in a peninſula, is not ſo faulty as Pliny (c), who calls it an iſland, for it is certain that Teos ſtood on the ſouth ſide of the iſthmus (d) over againſt Clazomenæ [B], which was on the north ſide. The inhabitants of Teos not being able to hold out any longer againſt the troops of

(a) Pauſanias, lib. vii, pag. 208. Strabo, lib. xiv, circa init.

(b) Lib. v, cap. clxx.

(c) Lib. i, cap. xxxi.

(d) Strabo, ibid. Pompon. Mela, lib. i, cap. xvii, & ibid. If. Voſſius.

[A] This city acknowledged Athamas for it's firſt founder.] Ortelius (1) falſly imagines that Strabo and Stephanus Byzantinus ſay, that Anacreon calls it Athamas, before it had the name of Teos. Thoſe two authors only ſay, that Anacreon called it Ἀθαμαντίδα, becauſe it was founded by Athamas. There ought to be a great difference made between the proper names of a town, and the epithets beſtowed upon it in Poetry; which ſhews, that Ortelius would have been guilty of a miſtake, if he had ſaid that Teos ever went by the name of Athamantis. It will appear, upon a proper examination, that he has committed three faults. 1. He confounds Athamas with Athamantis. 2. He takes an epithet for a proper name. 3. He thought the native country of Anacreon was not called Teos, when that Poet called it Athamantida. Charles Stephens has fallen into the ſame miſtakes.

[B] Teos ſtood on the ſouth ſide of the iſthmus overagainſt Clazomenæ.] Here follows a paſſage of Pomponius Mela (2), which we muſt examine. 'Super anguſtias, hinc Teos, illinc Clazomenæ, & quia terga 'jungunt confinio adnexa maris, diverſis frontibus 'diverſa maria proſpectant. ---- On the ſtraits are ſituated Teos on this ſide, Clazomenæ on the other; which 'two places, as the back parts of them are almoſt joined 'by their nearneſs to the ſhore, have in their fronts the 'different proſpect of two oppoſite ſeas.' Pincianus makes the

(1) In Theſauro Geographico, voce Teos.

(2) Lib. i, cap. xvii.

of Cyrus, commanded by Harpalus, put to ſea in the LIXth Olympiad, and went to ſettle a colony at Abdera in Thrace (e). Suidas, ſpeaking of Anacreon, who was a native of Teos (f) [C], ſeems to ſay that it was in the reign of Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes that the Teians went to Abdera; for he ſays, that Anacreon retired thither, being expelled from Teos, on account of Hiſtieus's revolt. There were ſome of them who returned back again to their country in proceſs of time (g). This town produced not only Anacreon, but alſo the Poet Scythinus (h), the Hiſtorian Hecatæus (i), and Apellicon, who collected ſo many books. Stephanus Byzantinus mentions another town called Teos, which he places in the country of the Dirbæ in Scythia; but as this is a nation altogether unknown, and as it muſt be different from thoſe, whom he calls Dyrbæi, that paſſage is thought to be faulty.

(e) Herod. lib. i, cap. clxviii: Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. m. 443.

(f) See the remark [I], of the article ANACREON.

(g) Strabo, ubi ſupra.

(h) Stephanus, in Τέως.

(i) Strabo, ubi ſupra, & lib. xiii, pag. 419.

the following correction, Quæ terga agunt, confinibus adnexa muris diverſis frontibus diverſa maria proſpectant. Salmaſius not finding his account in it, reads thus (3), Qua terga agunt confinio adnexæ maris, adverſis frontibus diverſa maria proſpectant. Iſaac Voſſius always ready to find fault with that Critic, will have (4) the words to be read in this manner, Qua terga agunt confinio adnexæ muri diverſis, &c. He calls the reading adverſis, inſtead of diverſis, a very great miſtake; for, ſays he, if thoſe two towns had frontes adverſas, they would not look towards the ſea, but would face one another: ‘ Manifeſte, Voſſius goes on, hic tergum pro ‘ fronte, & frontem pro tergo accepit vir doctiſſimus. ‘ - - - It is plain therefore that this learned man has ‘ taken the front for the back part, and the back part for ‘ the front.’ Voſſius muſt needs have read the paſſage of Salmaſius very careleſsly, to raiſe ſuch an objection againſt him. How could Salmaſius take the front for the back part, ſince he expreſsly obſerves, that the Teïans had the ſea of Clazomenæ before them, as the Clazomenians had the ſea of Teos before them? He will have it, that each of thoſe two towns had the ſea before and behind; that each had behind it the ſea near which it was built, and before it the ſea on which the other town was built. And therefore, the objection of Voſſius is altogether wrong in that reſpect. The reaſon on which it is grounded is not better, namely, that thoſe two towns would have faced one another, if Salmaſius's correction was right; for Salmaſius did not pretend to deny that they faced one another; on the contrary, he ſuppoſes it, or rather expreſsly declares it (5). By that very reaſon he pretended, that each of thoſe two towns looked towards the ſea on which the other was built. Beſides, it ſeems to me, that Voſſius ſhould not have aſſerted, that Teos and Clazomenæ had the ſea only on the foreſide; and that there was a wall between them, which took up the breadth of the iſthmus. This particular wanted to be proved, and would not have been forgotten by all the antient authors, if it had been true. And therefore Pincianus's correction of muris, inſtead of maris, partly adopted by Voſſius, ought not to hinder our following Salmaſius's correction till we have a better.

[C] Anacreon, who was a native of Teos.] Moreri (6) tells us, that ſome ſay Anacreon was a native of Teïos, a town of Paphlagonia. One would think that Strabo and Ovid, quoted by him at the end of his article, ſhould be the authors who ſay ſo; but this exactneſs in citing is not to be expected from him. Yet it is true, Moreri did not invent that particular; he found it in theſe words of Charles Stephens (7): ‘ Teium, ‘ urbs in Paphlagonia (ut Salluſtius ſcribit) in qua ortus ‘ fuit Anacreon. - - - - Teïum, a city in Paphlagonia, ‘ (as Salluſt writes) where Anacreon was born.’ Properly ſpeaking, there is no quotation in thoſe words for what concerns the native country of Anacreon; for Salluſt ſeems to be alledged only to prove, that there was a town called Teium in Paphlagonia (8). And therefore we are never the better for what Charles Stephens ſays any more than for what we read afterwards in Moreri. Lloyd and Hofman give us no greater aſſiſtance: they left out the quotation of Salluſt in the article of Teïum, thinking, without doubt, that it was falſe; and yet it is certain, that Charles Stephens is right in that reſpect: they affirm, without quoting any author for it, that this Teïum, a town in Paphlagonia, on the Euxine ſea, was the native country of Anacreon; and they ſay, under the word Teos, that ſome make him a native of Teïum. They give us therefore no evidence that we can conſult: for which reaſon we are put to the ſearch, and by this means we find that one of the ſcholiaſts upon Horace (9) has theſe words: ‘ Teïa dicta eſt à Teïo Anacreontis poëtæ ‘ lyrici oppido, quod in Paphlagonia eſſe Salluſtius in‘ dicat, cum de ſitu Pontico loquitur. - - - - It is called ‘ Teïan from Teïum, the native place of Anacreon, the ‘ Lyric Poet, which Salluſt ſays is in Paphlagonia, ‘ when he deſcribes the ſituation of Pontus.’ I would not affirm, upon the authority of that paſſage, that Salluſt ſaid, that Teïum, upon the Exine ſea, was Anacreon's native country. It might be a gloſs of the ſcholiaſt, grounded upon what he had read in Salluſt, concerning the town of Paphlagonia. But, even tho' Salluſt, and other writers ſhould aſſert, that Anacreon was born in that town of the Euxine ſea, there would be no room to doubt that he was a native of Teos in Ionia.

(3) Exercitat. Plin. pag. 861.

(4) In Melam, pag. 85.

(5) Ita ut à tergo mare habeant vicinum cui adnexæ ſunt, à fronte diverſa maria proſpectant. Teos enim adverſa fronte proſpectat mare in quo ſitæ ſunt Claromenæ (ſo ſays Salmaſius inſtead of ſaying Clazomenæ) & ſinum Smyrnæum Illæ contra Teon reſpiciunt & ſinum cui juncta eſt Teos.

(6) At the word Teos.

(7) At the word Teium.

(8) Strabo, lib. xii, pag. m. 374, 375, mentions it, but does not ſay it was in Paphlagonia.

(9) In hæc verba Od. XVII, lib. i, Fide Teïa dices laborantes.

TERMESSUS, a town of Piſidia. See the remark [E], of the article TELMESSUS.

TETTI (SCIPIO), in Latin Tettius, a learned man of the XVIth century, was born at Naples. He came to an unfortunate end; for he was proſecuted, for having ſome ill opinions concerning the Deity, and ſent to the gallies [A]. He wrote a tract de

[A] He was ſent to the gallies.] If Thuanus had not mentioned this particular, I fancy we had never known it: for the curious Nicodemo, who made ſo many inquiries concerning the Neapolitan writers, acknowledges that he knew nothing of this misfortune of Tetti, but what he had read in Thuanus, ‘ Queſto luogo ‘ del Tuano, ſays he (1), qui ſi e traſcritto volentieri ‘ perche oltre alla lode che ſi da al Tetti in eſſo, ſi ha ‘ una notizia anche curioſa intorno al medeſimo Tetti. ‘ - - - Here I tranſcribe this paſſage of Thuanus with ſo ‘ much the more pleaſure, as it is not only in commendation ‘ of Tetti, but alſo becauſe it contains a curious particular ‘ concerning him.’ Theſe are Thuanus's words (2): ‘ Ab eo (Mureto) de Scipionis Tettii Neapolitani caſu ‘ cognovit, hominis undecunque, ut ille ajebat, doctiſ‘ ſimi, qui delatus quod male de numine ſentiret, re‘ mo mancipatus fuerat, & tunc an adhuc in vivis eſſet, ‘ incertum erat. - - - From Muretus he underſtood the ‘ misfortune of Scipio Tetti, the Neapolitan, a perſon ‘ otherwiſe, as he ſaid, extremely learned, who being ‘ informed againſt for ſome heterodox opinions of the Deity, ‘ was condemned to the gallies, and whether he was then ‘ alive or not was uncertain.’ Thuanus ſpeaks of the time when he was at Rome (3), and of the frequent converſations he had with Muretus. What we read in the Thuana has a relation to this: ‘ The Inquiſition ‘ was very ſevere under the Pontificate of Sixtus V. ‘ Muretus told me, we do not know what becomes of ‘ people here. I am amazed, when I riſe in the ‘ morning, and hear that ſuch a one is not to be ‘ found, and yet none dares ſpeak of it. The Inqui‘ ſition made a quick diſpatch of them.’ There is a ſlip

(1) Leon. Nicodemo, Addizioni alla Biblioteca Napoletana, pag. 228.

(2) In Vita ſua, lib. i, pag. m. 1172.

(3) That is, the year 1574.

A MISTAKE in the Thuana.

de Apollodoris, which was publiſhed at Rome by Benedictus Ægius in the year 1555 [B]. He was very much eſteemed by the learned [C].

ſlip of memory in this paſſage. Muretus died ſoon after the election of Sixtus V, in 1585, and Thuanus was in France all that year; he could not therefore learn any thing from Muretus in that Pope's reign. I believe I ſhould not be miſtaken, if I were to advance, that Thuanus remembering on the one hand what Muretus had told him concerning the executions of the Inquiſition; and knowing on the other hand, that Sixtus V was very ſevere, confounded the time in which Muretus ſpoke to him, with the time when Sixtus V was Pope. People do not uſe to be ſo exact in converſation, and the memory is not then ſo intent as to make one avoid anachroniſms.

[B] He is the author of the treatiſe de Apollodoris, which was publiſhed at Rome by Benedictus Ægius, in the year 1555 (4).] He added it to his edition of Apollodorus, whoſe book he tranſlated into Latin, and added notes to it, wherein he often mentions Tetti. He gives him the character of a very honeſt and learned man. 'Sic habet exemplar Scipionis Tetti Neapolitani, viri nobiliſſimi & ſummæ doctrinæ & modeſtiæ & humanitatis incredibilis (5). - - - - Thus it is in the copy of Scipio Tetti, the Neapolitan, a perſon of conſiderable rank, and ſuperior learning, and of incredible modeſty and humanity.' Mr Baillet makes mention of him in his Jugemens des Savans, part II, chap. X, of the Prejudices of Precipitation. 'Scipio Tetti, ſays he, a Neapolitan, beſtowed ſeveral years upon his ſmall tract de Apollodoris, before he was ſent to the gallies. It is a work only of two ſheets; but the public, which approved of it, thought that neither the ſmallneſs of the piece, nor the length of the time employed in compoſing it, nor the author's misfortune, ought to make it ſuffer in their eſteem.' Colomiés (6) thought that Tetti had only written that tract, and a catalogue of manuſcripts publiſhed by Father Labbe (7); but he ſhould have known, that the ſame Father aſcribes to him (8) Bibliotheca ſcholaſtica inſtructiſſima Latinè, Gallicè, Italicè, Hiſpanicè, Anglicè, & Græcè, printed at London, in the year 1618, in 8vo. Nicodemo knew nothing of it, but what he found in Father Labbe.

[C] He was very much eſteemed by the learned.] He himſelf informs us, that he had contracted friendſhips with ſeveral illuſtrious perſons. 'Teſtes, ſays he (9), conſciique noſtrum utriuſque laborum celeberrimi rerum antiquarum conſervatores, nedum rei litterariæ acerrimi patroni ac defenſores, Achilles Maffeus, Gentiliſque Delphinius. Teſtes amici alii literis & ingenio præſtantiſſimi Carus Hannibal, Baptiſta Sigicellus, Antonius Auguſtinus, Alexandri duo, Picolominus & Corvinus, Marcus Caſalius. Teſtes item alii quos longum eſſet enumerare. Denique & Fulvius Urſinus juvenis imprimis honeſtus & ornatus, & ſupra quam par ſit ejus ætati Latinè & Græcè eruditus. - - - - Achilles Maffeus, and Gentilis Delphinius, thoſe eminent preſervers of Antiquity, as well as ſtrenuous patrons and defenders of learning in general, are ready to give their teſtimony to both my works. So are others of my friends, who are alſo diſtinguiſhed for their great parts and erudition; Carus Hannibal, Baptiſta Sigicellus, Antonius Auguſtinus, the two Alexanders, Picolominus, and Corvinus, and Marcus Caſalius. So are others, whom it would be tedious to enumerate. Laſtly, ſo is Fulvius Urſinus, a young gentleman of great figure and politeneſs, and learned in Latin and Greek, far beyond what is uſual at his age.'

(4) Compare this with the citation (b), of the firſt article APOLLODORUS.

(5) Ægidius Spoletinus, Notis in Apollodor. pag. 41, apud Nicodemum. Bibliotheca Napoletana, pag. 228.

(6) Mêlang. Hiſtoriq. pag. 91.

(7) In Novæ Bibliothecæ MSS. Supplementis.

(8) In Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum.

(9) In Tractatu de Apollodoris.

TETTIX, was a native of the iſle of Crete, and went with a fleet to the Peloponneſus. He landed at the promontory called Tænarium, and there built a town. He made his reſidence near a place called Ψυχοπομπεῖον, by reaſon of the ceremonies which were performed there to appeaſe the Manes. It was hither the prieſteſs of Delphos ſent him who had killed the Poet Archilochus [A].

[A] It was hither the prieſteſs of Delphos ſent him, who had killed the Poet Archilochus.] Plutarch, from whom I have taken this whole article, expreſſes himſelf in this manner (1): Ἐκελεύσθη πορευθῆς ἐπὶ τὴν τȣ̃ Τέττιγος οἴκησιν ἱλάτασθαι τὴν τȣ̃ Ἀρχιλόχȣ ψυχήν. He was ordered to go to Tettix's habitation, in order to appeaſe the ſoul of Archilochus. According to Suidas, he was ordered to go to Tænarium, where Tettix was buried, and there to offer a propitiatory ſacrifice to the ſoul of the ſon of Teleſicles (2). Goropius Becanus (3), who conſulted no other author but Suidas, falſly imagined that Tettix was Archilochus himſelf. If he had conſulted Plutarch, he would have avoided that miſtake, nor would he have made uſe of Archilochus's words (4) againſt a man, who had abuſed him, Τέττιγα τȣ̃ πτερȣ̃ συνείληφας; Cicadam ala apprehendiſti. - - - You have got a graſhopper by the wing. See the remark [C] of the article ARCHILOCHUS.

(1) De iis qui ſerò à numine puniuntur, pag. 560.

(2) He was Archilochus's father.

(3) Orig. Antwerp. lib. iv, apud Schottum, Bibliothecæ Hiſpan. pag. 378.

(4) Apud Lucianum, in Pſeudolog.

TEUCER, the ſon of Telamon and of Heſione ſiſter of Priam (a), went with twelve ſhips to the ſiege of Troy (b), where he gave noble proofs of his courage; but he did not revenge the affront put upon his brother Ajax (c), nor prevent his killing himſelf (d). This made him ſo odious to Telamon [A], that he received an order from him

(a) See the remark [D] of the article TELAMON.

(b) Hygin. cap. xcvii.

(c) Teucer non receptus à patre Telamone ob ſegnitiam non vindicatæ fratris injuriæ, Cyprum appulſus cognomine patriæ ſuæ Salamina conſtituit. Vell. Paterculus. init.

(d) Ἐδιώχθη ἀπὸ τῆς Σαλαμῖνος ὡς μὴ τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτȣ̃ Αἴαντα κωλύσας σφαγισθησόμενον ὑφ' αὐτȣ̃. Ejectum Salamine eo quod Ajacem fratrem manus ſibi illaturum minime prohibuiſſet. Scholiaſt. Æſch. in Perſic.

[A] This made him ſo odious to Telamon (1).] Sophocles brings in Teucer foretelling that misfortune, and foreſeeing that his father would call him baſtard (2) and coward, and even accuſe him of having deceitfully contributed to the death of his brother, in hopes of being the only heir; and that he would turn him out of his houſe. He obſerves, that Telamon never laughed, no, not in a time of mirth; and that he would, with much more reaſon, be angry and peeviſh, hearing, in his old age, of the unhappy death of his ſon. Cicero, without doubt, admired the verſes, wherein Pacuvius repreſents the reception Teucer met with from his father; for theſe are his words (3): 'Quid poteſt eſſe tam fictum quàm verſus, quàm ſcena, quàm fabulæ? Tamen in hoc genere ſæpe ipſe vidi quum ex perſona mihi ardere oculi hominis Hiſtrionis viderentur ſpondalia illa, dicentis,

Segregare abs te auſus, aut ſine illo Salamina ingredi,
Neque paternum aſpectum es veritus.

'Nunquam illum aſpectum dicebat, quin mihi Telamon iratus furere luctu filii videretur. Ut ille inflexa ad miſerabilem ſonum voce,

. . . . . Quem ætate exacta indigem
Liberum laceraſti, orbaſti, extinxiſti, neque fratris necis,
Neque gnati ejus parvi qui tibi in tutelam eſt traditus.

'Flens ac lugens dicere videbatur? Quæ ſi ille Hiſtrio quotidie cum ageret, tamen recte agere ſine dolore non poterat, quid Pacuvium putabis in ſcribendo leni animo ac remiſſo fuiſſe?

(1) See in Servius, in Æn. lib. i, ver. 619, all the reaſons that are given for Telamon's anger.

(2) Agamemnon in the eighth book of the Iliad, ver 284, tells him, that Telamon had carefully bred him up, though he was a baſtard.

(3) De Oratore, lib. ii, fol. 80.

'What

him not to ſet foot in Salamina. Upon this he went to ſeek his fortune; and having landed in the iſle of Cyprus, he there built a town to which he gave the name of his father's kingdom from whence he had been excluded, I mean he called it Salamina [B]. When he heard of Telamon's death, he went to take poſſeſſion of his kingdom; but Euryſaces, Ajax's ſon, prevented him. This reſiſtance raiſed in him a deſire of turning adventurer: he ſailed towards the coaſts of Spain, and having landed in the place where new Carthage was built, he went as far as Gallicia, and there he ſettled. Juſtin affirms it (e), but it is more probable that Teucer ſettled in the iſle of Cyprus [C]. He built a temple to Jupiter in Salamina, and inſtituted a human ſacrifice to that deity [D]. That cruel ſacrifice was not aboliſhed till the time of the Emperor Hadrian. Teucer's poſterity reigned there for ſeveral ages. Pauſanias (f) ſays they reigned there till the time of Evagoras; but he is not exact, for they reigned there much longer [E]. They reigned alſo in Cilicia, as I have ſhewn in the article of Ajax, the ſon of Teucer. There is a paſſage in Pauſanias (g) which gives room to believe, that Teucer married a daughter of Cinyras. He was aſſiſted by the King of the Tyrians, to ſecure his new dominions. Virgil ſays ſo (b); and Servius, his commentator, does not deny that it was the opinion of ſeveral

(e) Juſtin. lib. xliv, cap. iii.

(f) Lib. ii, pag. 71.

(g) Lib. i, p. 3.

(b) Æn. lib. i, ver 620.

' What is ſo full of fiction as Poetry, and repreſentations ' on the ſtage? Yet in ſome of theſe, I have ſeen the ' actors eyes all on fire at the pronouncing theſe lines;

How durſt thou part from him, and thus without him
Return, and fearleſs view thy father's face?

' At the expreſſing thoſe words, thy father's face, I never ' could forbear imagining I ſaw Telamon in a rage, ' ſtorming for the loſs of his ſon; then changing his tone to ' the pitiful, at theſe lines;

Whoſe grey hairs thou in ſorrow now haſt ſteep'd,
By tearing from me thus my dear, dear ſon;
Whilſt thou, inhuman, neither mourn'ſt thy brother,
Nor tho' thy ward, weep'ſt o'er his infant child.

' With what tears and heart-breaking did he ſeem to ' ſpeak them? But if the player, who daily acted this ' part, could not act it without ſhewing ſo great a de- ' gree of concern, do you think Pacuvius could be unaf- ' fected and unmoved at the writing of it?'

[B] I mean, he called it Salamina.] An oracle of Apollo (4) had promiſed him that the new Salamina, to be built by him, would be no leſs famous than the other:

Certus enim promiſit Apollo
Ambiguam tellure nova Salamina futuram (5).

For by Apollo's oracle we're told,
A future Salamin ſhall match the old.

The place where Horace ſays this, is very well known, becauſe it is part of a drinking ſong.

Teucer Salamina patremque
Cum fugeret, tamen uda Lyæo
Tempora populea fertur vinxiſſe corona,
Sic triſtes affatus amicos;
Quò nos cunque feret melior fortuna parente,
Ibimus ô ſocii, comiteſque:
Nil deſperandum Teucro duce & auſpice Teucro.
. . . .
O fortes pejoraque paſſi
Mecum ſæpe viri, nunc vino pellite curas,
Cras ingens iterabimus æquor.

When Teucer from old dad and country fled,
He fill'd his glaſs, and to his comrades ſaid,
Cheer up, brave boys, a touchy ſire ne'er heed,
We'll go where kinder fortune's pleas'd to lead.
Teucer's companions no deſpair can ſeize:
. . . .
We've ſeen, brave boys, much harder times than theſe.
A fart for care, let's drink about to day,
To morrow we'll weigh anchor, and away.

Teucer does not ſay in Horace, where he would build the new Salamin; but he declares in Euripides that he would build it in the iſle of Cyprus: and all the Hiſtorians obſerve that he built it there, except Meſſala Corvinus, who is reproved for it by Meurſius. ' Itaque manifeſtus eſt error Meſſallæ Corvini, qui in ' Sidonia conditam à Teucro dicit lib. de Auguſti pro- ' genie. Teucer qui patria profugus in Sidonia alteram ' Salaminam condidit (6). - - - Meſſala Corvinus there- ' fore is manifeſtly in the wrong, who ſays in his book ' de Auguſti Progenie, that Teucer built it in Sidonia. ' Tucer, who being baniſhed his country, built an- ' other Salamina in Sidonia.'

[C] It is more probable that Teucer ſettled in the iſle of Cyprus.] If he had fixed his quarters in Spain, Aſclepiades of Myrlea, who taught Grammar in that country, would not have forgot to ſay ſo in his deſcription of the nations, who inhabited it, ſince he has been ſo careful to obſerve (7), that ſome of them who bore arms under Teucer, ſettled in Gallicia. His ſilence is, in this caſe, a very good proof.

[D] He inſtituted a human ſacrifice to this deity.] Tacitus, who mentions the conſtruction of that temple, ſays nothing of that ſacrifice; ' Et Jovi Salaminio ' Teucer, Telamonis patris ira profugus (8). - - - And ' to Salaminian Jupiter, Teucer, who was expelled his ' country by his enraged father.' It is Lactantius who informs us of this. ' Apud Cypri, ſays he (9), Sala- ' minem humanam hoſtiam Jovi Teucrus immolavit, ' idque ſacrificium poſteris tradidit, quod eſt nuper ' Hadriano imperante ſublatum. - - - - At Salamin, in ' Cyprus, Teucer offered a human ſacrifice, to Jupiter, ' and enjoined it to be obſerved by poſterity; nor has ' it ceaſed till lately in the reign of Hadrian.' What puzzles me moſt in this matter, is, that Porphyrius (10), who owns that men were ſacrificed in Salamin for a long time, does not ſay that any men were ſacrificed to Jupiter; and that he tells us, this cuſtom was ſuppreſſed under the reign of Diphilus, co-tempory with Seleucus the Theologian. That Prince ordered, that, for the time to come, an ox ſhould be ſacrificed inſtead of a man. This ſacrifice was offered to Agraule, the daughter of Cecrops, and of the Nymph Agraulis.

[E] For they reigned there much longer.] It appears from one of Iſocrates's orations, that it was not without interruption; for he introduces Nicocles, who, after having ſaid that Teucer, the founder of their family, had built Salamina, adds, that his father Evagoras had recovered the kingdom which had been loſt by others; and that he had ſo ordered things, that not only Salamina was no longer tyrannized by the Phœnicians, but alſo that this town had the ſame kings, to whom the kingdom did at firſt belong. Thus Teucer's poſterity were upon the throne after the death of Evagoras. It is certain that his ſon Nicocles reigned at Salamina: ſome (11) ſay, that Demonicus alſo reigned in that town, and that he was his ſon. Iſocrates inſcribes ſome orations to them. We find alſo one Nicocreon, king of Salamina, a deſcendant of Teucer (12). The learned Meurſius takes him to be the ſame man, to whom Ptolemy gave the government of Cyprus (13), in the firſt year of the CXVIIth Olympiad, ſixty-two years after the death of Evagoras (14). He has no other authority for this than a paſſage of Antoninus Liberalis. An authority which muſt in conſequence be a bad one, ſince the Greeks did not apply their Metamorphoſes to an age ſo far diſtant from the fabulous times as that of Alexander's ſucceſſors. The Nicocreon therefore mentioned by Antoninus Liberalis is not the ſame with that of Ptolemy. I omit taking notice that

4) Euripides in Helena mentions that oracle.

(5) Horat. Od. VII, lib. i, ver. 28.

(6) Meurſius, in Cypro, pag. 58. In the foregoing page, he corrects Acron, who ſays upon the VIIth Ode, of the firſt book of Horace, that one of the two Salamina's was in Thraciæ regione, (he ſhould have ſaid in Atticæ regione) and the other in the iſle of Cyprus.

(7) Apud Strabonem, lib. iii, pag. 108.

(8) Tacitus, Annal. lib. iii.

(9) Lact. Divin. Inſt. lib. i, cap. xxi.

(10) De Abſtinentia, lib. ii. Euſebius, de Præpar. Evang. lib. iv, cap. xvi. St Cyril, in Julianum, lib. iv, quote the whole paſſage of Porphyrius, teſte Meurſio, in Cypro, pag. 61.

(11) See Meurſius in Cypro, pag. 113.

(12) Antoninus Liberalis, Metamorphoſ. cap. xxxix.

(13) Diodorus Siculus, lib. xix.

(14) See Meurſius, in Cypro, lib. ii, cap. xii, & xv.

ſeveral writers. Others ſaid that Teucer made himſelf maſter of the country without any ſuch aſſiſtance. Homer makes him the beſt archer in the Græcian army (i).

(i) Τευκρός θ' ὃς ἄριςος Ἀχαιῶν Τοξοσύνῃ, ἀγαθὸς δὲ καὶ ἐν ςαδιῃ ὑσμίνῃ. Teucerque qui præſtantiſſimus Achivorum arte ſagittandi, ſtrenuus autem & in ſtataria pugna. Homer. Iliad. lib. xiii, ver. 313. See alſo lib. viii, ver. 266, & ſeq. & Horat. Ode IX, lib. iv.

that Nicocreon reigned before the Olympiad, mentioned by Meurſius (15), notwithſtanding which the King of Egypt might have given him the government in queſtion.

---

(15) He acted a tragedy before Alexander, Plut. in Alexandr. pag. 681. Iſocrates dined at his houſe, Idem in Iſocrate.

TEXERA (Joseph) a Portugueze Friar of the Dominican order in the XVIth century, was confeſſor to Don Antonio King of Portugal, and having followed him into France, he ſettled there and was made Almoner and Preacher to the king. He was confeſſor of Charlotte Catherine de la Trimoille Princeſs of Condé, and to the Prince of Condé her ſon. He publiſhed ſome books [A], and died in the year 1601 (a). He declared from the pulpit, that we are bound in duty to love all men of whatſoever religion, ſect, or nation, they be, even the Caſtilians (b). This diſcovered his ſtrong hatred againſt the prince (c) who had conquered Portugal from the unfortunate Don Antonio. One of his books was refuted by order of the King of Spain [B].

(a) Konig, Bibl. pag. 796.

(b) Traité Parænetique par un Pelerin Eſpagnol, folio 114, Edit. of Aux, 1596.

(c) Philip II, King of Spain.

[A] He publiſhed ſome books.] His Compendium de Portugalliæ ortu, regni initiis, rebuſque à regibus geſtis, was printed at Paris in the year 1582 in 4to. This book was refuted by Duardus Nonius Leo, a Portugueſe Civilian, in reply to which Texera afterwards wrote, Confutatio nugarum Duardi Nonii Leonis & aliorum qui Portugalliæ regnum Philippo Caſtellæ Regi jure hæreditario obveniſſe contendunt, & Antonii veri Portugalliæ Regis jus vellicare. This work was printed in the year 1592. I find in the catalogue of Thuanus's library (1), Joſ. Texere, Suite d'un Diſcours intitulé, Adventure, &c. touchant Don Sebaſtien Roy de Portugal, 1602 in 8vo. There was printed at Paris in 1590, and at Leyden in 1592, Joſephi Texeræ Exegeſis genealogica arboris gentilitiæ Henrici IV Gallorum Regis. The author compoſed another work on the genealogy of the Prince of Condé in 1596, and publiſhed a ſecond edition of it enlarged, in the year 1598, in 12mo. It was intituled, Rerum ab Henrici Borbonii Franciæ Protoprincipis majoribus geſtarum, Epitome: ejuſdemque Henrici Genealogiæ explicatio à divo Ludovico per Borbonios atque ab Imbaldo Trimollio ad utrumque dicti Henrici parentem repetitæ. He has added to it an account of the ceremonies obſerved by the Princeſs of Condé, upon her abjuring Calviniſm before the Pope's Legate at Roüen the 28th of December 1596. He obſerves one thing which I am going to mention, becauſe it may ſerve as a ſupplement to a fact which I have related in the article BOTERO (2), and which has afforded ſome mirth to Proteſtants.

One of theſe ceremonies was, that the Princeſs being upon her knees, the Legate and Biſhops who accompanied him repeated the Pſalm Miſerere, and after that the Pſalm Deus miſereatur noſtri: they repeated them alternately, he one verſe, and they another: at every verſe the legate repeated, he ſoftly touched her ſhoulders with his wand. The Conſtable's lady who was next the Princeſs not being able to turn away her head ever ſo little by reaſon of the crowd, was hit every time by the wand over the face. The Legate perceiving it broke off the end of his wand. Almoſt every body then preſent believed this to be part of the ceremonial: Joſeph Texere was alſo of that opinion; but the Legate undeceived him. Interea verò dum illuſtriſſimus Dominus Legatus ſuum verſiculum recitaret, ad quemlibet leviter contingebat cum virgula ſpatulas Dominæ Principiſſæ eam abſolvendo. Hîc animadvertendum eſt, quòd, cùm illuſtriſſima Domina Comeſtabilis eſſet D. Principiſſæ proxima, ita in anguſtias redacta fuerit, ut nec ſe movere loco, nec caput inclinare, aut avertere poſſet. Unde accidit, ut plus illic, quàm aliæ omnes mereretur: quia ſcilicet, cùm dicti pſalmi recitarentur antiphonatim, ut dictum eſt, ab Illuſtriſſimo D. Legato & clero præſente, & ad quemque verſiculum D. Legatus ipſam Principiſſam ſcipiunculo, vel virgula tangeret in humeris, (juxta ritum & conſtitutionem Eccleſiæ) cùm in ſpatulam ſiniſtram deflecteret, ſimul caput & vultum multis vicibus Dominæ Comeſtabilis contingebat. Quod advertens ipſe D. Legatus, abrupit punctum virgulæ verſus cuſpidem: quod ferè omnes putabamus hoc animadverſo fuiſſe partem aliquam hujuſce ceremoniæ. Sed ego reſcivi ex ore ipſius Illuſtriſſimi D. Legati veritatem rei. Hæc diximus, ne quis deinceps in eo hallucinetur ubi veritatem reſciſcat (3). No particular can more juſtly deſerve to be ſet right than this; for it might eaſily deceive the ſpectators: they might well imagine that ſuch a circumſtance not being taken notice of in the Rubric, might ſignify ſomething of a myſtery, ſome new and very ſingular caſe. Men of ſpeculation and wit might very well vie with one another in ſaying a thouſand chimerical things upon this ſubject.

[B] One of his books was refuted by order of the King of Spain.] I have quoted a book which has been tranſlated out of Spaniſh into French by one Dralymont, who ſubjoins ſome notes to the original. This is one of his notes. ‘ A Jew whoſe name was Duard Nonnes de Leon *, ... contrary to the laws of Portugal, which ſhut the door of public honours and dignities, (that is to ſay, againſt all thoſe who deſcend from the Jews) was preferred by the Catholic King to be a privy-counſellor, in recompence for his having written againſt Joſeph Texera, a Portugueſe preaching Fryar (a perſon at this day very much renowned all over Europe, and well known to all Princes in that part of the world, as well eccleſiaſtical as temporal; and particularly in France, where the greateſt men in the kingdom, and all perſons of quality eſteem and regard him, on account of his polite converſation, his excellent morals, and extraordinary doctrine, as being one of the moſt accompliſhed maſters in the knowledge of Hiſtory, and Genealogy, that can be met with, as his writings and common converſation ſufficiently teſtify) a book by way of anſwer, which is not only ſcurrilous, but alſo full of heretical and raſh propoſitions. I am very much ſurprized at the patience of this Fryar, conſidering how deeply read and experienced he was in Hiſtory, and how converſant in affairs of ſtate, and jealous of his own reputation, that he ſhould not, ſo far as I know, put pen to paper (4), and write not only againſt the errors and falſities of that Jew, but alſo againſt his Catholic Majeſty: ſince it was he who commanded that falſe and ſcurrilous book to be written, (as his ſaid Majeſty confeſſes in the licence he gave for the printing it in the year 1590) and who authorized the ſaid Jew to publiſh a piece of the genealogy of the Kings of Portugal, tranſlated by him into Spaniſh, out of another in Latin, which he compoſed by his order: and which is the anſwer I have been juſt now mentioning (5).

(1) Pag. 336, of the 2d Part.

(2) See the remark [C], of the art. BOTERO, and the remark [K], of the article HENRY IV.

(3) Texera, de Converſione Carlotttæ Catharinæ Principiſſæ Condæi, pag. 26, 27.

* Duard Non. liv. des Cenſures, &c.

(4) I am ſurprized at this; for we have ſeen in the preceding remark, that a refutation of this Jew's book was publiſhed by Texera in the year 1592.

(5) Traicté Parænetique par un Pelerin Eſpagnol battu du temps & perſecuté de la fortune, fol. 51, verſo, & 52, Edit. of Aux, 1597. Note this parænetical treatiſe was reprinted in the year 1641, under the title of Fuora Villaco, that is to ſay, The liberty of Portugal, &c.

THAIS.

THAIS, a Greek courtezan, followed Alexander's army, and occaſioned the deſtruction of Perſepolis [A]. She was ſo well beloved by Ptolemy King of Egypt, that he married her (a). There is no good authority for ſaying, that Menander was one of her galants. This is what I am going to examine, in animadverting on Moreri's miſtakes [B]. The name of that courtezan was commonly given in comedies, and other pieces

[A] She occaſioned the deſtruction of Perſepolis.] Mr Guillet rightly obſerves that Thais formed that deſign out of a principle of ambition. She propoſed to Alexander to burn the royal palace of Perſepolis, and plainly told him that ſhe longed to ſet fire to it firſt; that it might be ſaid in time to come all the world over, that the Athenian women, who followed Alexander into Perſia, had revenged the burning of Athens by Xerxes. Her beauty and eloquence gave ſucceſs to her ambition, and the royal palace was burnt that very night (1).' The thing is related more at large in the following words. 'After this, as he was making preparation for a farther march after Darius, he one day reſolved to make merry, and to divert himſelf with an entertainment, where his courtiers had prevailed with him ſo far as to permit every man to bring his miſtreſs along with him, among whom, the moſt celebrated was Thais an Athenian, Ptolemy's miſtreſs, who after the deceaſe of Alexander, was King of Egypt. This Thais ſometimes cunningly praiſed Alexander, ſometimes joked with and rallied him, agreeably enough to the manner of her country, but much above her character or condition, telling him that ſhe found herſelf that day fully recompenſed for the pains ſhe had taken in following his camp all over Aſia, by the favour ſhe then enjoyed of diverting herſelf at pleaſure in the ſtately palace of the Perſian monarchs: but that ſhe ſhould be much more delighted to burn by way of ſport, and make a bonefire of the court of Xerxes, who had ſet fire to the city of Athens, by lighting it up with her own hand in his preſence, and before the face of ſo brave a Prince as Alexander: that it might be recorded to poſterity, that the women who followed Alexander's camp, had taken a ſharper revenge on the Perſians for the former ſufferings and affronts of Greece, than all his commanders could do by ſea or land. She had no ſooner made the propoſal, but ſhe was ſeconded by Alexander's courtiers, with clapping of hands, and great acclamations of joy, commending what ſhe ſaid to the ſkies, and preſſing the King to put it in execution. Alexander giving way to their perſuaſions, ſtarted from his ſeat, and with a chaplet of flowers on his head, and a lighted torch in his hand, led the way, and his courtiers followed him in the ſame manner, dancing, and making a great noiſe about the palace (2).' Diodorus Siculus obſerves (3) that Thais ſet fire to the royal palace, next to the King, and that all the houſes round it were burnt down. He calls her ἑταίραν, a word that may be rendered a courtezan. Note that, according to Plutarch nothing was burnt but the royal palace: but according to Quintus Curtius, the whole city was conſumed to aſhes, and never afterwards rebuilt. I wonder he does not mention the fineſt paſſage of Thais's ſpeech: he does not make her ſay any thing that diſcovers her ambition of having it ſaid in future ages, that ſhe and her companions had contributed more to revenge her country than their greateſt Captains. 'De die inibat convivia (Alexander) quibus feminæ intererant: non quidem quas violari nefas eſſet; quippe pellices licentius quam decebat cum armato vivere adſuetæ. Ex his una Thais & ipſa temulenta, maximam apud omnes Græcorum initurum gratiam adfirmat, ſi regiam Perſarum juſſiſſet incendi, expectare hoc eos, quorum urbes barbari deleſſent. Ebrio ſcorto de tanta re ferente ſententiam, unus & alter, & ipſi mero onerati, adſentiunt, rex quoque fuit avidior, quam patientior: quin igitur ulciſcimur Græciam, & urbi faces ſubdimus. Omnes incaluerant mero: itaque ſurgunt temulenti ad incendendam urbem; cui armati pepercerant. Primus rex ignem regiæ injecit; tum convivæ & miniſtri pelliceſque. Multa cedro ædificata erat regia: quæ celeriter igne concepto, late fudit incendium. Quod ubi exercitus, qui haud procul ab urbe tendebat, conſpexit; fortuitum ratus, ad opem ferendam concurrit. Sed ut ad veſtibulum regiæ ventum eſt; vident regem ipſum adhuc adgerentem faces. Omiſſa igitur, quam portaverant aqua, aridam materiam in incendium jacere ceperunt. Hunc exitum habuit regia totius Orientis . . . ac ne longa quidem ætate, quæ excidium ejus ſequuta eſt, reſurrexit (4). - - - Alexander ſpent the day in feaſting, to which the women were admitted, not modeſt ones, whom it was unlawful to violate, but courtezans who uſed to live after a licentious manner in the camp. One of thoſe whoſe name was Thais, and ſhe very much in drink, cried out to the King, that he would very greatly oblige all the Greeks if he would order the Perſian palace to be burnt; that they expected this from him, ſince their cities had been ſo ſerved by thoſe Barbarians. This drunken courtezan thus declaring her mind on ſo important an affair, was applauded firſt by one and then another, all of them overcharged with drink; and the King too with greater warmth than prudence replied; Well then let us revenge our country, and ſet fire to the city. They were all inflamed with wine; and therefore roſe up to burn the city now they were in drink, which they had ſpared when they were in arms. The King firſt ſet fire to the palace, then the gueſts, the courtiers, and courtezans. Great part of the palace was built with cedar, which quickly taking fire, ſpread the flames all around. The army which was encamped not far from the city ſeeing the fire, thinking it to be accidental, came to give their aſſiſtance. But when they were advanced to the entrance into the palace, they found the King himſelf ſtill holding out his torch. So that throwing away the water they had brought, they began to heap on dry fuel to increaſe the fire. Thus fell the palace of the whole Eaſt . . . . and though it is ſo long a time ſince that deſtruction happened, it has not been rebuilt.' Obſerve that not only it does not appear from thoſe two accounts that Thais was at that entertainment in the quality of Alexander's miſtreſs; but it appears on the contrary, that ſhe had not that character. Quintus Curtius ſays only, that ſhe was one of the concubines, who followed the army (5). Plutarch affirms in expreſs words, that ſhe was the concubine of Ptolemy, one of Alexander's captains. Yet it is a very common opinion, that ſhe was one of Alexander's miſtreſſes; but this opinion may be falſe, though it be favoured by a paſſage in Athenæus. This author ſays, that Alexander had that courtezan with him; and that after his death ſhe married Ptolemy, King of Egypt, by whom ſhe had two ſons and one daughter, called Irene, who was the wife of Eunoſtus, King of Solis (6) in the iſle of Cyprus. Ὁ δὲ μέγας Ἀλέξανδρος οὐ Θαΐδα εἶχε μεθ' ἑαυτοῦ τὴν Ἀττικὴν ἑταίραν; περὶ ἧς φησὶ Κλείταρχος ὡς αἰτίας γενομένης τοῦ ἐμπρησθῆναι τὰ ἐν Περσεπόλει βασίλεια. αὕτη δὲ ἡ Θαῒς καὶ μετὰ τὸν Ἀλεξάνδρου θάνατον, καὶ Πτολεμαίῳ ἐγαμήθη τῷ πρώτῳ βασιλεύσαντι Αἰγύπτου, καὶ ἐγέννησεν αὐτῷ τέκνον Λεοντίσκον καὶ Λάγον, θυγατέρα δὲ Εἰρήνην, ἣν ἔγημεν Εὔνοστος ὁ Σόλων τῶν ἐν Κύπρῳ βασιλεύς. Thais Athenienſis meretrix cum Alexandro Magno fuit, eumque præcipuè impulit, ut Cleitarchus autor eſt, ad comburendam regiam Perſepolidis. Poſt obitum Alexandri, Ptolemæo, qui primus Ægypti regnum adeptus eſt, illa nupſit, ex eoque liberos concepit, Leontiſcum, & Lagum mares: Eirenen fœminam, quæ Solonis Eunoſti regis Cypriorum uxor fuit (7). - - - Thais the Athenian, courtezan, went along with Alexander, and is ſaid by Cleitarchus to have been the principal cauſe of his burning the palace of Perſepolis. After the death of Alexander, ſhe was married to Ptolemy, who firſt obtained the kingdom of Egypt; and had children by him, Leontiſcus and Lagus, ſons, and Eirene a daughter, who was married to Solon Eunoſtus King of Cyprus.

[B] In animadverting on Moreri's miſtakes.] I. He ſays ſhe was a native of Alexandria, and that going to Athens all the youth of that country flocked to her. This falſity is confuted in the following quotation (8): 'Do not ſuffer your ſelves to be led into an error by what is ſaid in five or ſix ſorry hiſtorical Dictionaries, that Thais

(a) See the remark [A], towards the end.

(1) Guillet, Athenes ancienne & nouvelle, pag. m. 291.

(2) Plutarch, in the Life of Alexander, pag. 687, of the Francfort edition 1620.

(3) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvii, cap. lxxii.

(4) Q. Curtius, lib. v, cap. vii.

(5) This ſenſe expreſſes the whole force of Quintus Curtius's words.

(6) Thus the Greek words of Athenæus Εὔνοστος ὁ Σόλων τῶν ἐν Κύπρῳ βασιλεὺς, ought to be tranſlated, and not as Dalechampius renders them, Solonis Eunoſti regis Cypriorum. - - - Solon Eunoſtus, King of Cyprus.

(7) Athen. lib. xiii, p. 576, D.

(8) Guillet, Athenes ancienne, & nouvelle, pag. 291, 292.

pieces of Poetry, to ladies of pleaſure (b). It is ſaid, that Paphnutius who flouriſhed in the IVth century, converted in Alexandria, a famous courtezan, called Thaïs [C].

(b) See Juvenal, Sat. III, ver. 93, where he ſays an melior cum Thaïda ſuſtinet? and Martial in ſeveral places.

'Thais was a native of Alexandria. There was ſo ſhort an interval between the time when Alexander laid the foundation of that city of Egypt, and the time when he burnt Perſepolis, that Thais could not have ſeen the burning of that town, unleſs ſhe had been quickly ſnatched away among the firſt-born of Alexandria, and tranſported in her cradle: For you know that after the battle of Arbela, fought in the ſame year that Alexandria was built, In Oriente victoriis magis quàm paſſibus omnia peragrabat Alexander. - - - In the eaſt Alexander over-ran every place rather with victories than marches. But without refining upon Chronology, Plutarch and Athenæus ſay ſhe was born at Athens (9).' II. Moreri adds, that the Poet Menander had made her famous by his verſes, which was the reaſon why ſhe was called Menandrean. This is taken from Charles Stephens's Dictionary, and cannot be ſo well confuted as Guillet's paraphraſe upon it. It was there, ſays he (10), ſpeaking of Athens, that Thais had an intrigue with Menander, that famous Poet, who was ſo tender-hearted, and ſo much given to love, that he committed extraordinary follies for his miſtreſſes. I alledge againſt this what Plutarch tells us (11), that Thais was Ptolemy's concubine during Alexander's expedition, and what Athenæus obſerves, that ſhe was married to the ſame Ptolemy after the death of that conqueror. This is a plain proof, that, if ſhe had an intrigue with Menander, it was before this expedition. Nay, it is probable, that ſhe was Ptolemy's miſtreſs ſome time before the war of Aſia: it is probable, I ſay, that this great Macedonian Lord had got her from Athens, and kept her in his houſe for ſome time, before the breaking out of the war againſt Darius. Now this expedition of Alexander began when Menander was not above eight years of age (12). It is impoſſible therefore that he ſhould be in love with Thais before the Perſian war. In what time then ſhall we place this amour, ſince after the death of Alexander, ſhe married the King of Egypt, I mean the ſame Ptolemy whom ſhe had followed every where, whilſt that conqueror was ſubduing Aſia? I have another argument to alledge againſt this amour. I believe there is no better proof for it than theſe verſes of Propertius,

> Turba Menandreæ fuerat nec Thaïdos olim
> Tanta, in qua populus luſit Erichthonius (13);

> Not ſuch a crowd Menander's Thais led,
> Altho' all Athens ſought her wanton bed.

or theſe, wherein the ſame Poet has included ſome advices of a bawd,

> Non te Medeæ delectent probra ſequacis,
> Nempe tulit faſtus auſa rogare prior:
> Sed potius mundi Thaïs pretioſa Menandri,
> Cum ferit aſtutos Comica mœcha Getas (14);

> To ſhun Medea's fondneſs he adviſed,
> For aſking firſt ſhe juſtly was deſpis'd,
> Menander's Thais ſhews a wiſer way,
> When ſhe cajoles her cullies in the play.

or upon this inſcription of Martial, under Menander's Thais,

> Hæc primum juvenum laſcivos luſit amores,
> Nec Glycere, vere Thaïs amica fuit (15).

> This play firſt draws the ſcenes of wanton loves,
> Thais, not Glycera, the miſtreſs proves.

But it is certain, that Menander's Thais, mentioned by thoſe two Latin Poets, ſignifies a Comedy of Menander, intituled Thais, and not the Courtezan, who occaſioned the burning of Perſepolis. Conſult the obſervations of Gronovius the father (16). I would not be underſtood to deny, that our Thais was, in the Poet's mind, the original of the comedy that went by her name; but this does not prove, that there was any love intrigue between Menander and the Courtezan who is the ſubject of this article.

[C] It is ſaid that Paphnutius . . . . . converted in Alexandria a . . . . . . Thaïs.] Charles Stephens, and ſeveral Lexicographers after him, have mentioned this converſion: they all quote Volaterranus, who relates it in this manner. Paphnutius, ſays he (17), going incognito to Thaïs of Alexandria (18), was never ſatisfied that the place ſhe carried him to was private enough; and at laſt being told by her, that none but God could know what paſſed between them in the place they were in, he took from thence an occaſion to exhort her to fear God, who ſees and puniſhes the moſt private actions. She was ſo ſenſibly moved with his exhortation, that ſhe gave over her trade, and became a holy woman.

(9) They ſay ſhe was born in Attica, and not at Athens.

(10) Guillet, Athenes ancienne & nouvelle, pag. 292.

(11) See the foregoing remark.

(12) He was born about the third year of the CIXth Olympiad. See Voſſius, de Poëtis Græcis, pag. 57; and Alexander began his march the third year of the CXIth Olympiad.

(13) Propert. Eleg. VI, lib. ii.

(14) Id. lib. iv, Eleg. V.

(15) Martial. Epigr. clxxxvii, lib. xiv.

(16) Upon the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, in the ſecond chapter, pag. 25, & ſeq.

(17) Volaterr. lib. xx, circa init. pag. m. 718.

(18) Thaidis nomen nobilitatum in primis à Thaide Alexandrina. Id. ibid.

THALES, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. Moreri ſpeaks of him at large. I add, that this Philoſopher believed, that the world was the work of God, and that God knew the moſt ſecret thoughts of men [A]. Some ſay, that he was married; but others affirm this to be falſe, and that he got rid of the perſecutions of his mother on this ſubject,

[A] Thales believed that the world was the work of GOD, and that GOD knew the moſt ſecret thoughts of men.] I mention this as I find it in Diogenes Laërtius, without affirming, that it was really the opinion of that Philoſopher. The three following Apophthegms are aſcribed to him among others. 1. God is the moſt antient thing of all, for he is uncreated. 2. The world is the fineſt thing of all, for it is God's work. Πρεσβύτατον τῶν ὄντων, θεός, ἀγέννητον γάρ. κάλλιστον, κόσμος. ποίημα γὰρ θεοῦ. Antiquiſſimum eorum omnium quæ ſunt, deus; ingenitus enim. Pulcherrimum, mundus; à deo enim factus eſt (1). 3. So far are they who commit ſin, from being able to conceal it from God, that they cannot ſo much as prevent his knowing their thoughts. Ἠρώτησέ τις αὐτὸν εἰ λήθοι θεοὺς ἄνθρωπος ἀδικῶν. Ἀλλ' οὐδὲ διανοούμενος, ἔφη. Interrogatus, lateretne deos homo male agens: Ne cogitans quidem, inquit (2). Valerius Maximus relates the ſame thing with regard to the third ſentence. 'Mirifice etiam Thales. Nam interrogatus an facta hominum Deos fallerent: Nec cogitata, inquit. Ut non ſolùm manus, ſed etiam mentes puras habere vellemus; cùm ſecretis cogitationibus noſtris cœleſte numen adeſſe crediſſemus (3). - - - It was an admirable ſaying of Thales, who when he was aſked, if the actions of men could eſcape the knowledge of GOD, replied, no not even their thoughts. So then we ought not only to have our hands pure, but alſo our minds; when we are ſatisfied that GOD is preſent even to our moſt ſecret thoughts.' Valerius Maximus's interpretation of this ſaying, to wit, that it was intended to inculcate ſuch a faith in the preſence of God to our moſt ſecret thoughts, as might oblige men to preſerve their hearts pure as well as their hands, does very well agree with a paſſage of Cicero, concerning the ſame Thales. If you carefully examine the ſequel of Cicero's argument, you will find, that the ground of the maxim of this antient Grecian ſage, was the moral advantage that men might derive from it: 'Melius græci atque noſtri, qui ut augerent pietatem in deos, eaſdem illos urbes quas nos incolere voluerunt. Affert enim hæc opinio religionem utilem civitatibus. Siquidem & illud bene dictum eſt à Pythagora doctiſſimo viro, tum maxime pietatem & re-

(1) Diogenes Laërtius, lib. i, num. 35.

(2) Id. ibid. num. 36.

(3) Valerius Maximus, lib. vii, cap. ii, num. 8 Ext. pag. m. 602.

ſubject, by telling her when he was young, that it was too ſoon, and when he was growing old, that it was too late (a). Some will have it that he believed living and dying to be the ſame thing; and that being aſked why then he did not dye, he returned an anſwer, which others aſcribe to Pyrrho (b). An old woman bantered him very merrily, for going abroad with her to look at the ſtars, and falling into a ditch [B]. It is thought he lived above ninety years [C].

Thoſe,

'ligionem verſari in animis, cum rebus divinis operam daremus: & quod Thales qui ſapientiſſimus inter ſeptem fuit, homines exiſtimare oportere deos omnia cernere, deorum omnia eſſe plena: fore enim omnes caſtiores, veluti quo infans eſſet maxime religioſus (4). - - - It was a better thought both of the Grecians and Romans, to ſuppoſe the gods to inhabit the ſame cities with themſelves, in order to promote piety towards them. For this opinion infers that religion is uſeful to cities. It was an excellent ſaying of that moſt learned Philoſopher Pythagoras, that piety and religion were then the moſt impreſſed on our minds, when we were actually worſhipping the gods; as alſo of Thales, who was the wiſeſt of the ſeven, that we ought to believe the gods ſee every thing, that every thing is full of the Deity: for by this means all men would become more virtuous, and even an infant would grow religious.' Here I deſire you would obſerve the difference which appears between Cicero and Diogenes Laërtius. The latter ſays abſolutely, that, according to Thales, the world was animated and full of Genii: Τὸν κοσμὸν ἔμψυχον καὶ δαιμόνων πλήρη, animatum mundum ac demonibus plenum (5); but Cicero ſeems to reſtrain Thales's words; for he ſays, that, according to that Philoſopher, it was proper or neceſſary for men to believe that every thing was full of gods. Ariſtotle thought, that perhaps Thales meant only what others underſtood by aſſerting, that all Beings have one ſoul: Καὶ ἐν τῷ ὅλῳ δέ τινες αὐτὴν (ψυχὴν) μεμίχθαι φασίν. ὅθεν ἴσως καὶ Θαλῆς ᾠήθη πάντα πλήρη θεῶν εἶναι. Sunt & qui in toto univerſo permiſtam ipſam (animam) inquiunt eſſe. Quocirca forſitan & Thales omnia plena deorum eſſe putavit (6). - - - - And ſome ſay that the ſoul is infuſed throughout the whole Univerſe. From whence very probably Thales derived his opinion, That all things are full of gods. Here follow ſome other variations. Plutarch does not ſuppoſe that Thales alledged the reaſon abovementioned, why the world is the moſt beautiful of all things: he ſays, that Thales being to reſolve this queſtion, Which is the moſt beautiful of all Beings? Anſwered, the world; for every thing that is regular, is part of the world. Τί κάλλιστον; κόσμος· πᾶν γὰρ τὸ κατὰ τάξιν, τούτου μέρος ἐστί. Quid pulcherrimum? Mundus. omnes enim ejus partes ordine aptæ ſunt (7). As for the anſwer to the queſtion, whether GOD knows the wicked actions of men, ſome aſcribe it not to Thales, but to Pittacus. See Theon in the fifth chapter of his Progymnaſmata, page 69 and 77, of the Leyden edition 1626.

I obſerve all theſe variations, in order to ſhew, that the reaſons, which might be alledged againſt what I have ſaid in another place (8), viz. that Thales did not make uſe of the power of GOD in his ſyſtem concerning the production of things, are not very convincing. But I muſt ſpeak of this hereafter. See the remark [D].

[B] To look at the ſtars, he fell into a ditch.] How can you know what paſſes in the Heavens, ſaid that good old woman to him, ſince you do not ſee what is juſt at your feet? Λέγεται δ' ἀγόμενος ὑπὸ γραὸς ἐκ τῆς οἰκίας, ἵνα τὰ ἄστρα κατανοήσῃ, εἰς βόθρον ἐμπεσεῖν, καὶ αὐτῷ ἀνοιμάξαντι φάναι τὴν γραῦν, Σὺ γὰρ, ὦ Θαλῆ, τὸ ἐν ποσὶν οὐ δυνάμενος ἰδεῖν, τὰ ἐπὶ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ οἴει γνώσεσθαι: Fertur, quum domo exiret contemplandorum ſiderum cauſa, in ſubjectam foſſam incidiſſe, petulantique probro dictum ab anu domeſtica, Qua ratione, ô Thales, quæ in cœlis ſunt comprehenſurum te arbitraris, qui ea quæ ſunt ante pedes, videre non vales (9)? - - - It is ſaid, that going out of his houſe in order to contemplate the ſtars, he fell into a ditch, and that an old woman jeering him, cried, O Thales, when you cannot diſcern what is at your feet, do you think to make diſcoveries in the Heavens? This thought has been turned ſeveral ways. See the Commentaries upon the 105th emblem of Alciatus, wherein you will find the verſes which Sir Thomas More made upon an Aſtrologer, who was a cuckold. Sometimes this learned chancellor excuſes him, and ſometimes banters him, for not ſeeing in the ſtars his wife's gallantry.

Saturnus procul eſt, jamque olim cæcus, ut ajunt,
  Nec propè diſcernens à puero lapidem.
Luna verecundis formoſa incedit ocellis,
  Nec niſi virgineum virgo videre poteſt.
Jupiter Europam, Martem Venus, & Venerem Mars,
  Daphnen Sol, Herſen Mercurius recolit.
Hinc factum, Aſtrologe, eſt, tua cùm capit uxor amantes,
  Sidera ſignificent ut nihil inde tibi.

Saturn who blinks far off, is ſoon beguil'd,
As when a ſtone was giv'n him for a child,
The charming moon preſerves ſo chaſte a ſight,
She lends to no immodeſt act her light.
Jove with Europa, Mars with Venus toys,
Sol Daphne, Herſe Mercury employs.
Hence when the conjurer's wife receives her lover,
The ſtars, ſo taken up, can ne'er diſcover.

You ſee he alledges ſome reaſons why the planets cannot diſcover to that Aſtrologer his domeſtic miſfortune: but here are ſome other verſes, wherein he pretends that ſince the ſtars ſee every thing, they ought to have acquainted their votary with his wife's unlawful amours.

Aſtra tibi æthereo pandunt ſeſe omnia vati,
  Omnes & quæ ſint fata futura monent.
Omnibus aſt uxor quod ſe tua publicat, id te
  Aſtra, licet videant omnia, nulla monent.

While all the ſtars their fav'rite prophet ſhew,
Each future fact that paſſes here below.
His wife's conjunction with each amorous ſpark,
The ſtars, which all things ſee, ne'er once remark.

As there are ſome Aſtrologers every where, who are not more exempt from that misfortune, than men of other profeſſions, a French author, who was acquainted with ſome of them, has preſented them with a French tranſlation of the firſt verſes of Sir Thomas More. Theſe are his words (10). Now if this man (11), intent upon a high contemplation, and pretending to great knowledge, did not ſee what was before him, you may be ſure he is not the only faulty man in this reſpect. Several Aſtrologers are like him; for, though they pretend to foretel the fate of other men, they cannot foretel their own, witneſs ſome of that Profeſſion in our time, who are extreamly jealous, and ſomething more, you know what I mean, with due reſpect to the Ladies. Upon theſe I formerly wrote the following epigram, in imitation of the Latin one of Sir Thomas More.

Tu cognois aſtrologue eſtoilles etherees,
Dont à chacun predis futures deſtinees;
Mais de ce que ta femme eſt à pluſieurs commune,
Par les aſtres n'en peux cognoiſtre choſe aucune,
Saturne eſt trop loingtain, aveugle eſt en apres,
Le blanc d'entre le noir ne diſcernant de pres.
Ayant les yeux honteux la Lune fait ſon cours,
Puis la vierge ne veut voir laſcives amours.
Les autres affaire ont, Mars ſa Venus regarde,
Venus Mars, Jupiter à Europe prent garde.
Ainſi donc tu ne peux ta femme apercevôir,
Quand ſon amant l'embraſſe, & moins tes cornes voir.

See what I quote out of the Menagiana (12).

[C] It is thought he lived above ninety years.] He was born in the firſt year of the XXXVth Olympiad, and

---

(a) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, num. 26.

(b) See the article PYRRHO, citation (37).

(4) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. ii, fol. 334, B.

(5) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, num. 27.

(6) Ariſtot. de Anima, lib. i, cap. v.

(7) Plut. in Convivio ſeptem Sapient. pag. 153, C.

(8) In the remark [D], of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(9) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, num. 34.

(10) Du Verdier Vau Privas, Proſopographie, Tom. i, pag. 81.

(11) That is, Anaximenes, of whom he had been ſaying, that one day, as he was gazing upon the ſtars, he fell into a ditch.

(12) They ſay of a man, who fell into a ditch, as he was gazing upon the ſtars, Qui fuit Aſtrologus, nunc Geometra fuit. - - - The Aſtrologer becomes a Geometer. Menagiana, pag. 33.

Thoſe, who are not unacquainted with the doctrine of the moſt antient Philoſophers of Greece, cannot be ignorant that he aſſerted, that water was the principle of all bodies, which compoſe the Univerſe. A great many reflexions might be made on this ſuppoſition [D]. I ſhall cite a paſſage, which will inform us; that he made very fine diſcoveries and died in the LVIIIth Olympiad (13). This makes at leaſt ninety two years. So that Diogenes Laërtius argues wrong when he ſays Τελευτῆσαι γὰρ ἐπὶ τῆς πεντηκοστῆς ὀγδόης Ὀλυμπιάδος: quinquageſima QUIPPE & octava Olympiade eſſe defunctum (14); - - - FOR that he died in the LVIIIth Olympiad; and yet Aldobrandinus (15) approves the computation of that author, and admits the 90 years aſſigned to the life of Thales by Diogenes Laërtius. Moreri is wrong in his calculation; he would have it, that Thales, who was born in the XXXVIth Olympiad, died in the 58th about the year of Rome 209, in the 95th year of his age. The year of Rome 209, is the laſt of the LVIIIth Olympiad; but which way ſoever you reckon, you will never find ninety-five years in the hypotheſis of that writer.

[D] He aſſerted that water was the principle of all bodies. . . . . . A great many reflexions might be made on this ſuppoſition.] There is very good reaſon to believe, that he was not the firſt, who advanced this doctrine; and that he borrowed it from the Egyptians, or the moſt antient Greek Poets. See the diſſertation de dogmate Thaletis, quod aqua ſit principium omnium rerum, printed with ſome others at Hall in Saxony in the year 1700 (16). Some authors ſay, that the chaos of Heſiod is, at the bottom, the ſame principle, which Thales called water: this I can hardly believe; for the water of Thales muſt needs have been conſidered as an homogeneous thing, whereas the chaos muſt have been conſidered as an odd mixture of all ſorts of principles. Ovid gives us that notion of it, at the beginning of his Metamorphoſes (17): and when the other Poets ſpeak of a certain infernal chaos, they mean a dark and dreadful place, wholly deſtitute of the beauty that is to be ſeen in things well ordered, or altogether wanting the ſimplicity of a firſt principle.

Di, quibus imperium eſt animarum, umbræque ſilentes,
Et chaos, & Phlegethon, loca nocte tacentia late (18.)

Ye realms, yet unreveal'd to human ſight
Ye gods, who rule the regions of the night.

DRYDEN.

The Commentator Servius underſtands by the word chaos in theſe two verſes, the firſt principles as they were in the confuſion of the elements. But perhaps he is too ſubtil, for it is likely Virgil intended to ſpeak only of hell in general, or of part of it. Theſe words of Ovid ought to be underſtood in the ſame ſenſe:

Per ego hæc plena timoris,
Per chaos hoc ingens, vaſtique ſilentia regni
Eurydices oro, properata retexite fata (19).

Now, by the horrors which theſe realms ſurround;
By the vaſt chaos of theſe depths profound;
By the ſad ſilence which eternal reigns
O'er all the waſte of theſe wide ſtretching plains
Let me again Eurydice receive,
Let fate her quick-ſpun thread of life re-weave.

CONGREVE.

It is Orpheus who addreſſes the prayer to Pluto and Proſerpine. Conſult Mr Grævius's notes upon Heſiod (20), wherein he proves, that the word chaos very frequently ſignifies hell. I know that another ſenſe has been put upon the chaos, which was, according to Heſiod, the firſt of all Beings: It has been ſaid, that this chaos ſignifies the place wherein all bodies lay placed. Simplicius (21) tells us, that this was a very common interpretation. It is mentioned by Sextus Empiricus: Εἶναι γάρ φασι Χάος τὸν τόπον ἀπὸ τοῦ χωρητικὸν αὐτον εἶναι τῶν ἐν αὐτῷ γινομένων. Dicunt enim Chaos eſſe locum, eo quod comprehendat illa quæ in ipſo ſunt (22). - - - For they ſay that chaos is place, becauſe of its comprehending every thing contained in it. But, according to this ſenſe, it is impoſſible that Thales ſhould have taught the ſame doctrine with Heſiod; for water muſt neceſſarily require place no leſs than other bodies; and therefore place muſt have exiſted before water, and conſequently water could not be the firſt principle. I do not believe that Heſiod ever dreamed of what is aſcribed to him: And certainly, by the word chaos, he did not underſtand the ſpace or the place which contains bodies. Doubtleſs, he meant by it the ſtate of confuſion all things were in, before the earth, the ſea, the air, the heavens, &c. obtained their proper ſituation. He did not pretend therefore to ſpeak of ſpace, which, if it be diſtinguiſhed from matter, is neceſſarily and intirely homogeneous, and incapable of being the ſubject of the formation of any element, or any mixed body. This ſhews, that the water of Thales was not ſpace, though otherwiſe he muſt have regarded it as a whole perfectly homogeneous in actu, but heterogeneous in potentia. I make uſe of a diſtinction very famous in the ſchools of the Peripatetics; by which I mean, that, according to Thales, water conſidered in itſelf, and before the particular formation of all bodies, ought to be actually water in each of its parts, and yet capable of becoming air, fire, earth; and then a tree, metal, blood, wine, bone, &c. according to the ſeveral degrees of rarefaction and condenſation through which it goes. They are in the wrong who object that there would be no difference in bodies, if there was but one ſole material principle. This objection can be of no force but againſt thoſe, who ſhould ſuppoſe, that this ſole principle is immutable: But if they ſuppoſe, that it is ſuſceptible of ſeveral qualities ſucceſſively, like the materia prima of Ariſtotle, there is no body but may ariſe from it. The objection propoſed by Lactantius, either againſt Thales, or againſt Heraclitus, who admitted only fire for the principle of all things, is not a good one: Fire, ſays he (23), cannot be produced from water, nor can water proceed from fire. He is miſtaken: Any particular body may proceed from fire, from water, or from earth, provided there be ſome cauſes that know how to modify matter according to its alterability, or mutability. But we muſt obſerve, by the by, that neither Thales, nor Heraclitus, nor any of the ancient Philoſophers, who took only one of the four vulgar elements for the general principle of all bodies, have equalled Ariſtotle in penetration of mind: They did not conſider that not one of the four elements is matter in general, and that they are a kind of determined matter. This is the reaſon why Ariſtotle, who was more judicious than all of them, has pitched upon matter, in general, for the firſt principle of all things.

The great difficulty in Thales's Hypotheſis is, that he has not ſaid how water began to alter, and to put on the particular forms of air, fire, earth, &c. Was it rarified, was it condenſed by its own virtue? Did that virtue ariſe all of a ſudden in the beginning of the world, or did it always exiſt in water? One cannot apprehend how water could come by that virtue, if it had not been always in it; and how it could have been from all eternity without condenſation and rarefaction, if that virtue had been always in it. Some are of opinion, that Thales ſuppoſed GOD to be the efficient cauſe, which produced all particular bodies out of water. They alledge two paſſages of Cicero (24), and one of Lactantius (25). But as to Lactantius he is no new evidence, but a copier only of Cicero: And as to Cicero, the reaſons urged againſt him (26), are ſo ſtrong, that his teſtimony cannot be depended upon. If any ſhould alledge the words of Diogenes Laërtius, before quoted (27), I anſwer, that Plutarch does not make uſe of them, when he mentions the ſame anſwer made by Thales. If it be replied, that Plutarch and Diogenes Laërtius agree in another point, viz. that Thales giving a reaſon why GOD is the moſt antient of all things, alledged that GOD was not made, or had no beginning; I anſwer, that this is not a poſitive proof that he aſcribed to GOD the generation of the world. Have there not been Philoſophers, who, tho' they acknowledged on the one hand the exiſtence of the gods, yet

SEVERAL ſignifications of the word Chaos.

---

(13) Apollodorus, in Chronicis, apud Laërt. lib. i. num. 38.

(14) Diog. Laërt. ibid.

(15) In Notis ad hunc locum Laërtii.

(16) With this title Obſervationum ſelectarum ad Rem Litterariam ſpectantium Tomus I. Mr Thomaſius profeſſor of the Civil-Law at Hall, was pleaſed to ſend me a copy of it; for which I expreſs my acknowledgment in this place. He has a great ſhare in the pieces which make up this collection.

(17) See above, citation (42), of the article OVID.

(18) Virgil. Æn. lib. vi, ver. 265.

(19) Ovidius, Metam. lib. x, ver. 29.

(20) Pag. 115, of the Amſterdam edition 1701.

(21) Simplicius in Ariſtotel. Phyſ. lib. iv. See Petit, Miſcell. Obſervat. pag. 52.

(22) Sext. Empericus, Pyrrh. Hypotypoſ. lib. iii, cap. xvi.

(23) Heraclitus ex igne nata eſſe omnia dixit, Thales Mileſius ex aqua. Uterque vidit aliquid: ſed erravit tamen uterque: quod alterutrum ſi ſolum fuiſſet, neque aqua naſci ex igne potuiſſet, neque rurſus ignis ex aqua. Lactant. lib. ii, cap. ix, pag. m. 121.

(24) You will find them above, citations (82), and (84), of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(25) Lactant. lib. i, cap. v, pag. m. 14.

(26) See them in the remarks [D] and [F], of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(27) Citat. (1).

coveries in Aſtronomy, and that in particular he was ſo well pleaſed with having found out the proportion which the ſun's diameter [E] bears to the circle it deſcribes round the earth, that having communicated it to a perſon, who offered him any reward which he ſhould yet denied, on the other, that the gods had made the world? If it be further replied, that Thales attributed to the gods a knowledge of the moſt ſecret thoughts of men; I anſwer, I. That it is not certain he ſaid ſo, ſince ſome writers aſcribe that ſaying to Pittacus (28): II. That he might have believed, that the gods concern themſelves with our affairs, and know our ſecret thoughts; but it does not follow from thence, that he aſcribed to them the production of the world (29), or that he did not believe, that they themſelves proceeded from water, as from their firſt cauſe and principle: III. That the true philoſophical opinions of Thales, the Naturaliſt, ought not to be looked for in the converſation of Thales, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. He might have ſaid a great many things under this laſt character, which he did not ſay in his ſchool of Philoſophy. He mentioned only water, when he explained the formation of the world, as a Naturaliſt; he did not add the power of God to that of water. But when he looked upon himſelf as a Sage, whoſe ſententious diſcourſes ſhould tend to promote virtue, and would be ſpread among the people, he thought himſelf obliged to conform to Theological notions. Take notice, that the opinions of the Heathen Philoſophers were ſo incoherent, and ſo little juſt, that from their hypotheſis concerning the exiſtence of God, it did not follow, that he had a ſhare in the production and government of the world; and that, from their hypotheſis concerning his Providence, it did not follow, that he had diſentangled the chaos, or formed the univerſe. They were allowed to ſay, that the gods governed the world, tho' they had been produced and formed out of the chaos, as well as bodies. When a man believes, that human ſouls are formed of the moſt ſubtile parts of blood, he may ſay, that Jupiter, Venus, and Mercury, have been produced out of the moſt ſubtile parts of the chaos. Now, as the ſoul governs the body, which it has not made, and whereof it is but a kind of diſtilled water (30); and as we govern beaſts, and even ſome men, who are not produced by us; ſo the gods govern the world which they have not made, and which has made them of it's moſt refined parts.

I wiſh the learned men of Hall, who have ſaid ſuch fine things of the Ionic ſect (31), had ſaved me the trouble of reconciling St Auguſtin with Cicero. One of them ſays, that Thales acknowledged no divine influence in the production of the world; the other ſays the quite contrary. Thoſe gentlemen have taken no notice of the arguments above-mentioned (32); which ſeem to prove, that this founder of the Ionic ſect, was orthodox in his notion of the Deity. I wiſh they had examined that objection, for I would have made uſe of their anſwers. They poſitively affirm, that from Thales incluſively, to Anaxagoras excluſively, the Ionic ſect has been guilty of Atheiſm in the ſecond degree. To underſtand this, I muſt obſerve, that they admit of three degrees of Atheiſm (33). The firſt is to maintain, that there is no God: the ſecond is to deny, that the world was the work of God, whoſe exiſtence is acknowledged: the third is to ſay, that God has created the world by the neceſſity of his own nature, and not by any inducement of free-will. Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes, are guilty of the ſecond degree of Atheiſm, as well as Epicurus. 'Hi tres univerſi convenerunt in eo, quod principium omnium rerum ſit aliquid ſimilare, quod ortæ res fuerunt nulla Dei opera, ſolius naturæ ſponte, qui eſt gradus Atheiſmi Epicureus (ſic enim vocare liceat) quod ortæ ſint condenſando & rareſcendo. Quod Atheiſmi illos tres poſtulavi, de ſingulis probatu non difficile eſt ex Auguſtino, qui ubi, &c. (34) - - - All three agreed in this, that the principle of all things is ſomething ſimilar, that things are produced by nature only in a ſpontaneous manner, without any interpoſition of the Deity, which is the Epicurean degree of Atheiſm, (if we may ſo call it) that they are produced by condenſation and rarefaction. This charge of Atheiſm which I have brought againſt them all three, is eaſily proved againſt every one of them in particular from St Auguſtin, who where, &c.' Anaxagoras, Ariſtotle, and the Stoics (35), are guilty of the third degree. 'Anaxagoram & duos ejus ſocios (Diogenem Apolloniatem & Archelaum) tametſi à Thaletico atheiſmo, qui Deo plane nihil vult eſſe cum fabricatione rerum negotii, adeo excuſo, ut ejus comparatione religioſus ipſe, qualem & vulgo habent quidam, videri queat, atheorum tamen catalogo minime expungendum ſtatuo. Fuit autem atheiſmus ejus in eo gradu quem minimum vocavit (36). - - Altho' I ſo far excuſe Anaxagoras and his two companions (Diogenes Apolloniates, and Archelaus) from the Atheiſm of Thales, who will not allow GOD to have any concern in forming the world, that in compariſon with him he may be eſteemed religious, as ſome have uſually ſtiled him, yet I judge him by no means to be ſtruck out of the Atheiſtical catalogue. However his Atheiſm was of that degree which I have called the leaſt.'

[E] A paſſage which will inform us, that he made very fine diſcoveries in Aſtronomy, and . . . . the proportion of the ſun's diameter.] Apuleius furniſhes me with this paſſage. 'Thales Mileſius, ſays he (37), ex ſeptem illis ſapientia memoratis viris facile præcipuus: fuit enim geometricæ penes Grajos primus repertor, & naturæ rerum certiſſimus explorator, & aſtrorum peritiſſimus contemplator, maximas res parvis lineis reperit: temporum ambitus, ventorum flatus, ſtellarum meatus, tonitruum ſonora miracula, ſiderum obliqua curricula, Solis annua reverticula: idem Lunæ vel naſcentis incrementa, vel ſeneſcentis diſpendia, vel delinquentis obſtacula. Idem ſane jam proclivi ſenectute divinam rationem de Sole commentus eſt: quam equidem non didicit modo, verum etiam experiundo comprobavit: quotiens Sol magnitudine ſua circulum quem permeat metiatur. Id à ſe recens inventum Thales memoratur edocuiſſe Mandraytum Prienenſem, qui nova & inopinata cognitione impendio delectatus, optare juſſit quantam vellet mercedem ſibi pro tanto documento rependi. Satis, inquit, mihi fuerit mercedis Thales ſapiens, ſi id quod à me didiciſti, cum proferre ad quoſpiam cœperis, tibi non adſciveris; ſed ejus inventi me potius quam alium repertorem prædicaveris. - - - - Thales, the Mileſian, the moſt eminent of the ſeven famous Sages; for he was the firſt inventor of Geometry among the Greeks, the moſt judicious inquirer into nature, and the moſt ſkillful obſerver of the ſtars: he made great diſcoveries by ſmall Geometrical lines; the regulation of times and ſeaſons, the theory of the winds, the courſe of the ſtars, the wonderful cauſes of thunder, the oblique motions of the planets, the annual revolutions of the ſun, the reaſon of the increaſe, decreaſe, and eclipſe of the moon. He alſo, in his old age, found out the moſt ſurprizing proportion with regard to the ſun; which he not only invented but confirmed alſo by experience, the proportion between the ſun's magnitude and the circle it deſcribes. Thales, as ſoon as he had found it out, is ſaid to have communicated it to Mandratus Prienenſis, who being exceedingly delighted by ſo new and unexpected a diſcovery, deſired him to aſk what reward he would have for it. The wiſe Thales replied, It will be a ſufficient reward to me, if you do not publiſh what I have taught you as a diſcovery of your own, but fairly declare that I am the inventor.' It ſeems to me that the true ſenſe of theſe words, quotiens ſol magnitudine ſua circulum quem permeat metiatur, is this which I have given to them, viz. that Thales found out the meaſure of the ſun's diameter, and of the circle it appears to deſcribe round the earth. We are told, that he computed how many times the whole body of the ſun was to change it's ſituation to deſcribe that circle; but we are not told how many times it was. The modern Aſtronomers ſuppoſe that the ſun's diameter is about thirty minutes: from whence it follows, that, by changing it's place ſeven hundred and twenty times, according to the whole extent of it's globe, it deſcribes the whole circumference of it's circle. Some infer from thence, that it's diurnal ſwiftneſs would not be very conſiderable, if it were true that it moves in the manner ſuppoſed in Tycho Brahe's ſyſtem; that is, like an arrow ſhould aſk for it, he only deſired, that he would be ſo ingenuous as to declare, that the glory of that invention was his due (c).

---

(28) See, above, the remark [A].

(29) See remark [G], of the article JUPITER.

(30) That is according to the hypotheſis of the Heathens.

(31) See the firſt volume of Obſervationum ſelectarum ad Rem Litterariam ſpectantium, printed at Hall, in the year 1700, pag. 445, & ſeq.

(32) In the remark [A].

(33) Obſerv. ad Rem Litterariam, Tom. i, pag. 448.

(34) Ibid. pag. 450.

(35) Infimum (Atheorum gradum faciunt) quia produxerit quidem Deus, (mundum) ſed neceſſitate naturæ coactus, non voluntate ſua libere motus, quæ fuit Ariſtotelis & Stoicorum ſententia . . . Interim qualicunque providentiæ Divinæ confeſſione factum eſt, ut Ariſtoteles & Stoici pro non-atheis vulgo haberentur. Eſſe tamen ipſorum eandem ſortem debere cum phyſicis Ionicæ Sectæ, quos pro atheis habitos monſtrabimus, ſectarum convenientia edocebit. Ibid. pag. 448, 449.

(36) Ibid. pag. 453.

(37) Apuleius, Floridor. pag. m. 361.

arrow in the air, and not as the nails of a wheel. Cannot oxen, with a ſlow pace, go, in a few hours, through a ſpace ſeven or eight times greater than they are. Obſerve, in the example of Thales, how very much pleaſed the inventers of things are with the glory of a firſt diſcovery. That wiſe man of Greece was now grown old, and in high reputation. He was inſenſible as to lucre, pecuniary rewards, or any other advantage; but not as to the injuſtice of thoſe, who ſhould rob him of his diſcovery, or deprive him of the glory of it, by a diſobliging ſilence. See what Tacitus ſays, ſpeaking of Helvidius Priſcus, that the laſt thing even the wiſe man can part with, is the deſire of glory (38).

(c) See the remark [D].

(38) Opum contemptor, recti pervicax, conſtans adverſus metus. Erant quibus appetentior famæ videretur, quando etiam ſapientibus cupido gloriæ noviſſima exuitur. Tacit. Hiſt. lib. iv, cap. 5, 6.

THAMYRAS, who invented the ſcience of the Haruſpices in the iſland of Cyprus. See TAMIRAS.

THAMYRIS, a Poet, and one of the moſt excellent Muſicians of his time, was born at Odryſa in Thrace, whither his mother (a) retired to hide her ſhame. This was occaſioned by her having the imprudence to lye with a man (b), who would not marry her. Without doubt ſhe often deſired it of him, as ſhe found her big belly increaſe, which quickly followed their amorous commerce; but he gave no ear to it, and obliged her by this means to leave her country, which was Mount Parnaſſus [A]. The ſon, of whom ſhe was delivered at Odryſa, was called Thamyris, and was endowed with a great many perfections, which might have raiſed him to the higheſt pitch of glory, had not the vanity which was intermixed with them run him into a thouſand extravagancies. He trod in his father's ſteps, for he learned Muſic ſo perfectly, that the Scythians made him their king, though he was a foreigner (c). He had the fineſt voice of any man in his time, if we believe Plutarch, who adds, that he compoſed a Poem concerning the war of the Titans with the gods (d). Some other Poems are aſcribed to him; five thouſand verſes on the creation of the world, and a ſyſtem of Theology conſiſting of three thouſand verſes (e), which was ſtill extant when Suidas was writing his Dictionary. There is no great probability that thoſe two Poems were entirely different. He was more antient than Homer by eight degrees according to ſome, or five according to others (f), and he was the third, who gained the prize of ſinging at the Pythic games (g). He is ſaid to have been the firſt inventer of the ſin againſt nature [B]. The challenge which he had the aſſurance to give to the Muſes was full of ſcandalous inſolence: proud of his beauty, and of his ſkill in muſical inſtruments, he challenged them to a trial of ſkill, upon this condition, that if he got the victory, he ſhould deprive them all nine of their virginity; and that if he was overcome, he would ſubmit himſelf to their diſcretion. The Muſes, in all probability very well aſſured of ſucceſs, accepted the condition, and after their victory deprived him of his ſight, and of his ſkill in Muſic. Homer, who has mentioned this challenge of Thamyris [C], and the puniſhment inflicted upon him on that account, ſays nothing of his pretenſion in caſe he had been conqueror; a pretenſion like that of male partridges, when they fight in the preſence of their females (h); but Apollodorus, and the Scholiaſt upon Homer, are as expreſs in this particular as poſſible (i). Natalis Comes would have done well to cite them [D]. It is ſurpriſing that Lucian did not ſhow his bantering wit upon this head, and that he ſhould content himſelf with repreſenting Thamyris as an ungrateful perſon

(a) Her name was Arſinoë, according to Suidas; and Argiope, according to Pauſanias and Apollodorus.

(b) His name was Philammon, and he was a good Muſician; See Pauſanias, lib. iv, p. 143, & lib. x, pag. 322, Plut. de Muſica, pag. 1132.

(c) Conon, apud Photium, num. 186, pag. 428.

(d) Plutarch. de Muſica, pag. 1132. Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. vi, cap. xiv, ſays that Plutarch values that poem more than all the others; but it is certain he neither praiſes nor diſpraiſes it.

(e) Tzetzes, Chil. VII. Hiſt. CVIII.

(f) Suidas.

(g) Pauſan. lib. lib. x, pag. 322.

(h) Tunc inter ſe dimicant mares deſiderio feminarum, victum ajunt Venerem pati. Pliny, lib. x, cap. xxxiii.

(i) See the remark [D].

[A] Which was mount Parnaſſus.] Others (1) ſay ſhe retired from Peloponneſus, and that Philammon, a handſome young man, who was too much beloved by her, and had received too great a ſhare of her favours, was born at Thoricum in Attica.

[B] The firſt inventor of the ſin againſt nature.] That I may not advance this without proof, I ſhall cite theſe four Greek words, Πρῶτος ἀρξάμενος ἐρᾷν ἀῤῥένων. Maſcula Venere primus uſus diſcitur (2) - - - - He firſt, introduced the love of males. The boy he fell in love with, was the ſame Hyacinthus, who was afterwards loved by Apollo, and killed by him accidentally with a quoit. He was the ſon of the Muſe Clio, and of Pierus the ſon of Magnes (3). This is what we find in Apollodorus; but Suidas calls the boy Hymneus, and makes him the ſon of Calliope and Magnes. I have not read in any author what Lloyd and Hofman have copied from Charles Stephens, namely, that Thamyris, the moſt beautiful of all men, fell in love with boys at firſt, and afterwards changed his courſe, and loved the Muſes. This is perverting and overturning every thing that is to be met with among the Antients.

[C] Homer, who has mentioned this challenge.] It is in the ſecond book of the Iliad, in the catalogue of the Grecian fleet, on occaſion of the town Dorion, near which he ſays, Thamyris was met by the Muſes. It is evident, by what is ſaid both before and after, that this town was not in Thrace, as Lloyd will have it, but in Pelopponneſus. Lucan, who places it in Theſſaly (4), was no better acquainted with it's ſituation. Beroaldus, who would prove from Lucan, that it was in Bœotia, has committed two faults for one (5). Diodorus Siculus, in the third book, and Dion Chryſoſtom, in his third oration de Fuga, have mentioned that challenge of Thamyris, and how he was puniſhed for it. Barthius has found in that oration, that Thamyris loſt his ſight, and his ſkill in Muſic, on account of his wealth (6). But this is not the author's meaning.

[D] Natalis Comes would have done well to cite them.] He has given a juſt account (7) of that adventure; but he quotes only Aſclepiades of Myrlea (8), which is a wrong way of quoting, and a remainder of the vain affectation of ſome learned men of Italy, upon the revival of learning. Some quoted a Greek author only in general; others called him by his name, but they took care not to ſay, that what they cited out of him, was only to be found quoted in ſome known authors. The ſcholaſtic Divines and Philoſophers are not ſo unfair in their quotions: they do not ſcruple to refer the reader for a paſſage of an author, whoſe works are in every body's hands, to a modern writer who quotes it. Thus Father Terillus, in his book upon the Prima Regula Morum, does ſeldom quote the Fathers, or Thomas Aquinas, but upon the credit of Sanches, Vaſques, and other Jeſuits, as is obſerved by the author of the fourth Denunciation of the Philoſophical Sin. I here give myſelf an example of ſuch quotations. However it be, Natalis Comes ſhould have told

(1) Conon, apud Photium, num. 186, pag. 428.

(2) Apollodor. lib. i, pag. m. 11. See alſo Suidas, and the Scholiaſt upon Homer, in Iliad. lib. i, ver. 102.

(3) Apollod. lib. i, pag. m. x.

(4) Quæ tetigit Phylace Pteleoſque & Dorion ira Flebile Pieridum. Lucan. Pharſ. lib. vi, ver. 352.

(5) Beroald. in Propert. Eleg. XXII, lib. ii.

(6) Barth. Comm. in Statium, Tom. ii, pag. 962.

(7) Nat. Comes, Mythol. lib. vi, cap. xiv.

(8) He is a famous author. Myrlea, a town of Bithynia, was ſince called Apamea.

perſon [E], who turned againſt the Muſes the talent he had received from them. Some authors have ſaid, that the puniſhment of his preſumption was put off till he ſhould arrive in the infernal regions (k). Pauſanias ſays, he believes that Thamyris loſt his ſight, not as Homer ſays, for having contended with the Muſes, but through ſickneſs (l). It is obſerved (m); that this Poet left off making verſes after he loſt his ſight, and that he threw his lyre into a river [F]: hence it is, that when he was painted blind, he was repreſented with a broken lyre (n). Note he invented the Muſic called Doric [G]. Plato has feigned, according to the principles of the Metempſychoſis, that the ſoul of Thamyris tranſmigrated into the body of a nightingale (o).

(k) Prodicus Phocæenſis, apud Pauſaniam, lib. iv, pag. 143.

(l) Pauſan. ib.

(m) Ibid.

(n) Prodicus Phocæenſis, apud Pauſaniam, lib. ix, pag. 304, & lib. x, pag. 347.

(o) Plato, de Republ. lib. x, pag. 765.

told us, that there are ſome authors extant, who may be conſulted as to the conditions of the challenge. Συνθέμενος, ſays Apollodorus, ἂν μὲν κρείττων εὑρεθῇ πλησιάσειν πάσαις. - - - Making his bargain, in caſe he ſhould come off conqueror, to lie with them all. The Scholiaſt upon Homer has the ſame expreſſion upon the paſſage of the ſecond book of the Iliads: Συνέθετο, ἂν μὲν κρείττων εὑρεθῇ πλησιάσαι πάσαις.

[E] It is ſurpriſing that Lucian did not ſhew his bantering wit upon this head, and that he ſhould content himſelf with repreſenting Thamyris as an ungrateful perſon.] Ἐκτὸς εἰ μὴ κατὰ τὸν Θάμυριν, ἢ τὸν Εὔρυτον εἴη τὴν φύσιν, ὡς ταῖς μούσαις ἀντᾴδειν, παρ' ὧν εἰλήφει τὴν ᾠδήν, ἢ τῷ Ἀπόλλωνι ἐριδαίνειν, ἐναντία τοξεύων, καὶ ταῦτα, δοτῆρι ὄντι τῆς τοξικῆς. Ni ejuſdem naturæ, cujus Thamyris, vel Eurytus, ut muſis occinat, à quibus canendi normam acceperit, vel Apollinem, idque jaculationis præceptorem, jaculando provocet (9). - - - Unleſs of the ſame diſpoſition with Thamyris, or Eurytus; the former of whom preſumed to ſing with the Muſes, who had taught him that art; the latter challenged Apollo to ſhoot, notwithſtanding he had been his maſter. Perhaps this merry writer forgot that circumſtance, or never obſerved it in his reading. It is well he did not; for this, in all probability, is the true reaſon why he did not jeſt upon it in any of his books, by falſly and maliciouſly ſuppoſing, that the Muſes did not ſing well that day, either from a pretended cold, or one really catched in a very lucky ſeaſon, or from ſome other artifice, like thoſe made uſe of by courtiers and ambitious men when they play (10), and that therefore Thamyris, &c. But we muſt not forget, that, according to ſome authors (11), the prize annexed to the victory was not a tranſient favour, but an actual marriage to be contracted between him and the nine Muſes: this was conſequently a laſting buſineſs.

Connubio jungam ſtabili propriamque dicabo (12).

In Hymen's laſting bands I'll make her thine.

[F] It is obſerved . . . that he threw his lyre into a river.] Caſeneuve, in his French Commentary upon ſome epiſtles of Philoſtratus, ſays, that Thamyris, after his puniſhment, threw his lyre againſt mount Parnaſſus, and that from the ſtroke of it there iſſued a brook, which was from thence called Balyra. This is a ſtrange alteration of Pauſanias's words, which inform us (13), that at the diſtance of thirty ſtadia from the gate of Meſſena in Peloponneſus, there was a river called Balyra, becauſe Thamyris had thrown his lyre into it.

[G] He invented the Muſic called Doric.] He was too great a maſter in that art, to content himſelf with leaving it in the ſtate he found it, and not to be ambitious to make ſome new improvements in it. ' Lydios modulos Amphion (invenit) Dorios Thamyras ' Thrax: Phrygios Marſyas Phrix (14). - - - Amphion ' invented the Lydian mood in Muſic, Thamyras the Thracian the Doric mood, and Marſyas the Phrygian ' the Phrygian mood.'

(9) Lucian. in Reviviſcentibus, pag. 389, Tom. i.

(10) It was principally by ſuch a device as this, that Ruy Gomes gained the love of Philip II. Brantome, in his Elogy upon Philip II. See the remark [B], in the article of INNOCENT XI.

(11) Conon, apud Photium, num. 186, pag. 428.

(12) Virgil. Æn. lib. i, ver. 73.

(13) Pauſan. lib. iv, pag. 143.

(14) Pliny, lib. vii, cap. lvi, pag. m. 102. See alſo Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. i, Strom. pag. 307.

T H E O N, a Greek Sophiſt, of whom we have ſtill remaining a Rhetorical work (a), written with great politeneſs and judgment. His rules are clear and ſhort, and he makes a good choice of common places for the furniſhing of arguments. There is no ſubject wherein he has been more ſucceſsful, than that concerning the Divine Providence [A]. He paſſes a right judgment upon the beauties as well as the faults of the moſt illuſtrious Orators and Hiſtorians. I ſhall prove, by an example, his great nicety in the placing (a) Intituled, Προγυμνάσματα, Progymnaſmata.

[A] There is no ſubject wherein he has been more ſucceſsful than that concerning the Divine Providence.] Read the twelfth chapter of his book, where you will find a very plentiful collection of the fineſt arguments that a Pagan could conceive; and which will convince you Theon was a man of great parts. You will there find, among other things, that mens being perſuaded that the gods continually ſee every thing they do, makes them live in great ſafety, and practiſe their duty; and that thoſe who think themſelves under the care of the gods, ſpend their lives with the greateſt pleaſure imaginable. Let us hear his own words: Εἶθ' ὅτι ἀσφαλέστατα ἂν ἔτοι, καὶ προσηκόντως τὸν βίον διάγοιεν, νομίζοντες ἔχειν ἐπισκόπους ἀεὶ πασῶν τῶν κατὰ τὸν βίον πράξεων. καὶ ὅτι μάλιστα ἡδέως ζῶσιν, οἱ ἡγούμενοι ἐπιμελητὰς ἔχειν τοὺς θεούς. Quemadmodum & omnium tutiſſime ac diligentiſſime eos vivere conſtet, qui omnium ſuarum in vita actionum inſpectores ſe habere exiſtimant Deos. Sed & jucundiſſime ætatem agere, qui à Diis reſpici ſe credunt (1). It is certain, that if men knew how to live according to their principles, the doctrine of GOD's preſence would be the moſt effectual means to divert them from all evil, and to make them purſue good. The moſt profligate have the power to hold their hands and refrain their tongues, when they think they are ſeen or heard by ſome perſons whom they fear or reſpect. With how much more reaſon ſhould the perſuaſion, that GOD ſees every thing, keep men conſtant to their duty (2)? It is upon this account, that the authors of pious books do ſo much inculcate the neceſſity of meditating upon GOD's preſence. From hence comes alſo the cuſtom of fixing up this ſentence even at the corners of the ſtreets, GOD SEES THEE, SINNER. It is alſo certain, that thoſe who believe themſelves under the protection of GOD, muſt enjoy an inexhauſtible fund of comfort and pleaſure. Some of the profane Poets were not ignorant of it; but they have given a juſt cauſe of ſcandal by making uſe of this maxim to obtain a miſtreſs (3).

I ſhall here take notice of one thing, that is to be met with in a book, intituled, Pratiques de Piété pour honorer le S. Sacrament. The author of it relates (4) ' this ſaying of Marſhal de Gaſſion. ' If I believed ' the Real Preſence, I would ſpend my whole life in a ' church with my face proſtrate to the ground; and I ' cannot perſuade myſelf, that many Catholics believe what ' they ſay concerning that myſtery, when I conſider how ' little reſpect they expreſs at church.' If that Marſhal had believed the Real Preſence, he would have done as others do: He would have been accuſtomed to that doctrine, and by habit he would have become inſenſible to it; that was already his caſe, as to the doctrine of GOD's preſence throughout the whole univerſe. A viſible preſence of CHRIST's humanity would, without doubt, be more efficacious than GOD's preſence; but a preſence of CHRIST's human nature, as inviſible as that of the Divine Nature, will ſoon come to the ſame thing. Thoſe who believe it are no more ſenſibly affected with it, than the Proteſtants are with the doctrine of GOD's preſence.

(1) Theo, in Progymn. cap. xii, pag. m. 135.

(2) Confer quæ ſupra in the remark [A], of the article THALES.

(3) See the XVIIth Ode of the firſt book of Horace, and mind theſe words, Di me tuentur: Dis pietas mea, Et Muſa cordi eſt. All ſeeing gods my cauſe defend, My pray'rs accept, my muſe befriend.

(4) See the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, Tom. i, pag. 313.

[B] I ſhall

placing of words [B]. Here is another proof of his good taſte. He would not have maxims or ſentences to appear in relievo, or like embroidery, in narrations, but to be incorporated with them in an imperceptible manner [C]. His book was printed at Baſil, with the Latin tranſlation of Joachim Camerarius in the year 1541: but the beſt edition is that of Leyden 1626, in 8vo. Daniel Heinſius, who publiſhed it, carefully reviſed the Latin tranſlation, and corrected it in a great many places.

[B] I ſhall prove by an example his great nicety in the placing of words.] When he recommends perſpicuity of expreſſion (5), he points out ſeveral cauſes of obſcurity which ought to be avoided. He ſays, among other things, that we ſhould never leave our readers or hearers in an uncertainty where to refer a certain part of a period; and therefore he blames this expreſſion: Δῆμον ἐρεχθῆος μεγαλήτορος, ὅν ποτ᾽ ἀθήνη θρέψε διὸς θυγάτηρ, τέκε δὲ ζείδωρος ἄρουρα. Populum præſtantis Ereckthei, Pallas quem Jove nata aluit, terra edidit alma (6).-- The people of the great Erechtheus, whom Pallas, Jove's daughter, bred, and earth produced. One cannot tell, ſays he, whether it be the people, or Erechtheus, whom Pallas bred, and the earth produced. He adds, that Heraclitus's books were grown very obſcure, by ſuch an order of words, ſo very frequently to be met with, whether it was owing to the author's careleſſneſs or deſign. Παρὰ ταύτην δὲ τὴν ἀμφιβολίαν, τὰ Ἡρακλείτου τοῦ φιλοσόφου βιβλία σκοτεινὰ γέγονε, κατακόρως αὐτῇ χρησαμένου, ἤτοι ἐξεπίτηδες, ἢ καὶ δι᾽ ἄγνοιαν. Ex hujuſmodi ambiguis locutionibus Heracliti philoſophi libri obſcuritatem contraxere: qui ad faſtidium illis, ſive gnarus ſive ignarus, uſus eſt (7). Since Theon appears to have been ſo very nice with regard to ambiguous expreſſions, I am at a loſs to know where he met with any authors, who had writ in the manner he deſired; for the greateſt maſters of the Greek and Latin tongue are full of ſuch ambiguities. It is true, they are not ſo perplexing in a piece of Hiſtory or Oratory as they are in a treatiſe of Phyſics; and that therefore the Philoſopher, cenſured by Theon, was particularly obliged to avoid them. I have ſaid, in another place (8), that the French language is not ſo ſubject to this defect as the Greek and Latin: but it muſt be confeſſed, that even ſome excellent writers too much neglect, in that reſpect, the ſtrict rules of our Grammar. A new Theon would point out to them a great many faulty periods not to be juſtified.

[C] But to be incorporated with them in an imperceptible manner.] This is, without doubt, the true ſenſe of theſe words: Ὅταν μέν τοι συνεχῶς ἐγκαταμιγνύῃ τίς, καὶ λανθάνῃ ταῦτα γνωμικά, ἐπιχαρίς πως ἡ διήγησις γίνεται. Quæ ſententioſa quidem quamvis ſæpe inſerantur, modo ne emineant, mirifice amœnam ac venuſtam efficiunt orationem (9). - - - When theſe maxims are frequently intermixed, and yet at the ſame time concealed, the narration becomes ſurpriſingly beautiful. Petronius was of the ſame taſte. Read the following words of the preface to a book of Mr Corbinelli. *Thoſe, who have read Livy, will be ſurprized to find ſo many maxims in an Hiſtorian, who has but very few, or none, but of ſuch a ſort as thoſe mentioned by an antient author , which are incorporated with the body of the diſcourſe, without having the turn or appearance of maxims. This is giving a fine encomium on that Hiſtorian. Moral and political ſentences and reflexions, not interwoven with the thread of the diſcourſe, do not deſerve much commendation. It is no difficult thing to ſcatter them in that manner; but the inſerting them, in the very body of the narration, requires a great deal of art. They ought to appear there like a flat painting, and not like a book emboſſed in relievo.

(5) Theo, cap. iv, pag. 46, & ſeq.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 47.

(7) Ibid.

(8) Remark [C] of the firſt article ACHILLES.

(9) Theo, cap. iv, pag. 63, 64.

* Curandum eſt, ne ſententiæ emineant extra corpus orationis expreſſæ, ſed intexto veſtibus colore niteant. Petr. Satyric.

THEOPOMPUS, an Orator and an Hiſtorian, born in the iſle of Chios (a), flouriſhed in the time of Philip, King of Macedonia, father of Alexander the Great [A]. He was the moſt famous of all the diſciples of Iſocrates (b), and carried the prize from all the Panegyriſts ſent for by Artemiſia to praiſe Mauſolus (c). There was no conſiderable town in Greece where he had not harangued with univerſal applauſe (d). This was one of the reaſons he advanced, to juſtify the good opinion he had of his own merit; when having very much preferred the modern Orators to thoſe of the preceding age, he inſtanced himſelf for one of the beſt of his time (e). After he had ſignalized himſelf as an Orator, he ſet himſelf about writing Hiſtories [B], and made it appear, that the ſtudy of (a) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 444.

(b) Ἐπιφανέστατος πάντων Ἰσοκράτους μαθητῶν. Clariſſimus omnium Iſocratis diſcipulorum. Dionyſ. Halicarn. Epiſt. ad Pompeium, ſub fin. pag. m. 262.

(c) Aulus Gellius, lib. x, cap. xviii.

(d) Photius, Bibl. Cod. 176, pag. 392.

(e) Id. ibid. See the end of the laſt remark.

[A] He flouriſhed in the time of Philip . . . . . father of Alexander the Great.] The anonymous writer, who has deſcribed the Olympiads, ſays, he flouriſhed in the XCIIId. It is a miſtake, which has been followed by Suidas, and adopted by Meurſius (1) and Voſſius (2). Jonſius confutes it effectually (3). He quotes Diodorus Siculus, who has obſerved that the XLIſt, XLIId, and XLIIId books of Theopompus's Hiſtory, contained what paſſed in Sicily from the third year of the XCIIId Olympiad, to the ſecond year of the CIXth (4). Is it likely, that an author, who flouriſhed in the XCIIId Olympiad, ſhould have been alive in the CXth Olympiad (5)? Here is a more ſolid proof. Theopompus publiſhed a letter, and ſome advices he had wrote to Alexander, who did not begin to reign till the CXIth Olympiad. I paſs by ſeveral other proofs alledged by Jonſius: they might be eluded, and after all they are of no more weight than thoſe I have juſt now mentioned. We ſhall therefore take no farther notice of them, but obſerve that he might have found in Photius a much ſtronger argument than all he alledges; for, as I have ſaid in the text of this article, we read in Photius, 1. That Theopompus was but forty-five years old when Alexander cauſed him to re-eſtabliſhed at Chios. 2. That Ptolomy, King of Egypt had thoughts of putting him to death. This ſhews that he was ſo far from flouriſhing in the XCIIId Olympiad, that he was not born till towards the hundredth at the ſooneſt.

[B] After he had ſignalized himſelf, as an Orator, he ſet himſelf about writing Hiſtories.] Quintilian makes this obſervation: ' Theopompus . . . . . ut in hiſtoria ' prædictis (Herodoto & Thucydide) minor, ita Oratori magis ſimilis, ut qui antequam eſt ad hoc opus ' ſolicitatus, diu fuerit Orator (6). - - - Theopompus ' . . . . . as in Hiſtory inferior to the former (Herodotus ' and Thucydides), ſo was he much more of the Orator, having diſtinguiſhed himſelf in that character long ' before his being perſuaded to write Hiſtory.' Cicero does not contradict Quintilian, when he ſays, that Theopompus never pleaded any cauſes; for there were a great many Orators in Greece who never pleaded at all. In ſhort, it was Iſocrates, who adviſed Theopompus to apply himſelf to Hiſtory (7). The paſſage I have quoted out of Cicero, might make one believe, that Theopompus and Ephorus were of much the ſame genius, ſince their maſter adviſed them to apply themſelves to the ſame ſtudy; but do not let this deceive you. They had not the leaſt reſemblance; one wanted a curb, and the other a ſpur. Theopompus was too warm. Ephorus was not warm enough. This was the reaſon that Iſocrates uſed different methods with them. ' Hoc doctoris intelligentis eſt, videre quò ferat natura ' ſua quemque; & ea duce utentem ſic inſtituere, ut ' Iſocratem in acerrimo ingenio Theopompi, & leniſſimo Ephori dixiſſe traditum eſt, alteri ſe calcaria ' adhibere, alteri frænos (8).- - This is the part of an ' able maſter to diſcover every particular genius of his ſcholars, and to teach them accordingly, as Iſocrates is reported to have ſaid with regard to the bold turn of ' Theopompus, and the mild one of Ephorus, that he would ' make uſe of the ſpur to the one, and the bridle to the ' other.' Cicero expreſſes this in another place better ſtill for my purpoſe; for he declares, that theſe two ſcholars

(1) Meurſius de Archont. Athen. apud Jonſium, ubi infra.

(2) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græc. lib. iv, cap. viii, pag. 459.

(3) Jonſius, de Scriptor. Hiſt. Philoſ. pag. 45.

(4) Diodor. Siculus, lib. xvi, cap. lxxii.

(5) Theopompus's Hiſtory conſiſted of 58 books.

(6) Quintil. lib. x, cap. i, pag. m. 469.

(7) Ex clariſſima Rhetoris officina duo præſtantes ingenio Theopompus & Ephorus ab Iſocrate magiſtro impulſi ſe ad hiſtoriam contulerunt: cauſas omnino nullas attigerunt. Cicero, de Orat. lib. ii, fol. 73, D.

(8) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. 314.

of Eloquence is a good preparative for it [C]; for he acquired the reputation of an able Hiſtorian. He was beſides, very well qualified for this undertaking; for he boldly publiſhed ſcholars were never alike. ‘ Dicebat Iſocrates . . . . . ſe calcaribus in Ephoro, contrà autem in Theopompo frenis uti ſolere: alterum enim exultantem verborum audacia reprimebat, alterum cunctantem, & quaſi verecundantem incitabat. Neque eos ſimiles effecit inter ſe, ſed tantum alteri affinxit, de altero limavit, ut id confirmaret in utroque, quod utriuſque natura pateretur (9). - - - - Iſocrates ſaid . . . . . that he uſed to treat Ephorus with a ſpur, and Theopompus, on the contrary, with a bridle: the great forwardneſs and aſſurance of the former wanting to be repreſſed, and the great backwardneſs and modeſty of the latter to be encouraged. Nor did he make them in the leaſt alike, but only added to the one, and pruned off from the other, that he might confirm in each of them, what their reſpective genius would bear.’ Quintilian relates the ſame fact (10). Others make a like obſervation concerning Plato, with reſpect to Ariſtotle and Xenocrates, and concerning Ariſtotle, with reſpect to Theophraſtus and Calliſthenes (11).

[C] The ſtudy of Eloquence is a good preparative to write Hiſtory.] This was Cicero's opinion; for he is thus addreſſed by Pomponius Atticus: ‘ Potes tu profecto ſatisfacere in hiſtoria quippe cum ſit opus, ut tibi quidem videri ſolet, unum hoc oratorium maxime (12). - - - - You may be ſure of ſucceeding in Hiſtory, ſince it is a work, wherein you uſe to ſay Oratory is the chief ingredient.’ Nevertheleſs, it ſeems, that a man, who has been uſed to compoſe orations, is not very well qualified to obſerve, in his expreſſions, that grave ſimplicity, which becomes the character of an Hiſtorian. It is to be feared, that his ſtile will be too lofty, and too full of metaphors. But this is a much ſtronger objection againſt thoſe, who ſay, that none can be a good Hiſtorian, without being a good Poet (13). This has been advanced by ſome very great men. However it be, Theopompus's ſtile was thought to ſavour more of an Orator, than of an Hiſtorian, and to be an imitation of that of Iſocrates. Veterum hoc commune judicium eſt dictionem ejus oratoriæ ac imprimis Iſocraticæ ſimiliorem eſſe, quam hiſtoriæ (14). Thoſe, who juſtify him by ſaying in general, that he came nearer the ſtrength of Demoſthenes, do not wholly remove the difficulty, for that very thing ſhews, that an oratorial eloquence prevailed in his hiſtorical writings. The beſt thing therefore that can be ſaid for him is what we find in Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. I ſhall give it in Latin: It will inform us, that Theopompus added to the character of Iſocrates the ſtrength which his ſubject required, and that his cenſures were as ſharp as thoſe of Demoſthenes. ‘ Ea forma quæ in elocutione cernitur, maxime ad ſimilitudinem Iſocrateæ accedit. Pura enim dictio, vulgaris, ſimplex, perſpicua, ſublimis, magnifica, & ſummam pompam præ ſe fert, & quadam harmonia temperata eſt, jucunde & ſuaviter fluens. Differt autem ab elocutione Iſocratis in auſteritate & vehementia in aliquibus; nimirum cum ſe in affectus concitandos dederit, & vel maxime cum urbibus & ducibus improba conſilia & res geſtas exprobrat atque vitio dat. Multus enim eſt in iis, & à Demoſthenis acrimonia ne paululum quidem abeſt (15). - - - - The form of his ſtile is moſt like that of Iſocrates, for his expreſſion is pure, familiar, plain, clear, ſublime, magnificent, pompous, tempered with certain harmony, very pleaſant and agreeably flowing. But it differs from that of Iſocrates, ſometimes by it's ſharpneſs and ſeverity; that is, when he deſigns to ſtir the paſſions, and eſpecially when he expoſes and laſhes the evil counſels and miſconduct of cities and generals. For he enlarges much upon theſe, and is not in the leaſt ſhort of Demoſthenes's ſeverity.’ Cicero obſerves, that Theopompus eclipſed the glory of Philiſtus, and Thucydides, by the loftineſs of his ſtile. ‘ Ut horum conciſis ſententiis, interdum etiam non ſatis apertis cum brevitate, tum nimio acumine, officit Theopompus elatione atque altitudine orationis ſuæ, quod idem Lyſiæ Demoſthenes: ſic Catonis luminibus obſtruxit hæc poſteriorum quaſi exaggerata altius oratio (16). - - That their conciſe, and ſometimes not over-clear periods, were out-done by Theopompus not only in brevity and perſpicuity, but alſo in loftineſs and magnificence; as Lyſias's was by Demoſthenes. So Cato's glory is eclipſed by the more improved ſtile of the Moderns.’ But there is one thing, in which he ſhewed himſelf too much an Orator: he carefully avoided the meeting of vowels, and was extremely fond of the turn and cadence of his periods, and of the correſpondence of grammatical figures. This is a fault, for which he is reproached by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (17); and there is without doubt ſomething very mean in ſuch an affectation, when the grandeur and majeſty of the ſubject ought to engage the whole attention of the writer. We may ſay however, as to what concerns the meeting of vowels, that he did very right in avoiding it, and that he was only to blame for diſcovering that he avoided it too ſcrupulouſly. I obſerve, that when Cicero ſays, Theopompus was blamed upon that account, he does not ſay he was blamed juſtly: nay, he ſeems to ſay, that he was blamed unjuſtly. ‘ Ut in legendo, ſays he (18), ſic animus in dicendo proſpiciet quid ſequatur, ne extremorum verborum cum inſequentibus primis concurſus, aut hiulcas voces efficiat, aut aſperas. Quamvis enim ſuaves, graveſve ſententiæ, tamen ſi inconditis verbis efferuntur, offendent aures, quarum eſt judicium ſuperbiſſimum. Quod quidem latina lingua ſic obſervat, nemo ut tam ruſticus ſit, qui vocaleis nolit conjungere. In quo quidam etiam Theopompum reprehendunt, quod eas literas tantopere fugerit, & ſi id magiſter ejus Iſocrates, at non Thucydides. . . . . In ea eſt crebra iſta vocum concurſio, quam magna ex parte, ut vitioſam, fugit Demoſthenes. - - - As in reading, ſo in ſpeaking the mind ought to regard what is to follow, that the meeting of each ſubſequent word with the foregoing may produce neither too open nor too rough a ſound. For altho' the ſentences are agreeable and grave, yet if they are expreſſed in improper words, they will offend the ear, whoſe judgment is very arbitrary. Which the Latin tongue obſerves in ſuch manner, that the greateſt clown of all takes care to join his vowels right. Some alſo find fault with Theopompus on this head, for avoiding ſo ſcrupulouſly theſe openings, which if his maſter Iſocrates minded, Thucydides did not. . . . . With him the meeting of vowels is very frequent, which Demoſthenes in great meaſure has avoided as faulty.’ Duris Samius ſpoke of Theopompus's ſtyle with great contempt; but, as Photius (19) obſerves, he was far from equalling him. Conſult Longinus in two places of his treatiſe on the Sublime. He commends and juſtifies him in the one, and cenſures him in the other. ‘ This may be further ſeen, ſays he (20), in a paſſage of Theopompus, which Cæcilius blames I know not why, and which I think on the contrary ought rather to be praiſed for its juſtneſs, and for being very expreſſive. Philip, ſays that Hiſtorian, readily ſwallows all affronts, which the neceſſity of his affairs obliges him to ſuffer.’ It is in the Greek δεινὸς ὢν ὁ φίλιππος ἀναγκοφαγῆσαι πράγματα. Tanaquillus Faber renders theſe words: Philippus rerum neceſſitatem devorare callidus. The other paſſage of Longinus begins thus (21): ‘ In like manner, the Hiſtorian Theopompus has given a deſcription of the King of Perſia's deſcent into Egypt, which is otherwiſe ſublime; but he has ſpoiled all by the mean expreſſions he has intermixed with it. Is there any city, and nation in Aſia, ſays that Hiſtorian, but what has ſent ambaſſadors to the King? &c.’ Longinus, having repeated the remaining part of the deſcription, adds: ‘ From the higheſt elevation he falls into the loweſt meanneſs, in the very place where he ſhould have been moſt lofty. For the buſhels, raggo's, and ſacks, which he improperly mentions in the pompous deſcription of thoſe preparations, would make one think that he is deſcribing a kitchin.’ The Jeſuit Cauſſinus who was a good judge of Rhetoric, does not approve that cenſure. Theſe are his words: ‘ Dionyſ. Longinus, mordax Criticus, eum irridet, quòd ubi dona Regi Perſarum ab Aſiaticis oblata commemorat, poſt ſtragulam veſtem, purpuram, tabernacula aurea, periſtromata, emblemata, carnes etiam victimarum ſalſas, regi oblatas ad alendum exercitum, commemoret. Debebat, inquit, iſta minuta, aut omittere, aut initio collocare, ut à minoribus ad majora aſcenderet: ſed in eo frigidus eſt, & fruſtra mordax Longinus. Erat enim fidelis hiſtorici, & prudentis, poſt opulenta principum dona, tenuiorum quoque in colendo rege ſtudia commemorare, & rem, ut geſta

‘ eſt

(9) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. iii, fol. 90, C.

(10) Quintil. lib. ii, cap. viii, pag. 81.

(11) Diog. Laërtius, in Xenocrate & Theophraſto.

(12) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. i, circa init. fol. m. 328, C. See alſo Cicero, in I de Oratore.

(13) See the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, num. 5.

(14) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, pag. 34.

(15) Dionyſ. Halicarn. Epiſt. ad Pompeium, in fine, pag. m. 264.

(16) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m. 114.

(17) Quod ſi in iis in quibus ſummum ſtudium poſuit, colliſionem vocalium & numeroſas circumſcriptiones ac figuras ſimiles neglexiſſet, longe melior in elocutione ſe ipſo evaſiſſet. Dionyſ. Halicarn. Epiſt. ad Pompeium in fine, pag. m. 264.

(18) Cicero, in Oratore, fol. 124, B.

(19) Photius, Bibl. num. 176, pag. 393.

(20) Longin, chap. xxviii, juxta Editionem Tanaq. Fabri.

(21) Id. ibid. cap. xxxix, juxta Editionem Tanaq. Fabri.

publiſhed diſadvantageous truths, and was not ſparing of his money when an exact enquiry into matters of fact required great expences [D]. He is blamed for his digreſſions [E], and it is very likely, the cenſure paſſed upon him on that account is very reaſonable, though perhaps it is not in all reſpects ſo exact and equitable as it ſhould be, nor has the plan he laid down been conſidered with due attention. If we had his preface, perhaps we ſhould find ſomething in it, which might juſtify him in ſome meaſure; but I do not think that any thing can fully excuſe him, not even to ſuch readers as have the greateſt indulgence for Hiſtorical Epiſodes. With much more reaſon would he be condemned by thoſe Critics, who cannot bear any thing in Hiſtory that is foreign to the ‘ eſt, deſcribere. Quòd ſi tantopere petaſonem averſatur, quin Homerum, ſuum numen, reprehendit, qui tam ſimpliciter rem coquinariam à principibus obitam deſcribit: & quid hoc eſt, niſi μαγείρου. quod inſectatur in Theopompo, φαντασία eſt (22)? - - - Longinus, a ſevere Critic, ridicules him, becauſe in ſpeaking of the preſents made to the King of Perſia by the Aſiatic nations, after the carpets, the purple robes, the gilt tents, the tapeſtry, and inlaid work, he mentions even the ſalted meats of the ſacrifices which had been preſented to the King for the maintenance of his army. Theſe low matters, ſays he, ought either to have been omitted, or to have been mentioned firſt, that there might be a natural riſing from ſmall to great: but in this Longinus appears dull, and ſevere without reaſon. For it was the duty of a faithful and prudent Hiſtorian, after the magnificent preſents of Princes to take notice alſo of the reſpect paid to the King by the meaner ſort, and to deſcribe every thing in the order it happened. But if he has ſuch an extreme averſion to the kitchin, he muſt in courſe find fault with his divine Homer, who has deſcribed with ſo much ſimplicity the cookery of Princes; and what is this but the deſcribing a kitchin which he has objected to Theopompus.’ This ſeems to me to be the moſt plauſible thing that can be ſaid in Theopompus's vindication; but if I was to chuſe, I ſhould rather ſide with Longinus than with Father Cauſſinus. For the faithfulneſs of an Hiſtorian does not oblige him to give a particular account of all the preſents that have been made to a King. But what is alledged againſt Longinus in the laſt part of Father Cauſſinus's objection ſeems to me a home-thruſt. You cannot, ſays he, find fault with Theopompus, without blaming Homer your great deity. It is certain, that Homer has frequently touched more particularly on the kitchin than Theopompus.

[D] He boldly publiſhed diſadvantageous truths, and was not ſparing of his money when an exact inquiry . . . required great expences.] See, below, the remark [H]. I ſhall content myſelf here with thoſe words of Athenæus: Εἰ τις τούτοις ἀπιστεῖ, μαθέτω καὶ παρὰ Θεοπόμπου τοῦ Χίου, ἀνδρὸς φιλαλήθους καὶ πολλὰ χρήματα καταναλώσαντος εἰς τὴν περὶ τῆς ἱστορίας ἐξέτασιν ἀκριβῆ. His fidem ſi quis non adhibeat, diſcat Theopompum Chium veritatis ſtudioſum hominem, & qui hiſtorias exactâ inquiſitione, magno pecuniarum impendio, perſcrutatus eſt (23). - - - If any perſon doubts the truth of theſe things, let him learn them alſo from Theopompus the Chian, a perſon who was a great lover of truth, and who ſpent large ſums of money in ſtrict inquiries after it.

[E] He is blamed for his digreſſions.] The Sophiſt Theon (24) ſays they were ſo long, that it was impoſſible to read them thorough without forgetting the ſubject from which he digreſſed. It was neceſſary to recollect it, which is an unpleaſant thing to thoſe who read a work of that nature. Photius, in order to ſhew how Theopompus launched into matters foreign to his ſubject, gives us this inſtance. His hiſtory of Philip, King of Macedonia, contained fifty-eight books, which were reduced to ſixteen, by retrenching every thing that had no relation to the actions of that Prince. You will ſee this with ſome circumſtances of it in the following words: Πλείσταις μὲν οὖν παρεκβάσεσι παντοδαπῆς ἱστορίας, τοὺς ἱστορικοὺς αὐτοῦ λόγους Θεόπομπος παρατείνει. διὸ καὶ Φίλιππος ὁ πρὸς Ῥωμαίους πολεμήσας, ἐξελὼν ταύτας, καὶ τὰς Φιλίππου συνταξάμενος πράξεις, αἳ σκοπός εἰσι Θεοπόμπῳ εἰς ἑκκαίδεκα βίβλους μόνας: μηδὲν παρ᾽ ἑαυτοῦ προσθεὶς ἢ ἀφελὼν, πλην (ὡς εἴρηται) τῶν παρεκτροπῶν τὰς πάσας ἀπήρτισε. Digreſſionibus itaque variæ hiſtoriæ quàmplurimis, hiſtoricos ſuos implet libros Theopompus. Quamobrem & Philippus, ille qui cum Romanis bellum geſſit, digreſſionibus hiſce ſublatis, & Philippi rebus geſtis, quas Theopompus ſcribendas potiſſimum ſuſceperat, collectis, in ſedecim eas dumtaxat libros (nihil de ſuo addens, aut præter digreſſiones, ut diximus, detrahens) redegit (25). - - - Theopompus therefore ſpins out his various Hiſtories with numerous digreſſions. For which reaſon Philip, he who waged war with the Romans, pruning off theſe digreſſions, and collecting the actions of Philip of Macedon which Theopompus had principally undertaken to write, reduced the whole into ſixteen books only, adding nothing of his own, nor retrenching any thing, as I ſaid before, but meer digreſſions. If you attend to the extracts, which the ſame author gives us (26) of the twelfth book of this Hiſtory of Theopompus, you need not be told how much he delighted in digreſſions. You may judge of it very eaſily from this ſmall ſpecimen. For the reſt, if any thing can make us believe, that the Roman name was ſcarce known to the Greeks in Alexander's time, it is the finding that Theopompus ſays nothing of Rome, except, that it had been taken by the Gauls (27). This city would have afforded him matter for a long digreſſion, had it been ever ſo little known at that time.

Perhaps we may juſtly fear, that Photius's account is ſomewhat fallacious. Theopompus began his Hiſtory with the reign of King Philip, and his principal deſign was to relate the actions of that Prince; but perhaps he propoſed at the ſame time to give an account of the moſt remarkable tranſactions in the other parts of the world during that reign. Conſequently in reality, and according to the intention of the author, that work muſt have been an univerſal Hiſtory of that time, and not that of Philip in particular. What was retrenched therefore, when it was reduced to ſixteen books, ought not to be looked upon as digreſſions, properly ſo called. The wars of Cyprus and of Sicily, and of many other places were retrenched, which perhaps he did not mention occaſionally, and by way of digreſſion only, but as an eſſential part of his deſign. It is impoſſible to decide the matter, ſince we have neither his Preface, nor any other part of his work to conſult. However, I believe, that Photius has carried the thing too far; and if I was to complain of Theopompus's digreſſions, I would not inſiſt, as Theon (28) does, upon his relating many things, wherein neither the King of Macedon, nor any of his ſubjects, had any concern. Can it be denied, that the main deſign of Thuanus was to write the Hiſtory of France? And yet how many things does he relate, that have no relation to the French? I ſhould therefore blame Theopompus for putting a wrong title to his work (29): but if he had acquainted his readers that he propoſed likewiſe to give the Hiſtory of other countries, I ſhould not call his account of the wars of Evagoras, and of the tyrants of Syracuſe, a digreſſion. In order to paſs a right judgment upon his Epiſodes, I would not compare them with Philip or Macedon. I would go no further than this: his twelfth book, for inſtance (30), was deſigned for the wars of Cyprus. He there goes back as far as the ſiege of Troy; he ſpeaks of Agamemnon, and Mopſus the ſoothſayer, &c. Does what he ſays of them carry me too far from Evagoras King of Cyprus? If it be ſo, I blame him; but I ſee no reaſon for any to complain, that Mopſus and Agamemnon carry them too far from the court of Macedon. I am of opinion, that even this reſtriction would not be ſufficient to juſtify that Hiſtorian. Without doubt, he ran too frequently into Epiſodes, wherein he was apt to nod, and forget himſelf. That fault ought to be a new reaſon for us to lament the loſs of his Hiſtory; for ſince the only deſign of his digreſſions was to explain antiquities, to relate the origin of things, and different traditions, how many curious things

(22) Cauſſin. de Eloquentia Sacra & Humana, lib. i, cap. xx, pag. m. 19.

(23) Athen, lib. iii, cap. viii, pag. 85. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, ubi ſupra, pag. 263, praiſes that author for the pains and charges he was at in collecting materials.

(24) Theo, in Progymnaſmatis: I have quoted his words in the remark [E] of the article PHILISTUS.

(25) Photius, Bibl. num. 176, pag. 363.

(26) Id. ibid. pag. 390, 391.

(27) Theopompus ante quem nemo mentionem habuit (de Romanis) urbem duntaxat à Gallis captam dixit. Plinius, lib. iii, cap. v, pag. m. 324.

(28) Theo, in Progymn. cap. iv, pag. 44, 45.

(29) It was intituled, τὰ Φιλιππικά. Res Philipi.

(30) Photius, Bibl. num. 176. pag. 391.

the ſubject [F]. He is alſo blamed for his many fabulous ſtories, and too long ſpeeches [G], and for being too ſatirical [H]. He had a moſt terrible trick put upon ſhould we find in it, that are now unknown to us, and which we could not have been informed of by a conciſe Hiſtory?

[F] He would have been condemned by thoſe critics, who cannot bear any thing in a Hiſtory that is foreign to the ſubject.] How could Theopompus appear before their tribunal, and expect any favour from them, when they have paſſed ſentence upon Tacitus? They lay down, in the firſt place, theſe rules (31), That in the choice of Memoirs, an Hiſtorian ought to give himſelf up entirely to truth, and the diſtinguiſhing of facts; that he ought to renounce his own taſte, and to neglect foreign ornaments, which neither contribute to make things clearer, nor to enlarge our knowledge as to matters concealed .... that his narrations ought to be uninterrupted, his computations exact, and his reflections rare and always ſhort; that it (32) ought to contain the actions of a Prince, and the alterations that happened in his dominions, during his reign; that foreign digreſſions and ſtudied diſcourſes are improper for it, and ought always to be excluded. After this they pretend (33), ‘That if ‘Tacitus were examined according to their (34) rules, ‘one would never imagine that he intended to write ‘an Hiſtory: it is eaſy to obſerve with the learned, ‘that he frequently breaks off the thread of his narration without reſuming it, to have the pleaſure of ‘deſcribing a battle, or of making a ſpeech for his ‘hero. The conſciouſneſs of his excellency in this ‘ſort of performances, makes him ſometimes quit ‘his own country (if I may ſo ſay) to make excurſions into a foreign one, purely for the pleaſure of ‘deſcribing its beauties. In which I think he appears ‘more an Orator than any thing elſe, and as if he ‘did not ſo much deſign to write a faithful Hiſtory, ‘as to exerciſe his eloquence on ſubjects which ſeemed to favour it .... (35) I am therefore of opinion, ‘that Tacitus only touched upon Hiſtory occaſionally; ‘and that his ſole deſign ..... was to exerciſe his ‘eloquence in a various manner...... (36) Indeed ‘every thing in Tacitus beſpeaks his own character, ‘and not that of Hiſtory. He relates few events; ‘he makes long and frequent digreſſions, and his ‘careleſſneſs and affectation are too apparent. He ‘acts the part of an Orator who ſeeks to applaud ‘himſelf, and who turns and manages different facts ‘to his own advantage...... (37) Even in their ‘very tents in the middle of a camp and of an army, ‘dying men make ſpeeches with the ſame exactneſs, ‘and preſence of mind, which a perſon in health ‘would be capable of ſhewing if he was to compoſe ‘them (38) in his ſtudy: ſometimes this fondneſs for ‘expatiating is ſo very predominant, that he does ‘not ſtay till a General of an army is at the head ‘of his troops to harangue them, but makes him ‘write orders like a ſchool-maſter, full of antitheſes ‘and rhetorical figures.’

I believe this judgment upon Tacitus will appear unjuſt and extravagant to good judges; and it had been well for Theopompus, if all thoſe, who criticized him, had been like the author of theſe paſſages in the Anonimiana. He would have been condemned without mercy, and in a very inſulting manner; but he might have anſwered, that his Judges went upon ſtrained maxims, and he might have come off by ſaying, that all Hiſtorians were involved in the ſame cenſure, as well as he, and that conſequently it was falſe and over-nice.

[G] He is alſo blamed for his many fabulous ſtories, and too long ſpeeches.] As to the fables, which Theopompus inſerted in his work, I ſhall alledge Cicero's teſtimony. ‘Intelligo te alias in hiſtoria leges ſervan‘das putare, alias in poemate: quippe quum in illa ‘ad veritatem quæque referantur, in hac ad delecta‘tionem pleraque: quamquam & apud Herodotum ‘patrem hiſtoriæ & apud Theopompum ſint innume‘rabiles fabulæ (39). - - - I know you are of opinion ‘that the rules to be obſerved in Hiſtory, are quite diffe‘rent from thoſe to be obſerved in Poetry: ſince truth is ‘the end of the one, and pleaſure the end of the other: ‘altho' both Herodotus, the father of Hiſtory, and Theo‘pompus abound in fables.’ Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus mentions two abſurd tales of that Hiſtorian. ‘Multas ineptias præ ſe fert ex quo genere illa ſunt quæ ‘de Sileno commemorat qui in Macedonia apparuit, ‘& quæ de dracone ad triremum pugna navali con‘tendente & alia nonnulla iis ſimilia (40). - - - He is ‘full of idle ſtories, of which kind are his accounts of ‘Silenus's apparition in Macedonia, and of the dragon's ‘engaging in a ſea fight, and ſome others of the like ‘ſtamp.’ I cannot tell whether what is ſaid of Silenus's apparition, is the ſame thing with the dialogue of Silenus and Midas. It is to be found in Ælian (41), as taken from Theopompus. This is an adventure, which appears ſo fabulous to Ælian, that he concludes the recital of it with theſe words: Καὶ ταῦτα εἴ τῳ πιστὸς ὁ Χῖος λέγων, πεπιστεύσθω. ἐμοὶ δὲ δεινὸς εἶναι δοκεῖ μυθολόγος, καὶ ἐν τούτοις, καὶ ἐν ἄλλοις δέ. Hæc, ſi cui fide dignus videtur Chius, (i. e. Theopompus) credat. Mihi egregius fabulator tum in his, tum in aliis videtur (42). - - - And theſe may meet with credit among ſuch as can truſt the veracity of the Chian (that is, Theopompus) who relates them. But to me he appears, both in theſe and other things, moſt notoriouſly fabulous. It may be doubted whether Dionyſius had that dialogue in his view, for he ſpeaks only of the fables inſerted in Theopompus's Hiſtory, and Servius informs us, that Theopompus had related that ſtory in a book intituled, Thaumaſia, Wonderful things (43). But this doubt is not very ſtrongly founded; ſince that Hiſtorian might have repeated in his Hiſtory what he had ſaid in another book, or might have adorned his Thaumaſia with ſome pieces of his Hiſtory.

Note, we ought not to reckon among Theopompus's fables his Geographical miſtakes, or the falſities grounded upon ſome relations, which it was difficult for him to rectify (44): in this laſt claſs ought to be placed, the falſities vented by him concerning the Egyptians (45).

Here is a touch upon the length of his harangues: ‘But as for thoſe long ſpeeches, and tedious ha‘rangues, which Theopompus, Ephorus, and Anaxi‘menes, put into the mouths of their Captains, at ‘the head of their ſoldiers juſt ready to engage, we ‘may ſay of them with the Poet,

They're fools who thus the tongue employ,
So very near the enemy (46).

[H] He is alſo blamed .... for being too ſatirical.] Voſſius (47) quotes three authorities for it, that of Cornelius Nepos (48), Lucian, and Joſephus. The latter obſerves, that Theopompus defamed the Athenians (49). The words of the ſecond deſerve to be ſet down. He ſays, that the Hiſtorians, who inſert ſpeeches in their Hiſtories, ought to be ſparing of their praiſes and cenſures, and to remember that they are not at the bar; or otherwiſe that they will be guilty of Theopompus's fault: Τὴν αὐτὴν Θεοπόμπῳ αἰτίαν ἕξεις, φιλαπεχθημόνως κατηγοροῦντι τῶν πλείστων, καὶ διατριβὴν ποιουμένῳ τὸ πρᾶγμα, ὡς κατηγορεῖν μᾶλλον, ἢ ἱστορεῖν τὰ πεπραγμένα. Alioqui in eadem eris culpa qua Theopompus, qui plurimos odioſè nimis accuſat, & eam rem in ſtudium quoddam vertit, ut accuſet magis, quam res geſtas hiſtoriæ tradat (50). - - - - You will commit the ſame fault with Theopompus, who was too ſatirical on ſeveral, and made it his buſineſs rather to write ſatire than Hiſtory. Voſſius to theſe three might alſo have added the authority of Plutarch, who ſays, that Theopompus is more to be credited when he praiſes than when he cenſures. Ὧ μᾶλλον ἐπαινοῦντι πιστεύσειεν ἄν τις, ἢ ψέγοντι. Cui celebranti credas magis quam obterenti (51). Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus takes Theopompus's part on this head: he compares him with Phyſicians, who lance and cauterize the infected parts to the quick, but without hurting thoſe that are ſound. ‘Proinde etiam obtrectator videtur eſſe, dum ‘nonnullos debitis convitiis afficit, & facta virorum ‘illuſtrium non neceſſaria perſtringit: ſimile quiddam ‘faciens ac medici, qui corruptas corporis partes ſe‘cant & urunt, quam profundiſſime cauteria & ſectio‘nes immittentes, non tamen ſanas corporis partes & ‘bene affectas attingunt (52). - - - He alſo ſeems given ‘to ſcandal, while he loads ſome with deſerved re‘proaches, and ſpares not the ſlips of the greateſt per‘ſons:

(31) Anonimiana, pag. 13.

(32) This it relates to the word hiſtory, which is not to be found nearer than 5 or 6 periods before. This ſhews a great negligence of the rules of Grammar.

(33) Ibid. pag. 14, 15.

(34) It ſhould have been ſaid theſe.

(35) Anonimiana, pag. 22.

(36) Ibid. p. 23.

(37) Ibid. p. 24.

(38) There is here a ſoleciſm in the French original.

(39) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. i, circa init. fol. m. 328, C.

(40) Dionyſ. Halicarn. ubi ſupra, in fine, pag. m. 264.

(41) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. iii, cap. xviii, pag. m. 200. See Caſaubon upon Strabo, lib. vii, pag. m. 112.

(42) Id. ibid.

(43) Servius in Virgil. Eclog. VI, ver. 13, & 26.

(44) See Strabo, lib. vii, p. 219.

(45) See Diodorus Siculus, lib. i, cap. xxxvii.

(46) Plutarch. in Præceptis Reip. gerendæ, p. 803. Amyot's tranſlation.

(47) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 33.

(48) Theopompus . . . & Timæus qui quidem duo maledicentiſſimi neſcio quo modo in illo uno laudando (Alcibiade) conſenſerunt. Cornel. Nepos, in Alcibiade, cap. xi.

(49) Joſephus, lib. i, contra Apionem.

(50) Lucianus, veræ Hiſtoriæ, lib. i, pag. m. 705, Tom. i.

(51) Plut. in Lyſandro, ſub fin. pag. 450, E.

(52) Dion. Halicarn. ubi ſupra, pag. 264.

upon him which was by publiſhing in his name, and in a ſtyle altogether like his, a Hiſtory which reflected upon the moſt conſiderable republics of Greece [I]. We have none of his books remaining, which is a great loſs [K]; for the character which a great Critic gives of them (f), is ſufficient to make us lament the loſs of them. He ſays, that Theopompus inquired into the ſecret cauſes of actions, and into the tempers and motives of thoſe who performed them; that he was very lucky in his conjecture (g), and unmaſked thoſe who concealed real vices under the appearance of virtues (h): ſo that his Hiſtory was a tribunal where every man's conduct was examined with all the exactneſs aſcribed by the Poets to the infernal judges. I omit the other high encomiums beſtowed upon him by this great Critic. You will ſee in the remark [C], what judgment the Critics have paſſed on Theopompus's ſtyle. What has been quoted out of his works by Athenæus is enough to make the loſs of them regretted. It has been obſerved, that there were certain things no where to be found but in that author (i). All that I can ſay concerning his life is only this. He fled from Chio with his father, who was convicted of favouring the intereſts of the Lacedemonians (k). He was re-eſtabliſhed in his country after the death of his father, by virtue of a letter, which Alexander wrote to procure his

(f) Dionyſ. Halicarn. Epiſt. ad Pompeium, pag. 263, 264. See alſo pag. 191.

(g) Idem, pag. 191.

(h) Idem, pag. 263.

(i) Plutarch. in Ageſilao, pag. 614, C.

(k) Photius, in Biblioth. num. 176.

‘ ſons: imitating in ſome meaſure the practice of Phyſicians, who uſe inciſions and cauteries on the corrupted parts of the body, and extend them to very great depths, but yet do no injury to thoſe parts of the body that are ſound and in right order. Note, that the ſlanders of Theopompus did not ſpare the divine Plato (53): this is not to be wondered at, ſince they fell ſo ſeverely upon the perſon of Philip of Macedon. The deſcription he gave of the court of that Prince, contains more abominations (54) than were aſcribed to that of Henry III, King of France, by the anonymous writers of libels. Some will alſo have it, that after he had very much praiſed Alexander the Great, he recanted by ſome writings. ‘ Pulſus è patria quum ſupplex in Dianæ Epheſiæ templum confugiſſet multa contra Chios ſcripſit ad Alexandrum in quibus illum laudavit: ſed poſtea παλινῳδίαν cecinit. Nam dicitur in eundem poſtea ſcripſiſſe quamvis quod ſcripſit in manus hominum non videatur veniſſe (55). - - - Being baniſhed his country, and flying for refuge into the temple of Diana at Epheſus, he wrote to Alexander, condemning the Chians, and commending him: but he afterwards recanted. For he is ſaid afterwards to have written againſt him, tho' that piece does not ſeem to have been made public.' The ſharp ſtile of Theopompus is not ill deſcribed in the following words of Cicero: ‘ ἀνέκδοτα quæ tibi uni legantur, Theopompino genere aut etiam aſperiore multo pangentur (56). - - - - The ſecret Hiſtory that would pleaſe you only, ſhould be written in Theopompus's ſtile, or even in a ſharper.' That writer began to ſet up for a Critic in the very Preface of his Hiſtory, for he there cenſured the other Hiſtorians (57).

If what I have read in an Epiſtle Dedicatory be true, namely, that King Philip was very liberal to Theopompus, it muſt be acknowledged that he made an ill application of his money. ‘ Celebratur multorum literis ac libris principum quorundam benignitas in viros literatos, ut Dionyſii in Platonem, Philippi in Theopompum, Alexandri in Ariſtotelem, Severi in Oppianum (58). - - - A great many authors take notice of the liberality of Princes to learned men, as of Dionyſius to Plato, of Philip to Theopompus, of Alexander to Ariſtotle, and of Severus to Oppian.' I ſhould eaſily believe, that Philip made ſome preſents to Theopompus; for it is certain, Theopompus compoſed a Panegyric upon that King; and that, among other praiſes, he beſtowed this upon him, That monarch needs only go on as he has begun, to make himſelf maſter of all Europe. Καὶ ὡς Θεόπομπος ἐν τῷ Φιλίππου ἐγκωμίῳ. ὅτι εἰ βουληθείη Φίλιππος τοῖς αὐτοῖς ἐπιτηδεύμασιν ἐμμεῖναι, καὶ τῆς Εὐρώπης πάσης βασιλεύσει. Et quemadmodum in Philippi Laudatione Theopompus, Philippum, ſi pergere, ut inſtituiſſet, ſuique eſſe ſimilis vellet, totius Europæ imperio mox potiturum (59). Theon, from whom I borrow thoſe words, ſays in another place (60), that Theopompus's Panegyrics upon Philip and Alexander were ſtill extant. Thoſe two pieces without doubt made no part of his Hiſtory, but were written by him in the capacity of an Orator; and though he had been rewarded for them, he changed his note in his Hiſtory, and ſpoke ill of the ſame Prince, whom he had ſo much commended. The ſcenes varied: the Orator had acted his part; the Hiſtorian ſucceeded him and maintained his character. We ought not to imagine, that the diſcourſes of a Panegyriſt ſhould influence either his converſation, or the moral and hiſtorical books he writes. This diſtinction may be obſerved even at this day. One who on a ſolemn day, as for inſtance, when prizes are diſtributed, beſtows noble and magnificent encomiums, will not ſpare his cenſures ſitting by the fire-ſide; and even though he enjoys ſtill his penſion, he will ſay many unacceptable things, if he turns Hiſtorian. I do not ſay that every body acts in this manner. There are but too many, who prove as great flatterers under the character of an Hiſtorian, as under that of an Orator. But Theopompus and ſome others were not of this ſtamp.

(53) Id. ibid. pag. 252. Athen. lib. xi, ſub fin. pag. 508.

(54) See Athenæus, lib. vi, pag. 260.

(55) Corradus, in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 120.

(56) Cicero, Epiſt. VI, lib. ii, ad Atticum, pag. m. 209.

(57) Dionyſ. Halicarn. in Præfat. Hiſt.

(58) Franciſc. Duarenus, Epiſt. ad Margaritam Valeſiam Henrici II ſororem præfixa Commentario in Tit. ſoluto matrimonio.

(59) Theo, in Progymn. cap. viii, pag. 103.

(60) Theo, ibid. cap. ii, pag. 19.

[I] He had a moſt terrible trick put upon him, which was by publiſhing in his name, and in a ſtile . . . . . a Hiſtory, which reflected upon the moſt conſiderable republics of Greece.] Anaximenes, his enemy, put that trick upon him. It is related by Pauſanias, who, if I am not miſtaken, is the only author that mentions it. Theſe are his words: Φαίνεται δὲ καὶ ἄνδρα ὁ Ἀναξιμένης ἐχθρὸν οὐκ ἀμαθέστατα, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐπιφθονώτατα ἀμυνάμενος· Ἐπεφύκει μὲν αὐτὸς σοφιστὴς, καὶ σοφιστῶν λόγους μιμεῖσθαι. ὡς δέ οἱ διαφορὰ ἐς Θεόπομπον ἐγεγόνει τὸν Δαμασιστράτου, γράφει βιβλίον ἐς Ἀθηναίους, καὶ ἐπὶ Λακεδαιμονίους ὁμοῦ καὶ Θηβαίους συγγραφὴν λοίδορον. ὡς δὲ ἦν ἐς τὸ ἀκριβέστατον αὐτῷ μεμιμημένα, ἐπιγράψας τοῦ Θεοπόμπου τὸ ὄνομα τῷ βιβλίῳ, διέπεμπεν ἐς τὰς πόλεις. καὶ αὐτός τε συγγεγραφὼς ἦν, καὶ τὸ ἔχθος τὸ ἐς Θεόπομπον ἀνὰ πᾶσαν τὴν Ἑλλάδα ἐπηύξετο. Idem etiam Anaximenes inimicum ſuum non minus vafre quam invidioſe ultus dicitur. Nam qui ingenio ſophiſta eſſet, quum ſophiſtarum orationem aptiſſime imitaretur, ſuſcepta cum Theopompo Damaſiſtrati filio ſimultate, hiſtoriam conſcripſit maledictorum in Athenienſes, Lacedæmonios, & Thebanos pleniſſimam. Ad unguem vero quum Theopompi ſtylum expreſſiſſet, ſuppoſito ejus nomine, per Græciæ civitates librum divulgandum curavit: quæ res Theopompo magnam apud omnes plane Græcos invidiam concitavit (61). - - - But Anaximenes appears to have revenged himſelf on his enemy, not only very dextrouſly, but alſo very invidiouſly. For he was both a Sophiſt himſelf, and an excellent imitator of others. So that having a difference with Theopompus, the ſon of Damaſiſtratus, he wrote a book which was a ſevere libel upon the Athenians, the Lacedemonians, and the Thebans. And as he had imitated the ſtile of Theopompus to the greateſt exactneſs, he put Theopompus's name to it, and diſperſed it through thoſe cities. By this contrivance he raiſed a great reſentment againſt Theopompus throughout all Greece.

[K] We have none of his books remaining which is a great loſs.] He publiſhed a great number of Orations (62), and ſeveral letters (63). He wrote one to Alexander (64), and another to the inhabitants of Chio (65), which are quoted by Athenæus. He alſo wrote ſome advices to that Prince (66). His treatiſe περὶ τῶν συληθέντων ἐκ Δελφῶν χρημάτων: de rebus quæ ſacrilegio ex Delphis ſurreptæ ſunt (67); and that κατὰ τῆς Πλάτωνος διατριβῆς: de exercitationibus Platonis (68), are quoted by the ſame author. His diſſertation περὶ εὐσεβείας, de Pietate, is quoted by the ſcholiaſt upon Ariſtophanes (69). Others cite his θαυμάσια, admiranda (70); but he acquired his reputation principally by two Hiſtories. One was that of (61) Pauſan. lib. vi, pag. 496, Edit. 1696.

(62) Photius, in Biblioth. num. 170, pag. 392.

(63) Dionyſ. Halicarn. Epiſt. ad Pompeium, in fine.

(64) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 595.

(65) Id. ibid. pag. 586.

(66) Idem, lib. iii, pag. 230.

(67) Id. lib. xiii, pag. 604.

(68) Id. lib. xi, pag. 508.

(69) Schol. Ariſt. in Aves.

(70) Apolloſſius, Hiſt. commentit. cap. x. Laërtius, in Epimenide & Pherecyde. Servius, ubi ſupra.

his return: he was then forty-ſix years of age. He found himſelf obliged, after the death of Alexander, to wander up and down like a fugitive; and going into Egypt, he not only found no refuge there, but would have loſt his life had not his friends interceeded for him with King Ptolemy, who deſigned to put him to death, under pretence of his being a perſon of too meddleſome a temper (l). He was (m) an eye-witneſs of ſeveral events related by him, and he inſinuated himſelf into the favour of many perſons, who were Generals of armies, or miniſters of ſtate: he procured this acceſs as a thing of great importance to the perfection of his work. He had ſome diſputes with his countryman Theocritus about the government of the town (n). I do not find that he deſerved the title of a Peripatetic Philoſopher which Grotius has beſtowed upon him [L]. I ſhall ſay nothing of the puniſhment mentioned by Ariſteus: Moreri ſpeaks ſufficiently of it. I ſhall conclude by obſerving that Theopompus was accuſed of being a plagiary [M].

of Greece (71) in twelve books, containing the tranſactions of ſeventeen years, beginning where Thucydides left off. It ended with the ſea-fight at Cnidus. The other was intituled Φιλιππικὰ, becauſe it was deſigned to record the reign of Philip King of Macedon. It contained fifty-eight books, whereof the ſixth, ſeventh, ninth, twentieth and thirtieth, had been loſt for a long time (72), when Photius read the reſt. He gives us ſome extracts of the twelfth, though Menophauts, an antient author, thought it was loſt. Diodorus Siculus (73), and the anonymous author, who deſcribed the Olympiads, mention the loſs of five books of Theopompus. It would be in vain to alledge againſt them, that the fifty-fifth and fifty-ſeventh books are quoted by Stephanus Byzantinus, and the fifty ſixth by Athenæus. Thoſe who raiſe this objection, would not urge it, if they knew what Photius obſerves, that almoſt all the five books, then loſt, were nearer the beginning than the end of the work (74).

Voſſius is miſtaken when he ſays, that Harpocration quotes a letter of Theopompus to Tiſamenes (75). This is not true: Harpocration quotes a dramatic piece written by Theopompus, the comic Poet, and intituled Tiſamenes (76).

[L] The title of a peripatetic Philoſopher, beſtowed upon him by Grotius.] The reſurrection of a dead body, ſays he, ought not to be accounted an impoſſible thing, ſince ſome learned men, Zoroaſter among the Chaldeans, and almoſt all the Stoics, and Theopompus among the Peripatetics, believed the poſſibility of it, and that it would actually happen. Conſult his text in the ſecond book of his treatiſe de Veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ (77). This is his note concerning Theopompus (78): De quo Diogenes Laërtius initio libri (79). Καὶ Θεόπομπος ἐν τῇ ὀγδοῇ τῶν Φιλιππικῶν ὃς καὶ ἀναβιώσεσθαι κατὰ τοὺς μάγους φησὶ τοὺς ἀνθρώπους καὶ ἔσεσθαι ἀθανάτους, καὶ τὰ ὄντα ταῖς αὐταῖς διακλήσεσι διαμενεῖν. Theopompus verò etiam octavo Philippicorum, qui revicturos homines ex magorum ſententia tradit, immortaleſque futuros, & omnia in ſuis iiſdem ſemper manſura nominibus. - - - And Theopompus in the eighth book of his Philippics, who ſays that, according to the Magi, men are to riſe again, and become immortal, and that all Beings are to remain perpetually under the ſame denominations. He ſpeaks here of Theopompus the Hiſtorian, who makes the ſubject of this article. Now I do not remember ever to have read, that he was placed in the number of Philoſophers; and I think he was too proud to become the diſciple of Ariſtotle at an age ſo far advanced. But even though this fault of Grotius could be excuſed, he would be liable to juſt cenſure upon another account. For what he quotes out of Diogenes Laërtius proves only that Theopompus mentioned in his Hiſtory the opinion of the Magi, concerning the reſurrection. Let us ſuppoſe Theopompus to have been a very illuſtrious Peripatetic, will it follow from his paſſage, alledged by Diogenes Laërtius, that a famous diſciple of the great Ariſtotle believed, that men would riſe again? Do Hiſtorians believe whatever they relate? If Mr de Cordemoi, who was a Carteſian, had inſerted in his Hiſtory of France a doctrine of the antient Druids, might it be concluded from thence, that this doctrine was believed among the Carteſians? This is certainly a very weak paſſage in the learned commentary, which Grotius added to his excellent book concerning the truth of the Chriſtian Religion.

[M] Theopompus was accuſed of being a Plagiary.] It is pretended (80), that he inſerted word for word in the eleventh book of his Φιλιππικὰ, a long paſſage out of an oration of Iſocrates; that upon other occaſions, in order to hide his robberies, he changed the ſcene and the names of the perſons; that, for inſtance, he related, that Pherecydes having drunk of the water of a well in a town of Syria, foretold an earthquake which happened three days after; and that he took that courſe becauſe he was ſenſible, that if he had mentioned that earthquake, as a thing foretold by Pythagoras, in the town of Metapontum, his Plagiariſm muſt have been diſcovered, and his readers would have known that he had it from a book of Andron (81). It is added, that he ſtole ſeveral things from Xenophon, and ſpoiled them: for reſolving to inſert in the eleventh book of his Hiſtory of Greece the conference of Pharnabazus and Ageſilaus, which Xenophon had ſo well deſcribed, he deprived it of its beauty. He would not uſe the words of the author he ſtole it from, for two reaſons, the one was with a view to conceal his theft, the other out of a deſire to ſhew how well he could flouriſh upon ſo fine a ſubject; but he came off wretchedly: his narration was languid, and remarkable only for its heavineſs and dullneſs, whereas that of Xenophon was full of vivacity. Τὰ γοῦν περὶ τῆς Φαρναβάζου πρὸς Ἀγησίλαον συνόδου ..... εἰς τὴς ἐνδεκάτην τῶν Ἑλληνικῶν μεταθεὶς ὁ Θεόπομπος, ἀργά τε καὶ ἀκίνητα πεποίηκε καὶ ἄπρακτα. λόγου γὰρ δύναμιν, καὶ διὰ τὴν κλοπὴν, ἐξεργασίαν ἐμβάλλειν, καὶ ἐπιδείκνυσθαι σπουδάζων, βραδὺς καὶ μέλλων, καὶ ἀναβαλλομένῳ ἐοικὼς φαίνεται, καὶ τὸ ἔμψυχον καὶ ἐνεργὸν τὸ Ξενοφῶντος διαφθείρων: Nam illum ſane Pharnabazi cum Ageſilao congreſſum .... in Græcarum hiſtoriarum undecimum tranſtulit Theopompus: verum ita quidem, ut omnia ſine vi, ſine motu, habere prorſus ac jacere videantur. Dum enim is, ut plagium diſſimulet, dicendi facultatem oſtentare geſtit, & elaboratæ dictionis cultum aſſuere, tardus, cunctabundus, ac procraſtinanti ſimilis videtur, adeoque vivam illam ac ſpirantem Xenophontis efficacitatem elidit (82). Laſtly, we are told (83) of a book intituled Ἰχνευταί, Indagatores, that is the Inquiſitors, which contained many ſuch things concerning Theopompus.

We muſt obſerve, by the by, that if Theopompus falſified what he ſtole from Andron, it affords us an example of what is ſaid, that falſhood makes a greater progreſs than truth. Many grave writers aſcribe the prediction to Pherecydes (84).

We muſt not forget, that Porphyrius accuſes him alſo of preferring himſelf to Iſocrates, and of boaſting that he had got the better of him in a trial of eloquence upon Mauſolus's tomb. Καίτοι ὑπερφρονεῖ τὸν Ισοκράτην καὶ νενικῆσθαι ὑφ' ἑαυτοῦ λέγει, καὶ τὸν ἐπὶ Μαυσωλῷ ἀγῶνα, τὸν διδάσκαλον. Iſocratem interea deſpicit, eoque certamine, quod in Mauſoli honorem inſtitutum eſt, victum abs ſeſe Magiſtrum gloriatur (85). - - - And he deſpiſed Iſocrates, and boaſted that he had conquered his maſter at his own weapons at the tomb of Mauſolus. Photius ought to have mentioned this particular among thoſe of the ſame nature related by him. I cannot tell why he has omitted it. He ſays, Theopompus himſelf declares, that Iſocrates, Theodectus, Naucrates, and himſelf, were at that time the four greateſt Orators in Greece (86), that Iſocrates and Theodectus being poor, compoſed Orations for money, and kept ſchool for a livelihood, but that he and Naucrates, having wherewithal to live handſomely, ſpent all their leiſure time in ſtudy. Note, that the tranſlator does not well expreſs the ſenſe of theſe words: καὶ ὡς οὐκ ἂν εἴη αὐτῷ παράλογον, ἀντιποιουμένῳ τῶν πρωτείων (87). He pretends the meaning of it is, It ought not to be thought ſtrange that I ſhould place

myſelf

(l) Ὡς πολυπράγμονα ἀνελεῖν ἐθελῆσαι. Velut nimis curioſum de medio tollere voluiſſe. Id. ibid.

(m) Dionyſ. Halicarn. Epiſt. ad Pompeium, pag. 263.

(n) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 444. See alſo Athenæus, book vi, pag. 230.

(71) Anonym. in Deſcript. Olymp apud Voſſium, ubi ſupra, pag. 32.

(72) Photius, Bibl. num. 176, pag. 389.

(73) Diodorus Siculus, lib. xvi, cap. iii.

(74) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Philoſ. pag. 46, raiſes it.

(75) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Grecis, pag. 31.

(76) See Mauſſac's Notes upon Harpocration, voce Καταλήξ.

(77) Pag. m. 64, 65.

(78) Hugo Grotius, in Annotatis ad Librum II, de Veritate Relig. Chriſt. pag. m. 381.

(79) It is at pag. 7, of the Amſterdam edition, 1692.

(80) Porphyrius, lib. i, τῆς Φιλολογίας ἀκροάσεως de erudito auditu, apud Euſebium, Præpar. Evangel. lib. x, cap. iii, pag. m. 464.

(81) Who collected Pythagoras's predictions in a book intituled Tripos. Id. ibid.

(82) Porphyrius, ubi ſupra, pag. 465.

(83) Id. ibid. pag. 467.

(84) Cicero, lib. i, ii, de Divinat. Plinius, lib. ii, cap. lxxix. Apollonius Hiſt. memor. lib. v. Diogen. Laërt. lib. i, num. 116.

(85) Porphyrius, ubi ſupra, pag. 464.

(86) Τούτους ἅμα αὐτῷ τὰ πρωτεῖα τῆς ἐν λόγοις παιδείας ἔχειν ἐν τοῖς Ἕλλησιν. Hos ſecum in dicendi facultate principatum in Græcia tenuiſſe. Photius Bibl. num. 176, pag. 392.

(87) Id. ibid.

myſelf in the firſt rank (88). Theopompus was not ſo proud; he only ſays, that he may reckon himſelf among the firſt without being guilty of raſhneſs. This is a ſufficient piece of vanity, and needs not be increaſed by an unfaithful tranſlation.

(88) Neque vero temere ſe aut præter rationem primas ſibi vindicare.

THERON (VITAL) a French Jeſuit, was born at Limoux in Languedoc in the year 1572. He turned Jeſuit in 1587. He taught Rhetoric, Philoſophy, and Moral Divinity, and profeſſed the fourth vow. He applied himſelf to preaching for the ſpace of fifty years and this he did in the moſt conſiderable towns of France. He was rector of the college of Montauban, and provincial of the province of Toulouſe (a). He publiſhed at ſeveral times a great many Latin verſes, that were very much eſteemed, and continued theſe compoſitions even in his old age, when it did not appear that his poetical vein was in the leaſt impaired. Balzac commended him mightily for it [A]. He was miſtaken as to the age he aſcribed to him [B]. This Jeſuit died at Toulouſe the twenty-fifth of February 1657 (b).

The Chevalier Theron, his nephew, captain in the regiment of Lanoy, and ſon of a counſellor in the parliament of Toulouſe (c), is a good French Poet. In the Mercure Galant (d) may be ſeen a ſmall poem of his compoſing.

(a) Taken from Sotuel, in Bibl. Scriptor. Societatis Jeſu, pag. 784.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Merc. Galant, January 1703, pag. 112.

(d) Ibid.

[A] When it did not appear that his poetical vein was in the leaſt impaired. Balzac commended him mightily for it.] Here follow ſome thoughts of Balzac: they are taken from a letter written by him to Father Theron, the fourth of March 1643. The winters of Naples, full of light, and crowned with roſes, give me a lively image of your old age. That of Maſſiniſſa was not ſo briſk and vigorous; and the child he got at fourſcore years of age was not a production comparable to the Poem you have compoſed at ſeventy-five. This ſhews, that the fire which deſcends from Heaven, by way of Inſpiration, is not extinguiſhed by the abatement of natural heat. And if art has attained the invention of inextinguiſhable lamps, the Maſter of Art may no doubt preſerve in its full force the luminous part of our mind, and continue the ardour and vivacity of its flights. . . . . . I find myſelf obliged to contradict a wrong ſaying, which I advanced formerly as an eternal truth, That there is no ſuch thing as a fine old age. I beg pardon for this raſh ſaying. I was not then acquainted with your Muſe, which gives the lie to my propoſition, and demoliſhes a proverb I expected to have made current. The old age of your Muſe is not the decay, but the confirmation of her beauty. . . . . . Had I the courage of the authors of your country, I ſhould ſay a great deal more upon it: I would ſay, at leaſt, of this admirable old lady, that, at the age of Hecuba, ſhe has as many lovers as Helena had in the flower of her youth. I could name an infinite number, who burn in Paris, and ſigh on this ſide of the Loire (1). In order to give ſome weight to thoſe encomiums, I muſt obſerve, that Balzac praiſed Father Theron very much in the letters he addreſſed to his other correſpondents. This is what he wrote to his friend Chapelain. ‘ Since you have ‘ the curioſity to know the character of Father Theron, whom I thought you had known much better ‘ than I do, I muſt tell you that he is a Poet above ‘ ſeventy-five years old. Soon after the King's birth ‘ he made two Poems in ſhort verſes, which I take ‘ to be Glyconick; and the late King, on the favourable character he had received of them, ordered ‘ Motin to tranſlate them. They are intituled, The ‘ Crowns, and the Dauphins, and have been printed ‘ at Paris in Latin and French. They are two valuable pieces, and I am ſure you will be pleaſed with ‘ them. I have ſeen ſome other things of his, wherein I have obſerved an excellent genius; but I know ‘ at the ſame time that he is lazy, and cares the leaſt ‘ of any man alive to employ his talent (2).’ Mr Baillet does not ſo much as mention this Poet.

[B] Balzac . . . . . was miſtaken as to the age he aſcribed to him.] We have juſt now ſeen, that he ſaid on the 15th of February 1641, that Father Theron was then above ſeventy-five years old. At this rate that Jeſuit muſt have been born in 1566. But this is falſe; for Alegambe and Southwell make him but fifteen years of age when he was admitted among the Jeſuits in the year 1587. Such miſtakes are commonly diſobliging; for few people like to be accounted older than they are. I do not except even thoſe who do not intend to marry. I know very well that ſome old men, who, as it was ſaid of the firſt Duke d'Epernon, have paſſed the age of dying, are as willing to make themſelves five or ſix years older than they are, as they were formerly deſirous to make themſelves younger by ſo many years. Vanity finds its account in this, ſince it is a more wonderful thing that a man of ninety or a hundred years ſhould ſtill have ſome vigour, than if he enjoyed his health pretty well at eighty or eighty-five years of age. Other old men are well pleaſed with a right computation; they are afraid that a wrong reckoning, which brings them nearer than it ought to the end of their race, will make them leſs reſpected. However it be, Balzac's miſreckoning was of another nature: it was not diſobliging, but rather in compliment to Father Theron; a preſent of ſix years inſpired a greater admiration of his Poetry; the older he was thought to be, the more he was admired for the ſprightlineſs of his verſes. However I am of opinion Balzac ſpoke as he thought.

(1) Balzac, Lettres Choiſies, Part. ii, book. i, Letter xvii, pag. m. 313.

(2) Idem, Lettres à Chapelain, book vi, Letter v, p. m. 283, 284. It is dated the 15th of February 1641.

THESMOPHORIA. So they called the feſtivals celebrated in honour of Ceres, conſidered as a Law-giver [A]; for there were other feſtivals conſecrated to her, as [A] Ceres conſidered as a Law-giver.] According to the opinion of the Antients, mankind was indebted to this goddeſs for two great benefactions. She taught them ſowing and reaping, and gave them laws.

Prima Ceres unco glebam dimovit aratro:
Prima dedit fruges, alimentaque mitia terris:
Prima dedit leges. Cereris ſumus omnia munus (1).

Firſt Ceres taught the lab'ring hind to plow
The pregnant earth, and quickning ſeed to ſow.
She firſt for man did wholſome food provide,
And with juſt laws the wicked world ſupply'd:
All good from her deriv'd. . . . .

Conſult the commentators on the words of Virgil; Mactant lectas de more bidentes Legiferæ Cereri (2). It is therefore very probable that two ſorts of feaſts were dedicated to her, and that the Theſmophoria were principally inſtituted with regard to her character of Law-giver (3). The word itſelf lead us to this opinion; for, according to Heſychius, ϑεσμὸς ſignifies a divine law, νόμος ϑεῖος. ‘ Sacra ipſius Theſmophoria, ‘ id eſt, legum latio vocatur. - - - - Her feaſt Theſmo- ‘ phoria, ſo called from her giving of laws.’ Theſe are the words of Servius on the mentioned paſſage of Virgil; but this did not hinder the practice of ſome ceremonies relating to her character of inventreſs of reaping. Pauſanias (4), and one of Gruterus's inſcriptions (5) teſtify, thatone of her epithets was ϑεσμοφόρος. For the reſt, the following paſſage may ſerve as a proof of what is advanced in the text of this article; that the ſacred books were carried by virgins of unſpotted reputation

(1) Ovid. Metam. lib. v, Fab. vi, ver. 341.

(2) Virgil, Æn. lib. iv, ver. 58.

(3) See Caſtellanus de Feſtis Græcor. p. 168.

(4) Pauſan. lib. x, pag. 352.

(5) Gruteri, Inſcript. pag. 309.

as inventreſs of the products of the earth. The men were not allowed to be preſent at the Theſmophoria; and only women of the better rank, who are free, were admitted to celebrate them (a). They went in a proceſſion at Eleuſis, cauſing the ſacred books to be publickly carried by virgins of unſpotted reputation (b). This feaſt laſted three or four days, ſome ſay it continued nine, the women were not permitted to lie with their huſbands till it was over. It is pretended, that to render this abſtinence the more ſupportable, they lay upon certain leaves which had a refrigerating virtue [B]. But it is very ſtrange, tation. Πάρθενοι γυναῖκες, καὶ τὸν βίον σεμναὶ, κατὰ τὴν ἡμέραν τῆς τελετῆς, τὰς νομίμους βίϐλους καὶ ἱερὰς ὑπὲρ τῶν κορυφῶν αὐτῶν ἀνετίθεσαν καὶ ὡσανεὶ λιτανεύουσαι ἐπήρχοντο εἰς Ἐλευσῖνα. Virgines mulieres, vitæque honeſtæ; quæ per ſolennitatis diem legales libros & ſacros vertice geſtantes, tanquam ſupplicantes Eleuſinem contendebant (6). - - - Virgins of an upright life, during the ceremonies, carried the ſacred books of laws upon their head, and came to Ceres in a praying poſture.

[B] To render this abſtinence the more ſupportable (7) . . . . they lay upon certain leaves which had a refrigerating virtue.] Ovid is ſilent as to this, and only mentions the cuſtom of their ſeparation from their huſbands.

Feſta piæ Cereris celebrabant annua matres
Illa, quibus nivea velatæ corpora veſte
Primitias frugum dant ſpicea ſerta ſuarum:
Perque novem noctes Venerem tactuſque viriles
In vetitis numerant (8).

To Ceres now drew nigh the annual feaſt,
At which the matrons in white ſtoles were dreſs'd.
Twiſted in wreaths, the bring they yellow grain,
The firſt ripe products of the grateful plain;
And nine forbidden nights from nuptial joys abſtain.

I am not at all ſurpriſed at his omiſſion of this circumſtance, becauſe it was no way pertinent to his deſign. His ſilence here therefore is of no conſequence. Of all the ſeveral authors I could alledge, I ſhall inſtance only Pliny and the Scholiaſt on Theocritus. 'Græci 'lygon vocant, alii agnon, quoniam matronæ Theſ'mophoriis Athenienſium caſtitatem cuſtodientes, his 'foliis cubitus ſibi ſternunt (9). - - - The Greeks call it 'Lygos, others Agnos, becauſe the matrons, in the 'Athenian feſtival, called Theſmophoria, in order to 'preſerve themſelves chaſte, uſe to lie upon thoſe leaves.' Theſe are the words of Pliny, ſpeaking of the vitex, which our Botaniſts call Agnus Caſtus. Where, note, by the way, that they have changed an epithet into a proper name. The Greeks pretended, that thoſe who eat or drank this plant, or laid it under them in their beds, would thereby be preſerved from impurity; and therefore gave it the epithet of ἄγνος, from the word ἁγνὸς, which ſignifies chaſte. This word is now become the proper name of the word vitex, tho' not alone, but with the Latin word of the ſame ſignification. As to the ſcholiaſt on Theocritus, theſe are his words: Τὴν κονύζαν, κνύζαν εἶπεν. ἔςι φυτὸν ψυκτικώτατον. ἔνθεν καὶ ἐν τοῖς θεσμοφορίοις ὑποστρωννύουσι τὸ φυτὸν τὴν θερμότητα τὴν κατὰ τὰ Ἀφροδίσια ἐκκόπτοντες. Conyzam dixit Cnyzam. Planta refrigerandi ſumma vi pollens, quam propterea in Theſmophoriis lecto ſubſternunt, calorem ad res venereas extirpantes (10). - - - Conyza he called Cnyza. It is a moſt refrigerating plant. Hence, in the Theſmophoria, they laid this plant under them to prevent venereal inclinations. It ought to be obſerved, that he ſpeaks of conyza or cunilago, a plant of a different ſpecies from that mentioned by Pliny. And alſo upon what occaſion this remark was made; which was to explain a place in Theocritus, where a ſhepherd is introduced telling what he would do, in caſe his dear friend ſhould make a proſperous voyage to Mitylene. 'I 'will place, ſays he, a crown of flowers on my head, 'I will drink of the beſt wine, and ſtrew herbs on 'my bed up to my elbows.'

Χ' ἁ ςιϐὰς ἐσσεῖται πεπυκασμένα ἔς τ' ἐπὶ
πᾶχυν
Κνύζατ' ἀσφοδέλῳτε πολυγνάμπτῳτε σελίνῳ.

Et thorus denſatus erit ad cubitum uſque
Cnyza, aſphodelo & flexibili apio (11).

This, recited by the ſcholiaſt, was one of the herbs ſtrewed on the womens beds during the Theſmophorian rites in order to preſerve them from incontinency. It will be granted me that thoſe who by ſplendid feaſting, and ſuch other ſigns of joy on a feſtival, rejoice that their vows are accompliſhed, have no recourſe to thoſe remedies which ſtifle all amorous thoughts. It is not therefore likely that the cunilago had any ſuch effect; and the ſcholiaſt of Theocritus advances a thing that is contradicted by the very text on which he comments. Perhaps he would not be in the wrong to affirm, that the ſtrewing of leaves on the womens beds during the Theſmophoria, was only one of the ceremonies of that feſtival. It is no uncommon thing in great ſolemnities to ſtrew the ſtreets with flowers and leaves. Feſtoons are placed on the gates; and ſometimes the chambers participate of theſe ornaments: nor is it unlikely that the Greeks might extend this cuſtom to the beds of thoſe who celebrated the feſtival of Ceres. In proceſs of time ſome inquiſitive perſons, fond of diſcovering myſteries, at laſt imagined, that ſage antiquity had found this to be a remedy againſt incontinency. Nay, I cannot tell whether the wits and ſatiriſts were not the inventors of this ſuppoſition, which others a long time after might deliver ſeriouſly, and as a real fact. It is certain, a more diſobliging reaſon for this cuſtom could not have been advanced; nor can I imagine the Grecian women were tame enough to ſubmit to a remedy which would ſo publickly proclaim their laſciviouſneſs. Their conſent was not waited for, ſome will ſay: but I might anſwer, did Greece ever put the ſex on ſuch a foot, as to ſubject them to ſhameful cuſtoms. It is not eaſy to find in the whole map of the world, one corner of the earth, where things are eſtabliſhed on this foot; and if we would find ſuch a place, we ought not to look for it in Attica, Peloponneſus, or the iſles of the Ægean ſea. In order to make this probable, it ſhould be ſaid, that the honour of the women was not in the leaſt concerned in theſe ſtrewings of Agnus Caſtus. But who will believe it? Muſt not he have a very mean opinion of their virtue, who can imagine that married women could not lie alone five or ſix nights, (or put it nine, (12) if you pleaſe) without rendring themſelves unworthy by temptations, and impure proceedings, to celebrate a feſtival where chaſtity was required? I expect to be anſwered, that all countries are not alike, and that in climates leſs hot than Greece, wine or ſtrong liquors, tho' plentifully drank, would not produce the ſame venereal irritations that the meaneſt food would elſewhere occaſion; and that conſequently we ought not to judge of the ceremonies of the feaſts of Ceres by the deſires of the northern nations. But admit we do not ſtir out of Greece, I perſiſt in my opinion, that theſe motives for the uſe of Agnus Caſtus are not at all probable: for if the women, of their own accord had recourſe to this remedy, they muſt acknowledge a very great weakneſs, and proclaim a ſcandalous infirmity, which neither modeſty nor prudence would permit them to reveal. Prudence, I ſay, becauſe ſuch a confeſſion might cruelly diſturb and alarm their huſbands. Some might by trading be obliged to ſeveral weeks abſence. A law-ſuit might detain others as long. Several went to the wars, or engaged in foreign voyages. Thoſe who never went from home, were not always in good health; and thoſe who were could not tell how ſoon they might fall ſick. What ground was there, in all theſe caſes to rely on their wives chaſtity, who made profeſſion of their incontinency, at the Theſmophorian feaſt? This was a very auguſt feſtival, a ſolemn act of religion; the women held the principal functions of this holy ceremony. Chaſtity was neceſſary for their celebrating this ſolemnity, the ritual enjoined it. They had

---

(a) See Ariſtophanes in Θεσμοφοριαζούσαις.

(b) See the remark [A], at the end.

(6) Schol. ad Idyll. iv, Theocriti.

(7) Compare with this the remark [B] of the article PHASIS.

(8) Ovid. Metam. lib. x, ver. 431.

(9) Plinius, lib. xxiv, cap. ix, pag. m. 327. Father Hardouin ſays on this paſſage, Hæc totidem verbis. Dioſcor. lib. 1, cap. 135. & Galenus, lib. 6, de fac ſimp. med. pag. 148. Ælianus item, lib. 9. Hiſt. animal. cap. 26.

(10) Scholiaſt. Theocriti ad Idyll. VII. He ſaith the ſame things on the IVth Idyll. Κνύζα φυτὸν χορτῶδες, ᾧ αἱ Θεσμοφοριάζουσαι διὰ τὴν ἁγνείαν ςιβαδοποιοῦνται. Cnyza, planta graminis forma qua Cereris ſacra celebrantes fœminæ lectos ad ſervandam caſtitatem inſternunt.

(11) Theocrit. Idyll. VII, pag. m. 53, 54.

(12) Ovid, as may be ſeen above citation (8), makes this feſtival of Ceres laſt nine days.

ſtrange, generally ſpeaking, that they ſhould want ſuch a remedy; and yet more ſo that they ſhould acknowledge the neceſſity of it. The principal object of their worſhip in this feſtival, was that part which diſtinguiſhes them from men [C]. You may very well had therefore the moſt powerful motives to continency: the divine worſhip, conſcience, the public proſperity, the honour of Ceres, and the awfulneſs of her myſteries were all concerned in it: and nevertheleſs we are told, they owned themſelves unable to contain during the ſhort term of this feſtival. What was then to be expected from their virtue, when put to longer trials on other occaſions? It is therefore certain, that by having recourſe to Agnus Caſtus, they muſt have betrayed a great imprudence, in a voluntary manner, by filling their poor huſbands with jealouſies and uneaſineſſes. But what will you ſay, ſome may object, if their huſbands eſtabliſhed this cuſtom? I anſwer, that if they were the authors of it, either by way of advice, or command, it is not in the leaſt likely that the women would have ſubmitted to it either as a neceſſary, or at leaſt a very uſeful remedy; for in accepting of it, they muſt have confeſſed a natural infirmity, which would have done great injury to their honour, and rendered them ſuſpected of infidelity in the abſence or ſickneſs of their huſbands. All the huſbands who had been ſo imprudent as to propoſe or approve of this counſel, would have expoſed the reputation of their wives. The wits could not have failed to cry out, Theſe good men know how matters ſtand, a dire experience has obliged them to hunt after expedients; they never have a night's quiet, except thoſe which religion provides for them. But when they lie by whilſt the Theſmophorian rites are ſolemnized, the remembrance of what is paſt, makes them glad to rely on the virtue of Agnus Caſtus. I muſt repeat the obſervation I have made before. To what purpoſe would they have relied on that virtue during the feſtival? Would this have appeaſed the alarms of thoſe who were gone a long voyage, or a long journey? Would it ſatisfy the minds of the ſick? It may be affirmed, that whoever ſhould have introduced this cuſtom, would have deſerved to paſs for a diſturber of the public peace.

A hundred other reaſons convince me, that the uſe of the Agnus Caſtus in the beds of the women who celebrated the Theſmophorian rites, was not founded on the motive which is alledged. The ſame reaſon which led to the enjoining this remedy to married women, during that feſtival, would have occaſioned it's being preſcribed to them during the abſence or indiſpoſition of their huſbands, and to young widows and virgins all the year long. Since therefore the latter was not done, we ought not to give the leaſt credit to the former. If both of them had been practiſed in the manner I have mentioned, we ſhould find in ſome author or other, that no plant was more common than Agnus Caſtus all over Greece. Every perſon would have had a great many beds of them in his garden; whole foreſts had been filled with it, and expert planters employed on purpoſe to cultivate it; for the frequent ſtripping of it's leaves, would have required the greater care in keeping it alive. It would have been the firſt care of thoſe, who, in their declining years, ſhould have married women much younger than themſelves, to make large plantations of Agnus Caſtus, that they might continually have a decent remedy to aſſuage thoſe deſires, they could neither prevent nor ſatisfy. The leaves of this ſhrub would have been worſhipped as the tutelar god of married men, and a Deus averruncus, or alexicacus, with reſpect to cuckoldom. Some Juvenal would have congratulated Greece upon it (13): and it would have been obſerved of theſe leaves what another hath ſaid of frogs (14). But we find no appearance of any ſuch thing in the monuments of Antiquity.

Perhaps it may be objected, that the Theſmophorian rites exacted an extaordinary purity, an imagination exempt from what the Caſuiſts call unruly thoughts, an uninterrupted application to the excellency and ſublimities of chaſtity; which was unneceſſary at other times. All the anſwer I ſhall make to this, is, to aſk what proofs there are of this extraordinary peculiarity of the Theſmophoria. I am ſure ſuch a notion of this feſtival is only imaginary (15). I would alſo add, that neither Agnus Caſtus, nor Cunilago, nor willow-leaves (16), &c. are capable of inſpiring ſuch a purity, and moreover I reaſon thus: The Athenians were too ſenſible a people, to believe that a few leaves between the ſheets were ſufficient to mortify leudneſs. I will grant that there are ſome herbs, which, in length of time, may refrigerate thoſe who eat them; but as to the external application of them, I cannot tell whether it may not juſtly be ſaid of luſt as of death, ‘ Contra ‘ vim mortis non eſt medicamen in hortis. - - - Death's ‘ power is not be ſubdu'd by herbs.’ I cannot forget the anſwer of Theano, Pythagoras's daughter, who, when aſked, How many days reſpite, after having to do with a man, were requiſite to qualify a woman to aſſiſt at the Theſmophoria? replied, She was qualified the minute after, if ſhe had to do with her huſband, but never if with any other. Apud Theodoretum, lib. 12. Græcanicarum affectionum, Pythagorica Theano, rogata quoto demum die mulieri liceret à complexu viri Theſmophoriis intereſſe; Ἀπὸ μὲν τοῦ ἰδίου παραχρῆμα, ἔφη· ἀπὸ δὲ ἀλλοτρίου οὐδέποτε. Ei quæ à proprio viro ſurrexerit, ſtatim licere reſpondit; quæ ab alieno nunquam (17). This moral deciſion of Theano doth not in the leaſt ſavour of rigour. Such a lady as ſhe would not, if now alive, condemn frequenting the communion under pretence of too ſhort an interval after the conjugal duty. What may farther be inferred from her anſwer, is, that in order to a due performance of the Theſmophorian functions, a preparation of ſome days continence was thought neceſſary. But as this prolonged the time of abſtinence, it may be objected that I ought not to be ſurprized, that they ſhould have had recourſe to Agnus Caſtus. But this is indeed too weak an objection to make me alter my opinion. I refer the reader to what is ſaid in my laſt remark but one.

It would be unjuſt to condemn my criticiſms on this head, for equity will not permit us to ſacrifice the reputation of an infinite number of Grecian women, to all the conſequences which may be drawn from the teſtimony of Pliny and ſome others, if they have not deſerved ſuch an affront.

[C] The principal object of their worſhip in this feſtival, was that part which diſtinguiſhes them from men.] Faſoldus, who has wrote a ſmall tract on the Grecian feſtivals, cites Theodoret in relation to this circumſtance. ‘ In hoc quoque feſto pudenda muliebria mu‘ mulieres illæ initiatæ honore divino afficiebant. - - - ‘ In this feſtival alſo the women who were initiated paid ‘ divine honours to the pudenda muliebria.’ Theodoretus, lib. 3. Græcan. Affection. (18). He doth not cite the words of Thodoret, tho' he found them in Caſtellanus in the manner following: Καὶ τὸν κτένα τὸν γυναικεῖον (οὕτως δὲ τὸ γυναικεῖον ὀνομάζουσι μόριον) ἐν τοῖς Θεσμοφορίοις, παρὰ τῶν τετελεσμένων γυναικῶν θείας τιμῆς ἀξιούμενον. Nec minus muliebrem pectinem (ſic enim pudenda mulieris vocant) in Cereris feſto, mulieres initiatæ divino honore dignum habent (19). - - - And the pecten muliebris alſo, (ſo they called the pudendum muliebre) was eſteemed by the women initiated at the Theſmophoria to be worthy of divine honour. Faſoldus alſo informs us, that at Syracuſe they carried a repreſentation of this part, formed with a ſort of meal and honey, in a proceſſion on the laſt day of the feaſt in honour of Ceres and Proſerpine. This he grounds on the authority of Athenæus, lib. 14. ‘ Athenæus, ſays he (20), refert muliebria pudenda, ‘ μυλλοὶ appellata, quæ ex ſeſamo & melle facta ‘ erant, ultimo die hujus feſti apud Syracuſanos, qui ‘ hæc ſacra etiam obſervarunt, Cereri & Proſerpinæ ‘ circumlata fuiſſe. - - - - Athenæus relates, that the ‘ pudenda muliebria, called μυλλοὶ, made of flour and ‘ honey, on the laſt day of this feaſt, which were obſerved ‘ by the Syracuſians, were carried in honour of Ceres and ‘ Proſerpine.’ Perhaps he hath not rendred the ſenſe of Athenæus exactly, and inſtead of the laſt day of the feſtival, he ought to have tranſlated it at the great Theſmophoria. The Greek runs thus: Ἡρακλείδης ὁ Συρακούσιος ἐν τῷ Περὶ θεσμῶν, ἐν Συρακούσαις φησὶ τοῖς παντελείοις τῶν θεσμοφορίων ἐκ σησάμου καὶ μέλιτος κατασκευάσασθαι ἐφήβαια γυναικεῖα, ἃ καλεῖσθαι κατὰ πᾶσαν Σικελίαν μυλλοὺς, well imagine the antient fathers did not ſpare the Heathens on the ſubject of ſuch ceremonies. For the reſt thoſe who celebrated this feſtival were obliged to watch the whole night [D].

---

(13) O ſanctas gentes quibus hæc naſcuntur in hortis Numina. Juven. Sat. XV, ver. 10.

(14) See the paſſage of Pliny cited in the remark [I], of the article DEMOCRITUS.

(15) See the following remark.

(16) Salicem habere vim perimendi ſeminis, & libidinis extinguendæ, author eſt Theophraſtus. Ælianus Ἀφροδισίου κώλυμα nuncupat. Alii ἄγνον caſtam appellant. Homer. Odyſſ. κ. ὠλεσίκαρπον, id eſt, ut exponit Plinius lib. 16, cap. 26, frugiperda. Ad quem locum Euſtathius: Διότι οἱ πίνοντες τοῦ κατ' αὐτὰς ἄνθους ὀλλύουσι τὸν καρπὸν, ἤτοι ἄγονοι γίνονται. Caſtellanus, de Feſtis Græcorum, pag. 171.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) Joh. Faſoldus, in Græcorum veterum Ἱερολογία, Dec. XII, num. 1, pag. m. 280.

(19) Caſtell. de Feſtis Græcorum, pag. 173.

(20) Faſoldus, in Græc. veterum Ἱερολογία, pag. 280.

On

λοῦς, καὶ περιφέρεσθαι ταῖς θεαῖς (21). Dalecampius renders it thus: Heraclides Syracuſius libro de vetuſtis & ſancitis moribus, ſcribit, apud Syracuſios in perfectis Theſmophoriis (22), ex ſeſamo & melle fingi pudenda muliebria, quæ per ludos & ſpectacula (23) circumferebantur & in tota Sicilia vocabantur Mylli. You will find in Montagne's Eſſays a great many ſuch paſſages. I have not ſeen this in the place where he obſerves (24), that in the greateſt part of the world this part of our bodies was deified; that in certain places, the chief magiſtrates were reverenced and diſtinguiſhed by this part; and that in ſeveral ceremonies, inſtituted in honour of divers deities, the repreſentation of it was carried about in pomp. The Egyptian dames, in their Bacchanalian feaſts, wore a wooden one, finely covered, about their necks, proportioned in ſize and weight to their ſtrength; beſides that, the ſtatue of their god was furniſhed with one far ſurpaſſing the other parts of his body (25). The married women in my neighbourhood, adjuſt the upper-part of their head-dreſs to that ſhape, in order to boaſt of the pleaſure they received from it; and when they become widows, they turn it behind, and hide it under their head-dreſſes. It is probable that the reaſon why the part proper to the other ſex had ſuch honours paid to it in the Theſmophoria, was in remembrance of the good ſervice it had done to Ceres. This goddeſs having made a ſtrict ſearch after Proſerpine, who had been ſtollen away from her, without being able to find her, arrived very diſconſolate at Eleuſis. Here an old country-woman, named Baubo, uſed all endeavours to perſuade her to take ſome refreſhment, and to drive away melancholy. But all to no purpoſe. Ceres obſtinately refuſed every thing, and would not admit of any conſolation. Baubo changed the ſcene and endeavoured to divert the goddeſs with a new invented ſpectacle. She retired into another chamber, where ſhe tricked up a certain thing which had been long neglected, as a piece of waſte ground; after which ſhe returned to the goddeſs, to whom ſhe ſhewed her nudity, putting her body in the moſt extravagant poſtures ſhe poſſibly could (26). Ceres fixing her eyes on this object could not help laughing, and ſoon after accepted of the proffered refreſhments. I cannot deſcribe this in our language ſo naturally as an antient Father of the Church has done, whoſe words are theſe. Rogat illa (Baubo) atque hortatur contra, ſicut mos eſt in hujuſmodi caſibus, ne faſtidium ſuæ humanitatis aſſumat: obſtinatiſſimè durat Ceres, & rigoris indomiti pertinaciam retinet. Quod cum ſæpius fieret, neque ullis quiret obſequiis ineluctabile propoſitum fatigari, vertit Baubo artes, & quam ſeriò non quiebat allicere, ludibriorum ſtatuit exhilarare miraculis: partem illam corporis, per quam ſecus femineum & ſubolem prodere, & nomen ſolet acquirere generi, tum longiore ab incuria liberat: facit ſumere habitum puriorem, & in ſpeciem levigari nondum duri atque ſtriculi puſionis: redit ad Deam triſtem, & inter illa communia, quibus moris eſt frangere ac temperare mærores, retegit ſe ipſam, atque omnia illa pudoris loca revelatis monſtrat inguinibus: atque pubi affigit oculos diva, & inauditi ſpecie ſolaminis paſcitur. Tum diffuſior facta per riſum, aſpernatam ſumit atque ebibit potionem: & quod diu nequivit verecundia Baubonis exprimere, propudioſi facinoris extorſit obſcænitas (27). Hence with very good reaſon he vigorouſly attacks the Pagans on the ridiculous abſurdity of their feſtivals; what, could this object afford ſo extremely diverting to Ceres, who could at all times ſee the ſame in herſelf? ‘ Ut animum commodare alimoniis poſſint, victuique ſumendo, non ‘ ratio, non tempus, non ſermo aliquis adhibetur gra‘ vis, aut affabilitas ſeria, ſed propudioſa corporum ‘ monſtratur obſcœnitas, objectanturque partes illæ, ‘ quas pudor communis abſcondere atque naturalis ve‘ recundiæ lex jubet: quas inter aures caſtas ſine venia ‘ nefas eſt, ac ſine honoribus appellare præfatis. Quid‘ nam, quæſo, in ſpectu tali, quid in pudendis fuit ‘ verendiſque Baubonis, quod feminei ſexus Deam, & ‘ conſimili formatam membro, in admirationem con‘ verteret atque riſum? quod objectum lumini con‘ ſpectuique divino, & oblivionem miſeriarum daret, ‘ & habitum in lætiorem repentina hilaritate traduce‘ ret (28)? - - - To induce her to eat, and take ſome ‘ refreſhment, neither reaſon, nor time, nor any grave ‘ diſcourſe, or ſerious complaiſance were made uſe of, ‘ but obſcene parts, are offered to her view, which com‘ mon decency and the natural laws of modeſty require to ‘ be concealed: which to chaſte ears without leave or ‘ due reverence, ought not ſo much as to be named. ‘ What now, I deſire to know, in ſuch a ſight as this, ‘ what in the pudenda of old Baubo, could move the ‘ laughter and admiration of a goddeſs formed with the ‘ ſame parts herſelf? What an object was here to de‘ light the view of a goddeſs in ſuch a manner, as to ‘ drown all thoughts of ſorrow, and introduce ſo ſudden ‘ an appearance of joy?’ Is it not very probable that in commemoration of this adventure, divine honours were decreed to that object which had ſo opportunely diverted the goddeſs Ceres? Hence ariſes an objection againſt the aſſertion laid down in the precedent article: for, ſome will ſay, the Grecian women ought to be more than ordinarily fortified, when they not only lay alone, but were imployed in the contemplation of a ſubject ſufficiently apt to taint their imagination, and excite immodeſt thoughts. I confeſs, this may in ſome meaſure weaken my arguments; but all things well conſidered, they remain ſtill ſtrong enough to make me continue in my opinion.

[D] They were . . . . . . obliged to watch the whole night.] This might furniſh my adverſaries with another objection. The huſbands, will they ſay, conſidering, 1. That their wives were ſeparated from them, whilſt they were employed in celebrating the memory of a tickling adventure, and in worſhipping a tempting object, of which they were alſo obliged to make images in paſte (29). 2. Their watching all night; might well give ſome diſagreeable ſuſpicions. For watchings have always afforded lucky opportunities. It is therefore not unlikely, that they had recourſe to effectual preſervatives, ſuch as the leaves of Agnus Caſtus. Theſe difficulties are very inconſiderable; for, beſides that all men were abſolutely excluded from the Theſmophoria, which might afford a plenary ſatisfaction to the jealous and diſtruſtful huſbands, is it poſſible to believe the Grecians fooliſh enough to rely on the feeble aſſiſtance of leaves, when they doubted their wives virtue, notwithſtanding the engaging obligations laid on them by the neceſſary circumſtances of the feſtival, ſuch as the utter excluſion of men, the chaſtity enjoined, the watchings in the temple, &c. if it be aſked on what authority I found the text of this remark, I alledge theſe words of Arnobius (30): ‘ Vultis enim conſideremus myſteria ‘ & illa divina, quæ Theſmophoria nominantur à ‘ Græcis: quibus gente ab Attica ſancta illa pervigilia ‘ conſecrata ſunt & pannychiſmi (31) graves. - - - - ‘ Would you have us conſider alſo thoſe divine myſteries ‘ which the Greeks call Theſmophoria; in which the ‘ Athenians celebrated thoſe holy watchings, and ſerious ‘ vigils.’ I do not deny but ſeveral diſorders were occaſioned by theſe watchings. Plautus's Aulularia runs upon the marriage of a young woman who was got with child on ſuch an occaſion (32). The Romans never attempted the abolition of ſome nocturnal feaſts, till they diſcovered their irregularities. Certain Grecian cities alſo aboliſhed the ſame ceremonies: and the following words inform us how Ariſtophanes bantered thoſe devotional watchings (33): ‘ Diligentiſſime ſanciendum eſt, ut mulierum famam ‘ multorum oculis lux clara cuſtodiat, initienturque ‘ eo ritu Cereri, quo Romæ initiantur. Quo in ge‘ nere ſeveritatem majorum ſenatus vetus auctoritas de ‘ Bacchanalibus; & conſulum exercitu adhibito quæ‘ ſtio animadverſioque declarant. Atque omnia noc‘ turna, ne nos duriores fortè videamur, in media ‘ Græcia Diagondas Thebanus lege perpetua ſuſtulit. ‘ Novos verò Deos, & in his colendis nocturnas per‘ vigilationes ſic Ariſtophanes facetiſſimus poeta vete‘ ris comœdiæ vexat, ut apud eum Sabazius, & qui‘ dam alii dii de peregrinis judicati è civitate ejician‘ tur. - - - It is moſt carefully to be enacted, that day‘ light and the public eye may guard the reputation of ‘ women; and that they be initiated to Ceres, as they ‘ are

---

(21) Athen. lib. xiv, pag. 647.

(22) The tranſlators note is, Cereris Theſmophoria & myſteria, majora minoraque fuerunt. Vide Gyraldum.

(23) The tranſlator's note here, is ταῖς θέαις: alii, ταῖς θεαῖς deabus, nempe Cereri & Proſerpinæ. He falſely ſuppoſes, that ταῖς θέαις, is put into the text.

(24) Montagne, Eſſays, lib. iii, cap. v, pag. 128, 129.

(25) To this may be referred what Daniel Heinſius ſaith in his anſwer to Balzac's Diſſertation on Herodes infanticita, pag. 112. Quem (Pana) eundem cum Priapo, quem pæderaſten nec pudendum modo, ſed pudendi ſui prope partem faciunt. Arnobius, lib. vi, pag. 209, ſays genitalibus propriis inferior Priapus.

(26) Sic effata, ſinu veſtem contraxit ab imo, Objecitque oculis formatas inguinibus res: Quas cava ſuccutiens Baubo manu, nam puerilis Ollis vultus erat, plaudit, contrectat amicè. Orpheus, apud Arnobium, lib. v, pag. 175. See Clemens Alexandrinus, in Protrept. pag. 13.

(27) Arnob. lib. v, pag. 174, 175.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 176.

(29) See, above, citation (21), the paſſage of Athenæus; but the argument grounded upon it is not very certain, for we do not find by whom theſe images were made.

(30) Arnobius, lib. v, p. 173.

(31) That word ſignifies to watch the whole night, as appears by the gloſſaries, pervigilium, παννυχισμὸς καὶ ἡ διὰ νυκτὸς ἀγρυπνία.

(32) Is adoleſcentis illius eſt avunculus. Qui illam ſtupravit noctu, Cereris vigiliis. He is the uncle to the youth who lay with her during the vigils of Ceres. Plaut. in Prologo Aululariæ.

(33) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. ii, fol. 335, A.

I ſhall obſerve, on this occaſion, a miſtake of Brantome; who has falſely aſſerted, that, accordi[illegible] to Pliny, the Veſtal virgins made uſe of beds of leaves to preſerve their chaſtity [E].

are initiated at Rome. How the cuſtoms of this kind formerly obſerved in the Bacchanalias are now approved, the debate of the Senate before the Conſuls upon this queſtion, ſufficiently decided. All nocturnal ceremonies, that we may not ſeem leſs polite than others, have been aboliſhed in the midſt of Greece by a perpetual law of Diagondas the Theban. But the moſt facetious old comic Poet Ariſtophanes bantered the new Deities, and their nocturnal worſhip in ſo ſevere a manner, that Sabazius and ſome other gods mentioned by him, were judged foreigners and expelled the city.’ Read alſo what is ſaid by a certain Journaliſt in his extract of a diſſertation of Mr Rainſſant. The ſecular games were not only celebrated for three days, but alſo three nights together; for they aſſembled in the temples, where they watched, prayed, and performed their ſacrifices: this was what they called Pervigilium; and to prevent all indecencies in theſe public aſſemblies, the youth of both ſexes aſſiſted at them under the conduct of their fathers and their mothers, or ſome of their elderly relations, who could anſwer for their deportment, as Auguſtus had decreed. The precaution was neceſſary and the law very wiſe; love is too diligent in queſt of favourable opportunities, to forget its intereſts in theſe nocturnal aſſemblies. But it was ſomewhat late when the Emperor Auguſtus applied a remedy to it. Præſtat ſerò quàm nunquam. Better late than never. It is not to be doubted but before this, the three nights of the ſecular games were a very happy time for the amorous youth, and that they made the beſt uſe they could of it, ſince they knew it was impoſſible to enjoy it twice (34). The devotional watchings of the Primitive Church were not entirely free from abuſes of this kind; for which reaſon St Jerom adviſes the young virgins when they aſſiſted at theſe rites, not to ſtir ſo much as a finger's breadth from their mothers (35). This Father had done much better to acquieſce in the juſt complaints of Vigilantius, who condemned theſe nocturnal meetings on account of the impurities there committed (36). They were at laſt obliged to ſuppreſs this devotion, as Cardinal Bellarmin acknowledges. ‘Quoniam occaſione nocturnarum vigiliarum abuſus quidem irrepere cœperant, vel potius flagitia non raro committi, placuit Eccleſiæ nocturnos conventus, & vigilias proprie dictas intermittere, ac ſolum in iiſdem diebus celebrare jejunia (37). - - - - Becauſe on occaſion of the nocturnal watchings, abuſes had crept in, or rather horrid vices were too frequently committed, the Church was pleaſed to forbid thoſe night-meetings, and vigils properly ſo called, and to celebrate faſtings only on the ſame days.’

Without doubt the mandate of the Archbiſhop of Paris in the year 1697, againſt the cuſtom of viſiting Mont St Valerien in the holy week, was founded on like reaſons.

[E] Brantome ..... has falſely aſſerted, that, according [illegible] Pliny, the Veſtal virgins made uſe of beds of leaves to preſerve their chaſtity.] Theſe are the author's words at large (38): ‘I have ſeen and read a fooliſh Italian pamphlet, which pretends to give receipts againſt concupiſcence, of which ſort it lays down thirty-[illegible] but they are ſo ridiculous, that I would not adviſe the women to the uſe of them, leſt they ſhould bring their bodies into too low a condition. This is the reaſon why I would not here tranſcribe them. [illegible] alledges one of them, which the Veſtals and Athenian Ladies formerly made uſe of during the feaſts of Ceres called Theſmophoria, to refrigerate and extinguiſh every ſtrong amorous deſire, that by this means they might celebrate this feſtival with the utmoſt chaſtity; this was the making beds of the leaves of Agnus Caſtus. But you muſt imagine that they thus mortified themſelves only during the rites; and that afterwards they threw away their beds. I have ſeen one of theſe trees at the houſe of a very fine and honourable lady in Guienne, which ſhe often ſhewed for its rarity to ſtrangers who came to viſit her, and told them the virtue of it; but I could never obſerve or hear that any of the ſex had ſtuffed the leaſt corner of their bed with its leaves, or plucked ſo much as one branch, not even the Lady herſelf, who was the proprietor of the tree and place, and conſequently could diſpoſe of it at pleaſure. See the margin (39).

THIBAUT or THEOBALDUS,

Earl of Champagne, the fifth of that name, rendred himſelf famous among other things by his paſſion for Queen Blanche [A], St Lewis's mother: and though he was unſucceſsful in it, as moſt Hiſtorians believe, yet he expoſed this great queen to cenſorious tongues [B]. Some (a) pretend that he diſcovered

[A] His paſſion for Queen Blanche.] Claudius Fauchet has not forgot our Earl of Champagne nor his Amours, when he treats of the antient French Poets. ‘Blanche, ſays he (1), who was a young, beautiful, and beſides a Spaniſh Lady, managed Thibaut ſo artfully, that he abandoned the other Barons: and, what was yet more, he diſcovered the deſign to ſeize the King in his return from Orleans to Paris. But Thibaut's Amours diſpleaſing ſeveral Lords, it happened (as I find in a certain authentic manuſcript Chronicle which I have by me) that Thibaut one day entring the hall where Queen Blanche was, Robert Earl of Artois, the King's brother, threw a ſoft cheeſe in his face, which the Earl of Champagne being affronted at, took occaſion to retire from court, in order to avoid a greater diſgrace. However the great Chronicle of France tells us, that the Earl again took up arms againſt the King; but being informed of the great preparations made againſt him, he ſent ſome of the wiſeſt of his council to deſire a peace, which was agreed to. But as the King had been at a great expence on this account, therefore the Earl was obliged to quit Montereau-fault-yonne, and Bray on the Seine, with their appurtenances to him. On this occaſion it was (ſays the great Chronicle) Queen Blanche told the Earl that he ought never to take up arms againſt the King her ſon; but ſhould remember that he came even to his own country to aſſiſt him againſt the Barons when they attacked him. The Earl earneſtly looking at the wiſe and charming Queen, and ſtruck with her great beauty, replied, By my faith, Madam, my ſoul, my body, and all my lands are at your command. Nor is there any thing that can pleaſe you which I would not freely undertake: nor will I ever by the grace of GOD, engage againſt you or your's. He departed very penſive, often reflecting on the Queen's winning looks and charming air. The tender paſſion ſoon ſeized his heart, but when he remembred that ſhe was a Lady of ſo high a rank, and ſtrict virtue, that he could never think of enjoying her, it was turned into deſpair. And becauſe deep thoughts beget melancholy; to divert them he was adviſed by ſome wiſe men, to apply himſelf to Poetry and Muſic; in which he ſucceeded ſo well, that he compoſed the moſt melodious ſongs that ever were either ſung or plaid on inſtruments, and cauſed them to be inſcribed in the halls of Provins and Troyes. And they are called the King of Navarre's ſongs.

[B] He expoſed this great Queen to cenſorious tongues (2).] Several things gave occaſion to it. Thibaut had rendered himſelf odious by his precipitate retreat from the camp at Avignon, and became more ſo on account of the ſuſpicions he lay under of having poiſoned Lewis the VIIIth; which were increaſed, when ſo good an underſtanding was obſerved betwixt him and the Queen-Dowager, that he diſcloſed to her all the deſigns of the confederate Princes; and all this at a time that ſeveral provocations had engaged him to declare himſelf as one of the chiefs of the league. This looked very like a reciprocal affection betwixt them (3). A widow without this would never come into any correſpondence with a man, who is ſuppoſed to be her huſband's murtherer. Beſides, the confederate Princes marching into Champagne, met Queen diſcovered his paſſion, before that princeſs was a widow [C]: and they add that Lewis the VIIIth the huſband of Blanche, was obliged to diſſemble the affront, by reaſon of the wars in which he found himſelf engaged. That the earl brought this prince conſiderable forces, and behaved himſelf very bravely; but that he could not reſolve to winter out of his own territories, and that he expreſsly declared he would return home. That the king imagining this impatience of the earl to proceed only from a deſire of ſeeing the queen, and being alſo ſenſible of the great prejudice he ſhould receive by this lord's retreat, uſed him ill, and threatned him. That Thibaut enraged at the affront, and meditating a terrible revenge cauſed the king to be poiſoned. That finding the queen had the ſame indifference for him in her widow ſtate as ſhe had before, he confederated with the princes who deſigned to remove her from the regency; and that they met with no difficulty in engaging him in that affair, becauſe he was eaſily perſuaded that the queen's indifference proceeded from the paſſion ſhe entertained for the Cardinal Legate [D], who had reſided for ſome time at the Court of France. That it was equally eaſy for the queen to oblige him to abandon the confederates; for ſhe only acquainted him that ſhe ſhould not be diſpleaſed to ſee him. That he had conceived great hopes of ſucceeding in his amours by this bare compliment. That he deſerted the princes of the league, and diſcovered their deſigns to the queen, at a very favourable juncture. That turning their whole

---

(34) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, March 1685, Art. II, pag. 259, 260.

(35) Vigiliarum dies & ſolemnes pernoctationes ſic virguncula noſtra celebret, ut ne tranſverſum quidem unguem à matre diſcedat. Hieronymus ad Lætam de Inſtitut. Filiæ.

(36) Vide Hieronym. adverſus Vigilantium, cap. iv. Conſult Mr Van Dale, de Oraculis, pag. 232, of the firſt edition, and pag. 60, of the ſecond. See alſo remark [D], in the article VIGILANTIUS.

(37) Bellarminus, de Eccleſia triumph. lib. iii, cap. ult.

(38) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. ii, pag. m. 163, 164.

(39) It is no wonder, becauſe every woman who had gathered thoſe leaves, muſt have confeſſed her infirmity.

(a) Varillas, Minorité de S. Louïs, printed at the Hague 1685.

(1) Des anciens Poëtes François, book ii, pag. 117.

(2) See other ſcandalous reports concerning this queen in the remark [D].

(3) The modern Hiſtorian of St Lewis, lib. ii, num. 6, pag. 51, tells us that the eaſineſs which Blanche diſcovered to be reconciled to Thibaut, tho' ſhe knew he paſſionately loved her, occaſioned ſeveral ill reports.

Blanche on the way; ſhe was going to th[illegible] aſſiſtance, and would not abandon him, [illegible] they purſued him as the poiſoner of her huſband. This conduct appeared ſo ſuſpicious, that they laughed at the offers ſhe made of puniſhing Thibaut, in caſe he was guilty. The following paſſage is taken from a modern author, who has conſulted authentic manuſcripts. The Queen ſent a ſecond order to the Princes of the League to quit Champagne; aſſuring them, that if they had any complaint againſt Thibaut, ſhe was ready to do them juſtice. But all ſhe could obtain from them, we are told, was an inſolent and even barbarous anſwer: ‘ That they had taken up arms to do themſelves juſtice, ‘ and not to wait for it from a woman, who declared ‘ herſelf the protectreſs of her huſband's murtherer (4).’ As for the ſongs compoſed by the Earl, moſt Hiſtorians tell us they proved the ill ſucceſs of his amours. The paſſage of Claudius Fauchet already cited, ſhews that this unfortunate galant was adviſed to divert himſelf with ſongs, and by this means to expel the melancholy which preyed upon him. Common ſenſe obliges us to believe, that if Blanche had favoured the Earl's paſſion, he would have better concealed his flame; and that the deſpair of obtaining any tender returns from the Queen, occaſioned ſuch repeated ſighs and ſo many languiſhing verſes as he recorded on the walls of his palace. We are told that it was a ſort of folly and extravagance, which a proper compaſſion in the Queen would have entirely prevented. Let us hear a modern author. ‘ Whether ‘ his preſumption equalled his love; or his paſſion ‘ degenerated into folly; or he was prepoſſeſſed that ‘ concealing would rather increaſe than cure his diſ‘ eaſe; or the Queen's virtue had at laſt thrown him ‘ into deſpair: it is certain he was ſo little ſollicitous ‘ to conceal the conſuming fire; that he affected to ‘ diſcover it by all means which the moſt wretched ‘ extravagance could ſuggeſt to a man of his quality. ‘ He compoſed ſeveral amorous ſongs, in which he ‘ diſcovered more wit than elegance: he found op‘ portunities to hand them to the Queen; they were ‘ ſet to Muſic; they were fitted to all ſorts of Inſtru‘ ments, and to keep up the idea of them when they ‘ ſhould loſe the grace of novelty, or to preſerve the ‘ memory of them when the author and the Princeſs ‘ ſhould be no more, he cauſed them to be engraved ‘ in braſs, and expoſed to the view of all the world ‘ in the galleries of his palaces at Troyes and Pro‘ vins: as if he was afraid that future ages would not ‘ be ſufficiently informed of his folly, or that the age ‘ he lived in was very barren of ſatiriſts (5).’ Varillas is here miſtaken in his Chronology; he ſuppoſes Thibaut guilty of all theſe extravagancies before the death of Lewis the VIIIth: but I choſe to rely on the Hiſtory cited by Fauchet (6), which dates all theſe ſongs after the loſs of Montereau and Bray. This agrees with the Chronology of one of our beſt Hiſtorians (7): this loſs, ſays he, did not make him wiſer; he ſtill perſiſted in the fooliſh paſſion for the Queen which had ruined him, and retired to his caſtle of Provins to indulge his amorous extravagance, by making verſes and ſongs. He was obliged to ſurrender theſe towns in the year 1235, according to Mezerai (8).

I ſhall conclude this remark with the words of the modern Hiſtorian of St Lewis, which are an exact recapitulation of what hath been ſaid. ‘ The author ‘ who has collected moſt of theſe ſcandalous reports, ‘ and who perpetually praiſes Blanche to a degree of ‘ exceſs, ſpeaks of theſe ſtories as meer rumours ‘ which he had picked up; adding of himſelf, tho' ‘ he was an Engliſhman, that it would be criminal ‘ to give credit to them. He alſo aſſures us, as well ‘ as another author who was born at Liege, while ‘ theſe reports were yet freſh, that they only proceed‘ ed from the animoſity of the nobles againſt the re‘ gency and the ſteddineſs of this Princeſs; and indeed ‘ every age furniſhes examples enough of this kind. ‘ Beſides, of the four authors who have related this ‘ ſtory, not one has ſo much as inſinuated that the ‘ Queen had the leaſt inclination to favour the Earl ‘ of Champagne's paſſion, if it was true that he had ‘ any for her: but one of the four poſitively avers, ‘ that Thibaut only ſcribbled his ditties on the walls ‘ of the palaces of Troyes and Provins, to charm the ‘ deſpair into which Blanche's virtue had caſt him. ‘ That if amongſt the reſt of thoſe excellent works, ‘ ſome verſes appear which ſeem liable to be wreſted ‘ to this purpoſe; it is in truth a ſtrange thing to ‘ alledge the evidence of ſuch a one as Thibaut, a ‘ Poet tranſported by a warm imagination, who may ‘ as probably entertain the public with ſuch adven‘ tures as never happened to him, as others of the ‘ ſame character tire the reader with the paſſions which ‘ they never felt (9).’

[C] Some pretend that he diſcovered his paſſion before that princeſs was a widow.] It is very likely that his paſſion did not wait for the king's death. Nor is it at all leſs probable that ſuch a vain, inconſtant, courageous prince, might have had a ſufficient command over his paſſions, to love the queen a long time, without giving any marks of it. Note, that ſhe was at leaſt forty, and perhaps older, when ſhe loſt her huſband: for ſhe was married to him in the year 1200, and he died in 1226. It is very rare for a man to ſee a fine woman of thirty years of age, without any concern, and to fall in love with her all of a ſudden when ſhe is forty, and after ſhe has had above ten children. This was the caſe of Queen Blanche in the year 1226. One of our Hiſtorians imagines that there was a great deal more vanity than love in this action of Thibaut. The Earl of Champagne, ſays he (10), was the perſon who gave this advice to the queen. This young prince was touched with a ſort of gallantry for her, rather owing to the vanity of a courtier, than to the charms of a woman above forty. He is thus far in the right, that vanity is capable of obliging a man to act the part of a lover: but he doth not in the leaſt conſider, that the earl's paſſion might have begun long before the queen was forty years old. And at that age it was much eaſier for her to keep alive a flame long ſince kindled, than to begin to kindle one.

[D] The paſſion ſhe had entertained for the Cardinal Legate.] An author whom I have often cited (11) obſerves that the Cardinal's perſon was very agreeable; that his charming mien was equalled by none; that he had

(4) Hiſtoire de S. Louïs, lib. ii, num. 21, pag. m. 84, ad ann. 1229.

(5) Varillas, Minorité de S. Louïs, pag. 12.

(6) See, above, the remark [A].

(7) Mezerai, ubi infra.

(8) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. ii, p. 715.

(9) Hiſtoire de S. Louïs, lib. x, num. 14, pag. 126.

(10) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. ii, pag. 710, ad ann. 1227.

(11) Varillas, Minorité de St Louïs, pag. 22.

whole rage againſt him, they entred into and ravaged Champagne. That the Queen-Regent aſſiſted him, and ſo compoſed the difference, that they were deprived of all pretences for an invaſion. That they ſought another way to ruin him, by accuſing him of the king's death. That the queen brought him off, obliging them to lay down their arms on condition that he ſhould immediately ſerve in the wars againſt the Infidels, accompanied with a hundred knights to be maintained at his own expence (b). This whole relation mentions nothing of the crown of Navarre: which obliges me to take notice in this place, that Thibaut obtained that crown in the year 1234, after the death of Sanche (c), who left no children. Two years after, he undertook a Cruſade againſt the Infidels, of which he was alſo the chief: but for the uſual reaſon, I mean the miſunderſtanding of the princes engaged in that enterpriſe, the expedition came to nothing. He died in the year 1253 (d), leaving his dominions to Thibaut his ſon. In his latter days he was engaged in ſeveral broils with his clergy, and even drew an interdict on the kingdom of Navarre for the ſpace of three years, for having baniſhed the Biſhop of Pampelona (e). We ſhall ſee in the remarks that he was a great Poet [E]. He was a man ſuſpected on ſlight grounds of the greateſt crimes. It was thought he poiſoned Philip Earl of Boulogne [F], uncle to St Lewis.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Father, or, according to others, uncle to Blanche of Navarre, Thibaut's mother.

(d) And not 1277, as La Croix du Maine ſays, pag. 465.

(e) See the Hiſtory of St Lewis by Monſ. de la Chaiſe, lib. xi, num. 4, pag. m. 172.

had a delicacy of wit which was extremely ſurpriſing, and that Europe never produced ſuch a compleat courtier. He adds that Blanche had a very particular eſteem for him; that ſhe conſulted him on important affairs; that ſhe ſometimes preferred his advice to that of others, and that ſhe never denied any of the little favours he aſked for his friends. There needed no more, to kindle a jealouſy in Thibaut, or to furniſh detractors with a fair pretext, to ſpread injurious reports againſt the honour of the queen-regent. This they did not fail to do; and what was yet harder the men of letters were the chief promoters of thoſe ſatires; for the ſtudents of the univerſity of Paris, all of them of an age at that time ſo far advanced, that it would at preſent appear ſcandalous for a man of the ſame age, not to have his degree of doctor (12), being diſguſted at the proceedings on occaſion of their quarrel with the citizens (13), left the city, after having publiſhed licentious ſongs and verſes to blacken the reputation of the Queen-Regent, and the Pope's cardinal legate who governed her (14).

[E] He was a great Poet.] Preſident Fauchet ſpeaks thus of him. The Italians formerly ſo well eſteemed the ſongs of Thibaut King of Navarre, and other French poets, his cotemporaries, that they imitated them, as Dante has ſhewn, who in his Book de Vulgari Eloquentia, cites this king as an excellent maſter in Poetry. (15). You will meet with ſeveral fragments of this king's poetry in Fauchet's book (16).

[F] It was thought he poiſoned Philip Earl of Boulogne.] This earl was the ſon of Philip Auguſtus, and he was the chief of the league formed againſt the Regent Blanche, ſoon after the death of Lewis the VIIIth. 'As his death was very ſudden, the 'people, always prone to calumny, were very wil'ling to aſcribe it to a violent cauſe, and by dark 'hints charged it on the queen her ſelf. But to 'attempt to vindicate her would be to injure her: and 'in reality they fell upon Thibaut in quite another 'manner, either becauſe he had been the greateſt 'gainer by it, or becauſe being perſuaded that he had 'already made a bloody eſſay on Lewis the VIIIth, 'they did not think that he would make any ſcruple 'of this ſecond murther. But the truth is, no proof 'was ever given of his being guilty of either, tho' 'the manner in which he took the death of the 'latter, was like enough to make him ſuſpected of 'having been the cauſe of it (17). Thus we ſee how Queen Blanche was made to have a ſhare in every bad action. So hard it is to have a great reputation, and not be expoſed to the malice of cenſorious tongues.

(12) Hiſt. de S. Louïs, lib. ii, num. 16, p. 71.

(13) Theſe quarrels began in the year 1229. See a ſhort deduction of them in the Hiſt. de S. Louïs, ubi ſupra.

(14) Mezerai, Abrége Chronol. Tom. ii, pag. 715.

(15) Fauchet, des anciens Poëtes François, book ii, p. 118.

(16) Du Verdier Vau-Privas has inſerted in his Bibliotheque Françoiſe, what Fauchet ſays of Thibaut, Earl of Champagne.

(17) Hiſt. de S. Louïs, lib. iii, num. 20, pag. 140.

THOMÆUS (Nicolas Leonicus) was a famous profeſſor at Padua in the XVIth century. He was a Venetian, originally of Albania (a). He ſtudied the Greek literature at Florence under Demetrius Chalcondylas; and was the firſt among the Latins who explained in Greek at Padua the works of Ariſtotle. He reſolved to have recourſe to the fountain-head, in order to re-eſtabliſh Philoſophy, which he found miſerably disfigured by the vain ſubtilties of the ſchoolmen, and the ſpeculations of the Arabian Commentators [A]. As he was a great Humaniſt, we have no reaſon to be ſurpriſed at his diſlike of the manner of philoſophizing which was practiſed at that time, nor at his courage in undertaking to explain the Greek text of Ariſtotle. His manner of living was truly philoſophical: he was fond of a ſtudious repoſe, without giving way to the commotions which emulation and ambition uſually inſpire (b). He was content with a moderate fortune. He lived frugally and never married [B]. He took the death of (a) Epirota patre Venetiis genitus. Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. xci.

(b) Vita ejus procul à contentione ambitioneque in ſtudioſo mollique otio verſabatur. Jovius, ibid. Præter virtutem bonaſque artes tota in vita nullius rei appetens. Petrus Bembus, in Epitaphio Leon Thomæi, apud Chytræum Delic. Itiner. pag. m. 152.

[A] Philoſophy which he found miſerably disfigured by . . . . the ſchoolmen, and . . . . the Arabians.] Paul Jovius happily expreſſes the ſad condition to which the ſchoolmen had reduced Philoſophy. They never enquired after truth; but ſtudied the art of raiſing objections, and anſwering them by the help of a hundred new-fangled terms, which they did not themſelves underſtand. 'Philoſophiam ex puriſſimus 'fontibus, non ex lutulentis rivulis ſalubriter haurien'dam eſſe perdocebat, exploſa penitus ſophiſtarum 'diſciplina, quæ tum inter imperitos, & barbaros 'principatum in ſcholis obtinebat, quum doctores 'excogitatis barbara ſubtilitate Dialecticorum figmen'tis, Phyſicas quæſtiones non ad veritatis lucem, ſed 'ad inanem diſputandi garrulitatem revocarent; & 'juventus in gymnaſio Arabum, & Barbarorum com'mentationes ſecuta, à recto, munitoque itinere in 'confragoſas ignorantiæ crepidines duceretur (1). '---- He taught that philoſophy ought to be derived 'from the pure ſource itſelf, and not from the muddy 'rivulets, and that they ſhould baniſh the ſophiſtical 'learning, which then obtained the aſcendant in the 'ſchools among the ignorant, when the profeſſors by 'the invention of logical fictions, and barbarous ſub'tilties reduced all philoſophical queſtions not to the 'light of truth, but to the vain humour of diſputing, 'and the youth in the univerſity by following the com'ments of the Arabians and Barbarians were led from 'truth, and fortified in the craggy precipices of 'ignorance.'

[B] He was content with a moderate fortune . . . and never married.] His chaſte and innocent life, is very well expreſſed in the following citation. 'Pervenit 'veneranda barbæ canitie ad ſeptuageſimum tertium 'ætatis annum (2), mediocri ſubſtantia, ipſaque civili 'frugalitate, & cælebs & felix, quod nemo vel inno'centia, & doctrinæ conſcientia, vel munditia cor'poris, vel anima nitore, beatior ætate noſtra 'fuerit (3). ---- He arrived to the ſeventy-third 'year of his age, with a venerable aſpect, a moderate

'fortune

(1) Paulus Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. xci, pag. m. 213.

(2) Spondan. ad ann. 1533, num. 20, makes him live till he was 75 years old.

(3) Jovius, Elogior. cap. xci, pag. 213.

of a crane which he had kept forty years for a preſage of his own approaching end [C]. Conſidering the age he lived to, any thing might have furniſhed him with ſuch a thought. He ſucceeded very well in Poetry (c). He died at Padua, in the year 1533, aged ſeventy-five years (d). I ſhall ſpeak of his writings in one of my remarks [D]. He had a brother whom Pierius Valerianus ranks amongſt the unfortunate learned men [E].

(c) Petrus Bembus, ibid.

(d) Spondan. ad ann. 1533, num. 20.

fortune, great frugality, in a ſingle and happy ſtate, ſo that no perſon in our time has been more diſtinguiſhed, either for the innocency of his life, the ſanctity of his doctrine, the neatneſs of his perſon, or the brightneſs of his mind.’

[C] He took the death of a crane which he had kept forty years for a preſage of his own approaching end.] For this the ſame Paul Jovius is alſo my authority. ‘Aluerat domi gruem, de manus ipſius ſenili oblectamento cibaria capientem, per quadraginta annos. Is ſenio tabefactus quum periiſſet, & ejus deſiderio triſte omen concepit, prædixitque nullo laceſſitus morbo, ſe non multo poſt adamati gruis fatum, maturo vitæ exitu ſecuturum. - - - - He had kept in his houſe for forty years a crane, which in his old age he took a pleaſure to feed with his own hand. The crane happening to die of old age, he took the death of it to be ominous, and though he was in good health, foretold that without any diſtemper, he ſhould follow his favourite bird, and die, as his crane had done, of old age.’

[D] I ſhall ſpeak of his writings in one of my remarks.] He compoſed, in imitation of the Academics, ten dialogues on curious or important ſubjects, as de divinatione, de nominum inventione, de ludo talario, de precibus, de animorum immortalitate, &c. He tranſlated or paraphraſed ſome tracts of Ariſtotle and Galen (4), and publiſhed a miſcellany of very fine collections, under the title of Varia Hiſtoria, wherein according to the cuſtom of the age he lived in, he never cited thoſe antient authors who furniſhed him with materials. As to his tranſlations Huëtius gives him the following good character. ‘Emendatus interpres, ad auctoris nutum totum ſe fingens (5). - - - - An exact interpreter, perfectly repreſenting his author.’ There is another obſervation to be made concerning his work intituled de Varia Hiſtoria libri tres, that he wrote it when young, but did not publiſh it till he was very old in the year 1531. This is what he himſelf ſays in his epiſtle dedicatory to Cuthbert Tonſtal, Biſhop of Durham. ‘Commentariolos de Varia Hiſtoria quos alias juvenis admodum multiplici cum Græcorum tum Latinorum lectione confeceram ſepoſueramque nunc edendos excudendoſve curavi: ut quando maturioris ætatis pleraque jam à me de omnimoda philoſophia exierunt opera ex academicorum peripateticorumque fontibus hauſta, hæc quoque juvenilia ſtudia noſtra ſua aliquando mercede non defraudarentur. - - - - My commentaries on various hiſtory, which I compoſed while very young, with great pains in examining both Latin and Greek authors, and at that time laid by, I do now publiſh, that ſince the greateſt part of the works of my maturer years on all ſorts of philoſophical ſubjects, derived from the fountains of the Academics and Peripatetics have been made public, theſe ſtudies of my youth alſo may at laſt meet with their due reward.’

OBSERVATION concerning juvenile works.

Here is an author who had the prudence not to publiſh his juvenile productions before he had acquired a great reputation by his works compoſed in his riper years. This is a very wiſe conduct; for there are few authors who do not repent the precipitation with which they hurry their firſt eſſays into the world, even before the down begins to appear on their chin. Grotius, who perhaps had the leaſt reaſon of any body, to repent of it, was in extreme confuſion on this account. This is the confeſſion he makes in a letter, wherein he praiſes Scriverius for the contrary conduct. ‘Quo rependam non habeo, ex quo tandem reſipiſcere cœpi ab ea inſania, quæ mihi cum aliis nonnullis communis fuit, ut cœca quadam innoteſcendi libidine nihil niſi infamiam meam publicarem, daremque ea mundo ſpectanda, quæ nunc ne ſolus quidem apud me ſine magno pudore & acri doloris ſenſu conſpicio. Tu vero (dicam non ut blandiar, ſed ut raram animi fortitudinem, quam, ſi poſſim, imitari velim, ſane, quod poſſum, probem atque commendem) in annos non doctrinæ tantum, ſed & ſapientiæ capaces, tibi te & publico ſervaſti; & quo nullum maturæ mentis certius eſſe ſignum poteſt, auſus es ita utilitati aliorum ſtudere, ut appareret priorem tibi hujus eſſe quam gloriæ tuæ rationem (6). - - - - I am incapable of making any amends, ſince I have begun to recover from that madneſs which was common to me with ſome others, of publiſhing, out of a blind ambition of being known, my own diſgrace, and of preſenting thoſe pieces to the world which now I cannot read my ſelf without great confuſion and concern. While you (I do not ſpeak it out of flattery, but that your rare fortitude of mind, which ſhould be imitated by me if it were poſſible, may be approved and commended by me ſince that is poſſible) have reſerved the publication of your ſelf and works, to years, that are capable not only of learning but alſo of wiſdom: and which is the moſt certain ſign of a mature underſtanding, you have ventured to ſtudy the publick good in ſuch a manner, that it ſhould appear you had a much greater regard to this than your own glory.’ Thoſe authors who are not quite ſo haſty run a greater riſque; becauſe the world is more inclined to excuſe the faults of writers of 15 than thoſe of 20, or 25 years of age. Theſe therefore ought to take ſpecial care of their firſt book; for if it be worth nothing they will find a thouſand difficulties to retrieve their reputation, and cure the public of their prejudices. If they with Thomæus keep their juvenile compoſures by them till they have eſtabliſhed a good reputation, they may then eaſily paſs an indifferent piece upon the world. They muſt not follow the Italian faſhion, where the lacqueys go before their maſters; but place the fineſt of their equipage in the van, to prepoſſeſs the ſpectators in favour of them, and the remainder will follow in time. They would not loſe the recompence of their firſt labours, if they believed with Thomæus that theſe ought alſo to meet with their reward. It is undeniable, that at a certain pitch of reputation, authors may put off indifferent performances with ſucceſs, which would be laughed at, if publiſhed by perſons not known. But thoſe who make an ill uſe of this prepoſſeſſion of the public are very often deceived. They collect all their papers, they go back even to their moſt trifling manuſcripts, written when they were juſt come from the univerſity; or even while they were ſtudents, and ſend them to the Printer. They at laſt diſguſt all their readers, and ſometimes are more blamed for their laſt books, than they were praiſed for their firſt.

[E] He had a brother whom Pierius Valerianus ranks amongſt the unfortunate learned men.] He would not have been at all inferior to our Thomæus, if he had lived as long: but he died young, and yet he lived long enough to ſuffer a great deal of miſery: ſhort and evil were his days. Let us relate what Valerianus ſays of him, ‘Bartolomæum Leonicum cognomento Fuſcum agnoviſtis, cujus ingenium, & abſolutiſſimam eruditionem omnes admirabamur. Is cum Patavinum bellum, & totius ejus regionis deſolationem, incendiaque devitaſſet, Romæ aliquandiu fuit, ſed, cum neque hic otium, quod ſibi propoſuerat, reperiſſet, in Caſſinatem receſſit ſolitudinem, facta illi à loci illius monachis, quieſcendi copia; ſed, dum hic ſperat ſcripta ſua luculentiſſima maturare, & immortalem ſibi gloriam comparare, paucis poſtquam illuc ſeceſſerat diebus, rapidiſſima correptus febri, cùm ægrotaſſet graviſſimè, valetudinis ejus violentia ſublatus eſt: futurus dubio procul Leonico Thomeo germano fratri non inferior, ſi fata eum diutius in vita eſſe voluiſſent (7). - - - - You knew Bartholomew Leonicus, ſirnamed Brown, whoſe genius and compleat erudition we all admired. This man after he had eſcaped from the Paduan war, and the deſolation and the burning of all that country, made ſome ſtay at Rome, but when he could not there find the leiſure which he wanted, he retired into the ſolitude of mount Caſſin, the Monks of that place giving him a retirement; but whilſt he was in hopes of compleating his excellent writings and of gaining immortal glory, a few days after he retired thither, he was

‘ſuddenly

---

(4) De animalium motione ac ingreſſu: Quæſtiones mechanicæ: Liber primus de partibus animalium: Argumenta in aliquot libros Ariſtotelis parvorum naturalium ex Michaele Epheſio fere tranſlata. Geſner. in Bibliotheca, folio 521. Paul Jovius ſays Scripſit erudite & luculenter Commentarios in parva naturalia Ariſtotelis.

(5) Huet. de claris Interpret. pag. m. 222. See Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latin. pag. 677.

(6) Grotius's letter, in which he thanks Scriverius for a copy of the authors de Re Militari, dated June 8, 1607, in my edition it is at the beginning. To this example of Grotius, add thoſe alledged by Mr Baillet, in the firſt Tome of the Jugemens des Sçavans, Part. ii, ch. ix, des Prejugez de l'age.

(7) Pier. Valerianus, de Literatorum Infelicitate. lib. ii, pag. m. 84.

‘ ſuddenly ſeized with a fever, and the violence of his ‘ diſtemper carried him off. Had he lived longer, he ‘ would have undoubtedly equalled his brother Leonicus ‘ Thomæus.’

THOMAS (Paul) Sieur de Girac, ſon of Paul Thomas Sieur de Maiſonette [A], was a very learned man, a good neighbour, and hearty friend to Balzac. The fame of his wit and learning had never perhaps extended beyond the walls of Engoulême his native place, if he had not criticiſed the works of Voiture: but this critical piece, though a ſmall diſſertation, occaſioned a long controverſy which made a great noiſe in the world. Coſtar, Voiture's friend, had no ſooner ſeen this diſſertation, but he undertook to refute it. This deſign, which he executed very ſlowly, and with abundance of artifice, as it is ſaid, ſucceeded to his wiſh [B]. He publiſhed a defence of Voiture which was very much eſteemed [C]. Girac thought himſelf obliged to reply; and he did not make uſe of Latin, as he had done in his firſt diſſertation, but defended himſelf in French, the language in which Coſtar had publiſhed the apology for his friend. The deſign of Girac's anſwer (a) was not only to defend his criticiſm on Voiture's letters, but alſo to cenſure ſome faults of Coſtar. For this reaſon the latter replied in two pieces, one of which was an apology for himſelf, and the other the ſequel of his defence of Voiture. His adverſary returned to the charge, and publiſhed a large volume againſt that Sequel. The controverſy went no further; and indeed it had been carried to the greateſt extremities which the French language is capable of bearing on ſerious ſubjects. Coſtar was a rallying wit, who when he began to ſtrike, gave heavy blows. He made both Balzac and Girac feel the weight of them in his firſt defence. An author, when he is piqued, commonly imagines that he does not take ſufficient revenge, unleſs the ſtrokes he returns are heavier than thoſe he has received. Girac followed this principle in his anſwer, as did Coſtar likewiſe in his new defences; and Girac anſwering them in the ſame ſtrain, carried the invective to the higheſt pitch. To meet with books more abuſive than this reply, we muſt have recourſe either to thoſe who write in Latin, or to thoſe who have written in French not long ago in ſome towns of Holland, which I will not name. Girac had the advantage of ſtriking the firſt and the laſt blow. There was another thing which evidently proved that the victory was on his ſide, and this was Coſtar's

[A] The ſon of Paul Thomas Sieur de Maiſonnette.] Mr de Girac's father was born at Jarnac (1), but lived at Engoulême; he underſtood Hebrew very well, as appears by theſe words of Jarrige: Father Beaufés having laſt year received from one of our miniſters a letter in Hebrew, travelled all night from Ruffec to Angoulême, to get it tranſlated and anſwered by Mr Thomas de Maiſonnette, a learned man, who is perfectly acquainted with that language. This honeſt gentleman cannot deny the truth of what I ſay (2). Mr Colomiés (3) cites this paſſage of Jarrige, and ſays (4), that he had read Mr de Maiſonnette's poems with pleaſure, and that Balzac praiſed him in his Latin letters (5), as did alſo Nicolas Bourbon.

[B] This deſign, which he executed very ſlowly, and with abundance of artifice, as it is ſaid, ſucceeded to his wiſh.] A little after the impreſſion of Voiture's works, Balzac, who, perhaps could not ſee the good reception they met with, without chagrin, deſired Mr Girac to give him his opinion of them. Mr Girac, in complaiſance to his friend, wrote a Latin diſſertation on that ſubject, and Balzac communicated it to Coſtar, to have his ſentiment of it. Coſtar thought this a favourable opportunity of ſignalizing himſelf, and as he believed that Balzac was not diſpleaſed that ſome faults had been found in Voiture, he reſolved to make ſuch an apology for the latter, as might indirectly reflect upon the former. But in order to take the ſurer meaſures, He at firſt excuſed himſelf as not being able to give his opinion on Girac's remarks, alledging a thouſand affairs, which deprived him of all leiſure for it. At laſt, ſome years after, and when it was leaſt expected, he ſent his defence in manuſcript to Mr Balzac, conjuring him, that if he found any lines in it which diſpleaſed him, to blot them out, to commit them to the flames, or throw them into the water, for he abſolutely abandoned them to him. In the mean time this book, which is nothing but a ſatire, attacking the reputation of the perſon to whom it is addreſſed, notwithſtanding all the profeſſions of loving and honouring him, was printed, and in every bodies hands, before the manuſcript reached him (6). A paſſage in the Menagiana makes me doubt whether the laſt part of Girac's relation is true. I do not believe that the defence of Voiture was printed before the author ſent the manuſcript copy to Mr de Balzac. For I find this in the Menagiana (7): ‘ Mr de Balzac, . . . ‘ after having obliged Mr de Girac to write in Latin ‘ againſt Voiture's Letters, engaged alſo Mr Coſtar to ‘ undertake the defence of them, and to write againſt ‘ Girac; this was to make ſure of the praiſes of both ‘ parties. I was going through Mans in my return to ‘ Paris, when the Defence was finiſhed. Mr Coſtar ‘ gave me two copies of it, one to be ſent to ‘ Mr Pincheſne, Mr de Voiture's nephew, and the ‘ other, to Mr Conrart. He told me he freely ſubmitted it to all the alterations which his friends would ‘ propoſe, whether it were by adding or retrenching. ‘ One of the copies was communicated to Mr de Balzac, who ſent his corrections. In the mean while ‘ the work was printed, and his corrections not coming ‘ till the impreſſion was finiſhed, he was informed ‘ that they came too late; and the book appeared ‘ ſuch as it was, which gave him ſome uneaſineſs.’ Compare this with Mr Coſtar's account (8); and with a letter of Balzac to Conrart (9), and you will plainly ſee that Balzac received the manuſcript, before the book was printed. This will not hinder ſeveral people from believing that Balzac was impoſed upon, and that all the excuſes grounded upon Voiture's nephew, cauſing the book to be printed without Coſtar's knowledge, are but ſo many inſults. The wars of authors have their ſtratagems, as well as thoſe of princes; and it is probable that this was a ſtratagem of the pen-combatants, which was practiſed on this occaſion againſt Balzac, The impreſſion went on, and was finiſhed in ſpite of the ſtrong oppoſition he made by means of Mr Conrart (10).

[C] Coſtar . . . . publiſhed a Defence of Voiture, which was very much eſteemed.] It may be ſaid that this book made him known to the world; after this, his name was ſpread every where, and, what is much better, by means of this book, he obtained a penſion of five hundred crowns. He could not help, ſays Mr Girac (11), expreſſing on all occaſions, his ſatiſfaction and joy, that he had been acquainted with me. And, indeed, in what corner of France has he not publiſhed, that he was infinitely obliged to me for having given him an opportunity of making himſelf known to the world; and that by my means the eyes of all the learned and polite were fixed on him, and that to me he owed the glory and applauſe which he received from all parts, and what he eſteemed yet much more, that I have been the cauſe of his having gained five hundred crowns? I have ſeen ſeveral of his letters, which are all in the ſame tone, and I have not met with one

(a) He publiſhed it in the year 1655, and joined with it his Latin diſſertation, which had been already printed in the ſecond edition of his Defence of Voiture. I have an edition of this defence printed at Paris in the year 1664, wherein it is ſaid in the advertiſement that this was the firſt time Mr Girac's Latin Diſſertation was publiſhed. How ridiculous it is to affirm this in the year 1664!

(1) Colomeſius, Galliæ Oriental. pag. 183.

(2) Réponſe aux calomnies de Jaques Beaufés, chap. ii.

(3) Colom. Galliæ Oriental. pag. 184.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 183.

(5) Pag. 208, Edit. in 12mo. Quanti oris & quanta ſpiritus, ſays he, Poëta ſit Paulus civis meus, non eſt cur pluribus exemplis apud te probare debeam. After this he cites a paſſage out of a poem on the expedition of the Iſle of Ré.

(6) Girac, Préface de la Réponſe à la Défenſe de Voiture.

(7) Pag. 166, of the firſt Dutch edition.

(8) Suite de la Defenſe, pag. 20, & ſeq.

(6) The xvth of the ivth book, dated the 15th of June 1653.

(10) Ubi ſupra.

(11) Replique à Coſtar, pag. 3, 4, Dutch edition. See alſo the Menagiana, pag. 368, 369.

Coſtar's uſing all his intereſt to obtain of the magiſtrates that his antagoniſt's reply ſhould be ſuppreſſed [D]. The reaſon he alledged that his morals were attacked is, generally ſpeaking, ſomewhat ſpecious ; nevertheleſs in this caſe it was of no force [E] ; for he was of his friends who has not thanked me in his name, for having occaſioned this happy book, which his Eminence had thought worthy of his liberality *. Theſe are his own words in his Epiſtle Dedicatory.

[D] Coſtar uſed all his intereſt to obtain of the magiſtrates, that his antagoniſt's Reply ſhould be ſuppreſſed.] It is leſs ſhameful for a Logician to be guilty of the fault which they call μεταϐάσις ἐις ἄλλο γένος, to ſhift, to run from the queſtion, to ramble out of the way, in order to catch at another difficulty, than it is for a man of wit, after having for ſome time combated with his pen, to quit that weapon, and have recourſe to the arms of the civil magiſtrate. This is viſibly giving ground, quitting the field of battle, and throwing away his ſword and buckler, in order the ſooner to reach a place of refuge, and hide himſelf behind an altar. I am ſurprized that Coſtar, who was a perſon of wit and peneration, did not foreſee that his conduct would meet with this conſtruction, and be compared to that of a Gentleman who, in a quarrel, where his honour is concerned, ſhould apply himſelf to the civil magiſtrate, inſtead of having recourſe to his ſword. He anſwered, and replied to the criticiſm on Voiture, he treated his adverſary as ill as he pleaſed, he charged him with a thouſand faults, and after having taken the greateſt liberty which the Republic of Letters allowed him, he betook himſelf to the Lieutenant-Civil, to hinder his adverſary from making his defence, and uſing the ſame liberty. This was a loud injuſtice ; but the fear which ſuch a conduct betrayed was yet more apparent than the injuſtice of it. Girac was not ſilent on this head ; he ſufficiently inſulted his adverſary. 'What is become, ſays he (12), of the generous ſentiments of this bravo, who, not long ago, ſtiled himſelf a gentleman of Pomerania, and Orondates junior † ; who boaſted of his feats, and of always having the ſacred laws of antient chivalry, ſo deeply engraven in his mind, that it was impoſſible for him to violate or infringe them. If theſe frivolous and ridiculous imaginations are evaporated, and Mr Coſtar's brain is no longer troubled with ſuch viſions, does he not ſee, (to expreſs myſelf in plainer terms), to what confuſion and ſcandal a man of letters, as he is, expoſes himſelf, who, when accuſed of a thouſand inſtances of ignorance, a thouſand blunders, and a thouſand abſurdities, recurs to the civil magiſtrate, and to his intereſt, to ſuppreſs the books which convict him, inſtead of defending his opinions, or owning his errors?' He made another advantage of the great confuſion and diſorder which appeared in the conduct of his adverſary. 'This diſorder, ſays he (13), appeared very plainly through the whole courſe of his proceeding, but nothing publiſhed it more effectually, than the proteſtation he made ſo publickly ⸸, never to read, while he lived, any thing which went under my name. For if his hatred or contempt of me was ſo great, that he would never look on any of my books, why does he give himſelf ſo much trouble to hinder their publication? Why does he ſo loudly proteſt ‡, that in the purſuit of ſo vaſt a deſign which he propoſed, he will not be diverted by the way ; that the ſtones which I ſhall throw at him will not be able to ſtop him ; that he ſhould have a heap of them to denote his victory, and that tho' I ſhould continue to fling at him, he would not ſo much as turn his head. However, neither the ſacred obligation of an oath, nor ſuch a ſolemn proteſtation could hinder him from reading my book, nay, from bribing my Printer, in order to get all the ſheets of my book, as faſt as printed off. But, to continue his allegory, I had ſcarce taken this fatal ſling into my hand, but this intrepid, this terrible and haughty Goliah was ſo ſhamefully ſtruck with fear, that he cried out for help, and implored the aſſiſtance of the civil magiſtrate. Yet this hope will be in vain, and I deſire no other proofs of his flight and of victory, if I may ſo call the defeat of ſo cowardly an enemy, than the pains he takes to avoid me.'

[E] The reaſon he alledged . . . . was nevertheleſs of no force.] Let us hear Girac a little farther (14). 'By what authority therefore does he preſume to preſcribe authors, and act the tyrant in an empire, which hath always maintained the poſſeſſion of an entire and perfect liberty? It is, indeed, an unprecedented attempt, and worthy of the arrogance of my adverſary. For though he covered his deſign with a more ſpecious pretext, and took other meaſures to obtain that ſentence, in which he now triumphs, it is impoſing on the judge and the world, to perſuade them that he was forced to take thoſe meaſures, by the pretended calumnies caſt on his religion and morals. And he muſt ſurely be a very nice man to complain of two or three ſhort letters which I have made uſe of, when he cannot deny that he wrote them, and at the ſame time muſt own that what he himſelf has printed on theſe matters is much more ſhameful and ſcandalous. Beſides, they were in the hands of all the curious, and publickly read in every province where Mr Coſtar is known.' After having alledged ſome other reaſons to juſtify the uſe he made of theſe letters, he goes on in this manner (15) : 'It muſt therefore be, becauſe he bluſhes to ſee his fraud, inſincerity, falſe learning, and miſunderſtanding of authors detected. He is concerned to find himſelf diſturbed in that fine, general, and long enjoyed reputation, which he fancies he poſſeſſed without any interruption, and that the enchantments and illuſions by which he made a bad cauſe appear good, will no longer prove effectual. He knows very well that his fine language, the only thing that has any charm in his writings, will no longer impoſe upon the credulous. He is apprehenſive that inſtead of lofty epithets of illuſtrious, the ornament of France, and the glory of our age, he ſhould be taken for an ignoramus, a giddy-headed man, and a plagiary. Theſe are the genuine motives which made him take the reſolution of having recourſe to chicanery, as the laſt refuge of a deſperate cauſe, amidſt the trouble, confuſion and diſorder to which he is reduced.' Some, perhaps, may ſay, that Côſtar was not ſo unjuſt as certain perſons, to deſire that he might be allowed to write againſt his adverſary, but his adverſary not allowed to anſwer him (16). He was willing that the Lieutenant-Civil ſhould include him in the prohibition, and make an order that neither Mr Coſtar nor Mr Girac ſhould, for the future, write againſt one another : but this is ſaying very little in favour of Coſtar ; for having publiſhed all he had to ſay, he could be very little affected by a prohibition of writing any more. His advantage was to have his adverſaries hands tied up. 'Truly, ſays Mr Girac (17), it is not an eaſy matter to conceive what could oblige the Lieutenant-Civil, to order that Mr Coſtar and I ſhould not, for the future, write againſt one another ; when I had not yet began to defend myſelf (18), and my adverſary had publiſhed three large volumes, in which he had treated me in ſo opprobrious a manner, and loaded me with ſo much calumny, that I muſt of neceſſity either refute him, or ſuffer very greatly in my reputation. I muſt allow a ſchool-maſter, who ſcarce knows the firſt elements and principles of Science, to raiſe himſelf on my ruins, and procure himſelf an eſteem at my expence. So that whatever reſolution I may have taken to ſtifle my juſt complaints againſt the injury which has been done me ; I cannot help ſaying of this ſentence of the Lieutenant-Civil what an excellent perſon  ſaid long ago of that of a certain Emperor. This ſentence deſtroys itſelf, it confounds and overturns all things, and, under the pretext of a fallacious humanity, covers an extreme and unprecedented rigour. It binds the hands of the accuſed, in order to deliver him up a prey to his enemies ; it robs oppreſſed innocence of what the ſevereſt laws never refuſed to the moſt guilty criminal, as it takes away all poſſible means of juſtification, by impoſing ſilence on the perſon accuſed. It forbids Mr Coſtar to ſay any thing more to me, after he has ſo long worn out my patience, and tired his own cruelty and rage with abuſing me. Was there ever a more captious, more unjuſt, or more deceitful contrivance?' I muſt obſerve to my reader, that Girac does not forget the paſſage of Tacitus concerning Cremutius Cordus. Thus he was not accuſed without proof [F], and that ought rather to have engaged the judges to

---

* Epiſt. Dedic. to the Suite de la Deff.

(12) In his firſt letter to Mr de Montauſier at the beginning of his reply, fol. * 3 verſo.

† Sequel of the defence, pag. 12, l. 366.

(13) Girac, ibid.

⸸ Sequel. pag. 424.

‡ L. 334.

(14) Girac, ubi ſupra, fol. * 5 verſo.

(15) Ibid.

(16) See the book intituled La Chimere de la Cabale de Rotterdam démontrée, pag. 65, of the preface.

(17) Girac, ubi ſupra.

(18) This muſt be underſtood of the ſequel of the defence of Voiture and of Coſtar's apology. The The lieutenant's ſentence preceded Girac's reply in this reſpect, but before this ſentence, Girac had anſwered the defence of Voiture. Wherefore he does not expreſs himſelf exactly.

 Tertullian, in his apology.

he ſhews, in the conduct of his adverſary, not only a great deal of injuſtice, but alſo a great deal of imprudence; for Tacitus obſerves, that the prohibition of a book gains it a reputation.

A REFLEXION on the conduct of authors, who procure the prohibition of the books of their adverſaries.

It is evident, that an author who employs the authority of the civil magiſtrate, for the prohibition of books written againſt him, manifeſtly betrays his defeat and inability to anſwer, while he increaſes the curioſity of the public after thoſe very books. Why then do ſo many authors recur to this method, when they have intereſt enough to make it effectual. Is it a very agreeable thing, to declare to all the world that they are not able to reſiſt an author who is their adverſary? Can ſelf-love find it's account in raiſing a deſire to read thoſe books in ſeveral people, who would otherwiſe never hear of them, and who buy them on no other account but becauſe they are informed that thoſe books are prohibited? Can ſelf-love, I ſay, which is ſo angry at the contents of them, and ſo eager to ſtifle the memory of them, find it's account in putting the public upon enquiring more curiouſly into the particulars contained in them? What charm can there be in publiſhing a ſentence of prohibition of certain books in the Gazettes? Is not this the way to proclaim to all Europe the ſhameful neceſſity a man lies under of imploring that aſſiſtance of the civil magiſtrate, which he ought only to ſeek from his pen (19)? I think it may be ſaid, in anſwer to theſe queſtions, that the authors who take ſuch meaſures, find no great ſatisfaction in them at the bottom. It is only a laſt ſhift, to which they give the moſt comfortable turn they poſſibly can. They endeavour to regain, by their own intereſt, what they have loſt by the pen of their adverſaries. They would keep the populace on their ſide; the populace, I ſay, who are always prone to judge the ſtrongeſt party in the right: they would prevent the attacks of other adverſaries; for how many perſons are there who are ſilent on the injuſtice of a man, only in proportion to the good or ill he is able to do by his intereſt? Not to ſay that they hope a great many unwary readers will conclude that a book which is prohibited, muſt be ſtuffed with falſities. It is true, that ſeveral people are guilty of this wretched reaſoning; for they do not conſider that the civil magiſtrates, even when they ſuppreſs a book for prudential reaſons, and agreeably to their regulations, do not pretend to prejudice the public againſt the facts contained in it, for they take no cognizance of them, nor do they pretend to be judges of them. This ſeems to me one of the principle motives which engages certain authors to hold the ſame conduct with Coſtar; a conduct far from being honourable, to ſay no worſe of it, and entirely ſophiſtical. Is it not a meer ſophiſtry to change the ſtate of the queſtion? Was the diſpute between Coſtar and Girac any way concerning their greater or leſs credit with the Judges of the Chatelet? Did Mr Girac, confined within his province, pretend to have more friends, or greater intereſt than his adverſary in the capital city, in order to ſollicit a proceſs? The queſtion was, whether Voiture's thoughts were right or wrong, whether he had been ſtrongly cenſured, and weakly defended, or the reverſe. What does it avail in this queſtion, to have intereſt enough with the Lieutenant-Civil to get a book ſuppreſſed?

[F] He was not accuſed without proof.] It ill becomes a paſtor, a prieſt, a miniſter, to employ his pen on ſubjects of gallantry and pleaſantry. For which reaſon Mr Coſtar, who was a prieſt, had the cure of ſouls, and was an Arch-deacon (20), forgot his character, and all the rules of decency, when he employed his wit in being waggiſh with the fair ſex, and interſperſed his letters with a great many wanton ſtories. His adverſary cruelly perſecuted him on this head; if a war ſo juſtly founded deſerves the name of perſecution. On this paſſage, in a letter of Coſtar to a maid, Your nimble feet dance in perfection, they help you to fly top over tail, to ſhew the forked tree, and repreſent a thouſand other fine ſights. Girac ſays (21), that when the Arch-deacon ſaw this young lady in ſo pleaſant a poſture, he was not ſo hard-hearted as that hermit (22), who turned the hair of ſome young girls perfectly grey, becauſe they laughed at his not daring to ſee them naked. Mr Coſtar (ſays he) is too gallant a man to impoſe ſuch ſevere penances on the ladies; and if ſuch an adventure ſhould happen to him, I dare ſwear for him, he would ſooner wiſh that he had not a grey hair himſelf, than cover the heads of thoſe poor wretches with them (23). He will not pardon this Arch-deacon for ſaying in a letter to a lady, where he repreſents himſelf at the point of death. I cannot tell where I ſhall undergo my purgatory; it would be a moſt agreeable conſolation, if I might be permitted to undergo it in your chamber. I ſhould have ſo much pleaſure to ſee you ſo charming, &c (24). Nor will he pardon the pity which Coſtar expreſſes for one of the Graces on account of her huſband's impotence. ‘He rails againſt the Poets for their cruelty, and even impertinence in marrying one of the Graces to Vulcan, and another to Sleep. However, continues he, the firſt was not wholly diſconſolate, if what a Queen of the Amazons ſaid be true, that lame men kiſs beſt, ἄριϛα χωλὸς οἰφεῖ. But he deplores the miſerable condition of the ſecond, ſince Virgil has told us, that ſleep is ſoft, & ſomno mollior herba. What an excellent quality is this in the huſband of a goddeſs everlaſtingly young! It was a great happineſs for him that Paſithea (ſo ſhe is called) was ſolutâ zonâ, as were all the Graces, & ſolutis Gratiæ Zonis, or elſe

Quærendum aliunde foret (nervoſius illud)
 Quod poſſet zonam ſolvere virgineam (25).

He will not forgive Coſtar the explication he had given of theſe words in Horace (26), Bacchum in remotis carmina rupibus Vide docentem. I have recited it in the article SICYONE. He is charged with yet groſſer impurities, extracted from his printed works (27); he is even cenſured for a letter he wrote to his Phyſician. This indeed was not printed; but as he diſtributed copies of it every where (28), his adverſary made no ſcruple to charge him publickly with it. He had ſtill ſome remains of a fever on him, and finding two nights ſucceſſively that nature revived, he wrote this agreeable news to his Phyſician (29), deſiring to be informed whether he might rely on an old proverb, which repreſents this ſymptom as a ſign of recovery. As this letter is ſhort, and in Latin, I ſhall make no difficulty to print it at large: ‘Febris mea longè remiſſior fuit quàm fuerat hactenus, hac nocte placidiſſimè quievi, haud ſcio an uſquam melius. Sub ortum Solis (neque enim tibi & medico & amiciſſimo viro quicquam reticere æquum eſt) valida tentigine, & ſatis diuturna & non inſuavi, quod & heri acciderat, correptus ſum. Luſit animus aliquantulùm in umbra voluptatis, ſed ne de Theologo malè ſentias, dormiebam. Vides, mi colendiſſime ſeu potius mi jucundiſſime ſenex, nondum in me funeratam eſſe eam partem corporis, cui apodixin defunctoriam ſcribere paratus eram. Vetus verbum eſt, id jam jam redituræ ſanitatis argumentum indubitatum eſſe. Verum uni tibi plus credo quàm univerſis adagiis. Si commodum eſt ad me reſcribas velim hac de re quid ſentias, hoc eſt quid ſentire debeam. Ride, vale, & me ama, alioquin nec ridebo, nec valebo (30). - - - My fever is very much abated, and I do not remember that I ever had a better night in my life than the laſt. About ſun-riſe (for I ought to conceal nothing from you, who are my Phyſician and intimate friend) I was ſeized with a ſtrong tenſion, which was of ſome continuance as well as pleaſure; and I met with the ſame ſymptom yeſterday. My mind ſported a little in the ſhadow of pleaſure, but that you may ſuſpect nothing amiſs in a Divine, I aſſure you I ſlept. You find, my worthy, or rather my merry old friend, that I have not yet buried that part of the body, for which I was preparing to write an epitaph. The old proverb makes it an undoubted ſign of returning health. But I rely more upon your opinion than all the proverbs in the world. I beg you would write to me, if you conveniently can, and let me know what you think of this matter, that is, what I ought to think of it myſelf. Laugh, farewel, and love me, otherwiſe I ſhall neither laugh, nor farewel.’ Balzac having read this letter, wrote to Coſtar, among other things, as follows. ‘Now, that I ſee by your's to Mr le Gouſt, that you are not content with health alone, but pretend to vigour, and look rather like a ſtout wreſtler than a man who is barely well, I do not know, &c (31).’ It muſt be owned that theſe reproaches regarded Mr Coſtar's morals; but this was no reaſon why to licenſe than to prohibit Girac's book [G]. Patin has not ſpoken very exactly of this diſpute [H]. One cannot ſufficiently wonder at the nicety of Voiture's friends; they pretended that Girac for daring to criticiſe upon him, deſerved Military execution [I]. The paſſage which proves this, informs us that this author was rich. The ſame thing is affirmed in a paſſage of Balzac [K]. What I have ſaid concerning Mr de Girac in the

---

(19) Between author and author, the weapons ought to be equal, each ought to have recourſe to his pen alone. He may be allowed to ſay dextra mihi Deus & ferrum quod miſſile libro: (Virgil. Æn. lib. x, ver. 773.) If he ſays, I will have recourſe to the civil magiſtrate and to my intereſt with the gods of the earth, he is like a champion who arms himſelf againſt a naked man.

(20) Girac's Reply §. iii, pag. 15.

(21) Ibid. pag. 19.

(22) He cites Theodoret's Hiſt. Relig.

(23) Ubi ſupra, pag. 20.

(24) Coſtar, Letter clxxxviii, Tom. i.

(25) Girac, ubi ſupra, pag. 22.

(26) Od. XIX, lib. ii.

(27) See the Entretiens de Coſtar & de Voiture, pag. 200. Girac's Reply, pag. 23, 24, and the New Letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm, pag. 748.

(28) Girac, pag. 21.

(29) His name was Mr le Gouſt, a Phyſician of Niort.

(30) Girac, ibid.

(31) Balzac, Lettres Choiſies, Part. ii, Lett. iii, pag. 562, cited by Girac, ibid.

why the Chatelet ought to ſuppreſs Mr Girac's Reply, ſince it could not paſs for a libel; for the author puts his name to it, and proved his accuſations.

[G] And that ought rather to have engaged the Judges to licenſe than to prohibit Girac's book.] A critical book, which ſtrongly repreſents to a Prieſt, the ill uſe he makes of his time and wit, is no unprofitable work. On the contrary, the public good ſeems to require that there ſhould be men bold enough to cenſure thoſe Eccleſiaſtics whoſe life is not conformable to their profeſſion. Now it is leading a life very inconſiſtent with the duty of a Prieſt, who had the cure of ſouls, and was an Arch-deacon, as Mr Coſtar was, to ſet up for a wit, and to ſpend the beſt part of his time in reading books of gallantry, and writing, what they call fine things, to ladies and gentlemen. This ought to be left to the Voitures and the Sarrazins, and, in general, to thoſe who are not of a profeſſion which forbids their meddling with trifles. Or if the inclination be ſtrongly bent, and the perſon have a happy talent that way, he ought to keep in a lay-ſtation; and then he is free to make as many verſes, and write as many letters of gallantry as he pleaſes. He may jeſt and trifle in his books at diſcretion, and laugh at the ſour cenſurer who is diſpleaſed with it. But if he enters upon an eccleſiaſtical life, and takes on him the charge of ſouls, or is only in orders, he ought not to play the galant, either with his tongue, or his pen. Nay, methinks it were to be wiſhed that the rewards which the Voitures, the Sarrazins, and other fine wits, have a juſt claim to, were not aſſigned them out of the revenues of the Church, as they are very frequently (32). It was never the intention of thoſe who enriched the Church, that the eſtates which they beſtowed on her ſhould furniſh a recompence for amorous poetry, romances, or plays. Do you believe that thoſe who ſtraitned their families, to beſtow an eaſy life on ſuch as ſerve at the altar, ever deſigned to maintain wits who turn their ſtudies the ſame way as Coſtar, and employ their pens as he did? Do you believe, I ſay, that they deſigned give ſuch authors wherewithal to keep an open table, with every thing nice and good (33)? Upon the whole, it cannot be denied that ſuch a book, as Coſtar's Reply, was very proper to correct the abuſes, and, for the future, to prevent a clergyman's diſtributing copies of a letter, in which he acquaints his Phyſician of the reſurrection of a member, the mortification of which ought to have been one of his greateſt concerns. It appears, by Balzac's reflexion, that the author of the letter wanted to be congratulated on the return of his amorous dreams. What an exceſſive indecency was this! Had he only deſired to be praiſed for imitating Petronius in that letter, would he not have deſerved to be cenſured?

[H] Patin has not ſpoken very exactly of this diſpute.] Theſe are his words (34). ‘They are printing a ſecond tome of Mr Coſtar's letters. Mr Paul Thomas, Sieur de Girac, Counſellor of the Preſidial of Angoulême (35), and an intimate friend of Mr Balzac had a diſpute with Mr Coſtar in defence of Balzac againſt Voiture. There is ſome thing of it printed. Mr Girac has anſwered him, and ſent hither his copy. Mr Coſtar having notice of it, preſented a petition to hinder the impreſſion of the book, and obtained an order againſt the printing of it: nay what was already begun was ſeized; and yet Balzac has the better of Voiture.’ Who would not infer from theſe words that Voiture was engaged in a controverſy with Balzac, and that Girac appeared as Protector of the latter againſt the former? This is very falſe. Voiture never had any diſpute with Balzac: Balzac, after Voiture's death, critized his famous ſonnet of Urania, but this was not the ſubject of the quarrel between Coſtar and Girac. If Guy Patin was not better informed in his other news from the Republic of Letters, than this, woe be to them who rely on him. Sorel had much better intelligence: he gives an account of the affair exactly as it was (36), and does not forget to tell us that Mr Girac's laſt reply, though the impreſſion of it was ſtopped, had lately been publiſhed (37). Some are of opinion, adds he, that Mr Girac is in the right to defend himſelf; others ſay, he ought not to have continued this quarrel after the death of Coſtar, who cannot reply. Theſe laſt words are liable to cenſure. Sorel ſpeaks of Girac as of a man who was living in the year 1667, when he had been dead four years. He ſpeaks of his Reply as of a work juſt publiſhed; and yet there had been an edition of it (38) in the year 1660. He ought to have blamed thoſe who cenſured Girac for continuing this war after Coſtar's death. Such cenſurers were very unreaſonable, ſince Girac's reply was printed in Coſtar's life-time; and if it was not ſold, this was becauſe Coſtar had intereſt enough to hinder it. Was it therefore juſt, under pretence that he was dead, that is to ſay, that he could no longer oppreſs his adverſary by his intereſt with the Chatelet, to deprive the author of his right of publiſhing his vindication, and the Bookſeller of the means of recovering the money laid out in the impreſſion?

[I] Voiture's friends .... pretended .... that Girac .... deſerved military execution.] Coſtar informs us of it (39). ‘To ſpeak truth, a man of this humour is very liable to be beaten (I mean with the tongue and pen) for we do not live in an age ſo licentious as that, when the Roman young gentlemen walked in the ſtreets the whole day, with long rods concealed under their robes, to chaſtiſe the inſolence of thoſe who did not approve of the Poet Lucilius, if ſuch people were ſo unhappy as to fall in their way (40). Nevertheleſs Mr Girac is in danger of quartering ſome Gens d'Armes, if they paſs through Angoulême; and I wonder that he who is not very neglectful of his intereſt, and is very careful of his affairs, ſhould forget the Captain who told him two or three years ago: out of reſpect to the Marquis de Montauſier I will prevent my company quartering upon you: he is a Lord to whom I owe every thing; but it is on condition that you do not pretend to write any more againſt Voiture (41). I can hardly imagine what could make Mr Girac ſo little afraid of thoſe menaces, unleſs he fancied that being a celebrated author, he had no occaſion for the recommendation of any body, and that his book alone would prove an inviolable ſafe-guard againſt the ſoldiers.’ He afterwards alledges the regard Alexander had for Pindar's houſe, and that of Alphonſus King of Arragon for a ſeat of Cicero, and concludes with theſe words. I know all this, and ſomething more; and yet if Mr de Girac was my friend, I would not adviſe him to depend on theſe great examples, but to take better ſecurities againſt the Captain, Protector, and Avenger of the Wits. Can any thing be more extravagant than this Captain's pretenſion? He would have all the world approve Voiture; and no fault to be found in the works of that author, and he threatned to quarter his company upon the village of him who ſhould dare to criticize upon this fine genius. Is not this a fine way of revenging a friend? Is not this introducing a military government into the Republic of Letters, the moſt free ſtate in the world? Behold the effects of prepoſſeſſion! Voiture's relations and friends had a mind to ſet him up for the Pope of Wit, and to conſtitute him in all matters which came within that province, an infallible rule of Orthodoxy. They ought at leaſt to have been contented with the excommunications of Parnaſſus againſt thoſe who ſhould diſpute the infallibility of ſuch a Pontif. But they threatned them with the quartering of ſoldiers. A ſtrange way of converting Heretics in wit! Does not this reſemble the French dragooning?

[K] The ſame thing is affirmed in a paſſage of Balzac.] Girac anſwering his adverſary on the threats of this Captain revenger of the wits, declares, That he had hitherto been ſo happy as to have no ſoldiers quartered in his village (42). He was therefore Lord of a village (43). By what follows, it appears that his lands the project of this Dictionary, ſhall be one of the remarks of this article [L]. You will find in it the time of his death, and with what reſtriction we are to underſtand an encomium beſtowed on him on account of his knowledge in the oriental languages.

---

(32) See the article BENSERADE, remark [E], and the article RONSARD, remark [O].

(33) The Menagiana, pag. 90, of the firſt Dutch edition, ſays this of Mr Coſtar.

(34) In a letter dated October 25, 1658, being the lxxiv of the firſt edition, and the cxxii, of the ſecond.

(35) This does not agree with Girac's letter to Mr de Montauſier, dated March the 1ſt, 1659. (It is at the beginning of his Reply) where he ſays. Having all my life profeſſed my hatred of law-ſuits, and that I would, as much as poſſible, ſeek for that tranquillity and eaſe of mind, which are incompatible with the fatigues, the tricks and quirks of the bar; I heartily renounce the proſecution of injuries which I have received. See alſo his Reply, §. xii, pag. 93.

(36) Biblioth. Françoiſe, ch. vii, laſt ſection.

(37) Ibid. pag. 142, edition of 1667.

(38) At Leyden, in 8vo.

(39) Sequel of the Defence, pag. 40, 41.

(40) See the article LUCILIUS, remark [P].

(41) Girac anſwers this in §. xii, pag. 93.

(42) Replique, §. xii, pag. 93.

(43) This village was near Engoulême, Girac, ib.

The judgment of Mr Chevreau concerning theſe two celebrated combatants, Girac and Coſtar, gives all the advantage to the former [M]. I doubt not but that the moſt intelligent judges would agree with Chevreau, if they would take the pains to examine all the pieces of this controverſy: Thoſe who ſhould ſearch to the bottom of this diſpute, would probably find a new reaſon to paſs ſentence againſt Coſtar, for uſing Mr Balzac very ill. He is ſeverely cenſured for it in the preface to Balzac's Entretiens. Mr du Rondel, who from his youth has been a great admirer of Balzac, and does yet continue ſo as much as ever [N], was ſo incenſed at this conduct of Coſtar, that he hardly forbore writing againſt him.

lands were very well wooded. (44) The paſſage in the Diſſertation which you deſire ſhould be cleared, is a piece of his Hiſtory. Thoſe Silvæ which now employ Mr de Girac (45), are not metaphorical, and of the ſame nature with thoſe of Statius or Politian. But in the common language, it is a wood which he has felled, and ſold for 1500 Piſtoles (46). But what will Diana and the nymphs, the Dryads and Hamadryads, Pan and the Sylvans, ſay of all this? If the whole train of petty gods could but find a Poet at their devotion, what Elegiac complaints, what Iambic imprecations would be levelled againſt another Poet, who ſo cruelly drives them from their antient abode, who wounds and murders the nymphs with the hard blows of the ax, and gives them the laſt fatal ſtroke, by felling the ſacred trees in which they inhabited?

Non ſine Hamadriadis fato, proſtrata bipenni
Alta cadit quercus: clauſam ſub cortice Nympham
Mors eadem plantamque manet.

When the ſharp ax fells down a lofty oak,
Some Hamadryad feels the fatal ſtroke:
The nymph who lives within the bark conceal'd
Meets the ſame death to which the tree muſt yield.

[L] What I have ſaid . . . . in the project of this Dictionary ſhall be one of the remarks of this article.] I declared very freely that I thought Mr Girac was in the wrong to blame Coſtar on account of the marrow of the lions, wherewith ſeveral authors ſay that Achilles was fed: and thereupon I made the following remark. By this we do not pretend to derogate from his merit, or adjudge the victory to his adverſary. If, on the one ſide, Coſtar's thoughts ſeem more ſhining and brightned by the ſun of the capital city, as Mr Balzac would ſay, it appears, on the other ſide, that Monſieur de Girac had more learning. It was a great loſs that he died ſo young. In a word, I very readily ſubſcribe with Mr Colomiés (47), but with the reſtriction hereafter mentioned, to the fine elogy which Mr de Balzac beſtows on Mr de Girac in one of his Latin letters, and which Mr Colomiés cites (48), as well as to the praiſes which Balzac gives him in French (49), and to thoſe which Father Gaudin has beſtowed on him in the Preface to his Dictionary (50). According to that Preface Mr de Girac died the ſecond of January 1663. Mr Colomiés, ſays he, died in April following. However his death ſhould not have been wholly unknown, as it was to Sorel, when he publiſhed his Bibliotheque Françoiſe, in the year 1664, and when he renewed and enlarged it in 1667, where he treats (51) very fully of the controverſy betwixt Coſtar and Girac; on this head ſee alſo Guy Patin's ſeventy-fourth letter. The difference amongſt authors concerning the death of illuſtrious men is incredible. And yet this ſubject does not ſeem liable to many variations.

The reſtriction I promiſed is as follows. Mr de Balzac writing to Scipio le Gaillard (ſo Mr Coſtar (52) explains Balzac's Scipioni jucundo) ſays that Mr Girac underſtood Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, beyond what is poſſible to conceive. 'Habeo jam certe quicum non 'ſolum ſuaviſſimo ſermone horas conſumo, ſed etiam 'à quo recedo ſemper & melior & doctior. Paulum 'Thomam à Giraco, paternâ virtute, ſua virtute cla'riſſimum; rerum divinarum & humanarum cogni'tione inſtructum, à prima adoleſcentia: litteris La'tinis, Græcis, Hebraicis ſuprà quam credibile eſt, 'ornatum; omnibus denique & naturæ & artis præ'ſidiis ad dicendum, ad ſcribendum paratum (53).--- 'I now have one with whom I not only ſpend my hours 'in the moſt agreeable manner, but alſo from whom I 'always depart both wiſer and better. Paul Thomas de 'Girac, famous both for his family's virtues and his 'own; inſtructed from his infancy in all ſort of learning 'both divine and human; ſkilled in Latin, Greek, and 'Hebrew, above what can be imagined; and qualified 'both for ſpeaking and writing with all accompliſhments 'both natural and acquired.' Mr Coſtar taking occaſion from this character to rally his adverſary, repreſented (54) him deeply engaged in the bulky volumes of the Latins, Greeks, Hebrews, Arabians, &c. leſs ſenſible of the beauties of modern authors, than of thoſe that appear in ſome dead or oriental language, and ſpending the beſt of his time on a ſcholiaſt on Lycophron, or perhaps on Rabbi Nepthalim; whereupon Mr Girac makes this fair confeſſion to him: You think perhaps, ſays he (55), to reproach me with an odious thing, which, if it were true, I ſhould take for a great honour; but as I always act with ſincerity and truth, you may if you pleaſe be ſatisfied, that my ſtudies are ſcarce yet advanced beyond the Greek and Latin tongues; that I ſcarce underſtand the principles of the Hebrew tongue, and am intirely ignorant of the Arabic and Oriental languages, which you mention to cry me down. This was acting like a man of honour who would not take advantage of the flatteries of his friend, to impoſe on the public; he does not deſerve to have theſe words of Horace applied to him, Sed vereor ne cui de te plus quam tibi credas (56).

I fear, when you ſhou'd to yourſelf be known,
You'll truſt another's thoughts more than your own.

This is properly making a good uſe of this diſtich of Cato:

Cum te aliquis laudat, judex tuus eſſe memento:
Plus aliis de te quam tu tibi credere noli.

When others praiſe, you your own judge ſhould be,
Nor credit more than in yourſelf you ſee.

If Mr Colomiés had obſerved Girac's anſwer, he had not placed him in his Gallia Orientalis.

[M] The judgment of Mr Chevreau . . . . gives all the advantage to Girac.] The particulars of this judgment are theſe. 'I dare aver to you . . . . that there 'is a very conſiderable difference betwixt Mr de Gi'rac and Mr Coſtar: The firſt puſhes with all his 'force; and the other ſhuffles and does not parry at 'all: or, to ſpeak plainer, Mr Coſtar does his utmoſt 'to reſiſt truth and reaſon by dint of common-places; 'and contents himſelf with denying what the other 'proves. To re-aſſume the former figure. The one 'charges home and overthrows whatever reſiſts him. 'The other rallies as well as he can, and diſputes 'what he is aſſured never to obtain. The victor is 'aſtoniſhed at the weakneſs of his enemy; and the 'vanquiſhed rallies with no ill grace (57).'

[N] Mr du Rondel is as much as ever an admirer of Balzac.] This is what he wrote to me, on his reading the firſt tome of the Melanges of Vigneul Marville: 'Several other things pleaſe me in this Miſcellany '(58); but there are two or three which I do not 'like; particularly amongſt the reſt what he ſays of 'Balzac. Such a man ſhould not be mentioned with'out reſpect and veneration. Without him our lan'guage at this time would be wavering and uncer'tain; and we are obliged to him for knowing how 'to ſpeak and write. It is true that in the examples

(44) Balzac's Diſſertation to Dom Andr. de St Denys, at the end of his Socrate Chrétien, pag. 201, 202.

(45) In his Diſſertation againſt Voiture, he ſays, Quî enim ego mediis in ſilvis occupatus ruriſque plenus & inficetiarum judicem de homine.

(46) Balzac, ubi ſupra, pag. 203, ſays, My friend, though as great a Poet, and of as elevated a genius as the greateſt Poets, is at preſent employed in more earthly, and meaner thoughts. For a trifle of ſix thouſand crowns, or thereabouts, he has made no conſcience of clearing the ſhades, &c.

(47) Biblioth. Choiſie, pag. 9.

(48) Gallia Orientalis, p. 217.

(49) In a diſcourſe printed with the Socrate Chrétien, pag. m. 198, and the following pages.

(50) Dictionary, French and Latin, printed at Limoges, 1664.

(51) Chap. vii, laſt ſection.

(52) Continuation of the Defence of Voiture, pag. 77.

(53) Balzac, Epiſt. Selectat. pag. m 294.

(54) Coſtar's Defence of Voiture.

(55) Girac's anſwer to the defence of Voiture, pag. 47.

(56) Horat. lib. i, Epiſt. xvi. ver. 19.

(57) Chevreau, Oeuvres mêlées, pag. 350.

(58) He pointed out to me ſeveral places which he liked in that book.

‘ he has left us he ſeems to brave rather than inſtruct us. His elevation is ſo lofty, ſo nervous, ſo majeſtical, and he maintains himſelf ſo well in his height and ſphere, that he is perfectly inacceſſible; but this is not his fault at the bottom. If no body has followed him, this cannot prejudice either the uncommonneſs of his merit, the vigour of his motion, or the beauty of his flight; they rather make him the more remarkable. Let the Voitures be allowed to write prettily, naturally, and in the plain common ſtile; this ſuits very well with them, and they cannot do better. But let us not be angry with Balzac, for being exalted above mankind, by the moſt charming, moſt noble, and moſt glorious attempt that was ever made. Before him the ſublime ſtile was unknown in France, and our language was thought incapable of it. But he has plainly evinced the contrary; and becauſe in opening our eyes he has diſplayed his addreſs and courage, we cannot pardon him the diſcovering our ſtupidity and ſloth. This is the conſequence of converſing with inſenſible wretches; we awake them to our prejudice, and becauſe they cannot deſpiſe us, they will not fail to hate us (59).’

If you find here ſome lively marks of the admiration of Balzac, you may alſo obſerve the fertile effect of ſo juſt an admiration. Mr du Rondel clearly diſcovers that he is able to imitate what he ſo much values in this great model of majeſtic eloquence.

(59) Monſ. du Rondel's Letter from Maeſtricht, dated July 10, 1700.

THORIUS (RAPHAEL) a Phyſician and Latin Poet, flouriſhed in England under the reign of King James the I, (a). He wrote a letter which was printed de cauſa morbi & mortis Iſaaci Caſauboni. His elegy on Caſaubon's death was alſo publiſhed. His Poem on Tobacco is very much eſteem'd [A]. I am of opinion that he did not in the leaſt doubt the truth of the maxim, that water drinkers never make good verſes (b). Perhaps he was never ſo put to it in all his life, as when Mr de Peireſc obliged him to drink a large glaſs of water [B]. King James deſired to hear the ſtory, which is very diverting.

(a) See Colomeſii Opuſcula, pag. m. 162.

(b) Nulla placere diu nec vivere carmina poſſunt, Quæ ſcribuntur aquæ potoribus. Horatius, Epiſt. xix, lib. i, ver. 2.

[A] His Poem on Tobacco is very much eſteemed.] The Oxford catalogue, mentions an Engliſh and Latin edition of it at London 1651 in 8vo. Hymnus Tabaci, or a Poem in honour of Tobacco. Mr Paſch, Philoſophy Profeſſor at Kiel, cites an edition of Utrecht 1644, in 12mo, in the ſixth chapter of his treatiſe de Inventis nov-antiquis (1). Mr Konig ſpeaks of an edition of 1628 in 4to at Leyden (2). But this is not the firſt; for Mr de Zuylichem in the year 1625, wrote ſome verſes in Pœtologiam Raphaelis Thorii. You will find them at the end of Momenta deſultoria. With ſome Latin verſes compoſed by the ſame author and Thorius, one againſt the other by way of an amicable combat.

(1) Pag. 475, of the ſecond edition, which is that of Leipſic, 1700.

(2) Konig, Bibl. pag. 805.

[B] Mr de Peireſc obliged him to drink a large glaſs of water.] Mr Peireſc dining at London with ſeveral learned men, could by no means be excuſed from drinking a health which Dr Thorius drank to him. The glaſs was of a monſtrous ſize, for which reaſon Mr Peireſc excuſed himſelf a long while, and alledged a thouſand reaſons; but he was forced to drink it: Before he did it, he made this bargain that Thorius ſhould drink a health to be propoſed by him in his turn. After he had drank the wine, he filled the ſame glaſs with water, and took it off, firſt naming the health to the Doctor. Thorius had like to have ſunk, as if he had been ſtruck with thunder, but finding no way to avoid it, he fetched ſeveral profound ſighs (3), he put his mouth a thouſand times to the brim of the glaſs, and as often withdrew it. He called to his aſſiſtance all the fine ſayings of the Greek and Latin Poets, and was almoſt the whole day in emptying by repeated trials this accurſed cup. You will find this more agreeably related by Gaſſendus, in the following words. Contigit ut in quodam virorum doctorum convivio, Doctor Thorius ipſi Peireſkio ingenti Scypho præbiberit: Ac ille quidem ſe excuſare, ob vaſtitatem pateræ; ob merum inſolitum; ob imbecillem ſtomachum; ob compotandi infrequentiam: verùm cùm nihil admitteretur, petiit, ut ſaltem ſibi liceret, poſtquàm Thorio feciſſet ſatis, ſuo arbitrio præbibere. Annuerunt omnes, ac tùm aſſumptis, quaſi adigente neceſſitate animis, fœcundum hauſit calicem, eodemque mox aquâ oppleto, Thorio intentans præbibit, totumque rurſus (tanquam injectum temperaturus merum) abſorpſit. Ille quaſi fulmine ictus, delapſuſve è nubibus, vix tandem ad ſe rediit, & quia ex condicto agebatur, neque reſilire fas erat, tam longa ſuſpiria è pectore duxit, toties admovit, removitque ora, tot intereà carmina ex omnibus Græcis, Latiniſque Poëtis profudit, ut diem penè contriverit inſtillandæ aquæ in inſuetum guttur. Atque id ipſum eſt, quod Rex cùm audiiſſet ex aliis, ex Peireſkii ore accipere voluit (4).

(3) Some believe he was profane enough (as Poets ſometimes are in the heat of their liquor) to apply the words of the Evangeliſt, St Matth. xxvi, 39.

(4) Gaſſendus, in Vita Peireſkii, lib. ii, ad ann. 1606, Oper. Tom. v, pag. 263. col. 2.

TIBARENIANS, a people of Aſia bordering upon the Euxine Sea (a). They were famous for two very remarkable cuſtoms, the latter of which ſeems the conſequence of the former. They were extremely addicted to ſporting, and laughing, in which they placed their ſummum bonum (b); and as ſoon as their wives were delivered of their children the huſbands kept their beds, played the part of ſick perſons, and received from their wives all the nurſing which in other places is beſtowed on childbed women. It is plain this cuſtom was only owing to this buffooning humour, which led them to make a jeſt of every thing. Several authors ſpeak of this laſt cuſtom [A], which was alſo uſed in the iſle of Corſica (c). Lancelotti of Perugia has unjuſtly inſulted

(a) Stephanus Byzant. voce Τιβαρηνία.

(c) Diodor. Siculus, lib. v, cap. xiv.

(b) Ἔφορος ἐν πέμπτῳ φησὶν, ὅτι Τιβαρηνοὶ καὶ τὸ παίζειν καὶ τὸ γελᾶν εἰσιν ἐζηλωκότες καὶ μεγίϛην εὐδαιμονίαν τȣ̃το νομίζȣσι. Ephorus, lib. v, inquit Tibarenos ſtudio ludendi & ridendi teneri & maximam felicitatem hoc judicare. Id. ibid. See alſo Pomponius Mela, lib. i, cap. xix, who ſays Tibareni Chalybas attingunt quibus in riſu luſuque ſummum bonum eſt.

[A] Several authors ſpeak of this . . . . . . cuſtom.] I ſhall content myſelf with citing theſe verſes of Apollonius.

Σώοντο πάρεξ Τιβαρηνίδα γαῖαν.
Ἔνθ᾽ ἐπεὶ ἄρ κε τέκωνται ὑπ᾽ ἀνδράσι τέκνα
γυναῖκες,
Αὐτοὶ μὲν ϛενάχȣσιν ἐνὶ λεχέεσσι πεσόντες,
Κράατα δησάμενοι· ταὶ δ᾽ εὐκομέȣσιν ἐδωδῇ
Ἀνέρας, ἠδὲ λοετρὰ λεχώϊα τοῖσι πένονται.

Eruperunt ad Tibarenorum terram.
Ibi, cum è viris gravidæ mulieres reddiderunt fœtum,
Ipſi verſantur in gemitu, & puerperio cubant,
Capitibus circumvinctis: illæ rurſus molliter curant eſcis
Præbitis viros, & puerpera ipſis lavacra calfactant (1).

Among the Tibarenians they retire.
Here, when the teeming wives are brought to bed,
The men cry out, and lye-in in their ſtead;
Bind up their heads, and make their wives take care
To nurſe them well, and child-bed baths prepare.

(1) Apollonius, Argonaut. lib. ii, ver. 1012, pag. m. 242.

inſulted Diodorus Siculus on this ſubject [B]. Theodoret obſerves that after the Tibarenians had received the Goſpel, they abrogated a cruel law which had been obſerved amongſt them, which obliged them to throw their old people head-long from a Precipice (d).

(d) Theodoretus, de Græc. Affect. Serm. ix, pag. 615.

Valerius Flaccus ſays the ſame thing (2), and if the teſtimony of two Poets be inſufficient, the reader may beſides find that of an Hiſtorian, in the remark [A] of the article NYMPHODORUS.

[B] Lancelotti of Perugia unjuſtly inſulted Diodorus Siculus on this ſubject.] He publiſhed a treatiſe intituled, Farfalloni de gli antichi Hiſtorici, where he abuſes ‘ Diodorus Siculus, becauſe in the fourteenth ‘ chapter of his fifth book, he affirms that the Corſican women as ſoon as delivered, quitted their beds ‘ to their huſbands who lay-in in their ſtead. And ‘ yet nothing is more common in the greateſt part of ‘ America; or elſe what is reported of Canada, and ‘ ſeveral other places, ought to be looked upon as ‘ mere cheats; which is not at all likely, conſidering ‘ the condition of thoſe who inform us concerning ‘ that part of the world, and the impoſſibility of their ‘ entering unanimouſly into any agreement to deceive ‘ us (3).’ I wonder that le Mothe le Vayer takes no notice of the Tibarenians nor of the antient Spaniards. Γεωργοῦσι γὰρ αὗται, τεκοῦσαί τε διακονοῦσι τοῖς ἀνδράσιν ἐκείνους ἀνθ᾽ ἑαυτῶν κατακλίνασαι. Mulieres enim agros colunt, & cum pepererunt, ſuo loco viros decumbere jubent, iiſque miniſtrant (4). - - - - For the women till the ground, and when they are delivered of their children, nurse their huſbands, who are put to bed in their room. Mr Colomiés believed that this merry cuſtom which formerly was obſerved in Berne, viz. that as ſoon as a woman was delivered ſhe got up, and put her huſband to bed, who acted the ſick wife, was derived from the Spaniards (5). He adds, that this was practiſed by the Tartars, according to the teſtimony of Marcus Paulus Venetus, chap. 41 of the ſecond book of his travels. Note, that various cauſes might engage theſe nations to obſerve this cuſtom; for it is not probable that the humour of turning human life into ridicule, in order to attain the felicity which they placed in laughter, engaged the antient Corſicans, and the American nations, to agree with the Tibarenians in this practice. I ſhould be glad to be informed what reaſons prevailed with the nations of Canada, &c. who put the huſband to bed inſtead of the woman who was delivered. Would they by this means encourage him to get more children; would they induce him to it by the hopes of a good nurſing bout? Or do they fear that if the huſband were to have the trouble of acting the nurſe, he would be the leſs willing to make his wife ſick? But perhaps it would be found very difficult to account for ſo ridiculous a cuſtom.

(2) Valer. Flaccus, Argonaut. lib. v, ver. 148.

(3) La Mothe le Vayer, Obſervations ſur la compoſition des Livres, Tom. xv, of his works, pag. 30, Edit. of Paris, 1681, in 12mo, he cites the ixth Farfalloni.

(4) Strabo, lib. iii, pag. m. 114.

(5) Colomiés Mêlanges Hiſtoriques, pag. 25.

TIBUR, a city of Italy near to, and older than, Rome, called at preſent Tivoli. It was built on the river Ania (a), either by the Aborigines, according to Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (b), or by a company of Greeks from Peloponneſus (c), according to ſeveral other authors. It was already in a very flouriſhing condition, when Æneas landed in Italy [A], if we may believe Virgil, and we find that it made a very long and vigorous reſiſtance

(a) Now called Teverone.

(b) Dionyſ. Halicarn. Antiq. Roman. lib. i, cap. xvi, pag. m. 14.

(c) See the remark [A].

[A] It was in a very flouriſhing condition when Æneas landed in Italy.] Virgil reckons it amongſt the great cities which armed againſt the Trojans.

Quinque adeò magnæ, poſitis incudibus, urbes
Tela novant, Atina potens, Tiburque ſuperbum,
Ardea, Cruſtumerique & turrigeræ Antemnæ (1).

Five cities forge their arms: th' Atinian pow'rs,
Antemnæ, Tybur with her lofty towrs,
Ardea the proud, the Cruſtumerian town.
DRYDEN.

Leandro Alberti ſo ill underſtood this place, that he ſays, Tibur was one of the cities which forged arms for Æneas. ‘ N'e fatto anche memoria, ſays he (2), ‘ d'eſſa città da Vergilio nel ſettimo libro annoverandola fra quelle cinque città che fabricarono l'armi ‘ ad Enea coſi, Quinque adeo, &c.

‘ This city is alſo recorded by Virgil, in his ſeventh book ‘ among thoſe which forged arms for Æneas,

Five cities, &c.

Virgil in the ſame book mentions the names of the two Tiburtine chiefs who went to the war againſt Æneas:

Tùm gemini fratres Tiburtia mœnia linquunt,
Fratris Tiburti dictam cognomine gentem,
Catilluſque, acerque Coras, Argiva juventus (3).

Then two twin brothers from fair Tybur came,
(Which from their brother Tyburs took the name,)
Fierce Coras, and Catillus void of fear,
Young Argive champions, in the front appear.
DRYDEN.

Lloyd makes uſe of this paſſage to prove that Catillus and Coras built Tybur; but he falſifies the text, by reading mœnia condunt inſtead of mœnia linquunt. This is a way to find every where proofs for whatever we pleaſe, this is a way to make the honeſt reader believe any thing. But we ought not to look for an authority for the building of this city in theſe words of Virgil, but in thoſe of his commentator Servius. ‘ De Græcia, ſays he (4), tres fratres venerunt ‘ ad Italiam: Catillus, Coras, Tybur vel Tyburnus. ‘ Hi ſimul omnes unam fecere civitatem & eam de ‘ fratris majoris nomine Tybur appellaverunt: licet & ‘ alias fecerint ſinguli. - - - From Greece came into Italy ‘ three brothers; Catillus, Coras, Tybur or Tyburnus. ‘ Theſe all in conjunction founded a city, and called it Tybur from the name of their elder brother: tho' they ‘ each of them ſingly built others.’ Pliny aſcribes the fundation of this city only to one of theſe three mentioned in theſe words of Servius, he ſpeaks, I ſay, only of Tyburtus, who he pretends was the ſon of Amphiaraus. I have elſewhere (5) cited his words, which, containing ſomething very particular, I would adviſe the reader to turn to them. Others pretend that the three brothers mentioned by Servius were Amphiaraus's grandſons, and the ſons of Catillus. ‘ Tybur, ſicut Cato facit teſtimonium, à Catillo Arcade præfecto claſſis Evandri; ſicut Sextius, ab Argiva juventute. Catillus enim Amphiarai filius poſt ‘ prodigialem patris apud Thebas interitum Oeclei ‘ avi juſſu (6), cum omni fœtu ver ſacrum miſſus tres ‘ liberis in Italia procreavit, Tiburtum, Coram, Catillum, qui depulſis ex oppido Siciliæ veteribus Sicanis à nomine Tiburti fratris natu maximi urbem ‘ vocaverunt (7). - - - Tybur, as Cato witneſſes, from ‘ Catillus the Arcadian Admiral of Evander's fleet; as ‘ Sextius from the Argive youth. For Catillus the ſon ‘ of Amphiaraus after the extraordinary death of his ‘ father at Thebes, by the command of his grandfather ‘ Oeclaus was ſent with all his family under a vow ‘ to Italy, where he begat three children, Tyburtus, Coras, and Catillus, who, expelling the antient Sicanians ‘ from a city of Sicily, called it Tybur from the name of ‘ their elder brother.’ Salmaſius's cenſure on this paſſage of Solinus is very unjuſt. He ſtrangely exclaims againſt this author. ‘ Sanum putamus fuiſſe Solinum ‘ cum hæc ſcriberet? Quis Siciliam pro Italia ſanus ‘ dixit? . . . Scio Sicanos Italiam olim tenuiſſe. . . . ‘ Sed Italiam dictam fuiſſe Siciliam, nemo, quod ‘ ſciam, prodidit; falſiſſimum igitur, & abſurdiſſimum ‘ eſt, quod hic narrat Solinus (8). - - - Can we believe Solinus his wits when he writes this? Who in ‘ his

(1) Virgil. Æn. lib. vii, ver. 629.

(2) Leandro Alberti, Deſcritt. di tutta l'Italia, fol. 147, verſo, Edit. Venet. 1561.

(3) Virgil. ubi ſupra, ver. 670.

(4) Servius, in Virgil. Æn. VII, ver. 670.

(5) In the remark [M], of the article AMPHIARAUS.

(6) Leandro Alberti Deſcritt. d'Italia, fol. 147, hath committed a fault, per commandamento del ſuo avolo Tideo. - - - By command of his grandfather Tydeus, ſaith he. His tranſlator is guilty of another in expreſſing it hortatu Tydei patrui. - - By the advice of his uncle Tydeus.

(7) Solin. cap. ii, pag. m. 13.

(8) Salmaſ. Exercit. Plin. in Solin. pag. 61.

reſiſtance againſt the Roman arms (d), before it ſubmitted to that victorious Republic. But it was at laſt obliged to ſubmit, in the year of Rome 403 (e). It is pretended that this city, once ſo haughtily upbraided the Romans with it's ſervices to that republic, that its deputies could obtain no other anſwer than theſe words, you are proud (f). The inhabitants had a particular devotion for Hercules, in honour of whom they built a moſt magnificent temple [B]. They alſo worſhipped with no ſmall zeal the god Tiburnus

‘his ſenſes ever called Italy Sicily. . . . . I know the Sicanians formerly inhabited Italy. . . . . But that Italy was ever called Sicily, no body, that I know of, has ever advanced; and therefore what Solinus ſays here, is moſt falſe and abſurd.’ But preſently after he grows ſomewhat cooler, he ſuppoſes the fault is owing to ſome wretched Pedant who foiſted a gloſs into the text of this author. ‘Sed fortaſſe ita ſcripſerat: qui depulſis veteribus Sicanis, à nomine Tiburti fratris natu maximi urbem vocaverunt, cum ſciolus aliquis heic Sicanos legeret, ad oram videtur addidiſſe, ex oppido Siciliæ quia ſcilicet putaret Sicanos non alibi quam in Sicilia fuiſſe (9). - - - But perhaps he wrote thus: who, expelling the antient Sicanians, built a town, which they called Tybur, after the name of their elder brother, which ſome pretender reading, ſeems to have added in the margin, from a city of Sicily, as thinking that there were no other Sicanians but in Sicily.’ He did not obſerve that what he cites nine or ten lines after confounds all his criticiſm. ‘Quinimo Siculos illos veteres Tibur oppidum tenuiſſe ſcribit Dionyſius lib. 1. παρ᾽ οἷς, inquit, καὶ ἐς τόδε χρόνου, μέρος τι τῆς πόλεως ὀνομάζεται Σικελιῶν (10). - - - For that the antient Sicilians inhabited the city of Tybur, Dionyſius writes book 1. From whom, ſays he, even to this time one part of this city is called Sicilia.’ That is, part of the city Tibur is yet called Sicilia or Sicilium. Is not this a manifeſt evidence that this place was ſo called before Tiburtus and his brothers drove out the Sicanians? Why then is this trifling uſed either againſt Solinus himſelf or the preſent text of his book? Note that Catillus paſſed for the principal founder of Tibur. Hinc Tibur Catille tuum (11). - - - Catillus hence your Tybur; as Silius Italicus hath it: To which we may add theſe two verſes of Horace:

Nullam, Vare, ſacrâ vite priùs ſeveris arborem
Circa mite ſolum Tiburis, & mœnia Catili (12).

Varus, to plant the vine, ſuits beſt of all
Tybur's mild ſoil, and Catilus's wall.

For the reſt, that this city was of Greek original, is unanimouſly confirmed by an infinite number of athors.

Tibur Argeo poſitum colono
Sit meæ ſedes utinam ſenectæ (13)!

May Tibur, where Greeks built a ſeat,
In my old age be my retreat.

Ovid expreſſes it no leſs clearly:

Jam mœnia Tiburis udi
Stabant, Argolicæ quæ poſuere manus (14).

Moiſt Tybur's walls were ſtanding in thoſe da,
Which Argive hands of old were known to riſe.

See alſo Strabo (15), Martial (16), and Aemidorus cited by Stephanus Byzantinus (17).

We muſt not forget Servius's commentar on theſe words, ‘Tiburque ſuperbum in the ſeventh ofhe Æneid, aut nobile, ſays he (18), aut per tranſum tetigit illud, quod cum aliquando à Senatu auxia poſcerent Tyburtes ſub commemoratione benefiorum, hoc tantum à Senatu reſponſum acceperunt, ſuperbi eſtis. - - - This epithet proud, either means its magnificence, or alludes obliquely to its behaviour, wh requiring on a certain occaſion ſome aſſiſtance from th Senate which it claimed as due in regard to former ſvices, all the anſwer the Senate gave was, Ye are pud.’

[B] The inhabitants had a particur devotion for Hercules, in honour of whom they built a moſt magnificent temple.] Statius ranks Tibur amongſt the four places where this deity was principally worſhipped.

Nec mihi plus Nemee, priſcumque habitabitur Argos,
Nec Tiburna domus, Soliſque cubilia Gades (19).

Nor Nemea, nor old Argos will I own
More favourite abodes, nor Tybur's town,
Nor fartheſt Gades where the ſun goes down.

This temple of Hercules was one of thoſe repoſitories where the richeſt treaſures were ſecured. Auguſtus when he had occaſion, drew large ſums from thence as well as from the capital, the temple of Antium, and that of Lanuvium. He promiſed to pay intereſt for them. Appian who relates this, adds, that in his time very conſiderable ſacred treaſures were ſecured in thoſe places (20). The following lines witneſs that the Oracles were frequently conſulted in the temple of Tibur:

Quod ni templa darent alias Tirynthia ſortes,
Et Præneſtinæ poterant migrare ſorores (21).

If the Herculean temples ſilent were,
Præneſte's ſiſters quickly wou'd be there.

Theſe verſes are to be met with in one of Statius's Sylvæ, which was compoſed by him in compliment to Manlius Vopiſcus's country-ſeat near Tibur. The Oracle of Præneſte ſaith Statius, would gladly quit its reſidence, and remove to this charming place, if the temples of Hercules were not already occupied by other Oracles. The commentators on this place are very much puzzled. Sabellicus owns (22) that he never met with any thing relating to this Oracle of Hercules of Tibur, and is inclined to believe that this paſſage rather regards the Oracle of Albunea, a deity, worſhipped in conjunction with Hercules by the inhabitants of Tybur. To this purpoſe are cited the following words, ‘Quodque Albuna ſacras Tiberis per flumina ſortes, portarit (23): - - - And that Albuna ſhall extend her Oracles over Tiber's ſtream:’ but with very little reaſon; for this paſſage has no relation to an Oracle which was to be conſulted at Tybur, but to the books which a Sybil brought to Rome. Another commentator imagines that the following paſſages of Propertius affords an authentic teſtimony:

Nam quid Præneſtis dubias, ô Cynthia, ſortes,
Quid petis Aeæi mœnia Telegoni?
Curve te in Herculeum deportant eſſeda Tibur?
Appia cur toties te via ducit anum (24)?

Why to Præneſte her dark fate to know;
Why thus to Tuſculum, does Cynthia go?
Why to Herculean Tybur does ſhe ſtray?
Why thus grow old upon the Appian way?

You ſee plainly, ſays Barthius (25), that Cynthia went to Tibur to conſult the Oracle there, and was not this the Oracle of Hercules? I anſwer that Propertius does not ſay this voyage to Tibur was founded on that motive. What he obſerves about conſulting the Oracle extends no farther than the firſt verſe: Tibur is no more concerned in it, than the walls of Telegonus, that is Tuſculum. The only thing we can learn from this paſſage of Propertius, with regard to Tibur is, that this city enjoyed the epithet of Herculeum. This we may alſo be informed of from theſe words of Silius Italicus,

Quoſque ſub Herculeis taciturno flumine muris
Pomifera arva creant Anienicolæque Catilli (26);

And

(d) See Livy, lib. vii.

(e) According to Calviſius, pag. m. 195. According to Sigonius, in Faſtis, in the year 399.

(f) See the remark [A] at the end.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Silius Italicus, lib. viii, pag. m. 345.

(12) Horat. Od. xviii, lib. i.

(13) Id. Od. VI, lib. ii.

(14) Ovidius, lib. iv, Faſtorum, ver. 71.

(15) Strabo, lib. v, pag. 165.

(16) Mart. Epig. lvii, lib. iv.

(17) Steph. Byzant. voce Τίβυρις.

(18) Servius, in Virgil. Æn. VII, ver. 630.

(19) Statius, Silva I, lib. iii, ſub fin. pag. m. 55.

(20) Appianus, lib. v, de Bell. Civilibus, pag. m. 399.

(21) Statius, Silva III, lib. i, ver. 79, pag. m. 15.

(22) See Barthius in Statium, Silva III, lib. i, pag. 107.

(23) Tibullus, Eleg. v, lib. ii.

(24) Propert. lib. ii, Eleg. xxxii, pag. m. 476.

(25) Vides clare & Tibur petiiſſe Cynthiam ad capiendas ſortes: quæ autem illæ niſi Herculeæ cum hujus præcipue numen hic jungatur. Barth. ibid. pag. 108.

(26) Silius Italicus, lib. iv, pag. m. 172.

Tiburnus [C]. The Romans built ſeveral country-houſes in the territories of this city [D]. This has alſo been cuſtomary in later ages. The inhabitants of Tibur were put to the ſword by Totila's ſoldiers, in the year 545, as Procopius informs us. The German wars ruined this city: Frederic Barbaroſſa cauſed the walls to be re-built, and enlarged it. Pope Pius II ordered a fortreſs to be built there, at the entrance of which is the following inſcription of Giovanni Antonio Campani (g).

Grata bonis, inviſa malis, inimica ſuperbis
  Sum tibi Tibur enim ſic Pius inſtituit (h).

The good to ſave, the bad and proud to bow,
Tibur, to Pius I my building owe.

Lloyd is extremely miſtaken when he ſpeaks of the mountain of Tibur, as of a place famous

And Tybur's race who fruitful regions own,
Where Anio's waves waſh the Herculean town.

and from ſeveral epigrams of another author (27). Leandro Alberti has converted this epithet into a proper name, and to compleat his miſtake, he cites Strabo as well for this, as to prove that the city of Tibur was alſo called Cataracta. 'Fu altreſi nominata queſta citta (ſecondo Strabone) Herculeum . . . 'era anche nominata Caterratta (28). - - - This city 'was in like manner (according to Strabo) named Herculeum . . . it was alſo called Cataracta.' When in truth Strabo only ſays that there was at Tybur a temple of Hercules, and a cataract; that is, that the river Anio fell there with a rapid force from the precipice of a hill into a valley. Τίβυρα μεν, ἧ τὸ Ἡράκλειον καὶ ὁ καταράκτης· ὃν ποιεῖ . . . . . ὁ Ἀνίων ἀφ᾽ ὕψους μεγάλου καταπίπτων εἰς φάραγγα βαθεῖαν. Tibure fanum eſt Herculis & præceps aquæ dejectus (cataractam vocant) quem facit Anio . . . . ab excelſo loco in convallem dejiciens ſeſe profundam (29). - - - - At Tybur there was a temple of Hercules, and a cataract occaſioned by the fall of the Anio from a very high place into a deep valley.

Note, that there was a very fine library in this temple: this is atteſted by Aulus Gellius. 'Promit 'è bibliotheca Tiburti, quæ tunc in Herculis templo 'ſatis commode inſtructa libris erat, Ariſtotelis librum (30). - - - He borrowed a book of Ariſtotle from 'the Tybur library, which was then finely furniſhed 'with books in the temple of Hercules.'

[C] They alſo worſhipped with no ſmall zeal the god Tiburnus.] Conſult Cluverius in the fourth chapter of the third book of his Italia antiqua, and the commentators on theſe words of Horace: 'Et præceps 'Anio, & Tiburni lucus (31). - - - And Anio's cataract, and Tiburnus's grove.'

[D] The Romans built ſeveral country-houſes in the territories of this city.] The air all about this place was fine, healthful, and extremely refreſhing: the ſoil was watered by an infinite number of rivulets and was very fertile. It is no wonder then if the Romans had in this place ſo many country-ſeats, ſo many orchards, and ſo many other conveniencies. The Emperor Auguſtus frequently retired hither. 'Ex ſeceſſibus præcipue frequentavit maritima, inſulaſque 'Campaniæ, aut proxima urbi oppida, Lanuvium, 'Præneſte, Tibur, ubi etiam in porticibus Herculis 'templi perſæpe jus dixit (32). - - - The retirements 'he chiefly frequented, were thoſe on the ſea-coaſt, and 'the iſlands of Campania, or the towns in the neighbourhood of Rome, Lanuvium, Præneſte, and Tibur, where 'he often gave judgment in the porch of Hercules's temple.' The Emperor Hadrian (33) built a magnificent palace there. Zenobia had a retirement in the neighbourhood of this ſtately building (34). Manlius Vopiſcus had a very fine houſe in this territory. Statius has deſcribed it very pompouſly (35). Cetronius who ſpent ſuch immenſe ſums in building, had a palace here which eclipſed the temple of Hercules.

Ædificator erat Cetronius, & modo curvo
Litore Cajetæ, ſumma nunc Tiburis arce,
Nunc Præneſtinis in montibus, alta parabat
Culmina villarum, Græcis longeque petitis
Marmoribus vincens Fortunæ, atque Herculis ædem (36).

Cetronius does high coſtly villas raiſe
With Grecian marble, which the ſight amaze;
Some ſtand upon Caieta's winding ſhore,
At Tibur's tow'r, and at Præneſte more.
The dome of Hercules and Fortune ſhew
To his tall fabrics like ſmall cots below.

DRYDEN.

Shall we forget Horace, who had a houſe there which he frequently reſided at, and ſo earneſtly deſired might be the fixed retreat of his old age (37)? 'Vixit plurimum in receſſu ruris ſui Sabini aut Tiburtini: domuſque ejus oſtenditur circa Tiburtini lucum (38). - - - 'He ſpent great part of his time in his Sabine or Tibur 'retirement: and his houſe is ſhewn near the grove of 'Tybur.' He tells us that Munatius Plancus had a very beautiful houſe there (39). What I advanced in the beginning of this remark might be proved by a crowd of witneſſes, but I ſhall content myſelf with a few.

Cum Tiburtinas damnet Curiatius auras
  Inter laudatas ad Styga miſſus aquas.
Nullo fata loco poſſis excludere: cum mors
  Venerit, in medio Tibure Sardinia eſt (40).

Since againſt Tibur's air Curiatius raves,
Sent from its pleaſant ſtreams to Stygian waves.
No place can ſave you: when death leads the way,
Tybur's as fatal as Sardinia.

Theſe are verſes made upon the death of a man, who could not ſave his life by breathing the fine air of Tibur: and the following were by the ſame author addreſſed to Fauſtinus, who enjoyed the refreſhment of this place, during the heats of the dog-days.

Herculeos colles gelida vos vincite bruma,
  Nunc Tiburtinis cedite frigoribus (41).

In winter you th' Herculean hills excel
But now in their cool ſhade we chuſe to dwell.

I have already cited Silius Italicus, who calls the adjacent lands pomifera arva, - - - fruitful in apples; to which may be added theſe verſes of Horace.

Et præceps Anio, & Tiburni lucus, & uda Mobilibus pomaria rivis (42).

And Anio's Cat'ract, and Tiburnus's grove,
Where thro' moiſt orchards winding riv'lets rove.

Chriſtian Rome hath not been leſs charmed with the pleaſures of Tivoli; for Leandro Alberti relates that the Prelates of the court of Rome, antiently paſſed the ſummer in this refreſhing air (43). Cardinal Hippolyto d'Eſte, as Moreri obſerves, built a very fine palace there, with the moſt magnificent gardens in the world. Uberto Folietta publiſhed a deſcription of it which deſerves reading. See alſo the Itineraries of Italy, particularly thoſe of Andreas Schottus, and Geronimo Capugnani.

(g) Leandro Alberti, Deſcritt. di tutta l'Italia, fol. m. 248.

(h) Ex eodem, ibid.

(27) Martial. Epig. xiii, lib. i, and Epig. lxii, lib. iv, &c.

(28) Leandro Alberti, ubi ſupra.

(29) Strabo, lib. v, pag. 164.

(30) Aul. Gellius, lib. xix, cap. v.

(31) Horat. Ode VII, lib. i.

(32) Sueton. in Aug. cap. lxxii.

(33) See the remark [I], of the article HADRIAN.

(34) See the remark [C], of the article ZENOBIA.

(35) Stat. Silva III, lib. i.

(36) Juven. Sat, XIV, ver. 86.

(37) See the remark [A], citation (13).

(38) Sueton. in Vita Horatii.

(39) Seu te fulgentia ſignis
Caſtra tenent, ſeu denſa tenebit
Tiburis umbra tui.
Whether in ſhining camps you ſtay,
Or to your Tyber haſte away.
Horat. Od. VII. lib. i.

(40) Martial, Epig. lx, lib. iv.

(41) Idem, Epig. lvii, lib. iv.

(42) Horat. Od. VII, lib. i.

(43) Leandro Alberti, Deſcrittione d'Italia, fol. 148.

famous for the ivory found there [E]. He had better have been ſilent on this head, and have mentioned the fine quarries with which thoſe parts abounded [F]. We muſt not forget the fountain and the goddeſs Albunea [G], one of the moſt memorable things in the [E] Lloyd is extremely miſtaken when he ſpeaks of the mountain of Tybur as of a place famous for the ivory found there.] He may juſtly be accuſed of two groſs faults. Tiburtinus mons, ſaith he, locus ebore notiſſimus; and immediately after he cites two verſes of Martial, one out of the twelfth epigram of the ſeventh book (44), and the other out of the twenty-eighth of the eighth book (45). He plainly means that the mountain of Tibur produced Ivory; which ſhews he was ignorant that Elephants teeth are the only ivory in the world. For what Theophraſtus (46) ſays on this head, amounts to nothing, and can by no means concern our Tiburtine mountain. This is Mr Lloyd's firſt falſity. His ſecond fault is that the firſt verſe of Martial does not mention ivory; and that the ſenſe of the ſecond is not what Mr Lloyd ſuppoſes. He could make no manner of uſe of the firſt verſe without citing the Poet's whole thought; which if he had done, all his readers would have diſcovered that he had produced a very ill proof. Let us by the way from hence infer, that it is good to diſtruſt all paſſages cited by halves under the ſpecious pretext of avoiding prolixity. Is it not better to be prolix, than to deceive our readers? This is my maxim, for which reaſon I have taken care that my citations ſhould give the author's whole thought. Here is for inſtance the whole epigram, of which Mr Lloyd has only given the firſt line; and even has not given that, as it is.

Dum Tiburtinis albeſcere collibus audit
Antiqui dentis fuſca Lycoris ebur,
Venit in Herculeos colles: quid Tiburis alti
Aura valet? parvo tempore nigra redit (47).

Swarthy Lycoris hears with great delight,
That Tibur's hills can make old ivory white:
Thither ſhe goes, to bleach in Tybur's air;
And ſoon returns, but black inſtead of fair.

Martial's thought is, that Lycoris having heard that old ivory whitened on the mountain of Tibur, went thither; but inſtead of bleaching her tawny complexion, ſhe turned black in a ſmall ſpace of time. He had made uſe of the ſame raillery before.

Tibur in Herculeum migravit nigra Lycoris
Omnia dum fieri candida credit ibi (48).

Herculean Tibur black Lycoris's ſeeks,
In hopes its bleaching pow'r might reach her cheeks.

Ramirez de Prado affirms that Pliny ſays, the cool air of Tibur gives ivory a greater degree of whiteneſs (49). He cites alſo Propertius and Silius Italicus, one of whom ſays (50).

Ramoſis Anio qua pomifer incubat arvis
Et nunquam Herculeo numine pallet ebur;

Where Anio thro' fruitful orchards flows,
And ivory its unchanged whiteneſs ſhows,
Which to th' Herculean deity it owes.

And the other (51):

Quale micat ſemperque novum eſt, quod Tiburis aura
Paſcit ebur (52).

As the pure ivory, which in Tibur's air,
Appears for ever new, for ever fair.

Thus it plainly appears that Mr Lloyd hath improperly cited the ſecond paſſage of Martial, ſince it doth not ſignify that the Tiburtine mountain furniſhed ivory; but only that the air there had the virtue to preſerve the purity and brightneſs of ivory, and even to repair them.

[F] The fine quarries with which thoſe parts abounded.] Strabo ſpeaks of them, and obſerves that they furniſhed ſtone for the greateſt part of the edifices of Rome (53). The ſtones of Tibur were in great eſteem; They were ſo hard, as to be proof againſt all heavy burdens and injuries of the weather; but the fire ſoon deſtroyed them. 'Tiburtini (lapides) ad reliqua fortes, vapore diſſiliunt (54). - - - The Tiburtine ſtones bear every thing elſe, but fly with heat.' Theſe words of Pliny will become more intelligible by comparing them with the following: 'Tiburtina vero & quæ eodem genere ſunt omnia, ſufferunt & ab oneribus & à tempeſtatibus injurias: ſed ab igni non poſſunt eſſe tuta: ſimulque ut ſunt ab eo tacta, diſſiliunt & diſſipantur, ideo quod temperatura naturali parvo ſunt humore (55). - - - Thoſe of Tibur, and all of that kind, bear all injuries from weights and weather; but are not at all ſecure from fire: for as ſoon as they are affected with that, they ſplit and fly in pieces, becauſe of their having ſo very little moiſture in their natural temperature.' Pliny relates as a witty repartee what Cicero ſaid to the people of Chios, who out of oſtentation ſhewed him the walls of their houſes built with ſpeckled marble. I ſhould admire them much more, ſaid Cicero, if they had been built with Tiburtine ſtone. Primum, ut arbitror, verſicolores iſtas maculas Chiorum lapicidinæ oſtenderunt, cum exſtruerent muros, faceto in id M. Ciceronis ſale: omnibus enim oſtentabant ut magnificum. Multo, inquit, magis mirarer, ſi Tiburtino lapide feciſſetis (56). A very learned man pretends that if theſe ſtones had been tranſported to the iſle of Chios, they would perhaps have been more eſteemed, becauſe far fetched (57). This is not unlikely: but I do not believe that Cicero's raillery was grounded upon this foundation; he ſeems rather to have meant only this: you buy your marble very cheap, your iſland produces it, do not brag therefore of the ſumptuouſneſs of your buildings. Your riches and expences would appear more magnificent, if the materials of your buildings were brought from Tibur.

[G] We muſt not forget the fountain and the goddeſs Albunea.] Let us begin this note with a paſſage of Virgil.

At rex ſollicitus monſtris, oracula Fauni
Fatidici genitoris adit, lucoſque ſub altâ
Conſulit Albuneâ: nemorum quæ maxima ſacro
Fonte ſonat, ſævumque exhalat opaca mephitin.
Hinc Italæ gentes, omniſque Oenotria tellus,
In dubiis reſponſa petunt (58).

Latinus, frighted with this dire oſtent,
For counſel to his father Faunus went.
And ſought the ſhades renown'd for prophecy,
Which near Albunea's ſulphrous fountain lye.
To thoſe the Latian, and the Sabine land
Fly, when diſtreſs'd, and thence relief demand.

I omit the remainder of this paſſage, and only obſerve that it informs us, that thoſe who conſulted this Oracle ſlept on the ſkins of their victims, and received their anſwer during their ſleep. It doth not appear certainly from theſe words of Virgil, whether the god Faunus reſided in the Albunean grove; for the laws of Grammar allow us to believe that King Latinus conſulted the Oracle of Faunus, and the ſacred Albunean groves, that is to ſay, that he informed himſelf of the pleaſure of the gods in two different places: but yet the moſt reaſonable meaning of theſe words ſeems to be, that the King conſulted the Oracle of Faunus in the ſacred Albunean grove. There is one ſmall difficulty to get over, which is, that no perſon, that I know of, informs us that there was any Oracle of the god Faunus at Tibur. This city adored Hercules as their grand Divinity: their other deities were Tiburnus and Albunea. Faunus is not mentioned. Will any one ſay that Virgil was not here concerned to accommodate his fictions to tradition? This may perhaps be more true than probable. However it be, we may obſerve that Albunea was at the ſame time the neighbourhood of Tibur.

---

(44) De Tiburtinis albeſcere collibus audit. She hears that Tibur's hill can bleech. Mart. Epig. xii, lib. vii.

(45) Et Tiburtino monte quod albet ebur. The ivory whitening on Tibur's hill. Id. Epig. xxviii, lib. viii.

(46) Theophraſtus auctor eſt & ebur foſſile candido & nigro colore inveniri. Pliny, lib. xxxvi, cap. xviii.

(47) Martial. Epig. xii, lib. vii.

(48) Idem, Epig. lxii, lib. iv.

(49) Lycorin irridet quæ cum ſciret ebur candidius fieri frigidiſſima Tiburis aura ut Plin. Teſtatur. Laur. Ramirez de Prado in Mart. Epig. lxii, lib. iv.

(50) Propert. Eleg. vii, lib. iv, ſub fin.

(51) Silius Italicus, lib. xii, pag. m. 490.

(52) Paſcit, dixit pro ſuſtentat & conſervat. Ramir. de Prado, ubi ſupra.

(53) Strabo, lib. v, pag. 164.

(54) Pliny, lib. xxxvi, cap. xxii, pag. m. 334.

(55) Vitruvius, lib. ii. cap. vii.

(56) Plinius, lib. xxxvi, cap. vi, pag. 287.

(57) Romæ vulgaris in eam advectus inſulam accepiſſet fortaſſis ab loci unde peteretur intercapedine pretium. Harduin. in Plin. ibid.

(58) Virgil. Æn. lib. vii, ver. 81.

time the name of a grove, of a fountain (59), and of a deity of the mountain of Tibur (60). She only appears under the notion of a fountain in theſe words of Horace, ‘ & domus Albuneæ reſonantis (61): - -And Albunea's murmuring fountain:’ In the words of Virgil before quoted, ſhe appears under the notion of a grove as well as of a fountain; but the following paſſage of Lactantius elevates her to a goddeſs: Decimam Tiburtini, nomine Albuneam, quæ Tiburi colitur, ut dea, juxta ripas amnis Anienis: Cujus in gurgite Simulachrum ejus inventum eſſe dicitur, tenens in manu librum. Cujus ſacra Senatus in Capitolium tranſtulerit (62). That is, Albunea was the tenth of the Sibyls and worſhipped at Tibur as a goddeſs; and her image was reported to have been found with a book in her hand in the gulph of Anio. Note that ſome are of opinion that the fountain Albunea was only another name for thoſe mineral waters called Albula or Albulæ. Strabo ſays they were cold, that they aroſe from ſeveral ſprings, and either drank or bathed in, cured ſeveral diſeaſes (63). Pliny aſcribes to them only the virtue of healing wounds (64): but Suetonius (65) does not ſpeak of them with this reſtriction. Cluverius (66), who believes them to be the fountain Albunea, may alledge this reaſon for it: this fountain according to Virgil ſtunk, Sævumque exhalat opaca Mephitim (67).

And ſhaded o'er emits a ſulph'rous ſmell.

But according to Martial and ſeveral others this quality belonged to the mineral waters called Albula or Albulæ.

Canaque ſulfureis Albula fumat aquis (68).

And ſulph'rous ſteams riſe from pale Albula.

Therefore, &c. Note, that Albula was a ſmall river which diſcharged itſelf into the Anio, whoſe principal ſpring according to Cluverius was the fountain Albunea. This author believes that the image of the Tiburtine Sibyl or Albunea was reported to be found in this fountain. He adds that the antients made a deity of this ſpring, and conſecrated to it a grove, a Temple and an Oracle (69), and that it appears from an epigram of Martial that there was a grove conſecrated to the Muſes in this place (70). But the laſt is utterly falſe, and Cluverius read too haſtily the following words of Martial.

Itur ad Herculei gelidas quâ Tiburis arces,
Canaque ſulfureis Albula fumat aquis.
Rura, nemuſque ſacrum, dilectaque jugera Muſis
Signat vicina quartus ab urbe lapis:
Hic rudis æſtivas præſtabat porticus umbras,
Heu quam, &c (71).

To Tibur's airy towers where leads the way;
And ſulph'rous ſteams riſe from pale Albula:
The fourth mile ſtone points out the ſacred grove,
And pleaſant fields, ſeats which the Muſes love.
Here the rude porch yielded a ſummer ſhade,
Alas how, &c.

If he had conſidered them with the leaſt attention, he would have found that they did not in the leaſt concern Tibur but another place in the road thither, four miles from Rome. It is not even certain that there was in this place a grove conſecrated to the Muſes: it may be ſuppoſed that Martial meant nothing more, than that Regulus's lands were beloved by theſe goddeſſes (72). We ought to take notice that Martial has placed a diſtance of twenty miles betwixt Rome and Tibur (73).

(59) Sciendum ſane unum nomen eſſe fontis & ſilvæ. Servius, in Virgil. Æn. lib. vii, ver. 82.

(60) In Tiburtinis altiſſimis montibus. Id. ib.

(61) Horat. Ode VII, lib. i.

(62) Lactant. lib. i, Divin. Inſtitut. cap. vi, pag. m. 19.

(63) Strabo, lib. v, pag. 164.

(64) Juxta Romam Albulæ aquæ vulneribus medentur. Plin. lib. xxxi, cap. ii, p. 779.

(65) Sueton. in Auguſto, cap. lxxxii.

(66) Cluver. Ital. antiq. lib. ii, cap. x.

(67) Virgil. Æn. lib. vii, ver. 82.

(68) Martial. lib. i, Epig. xiii. See alſo Epig. iv, lib. iv, and Statius Silva iii, lib. i, ver. 75.

(69) That is, the Oracle of Faunus.

(70) Sed & Camænarum ſive Muſarum ibidem fuiſſe nemus ex Martialis Epigr. xiii, lib. i, colligere datur. Epitome Cluverii, per Bunonem Ital. antiq. lib. ii, cap. x, pag. 431.

(71) Mart. Epig. xiii, lib. i.

(72) So Farnaby underſtands that verſe of Martial.

(73) Mart. Epig. lvii, lib. iv.

TILLET (JOHN DU) in Latin Tilius, Protonotary, and Secretary to the king, and Regiſter to the Parliament of Paris, was born in Angoumois (a), and flouriſhed in the XVIth century. He applied himſelf with ſurprizing diligence to illuſtrate the Hiſtory of France; and it may be ſaid, that no body has ever yet treated this great ſubject according to the plan which he laid down. He not only propoſes to give a particular account of the wars, and general events which are to met with in the meaneſt Chroniclers; but he likewiſe inquired into (b) whatever related to the domains of the crown, the laws and ordinances, the antient form of government, the perſon and houſhold of the king, the officers of the crown, the grandees of the realm, the creation of their offices, ranks, duties, and undertook to explain all this by authentic records, whereof he gave catalogues which were very curious and inſtructive. He would have carried on his work much farther, if the court had furniſhed the neceſſary expences; but he complains that he was obliged to put a ſtop to it, becauſe he was not aſſiſted in the great charges which his inquiries made unavoidable [A.]

A ſmall

(a) Engoliſmenſi agro oriundus. Thuanus, lib. xlvii, circa fin. pag. m. 974. Sammarthanus, Elogior. lib. ii, pag. m. 80, expreſſes himſelf thus: Ducebant Tilii genus ſuum ab Engoliſma. La Croix du Maine is miſtaken in ſtiling the brother of this perſon a gentleman of Paris.

(b) See his own words in the remark [A].

[A] He complains that he was obliged to put a ſtop to it, becauſe he was not aſſiſted in the great charges .... unavoidable.] This particular, which will without doubt be agreeable to curious readers, is to be met with in the epiſtle dedicatory of his work. I ſhall cite a long paſſage of it, ſince it will acquaint us with ſeveral circumſtances of this author's undertaking. It muſt be remembred that he addreſſes himſelf to Charles IX. ‘ Having with very great labour and expence ſearched, ſince my inſtitution in my office, an infinite number of regiſters of your parliament, examined the libraries and charters of ſeveral churches in your kingdom, and, by the permiſſion of the late King, your father, (whom God abſolve) had acceſs to your treaſury of charters, and inſpected them all by his command, and upon his declaration that he would bear the charge, and recompence my aſſiſtants, (who muſt neceſſarily be very many in works of this kind), I undertook to compile in an hiſtorical form, and according to the order of reigns, all the differences of this third line now reigning with its neighbours, the domains of the crown by provinces, the laws and ordinances from the Salic law by volumes, and reigns, and, in a particular collection, what relates to the perſons and families of our kings, the antient form of government of the three eſtates, and the courſe of juſtice in the ſaid kingdom, together with the changes which have happened therein. Pliny relates, that King Alexander the Great expended eighty thouſand talents, which amount to forty eight thouſand crowns, in voyages, and other charges which were neceſſary to attain the knowledge of the properties of animals, whereof Ariſtotle by his command compoſed fifty books. The eighth part would have ſerved to compleat my ſaid works, which I began to apply my ſelf to with great diligence, and preſented to his Majeſty ſix volumes of them: four relating to the ſaid differences, one to the ſaid ordinances, and one to the perſons and families royal: but it happened to me as Mr Girard de Mountagu, Secretary and Treaſurer of the Charters to King Charles V, writes in the prefatory epiſtle to the Repertory-General, and Regiſter of the ſaid Treaſury marked A. A. that ſome of his predeceſſors in the ſaid office had begun a work relating to the ſaid Treaſury, but left it imperfect, for want of being able to bear the expence, and ſo have I been forced to do. For however, the ſaid King, and the Queen your mother declared their pleaſure, and even frequently gave their command, for the furniſhing the charges, and recompence for my aſſiſtants, and in order to perfect the ſaid works, they produced no effect, and

I was

A ſmall part only of his vaſt collections has been publiſhed [B]. If he acquired a great reputation by this exact knowledge of the conſtitution of the kingdom, he on the other hand amaſſed great riches [C], by his great aſſiduity in the particular functions of his office. The book which he publiſhed in the year 1560, concerning the king's majority, rendred him odious to the Proteſtants. They refuted it, and he reproaches one of their Hiſtorians for ſuppoſing that he never made them any reply [D]. They publiſhed ſome diſadvantageous things of him, as the motives to his work,

‘ I was abandoned, and even reproached by my ſaid aſſiſtants, whom I had entertained a long time, partly at my own expence, and partly fed with the hopes of the ſaid recompence. This, I ſay, in my excuſe, and to teſtify the infinite regret which I have upon being diſabled from doing that ſervice to your crown which I wiſhed, not aſcribing to others that misfortune, (if it be one), yet notwithſtanding this according to my duty I have upon my own ſole bottom, as far as I was able continued part of my undertaking. . . . . I have enlarged by one half the collection concerning the perſons and families Royal, and, if I live, I will purſue and perfect what relates to the three eſtates, and to the courſe of juſtice in your ſaid kingdom (1) ’.

[B] A ſmall part only of his vaſt collections has been publiſhed.] We have juſt now ſeen that they conſiſted of ſix volumes, and that while he was waiting for aſſiſtance to put the finiſhing hand to the five firſt, he prepared the ſixth, and dedicated it to Charles IX. It was printed under this title, Recueil des Roys de France, leurs Couronne & Maiſon: but I would not warrant that it had the ſame title upon the firſt publication; for Du Verdier Vau-Privas (2), and La Croix du Maine (3), mention only this Title, Memoires & Recherches touchant pluſieurs choſes memorables pour l'intelligence de l'Eſtat & des Affaires de France. La Croix duMaine adds that this book firſt printed at Rouen in the year 1577 for Philip de Tours, was reprinted at Paris by James du Puis, and that this ſecond edition is much more full and correct, and was reviſed by the author's manuſcript, with ſeveral figures and pourtraits of the Kings of France, their coins, and other remarkable things which were not in the firſt edition. After this he particulariſes the works not printed, and places in this liſt the collection relating to the perſons and families royal, and the treatiſe on the King's majority. This is a miſtake, ſince it is certain that the latter of thoſe two books had already been publiſhed in 1560, and perhaps alſo the former is the ſame with that juſt now mentioned by La Croix du Maine to have paſſed two editions. Note, that ſoon after there was publiſhed a work of du Tillet in Latin concerning the hiſtory of France: it was printed at Frankfort in the year 1579, under the Title Commentarii de Rebus Gallicis.

The Bookſeller who publiſhed the Collection of the Kings of France, their crown and family, gave hopes that the heirs of du Tillet would not ſtop there. Now let the name, ſays he (4), the praiſe, and the memory of the ſaid Sieur du Tillet be perpetuated in this kingdom, let them be perpetuated every where elſe . . . . . And to the gentlemen, his ſons, in like manner, let thanks be given in the name of us all, whom they have not only obliged with the impreſſion and publication of this work: but alſo promiſe us others too of the ſame hand, and of the like matter, having a great regard and zeal for the grandeur of our nation, and the ſingular pleaſure and ſatisfaction of every one, who is deſirous to be informed in things of this kind, no leſs than their late Father. Reader, Having ſollicited and obtained from them this conſiderable promiſe for your uſe and benefit, I alſo take upon my ſelf, and engage to remind them of it continually, out of the deſire I have to procure and communicate to you, by my impreſſion, ſomething which may confirm and preſerve you in the opinion you may have already conceived of me, that I do and ſhall always make it my buſineſs to publiſh ſuch books as may prove very greatly to your advantage. Adieu. I think that after the firſt edition of this collection, the ſons of John du Tillet furniſhed the Bookſellers ſucceſſively with the following additions. I. A collection of the ranks of the grandees of France. II. An account of every family of the kings and grandees of France. III. A collection of the wars and treaties of peace, truces, and alliances, between the kings of France and England. IV. A memoir and admonition concerning the liberties of the Gallican Church. Theſe four pieces are to be met with in my edition, which is that of Paris (5) 1618 in 4to, with a chronicle, by way of abridgment, of the kings of France, compoſed by John du Tillet, Biſhop of Meaux, brother to the Regiſter.

La Croix du Maine did not know that our John du Tillet was the author of an Inſtitution of a Chriſtian father to his children, which was printed at Paris in the year 1563 in 4to. I find in the catalogue of the Archbiſhop of Rheims's library (6), Sommaire de l'Hiſtoire de la guerre faite contre les Albigeois, extraite du Treſor des Chartes par Jean du Tillet, à Paris chez Robert Nivelle 1590 in 8vo. Mr Teiſſier obſerves that there is alſo a book intitled Pontificum aliquot Romanorum exempla cum Ethnicorum Principum geſtis comparata, printed in the year 1576, compoſed by John Tilius (7). He knows not which of the two brothers is the author of it. I do not know it neither: I only know that this work was printed at Amberg, in the year 1610 in 8vo.

[C] If he acquired a great reputation . . . . he amaſſed . . . . great riches.] Thuanus furniſhes me with this circumſtance, tho' he does not expreſs it in the ſame manner as I have done. I ſhall give the words of this great Hiſtorian. ‘ Qui (Jo. Tilius) cura, diligentia, & ſumma in ſuo munere aſſiduitate, non ſolum ingentes opes, ſed veram gloriam, & qua majorem nemo noſtrorum antea meruit, exacta Juris noſtri & Franco-Galliæ omnis antiquitatis cognitione ſibi comparavit (8). - - - - John du Tillet, by his care, diligence, and extreme application in his office, not only acquired great riches, but alſo true glory, to which none of our countrymen were more entitled, by his exact knowledge of all the laws and antiquities of France.’

[D] He reproaches one of their Hiſtorians for ſuppoſing that he never made them any reply.] Whenever we mention the diſputes of authors, we ought not to neglect obſerving what was the firſt occaſion of them, and what was the ſubject of their writings. We muſt not therefore be under any concern, if ſome readers ſhould think the following quotations too long. Charles V had paſſed at the wood of Vincennes in the year 1374, an ordinance concerning the Kings of France, attaining their majority on their entering into the fourteenth year, which was approved, and publiſhed in parliament, the King being preſent, and holding his bed of juſtice, the twentieth of May, one thouſand three hundred and ſeventy five. Notwithſtanding, after the deceaſe of the ſaid King Henry II, when his eldeſt ſon King Francis II, took the crown at the age of fifteen years, five months, and twenty one days, and being alſo married, ſome deſiring to change the religion in that kingdom, reflected, by audacious writings, upon the adminiſtration of the ſaid King, and of the Queen his mother as unlawful: to whom I preſented at that time a piece intitled, Pour la Majorite du Roy tres-Chreſtien contre les rebelles. - - - For the majority of the moſt Chriſtian King againſt the rebels. Their Majeſties having ſeen it, and found that the authority of the ſaid King was therein aſſerted and proved, commanded that it ſhould be printed and publiſhed. I remonſtrated that it was not drawn up with any other view than for inſtruction and advice, in order that the ſaid authority might not be ſuffered to be infringed, which might be preſerved and ſecured without the printing that piece. However to inform every one of the right of the ſaid King, their ſaid Majeſties perſiſted in ordering the ſaid impreſſion. Which being finiſhed, there came out ſoon after an anſwer to it, under the title of Legitime Conſeil, - - - Lawful Advice, to which I replied by another piece, intitled, Pour l'entiere Majorité du Roy tres-Chreſtien, contre le Legitime Conſeil malicieuſement intitulé par les rebelles, - - - For the full majority of the moſt Chriſtian King, in anſwer to the Lawful Advice ſo intitled by the rebels, which put a full ſtop to them. This anſwer was paſſed over without the leaſt notice by that impoſtor in his commentaries on the ſtate of religion, and of work, and went ſo far back as to relate the facts which they pretended were the cauſe of his averſion for Renaudie, the chief of the conſpiracy of Amboiſe [E]. I ſhall recite (c) what

---

(1) Du Tillet, Epiſtle to King Charles IX, before his collection of the Kings of France, &c.

(2) At page 758, of the Bibliotheque Françoiſe.

(3) Idem, pag. 268.

(4) In the Advertiſement to the Reader.

(5) By Peter Mettayer.

(6) At pag. 266, col. 2.

(7) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 345.

(8) Thuanus, lib. xlvii, pag. m. 974, col. 2.

of the republic publiſhed without any name. But the ſaid piece itſelf ſtill extant is ſufficient to convict him of an impudent calumny both in this and other particulars (9). The perſon he calls an impoſtor was the Preſident de la Place, who has given but a very indifferent character of him in his hiſtory. We ſhall take a ſhort view of this ſcene. La Place gives at firſt (10) a particular account of the ſeveral books and libels publiſhed againſt the houſe of Guiſe in the reign of Francis II. He ſays afterwards that they were anſwered by John du Tillet by a piece intituled the Majority of the King (11). He gives a very ſhort abſtract of this work, and concludes it in theſe words (12): 'And laſtly, he addreſſes himſelf to thoſe who declare that they make profeſſion of the goſpel, telling them that their aſſertion was falſe, and that what they profeſſed was rather a novel opinion, calling their preachers mutinous and ſeditious: and concluding that God would bleſs the arms that ſhould be made uſe of againſt them.' He adds, that almoſt as ſoon as this book was publiſhed there was an anſwer made to it, of which he gives an exact ſummary, and does not forget to enlarge upon the perſonal reflexions therein uſed. 'It was added, ſays he (13), that the author of the ſaid book, being advanced to honour and dignity by the liberality of the Kings of France, (whoſe pen ought to have been conſecrated and dedicated only to maintain equity, the ſtates, and policy of this kingdom, and the authority of juſtice) had very much forgot himſelf, by endeavouring to confirm the authority of thoſe who have never ceaſed to pervert all orders whatſoever hitherto obſerved in this kingdom, without returning any anſwer, deliberately, and with deſign, to what had been alledged, that thoſe of the houſe of Guiſe were abſolutely incapable of the places they held. And appearing as if he had no regard to this, he fell foul upon thoſe who were no way to blame, and who in proper time and place would not be backward in their own defence: but this author at laſt painted himſelf to the life in the colours of Achitophel, whom he exactly reſembled in the counſel he gave at the concluſion of his book. For as the former adviſed the purſuing the loyal party who were for ſupporting their King againſt the uſurper Abſalom: ſo the latter adviſes the putting them all to the ſword, declaring himſelf by this a rebel, and traitor, and deſiring nothing but cruelty, confuſion, and the deſtruction of the kingdom.' Here the ſcene ends: and, to ſpeak freely of it, we muſt allow it to be either too ſhort or too long. For if the Hiſtorian had a mind to ſay nothing of du Tillet's reply, he ought to have paſſed over the anſwer of the Proteſtants; and ſince he did not think proper to ſuppreſs the latter, he ought not to have ſuppreſſed the former. We ſhall ſee preſently that he is not the only perſon who has been guilty of this ſmall ſin of omiſſion, and that others have been guilty of ſomething worſe.

[E] They publiſhed ſome diſadvantageous things of him, as the motives to his work, and went ſo far back as to relate the facts . . . the cauſe of his averſion for . . . the chief of the conſpiracy of Amboiſe.] Louïs de Regnier, Sieur de la Planche, having given almoſt word for word the ſame account with the Preſident de la Place, ſtopped ſhort all at once, without ſaying one word of John du Tillet's reply. He did even much worſe; for he affirmed that this author being preſſed to reply, anſwered, that it was much better not to make any reply. 'There were ſeveral other perſons who took pen in hand in anſwer to du Tillet's book, but if I was to give an account of them all, it might give the reader too much trouble. Theſe anſwers falling into the hands of the Cardinal, he ſent for du Tillet, and his brother the Biſhop of St Brieu, and deſired them in the preſence of his moſt intimate and familiar friends to write a reply. For, ſaid he, I am afraid theſe pieces will make their way into Germany, and break the King's meaſures, ſince the princes, namely the Proteſtants with whom we would keep friendſhip, are very great readers of ſuch books: and whence once they have made an impreſſion on their heavy brains, it is not eaſy for the ſecret agents we have among them to find means to deface them. On the contrary, this greatly opens the way for the Huguenots to procure audience, in ſuch ſort that we cannot ſo readily play upon theſe princes as we could wiſh, and we are the more frequently defeated in our deſigns. It is ſaid that du Tillet excuſed himſelf very earneſtly, becauſe the ſubject was difficult, and too much cleared up by the hiſtories of France: ſo that this would be only furniſhing freſh matter for the Huguenots, to write on and over-load the Cardinal and his family with abuſe. That among thoſe deſperate perſons, there were ſome of ſurprizing parts, who had no other way of maintaining their credit, or ſupporting their cauſe, but by their writings. So far ought we to be from giving them the leaſt handle of this kind, that inſtead of writing we ought to employ againſt their perſons and effects all the ſeverities that can be contrived; in order to take from them all firm footing, and to diſcourage their writings: which was judged the beſt expedient by all the company, and that the Cardinal might write particular letters to the German princes, which would ſerve as an ample vindication againſt all calumnies that might be charged upon him, and not being publiſhed in print would not be contradicted. And this he promiſed to do as what was moſt adviſeable (14).'

The hiſtory from which I take this paſſage is a book which it would be very hard for an infinite number of perſons to meet with: the bare citing it therefore will be of little or no ſervice to them; the only true way to ſatisfy them is to relate here at full length the account we there find concerning the motives of du Tillet. It is an account full of very curious and remarkable matters. I ſhall herefore give it here, without being afraid of tiring the reader with the prolixity of the quotation.

'(15) Du Tillet, ... rummaging the antient regiſters and records of the Parliament of Paris, began to look into them; and finding ſeveral memorable pieces which had been quite forgot by our Hiſtoriographers, either through careleſſneſs or ignorance, he propoſed to make a collection of them for the ſervice of poſterity. This being intimated to the King (16), he found it would be very proper and uſeful in regard to his own intereſt, and that of the kingdom. And therefore commanded him to purſue it with diligence; and as it was a work of great expence, money was given him for the undertaking, with the promiſe of a reward. Becauſe alſo it was proper for him to be aſſiſted with regiſters and informations from the chamber of accounts, from the treaſury of charters, and other places, he had letters containing very expreſs command, to give him admittance to them, and to let him take whatever he ſhould have occaſion for. In which he uſed an extreme diligence. But having advanced the work, the king died, without du Tillet's receiving the reward he expected. And what ſurprized him more was, that after the death of the king, all his friends found themſelves eſtranged or baniſhed from the court, ſo that his place of Regiſter was in great danger by reaſon of its value, and becauſe thoſe of the houſe of Guiſe had at that time begun a method of diſtributing among their friends all the offices, and places of advantage which they could lay their hands on. Du Tillet had then only acceſs to the Conſtable, whom he made acquainted with the command he had received from the late king, and the ſervice that France ought to expect from it. In which he did not forget the pains he had taken, requeſting in recompence for thoſe and for his ſervices, that at leaſt his poſt of Regiſter to the Parliament might be continued and confirmed to him. The Conſtable, who had received ſome ſervices from du Tillet, promiſed to preſent him to the king, have him confirmed in his place, and to uſe his intereſt for him. But with reſpect to his book, not being a man of letters, he did not concern himſelf about it. It happened that as he was ſpeaking of it to the king, and du Tillet had his books lying before him on the table, the Cardinal of Lorrain came in, and caſt his eye upon them. And believing that this work would be very proper to inſtruct him in ſtate-affairs,

---

(c) In the remark [E].

(9) Du Tillet, Recueil des Roys de France, pag. m. 277, 278.

(10) Commentaires de l'eſtat de la Religion & Republ. livr. ii, fol. 38, verſo.

(11) Ibid. fol. 43.

(12) Ibid. folio 44.

(13) Ibid. folio 45.

(14) La Planche, Hiſtoire de François II, pag. 370, & ſeq.

(15) Ibid. pag. 372, & ſeq.

(16) The author ſpeaks of Francis I.

what they advanced: The reader may judge of it as he pleaſes. We ſhall ſee in the following article (d), that he was ſaid to have been a pupil of Calvin. He died at Paris on the 11th of November 1570 (e). His place of Regiſter to the Parliament of Paris was enjoyed by his deſcendants for above a century [F]. It ought not to be forgot, that he was

(d) In the remark [C].

and to compleat the deſigns he had already formed, he began to find fault with, and to caſt an odium upon this excellent undertaking of du Tillet, and even to accuſe him before his majeſty of diſloyalty, in deſigning to publiſh the ſecrets of the kingdom, and thoſe things which our kings ought with the greateſt care to conceal, that they may be inſpected only by very few perſons. The Conſtable did not inſiſt much in favour of du Tillet. For he was of opinion that learning effeminated the gentry, and made them degenerate from their predeceſſors, and even that it had engendered hereſies, and increaſed the Lutherans to ſuch a number as they were then arrived to in the kingdom, ſo that he had very little eſteem for learned men, and their books; which was the reaſon that du Tillet did not find ſo much countenance and ſupport from this quarter as he expected. However, finding himſelf thus rebuked, he alledged the command he had received from the late king, and deſired that his books might be read and examined, by which it would be found that he had not exceeded the bounds of his inſtructions. Upon this the Cardinal procured an order from the king to take theſe books to peruſe them, and to make his report to the council. This he accordingly did, and ſent them home to his houſe, where he ordered du Tillet to attend him to give him an account of what he had done, and to wait the king's pleaſure. Thus was this affair at a ſtand, and du Tillet, inſtead of receiving a recompence for his long labours, had enough to do to make all the friends he could to appeaſe the Cardinal: ſo that he was afraid of loſing his goods, eſtates, and life. The cardinal on his part having cauſed theſe books to be peruſed by ſome learned perſons whom he kept in his family, to inſtruct him in ſuch affairs as he was to propoſe to the council, to which he was then very much a ſtranger, by reaſon of his youth and want of experience, he found by their report, that theſe labours might be of great uſe and aſſiſtance to him: but that to publiſh them in print, there were things of too great importance, and which might even prejudice the rights which his family claimed to ſome duchies and lordſhips of France. However they thought he ought not to treat the author ſo roughly, but to careſs, and receive him kindly, and to procure for him the confirmation of his place. Which being done, would lay him under ſo great an obligation, that it would be eaſy to get him to ſuppreſs whatever theſe books contained in derogation to his rights. Beſides, that the gaining ſuch a ſervant to the parliament, would be no ſmall conqueſt: for by his means it would be eaſy to learn all the ſecrets of that court. All which they engaged to bring him to comply with, and to think himſelf very happy alſo in meeting with ſuch good fortune. The Cardinal approved of this advice, and knew ſo well how to put it in practice, that he gained the point he aimed at, in ſuch manner as we have before related. Du Tillet alſo eſteeming it no ſmall matter, to be received into the good graces of the Cardinal, and to have the confirmation of his office by his favour, became his affectionate ſervant: and, in order to find means to inform him of every thing with greater certainty, he recommended to him his own brother for Protonotary. By this means, as the Cardinal increaſed in favour, fortune, honours, and grandeur, the affection of this Regiſter for his ſervice increaſed in proportion; ſo that no law-ſuit was ever carried on ſo ſecretly, with regard to fine duchies, counties, or lordſhips of conſideration, but that he was advertiſed of it, ſo as to find means to recover them. The ſaid Cardinal, therefore, having afterwards attained the higheſt poſt under the reign of Francis II, whoſe hiſtory we are writing; du Tillet voluntarily took in hand the defence of the houſe of Guiſe, knowing that if any harm ſhould happen to them, his life might one day be in danger: as, on the contrary, it was to be imagined that this piece having ſtrengthened their cauſe, muſt entitle him to greater favour, as in truth the Protonotary, who had alſo found means to be employed by the Queen-mother, received for recompence the Biſhopric of S. Brieu. The court of parliament induced by the like reſpect, and willing to oblige theſe governors, gave a licence to this book of the Majority, uſing all their power to ſuppreſs the pieces on the other ſide, and making enquiry after the Printers who were ſuſpected of publiſhing them, in order to puniſh them as guilty of high-treaſon. Moreover, there was another conſideration which put this Regiſter upon writing againſt thoſe of the enterprize of Amboiſe, namely, the mortal enmity he bore to la Renaudie, on account of a law-ſuit between them for matters of forgery, wherein the honour of du Tillet was greatly concerned. And though he obtained a verdict in his favour (17), yet Renaudie publickly and expreſly declared, that it was by his intereſt that he had ſucceeded in all the courts of France, and in regard to his place, which gave him ſuch great opportunities of ſerving his friends: but that he hoped, that if ever juſtice ſhould be open to him, he ſhould make the iniquity of the judgments appear, and convict du Tillet of forgery, as in fact he did obtain a reverſal, and letters of rehearing ſome time before the death of King Henry. He reproached alſo du Tillet, that after he and his family had been maintained and educated in the houſe of la Renaudie, he had been ſent to Paris very young to ſollicit their law-ſuits, and there entertained ſo curiouſly and cloſely in his ſtudies, that by their favour and intereſt he was at laſt preferred to this poſt of Regiſter to the parliament; which finding himſelf poſſeſſed of, inſtead of rendering his loyal ſervice to that houſe for the favours he had received from it, he had, by forgeries all very manifeſt, procured for his brothers four or five thouſand livres a year in benefices, which were held by one of the uncles of the ſaid Renaudie: and farther, ſought all means to appropriate to himſelf the remaining part of their eſtate, becauſe he had got poſſeſſion of all the deeds and titles to it. But all this was ſuperſeded by the death of la Renaudie, who while living had kept du Tillet in the greateſt anxiety.’

(17) Compare with this the words of Varillas, pag. 102, of the Hiſtory of Francis II. La Renaudie had a long law-ſuit with John du Tillet, Regiſter in Chief to the Parliament of Paris. It was for the eccleſiaſtical benefice of Champiners in Angoumois, of ſix thouſand livres a year; and la Renaudie after having proſecuted him thro' all the ſupreme juriſdictions of the kingdom, under pretext that his adverſary had relations there, obtained at laſt an evocation to the Parliament of Dijon, where he was legally convicted of forgery. Varillas adds that du Tillet cauſed la Renaudie to be impriſoned, who could not prevent being condemned to death; but that the Prince of Joinville, ſaved the life of this priſoner, and obtained letters of rehearing, which re-eſtabliſhed him in his eſtate and reputation. Thuanus ſays, book xxiv, pag. m. 488, that la Renaudie was condemned only to pay a large fine, and to be baniſhed for ſome time.

I believe the hiſtory of the Sieur de la Planche was not printed till after the death of John du Tillet.

[F] His office of Regiſter . . . . was enjoyed by his deſcendants for above a century.] This is what we find in the True State of France, printed in 1657. There is in the Parliament of Paris a Regiſter in chief, who is Mr du Tillet, whoſe anceſtors enjoyed this office for three hundred years paſt, which is one of the moſt profitable in all France (18). Here is, in my opinion, an error in Chronology; for I believe that before our John du Tillet, not one of his family (19) had ever been Regiſter in chief to the Parliament of Paris. And note, that the State of France, printed in 1680 (20), names Philip-James as Regiſter at that time.

Here follows a fine encomium on the grandſon of John du Tillet. On the 29th of December, 1646, Monſieur du Tillet, Regiſter in chief to the Parliament almoſt during ſixty years, died after a tedious diſtemper, which he underwent with very great patience. He is commended in a moſt particular manner for having given in his life-time above a million of gold in charities, alms, and liberalities, and yet not left either the name or arms of John du Tillet, Baron de Buſſiere, any way recorded on that account. He lived ſeventy-eight years and ſix days (21) (§ a).

[(§ a) It is not true, as Mr Bayle very juſtly obſerves, that the office of Regiſter in chief to the Parliament was for 300 years ſucceſſively in the family of du Tillet, neither is it true that John du Tillet was the firſt of his family who was preferred to it. This will appear by the following extract from a memoir communicated

(18) Véri able Eſtat de la France, pag. 453, Edit. of Paris 1657.

(19) That is to to ſay, father, grandfather, &c. which is the meaning of the author whom I have cited.

(20) At page 430, of Tom. ii.

(21) Peter de St Romuald, Journal Chronol. Tom. ii, p. 700.

(e) Peter de St Romuald, Journ. Chron. Tom. ii, pag. 540. La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franc. pag. 269, and Sammarth. Elogior. lib. ii, pag. m. 80, mention only the month of November. Correct Moreri, who places his death in the month of December.

was either the author or promoter of the edict (f) which prohibits the remitting money to Rome for the diſpatching of benefices (g).

(f) Made in September 1551.

(g) Thuanus, lib. viii, pag. 168.

---

communicated by Mr Francis Janiçon, Advocate to his Majeſty's privy-council, and Deputy-General of the Reformed Churches in Guienne.

Elias du Tillet, whoſe father was Secretary to Louiſa de Savoy, Counteſs of Angoulême, the mother of Francis I, was ennobled in April 1434, and was, in 1514, Preſident of the Accounts in Angoulême, and Vice-preſident of the Chamber of Accounts in Paris. In regard to him, Francis I gave to his ſon Seraphin du Tillet, knight, Valet de chambre to the King, the office of Regiſter in chief to the Parliament of Paris, in which he ſucceeded Nicholas Pichon his father-in-law. The Letters-patent of this grant are dated at Claye the fifth of November 1518, and he was ſworn in the fourth of February 1519, new ſtile. From that time, this office has not been out of the family. John, his brother, obtained it, on the ſeventh of September 1530; John, his ſon, the twenty-fourth of July 1552; James, his brother, on the ſecond of January 1578; John, called the Younger, on the fourth of March 1588; Francis, in 1638; and John-Francis, in 1674. This year the king divided the office into four parts, whereof a perſon named Philip-James had one, which he enjoyed till 1689, when John-Francis du Tillet re-entred upon it. John du Tillet, brother to the firſt John, and ſon of Elias, was made Biſhop of St Brieux, in 1553, and Biſhop of Meaux the 16th of December 1565. He died in the month of December 1570.

It appears from hence, 1. That Seraphin du Tillet was the firſt of this family who was Regiſter in chief to the Parliament of Paris. 2. That this Philip-James was not of the family of du Tillet, as this paſſage, related by Mr Bayle, implies, and as Mr Bayle himſelf appears to have believed. 3. That this Philip-James ſeems to have diſcharged this office only till ſuch time as J. Fr. du Tillet ſhould come of age, or be qualified to diſcharge it himſelf. Rem. Crit.]

TILLET (John du) younger brother of the foregoing, was an Eccleſiaſtic, and became a very learned man (a). He was a perfect maſter of languages, the antient Roman law, and Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity. He ſearched, by the permiſſion of Francis I, the moſt celebrated libraries in the kingdom, and took from thoſe libraries a great many books, which enabled him to publiſh ſeveral valuable antient pieces, both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil (b) [A], and particularly an old manuſcript, that goes under the name of Charlemagne [B], and which did not much pleaſe the Roman Catholics. He was preferred ſucceſſively to two biſhoprics; ſome ſay he was firſt Biſhop of Meaux, and afterwards of St Brieu (c), others that he was firſt Biſhop of St Brieu and afterwards of Meaux (d). He compoſed ſome controverſial treatiſes, and yet was ſuſpected of inclining to Calviniſm [C]. The public very much eſteemed a ſhort chronicle of the Kings of France (e), which he publiſhed in Latin (f), and in French (g), and continued from Pharamond

(a) Thuan. lib. xlvii, pag. m. 974.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Sammarthan. Elog. lib. ii, pag. 79.

(d) Thuan. lib. xlvii, pag. m. 974.

(e) Sammarthan. Elog. lib. ii, pag. m. 80. La Croix du Maine, pag. 268.

(f) In the year 1551.

(g) In the year 1553.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral valuable antient pieces, both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil.] He printed at Paris, in 1538, ſome treatiſes of Pacianus, Biſhop of Barcelona, and in 1540 Apoſtolorum Canones & Concilia XIII; and in 1550, Codicis Theodoſiani Libri priores octo emendati, & poſteriores octo integri primum; and in 1555, Evangelium Matthæi Hebraicè & Latinè; and in 1567, the works of Luciferus, Biſhop of Cagliari.

[B] and . . . . . an old manuſcript, which goes under the name of Charlemagne.] He publiſhed it at Paris, in the year 1549; but no notice is taken in the title-page, either of the name of the Printer, or of the place where the book was printed, and in the preface, which he added to it, he took the fictitious name of Eliphilus. It has been thought, with a great deal of probability, that by the former part of this word he intended to ſignify, that being animated with the ſpirit of Elias, he had a deſign to deſtroy images; and that by the latter part he deſcribed his own name Tilius, for Tilia in Latin, is the name of a tree, which the Greeks call Philyra (1). It is certain that his Preface is not conformable to the principles of the Roman Catholics upon the worſhip of images; but rather to a book he publiſhed, which condemned the diviſions of the ſecond Council of Nice. This is the title under which he publiſhed it: Opus illuſtriſſimi Caroli Magni, nutu Dei, Regis Francorum, Gallias, Germaniam, Italiamque, ſive harum finitimas Provincias, Domino opitulante, regentis, contra Synodum, quæ in partibus Græciæ pro adorandis imaginibus ſtolide ſive arroganter geſta eſt. Item: Paulini Aquileienſis Epiſcopi adverſus Felicem Urgelitanum, & Eliphandum Toletanum Epiſcopos Libellus. Quæ nunc primum in lucem reſtituuntur. Anno Salutis MDXLIX. A ſecond edition of this book was printed at Cologn in the year 1555, and it has been inſerted by Goldaſt in the collection of Imperial Decrees de Cultu Imaginum, on the worſhip of images, publiſhed at Francfort in the year 1608, in 8vo. Several controverſial writers of the Romiſh communion (2) have maintained, that this is a ſuppoſititious piece, that Charlemagne was not the author of it, and that it was not compoſed in the time of that emperor, but rather by the Heretics of the XVIth century. It has been demonſtrated to them, that this notion of theirs is falſe; and that this piece was at leaſt approved and adopted by Charlemagne. See the proofs alledged by Mr Daillé, and his anſwers to the chicaneries of Bellarmin (3). Father Maimbourg ingenuouſly confeſſes that, this book was written under the Emperor Charlemagne. It remained in obſcurity, continues he (4), till the year 1549, when a Lutheran having found it in an antient manuſcript, publiſhed it with a preface of his own, under the borrowed name of Eli Phili, in which he inveighs terribly againſt the worſhip of images. It cannot, however, be denied, that this book was the very work aſcribed to Charlemagne, as appears by the anſwers which Pope Adrian made to the objections contained in it. He pretends, that thoſe who compoſed it had nothing of the ſpirit of that Prince, who would not have written in that manner. This remark has been invincibly refuted in the Entretiens d'Eudoxe & d'Euchariſte (5), the author of which confeſſes, that there is room to believe that Charlemagne was the author of thoſe four books which go under his name. I am ſurpriſed that no body has cenſured that Jeſuit, for aſſerting that they were publiſhed by a Lutheran. Could he be ignorant, that all the world has long ſince acknowledged, that the editor of them was a Biſhop?

[C] He compoſed ſome controverſial treatiſes, and yet was ſuſpected of inclining to Calviniſm.] Here follows the titles of them: A treatiſe on the Antiquity and Solemnity of the Maſs, on the Apoſtles Creed, and on the XII Articles of our Faith; at Paris, 1566, in 8vo. The Anſwer of a Biſhop to the Miniſters of the New Churches; at Paris, 1566, in 8vo (6). He publiſhed it alſo in Latin. Advice to the Gentlemen ſeduced by the Stratagems of the Miniſters of the New Churches; at Paris, 1567, in 8vo. A treatiſe on the Chriſtian Religion.

What follows is a proof of his being ſuſpected: Cardinal Perron accuſed him of having ſome ill deſign againſt the Romiſh Religion, in publiſhing the treatiſe of Charlemagne. It is Monſieur du Tillet, ſays he (7), who cauſed it to be printed ſtudio nocendi, out of a deſign to do miſchief, rather than on any other account; and he who had been a pupil of Calvin, could have no other

(1) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, p. 344, ex Voſſio de Hiſtor. Lat. lib. ii, cap. xxx, pag. 290.

(2) See among others Alanus Copus, Dial. IV, cap. xviii, xix; & Dial. V, cap. xii, & ſeq. Surius, in Admon. de Syn. Francof. in the iiid Tome of the Councils, Part. i, pag. 159.

(3) Daillé, Traité des Images, lib. iv, ch. iii. See alſo Mr du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. vi, pag. 120, Dutch edition.

(4) Maimbourg, Hiſt. des Iconoclaſtes, lib. iv, pag. m. 23.

(5) Pag. 173, Dutch edition.

(6) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 757, 758.

(7) Perroniana, at the word Charles-Magne.

ramond down to the year 1550. He died in the ſame month and year with his brother the Regiſter (b). Some ſay that LEWIS DU TILLET, Archdeacon of Angoulême was their brother [D].

(b) That is to ſay, in the month of November, 1570. Sammarth. Elog. lib. ii, pag. 80, and La Croix du Maine, pag. 269.

other opinion of images than this. Calvin, ſays he, in another place (8), was very much perplexed on the ſubject of the Euchariſt. It is ſaid, that Meſſieurs du Tillet have ſtill in their hands ſome letters of his own writing on that ſubject of the Euchariſt, which diſcover more clearly the opinion he had of it, than any of his other writings. It is not to be wondered at, if theſe Meſſieurs du Tillet have been a little ſuſpected, as they had Calvin for their maſter. It cannot be thought ſtrange, that the Preface which John du Tillet, the Biſhop, prefixed to the book of Charlemagne, ſhould render him ſuſpected; for he expreſſed himſelf in the ſtrongeſt terms againſt the abuſe of images, and did not contain himſelf within the bounds that have been fixed by ſome Catholic Doctors (9). Perhaps he wrote afterwards againſt the Huguenots, for no other reaſon but to clear himſelf of all ſuſpicion. What I have cited from the Perroniana proves, that his brother, the Regiſter, was not eſteemed truly orthodox, and that it was pretended he had been a diſciple of Calvin. He purged himſelf however ſo entirely, that the Proteſtants looked upon him as their perſecutor (10). And, by the way, I ſhall here correct a miſtake in the Index to the ſecond volume of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Reformed Churches in the kingdom of France. We there find under the letter T du Tillet, the Regiſter, and his cruelty, 7. 501; but when we conſult this page 501 of the VIIth book, we meet with nothing there which can neceſſarily be imputed to this du Tillet. We read there only that ſome Proteſtant ſoldiers, who went out of Bourges in 1563, in order to go to Orleans, took a private road, by which ſome of them found their way very well, but the reſt loſt themſelves: among whom there were thirty or forty, who being tired, and having very little powder left to defend themſelves, were ſurpriſed and cruelly maſſacred by the perſons who were kept by John du Tillet, Regiſter to the court of Parliament of Paris, in his houſe of la Buſſiere near Chaſtillon on the Loin (11). If the author had ſaid that du Tillet, reſiding at that time at la Buſſiere, had ordered this maſſacre, the Index of the book had been correct; but he leaves us at liberty to imagine that du Tillet might have no hand in it: for is it not allowable, in civil wars, for any one to guard his caſtles in the beſt manner he can? If the ſoldiers made uſe of commit any diſorder, the owner of the caſtle, who is often at an hundred leagues diſtance, having given no orders in particular, can never be anſwerable for it. Thoſe who make Indexes to books frequently commit miſtakes of this kind.

[D] Some ſay that LEWIS DU TILLET, Archdeacon of Angoulême, was their brother.] Florimond de Remond ſhall be my author. He affirms (12), that Calvin having retired into the city of Angoulême, was entertained there for the ſpace of three years, at the expence of Lewis du Tillet, Curate of Claix, and Canon of Angoulême, whom he taught the little Greek he knew. He was brother to the Biſhop of Meaux, and to John du Tillet, Regiſter to the Parliament of Paris. This author adds (13), that Lewis du Tillet, 'having his head full 'of the opinions which Calvin had imprinted on him, 'and being deſirous to ſee all thoſe great men who 'had declared war againſt the Catholic Church, made a 'journey into Germany (14). . . . Du Tillet on his 'return having recovered his reaſon, renounced for 'ever the doctrine of his maſter. Thus Calvin quickly 'loſt the firſt of his conqueſts; for this was the firſt 'ſoul which was ever believed to be ſeduced by him. 'He ſhews very ſtrongly the reſentment he had againſt 'this man in his Preface to the Pſalms. For it is of 'him he ſpeaks, where he mentions a certain perſon, 'who after vilely revolting, and returning back to the 'Papiſts, diſcovered him paſſing to Geneva. He means 'du Tillet, whom he never mentions without reflexion. Du Tillet, after his return to Angoulême, 'having, by letter, bid his laſt adieu to the novel 'opinions of Calvin, and made public abjuration of 'his Hereſy, aſcended the pulpit, (for he was a man 'of learning) preached, and declamed againſt Lutheraniſm as zealouſly as he had before deſired to promote 'it. The name of Calviniſm was not yet in uſe. He 'was elected Archdeacon, which dignity he long diſputed with la Renaudie (15).' According to this account, it would be falſe that du Tillet, the Regiſter, had been the diſciple of Calvin: the Perroniana would confound things.

Note, that Papyrius Maſſo's brother, affirms, that Lewis de Tillet was not brother, but nephew to the Regiſter of the parliament. 'Is (Ludovicus Tillius) 'erat filius Heliæ in privato Conſiſtorio Regio Conſiliarii & Vicepræſidis Rationalium, Aloiſiæ è Sabaudia Franciſci primi, matris, fratriſque Joannis Tillii 'Senatus Pariſienſis exceptoris, cujus ſcripta extant '(16).' - - - Lewis du Tillet was the ſon of Elias, 'Privy-counſellor to the King, and Vice-preſident of accounts to Louiſſa of Savoy, Francis the firſt's mother, 'and the brother of John du Tillet, Regiſter to the Parliament of Paris, whoſe writings are extant.' He does not ſay that the Regiſter had no ſhare in the return of this diſciple of Calvin. You may obſerve, if you pleaſe, that this brother of Papyrius Maſſo got the beſt information he was able of all theſe things during his reſidence at Angoulême, where he had a canonſhip (17). Peter de St Romuald (18) obſerves, that this Canon du Tillet was named Lewis or Seraphin: he relates ſome facts advanced by Florimond de Remond, but inſtead of quoting this Florimond, he quotes Papyrius Maſſo, who has ſaid nothing of them.

I find, in the Mercure Galant for the month of May, 1705 (19), one SERAPHIN DU TILLET, who was lately dead, a Counſellor in the grand-chamber, and an Abbot DU TILLET, who was ſtill living; and that the mother of the late Count d'Entremont, Lieutenant-General of Breſſe, and grand-mother of the Marchioneſs de l'Hôpital, was deſcended from the Regiſter John du Tillet.

(8) Ibid. at the word Calvin.

(9) Mr du Pin, for example. See page 153, of Tom. vi, of his Nouvelle Bibliotheque, Dutch edition.

(10) See the remarks [D] and [E], of the article foregoing.

(11) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. des Egliſes, Vol. ii, livr. vii, pag. 501.

(12) Florimond de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Héréſie, lib. vii, ch. ix, pag. m. 883.

(13) Id. ch. x, pag. 889, 890.

(14) See the remark [AA], of the article CALVIN.

(15) Thuanus, lib. xxiv, pag. 488, ſays that la Renaudie went to law for a benefice which his uncle by the mother's ſide, had in Augoumois, and to which du Tillet the Regiſter claimed a right. See, in the remark [E], of the preceding article, the words of la Planche, and of Varillas.

(16) Addit. to chap. iv, of the Life of Calvin. pag. 457. Elog. Pap. Maſſonis.

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 456.

(18) In Continuatione Chronici Ademari, pag. 297.

(19) Pag. 281.

TILLI or THILLI, a lordſhip in Brabant [A] which gave a title to John Count de Tilli, who was born there, and has been one of the greateſt captains of the XVIIth century. He is mentioned in Moreri's Dictionary, under the word Tzerclas, which was the

[A] A lordſhip in Brabant.] Gramaie informs us that it had belonged to the houſe of Warfuzé, and that Robert de Warfuzé transferred it to Gerard Marbais in the year 1389. It was afterwards poſſeſſed by John de Limilette, and then by Sanſon de Lalain, who, on the twenty-fifth of June, 1448, conferred the Dominium altum & baſſum, on John Serclaes, deſcended from one of the moſt noble Patrician families of Bruſſels (1). The lordſhip of Tilli was then entirely independent; but afterwards became a fiſe to the Dukes of Brabant, by virtue of the following inſtrument: 'John, Lord 'of Thilly, transfers into the hands of my Lord Duke, 'his houſe and lordſhip of Tilly, with all its rights 'and appurtenances as by him enjoyed, and our ſaid 'Lord the Duke hath again transferred the ſaid houſe 'and lordſhip, and all the lands thereto appertaining 'to the ſaid John, his heirs and ſucceſſors, to hold it 'in perpetual fief of our ſaid lord and his heirs and 'his ſucceſſors the Dukes and Ducheſſes of Brabant. 'And the ſaid John held his ſaid houſe and lordſhip 'of Thilly of our ſaid lord, and therefore did his fealty, 'and homage, and took the oath of allegiance, as cuſtomary in the court of the fiefs of Brabant. And our 'ſaid lord received his homage with a ſalvo to his 'highneſs and lordſhip, and to the rights of every 'one. Done the 16th day of May, in the year 1449 (2).' This John Serclaes was the father of James t'Serclaes, who was the father of Martin t'Serclaes father of John t'Serclaes, member of the council of war to the Emperor, who married a daughter of the Count of Friſeland (3). From

(1) Patricia imprimiſque nobili apud Bruxellam ſtirpe edito. Le Roy, in Topographia Gallo-Brabantiæ, pag. 99.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Ex eod. ibid.

the family name of this famous General. He had an elder brother, whoſe grandſons at this preſent time (a) make a very conſiderable figure. There are three brothers of them, all called Counts de Tilli. One is Canon of Liege; the two other bear arms. One of whom is General of the troops of Liege, and has been raiſed to the dignity of a prince by the King of Spain [B]. The other by his long ſervices has been advanced to the chief poſts in the Dutch army (b). He married a ſiſter of the Count of Reckheim, Biſhop of Coire or Chur, and Canon of Cologn and Saltzburgh, a lord who by his great merit and exalted genius ſupports the illuſtrious nobility of his houſe.

There are ſome miſtakes in Moreri's article Tzerclas [C], which is that of John Count de Tilly. I do not know whether he is not miſtaken, when he ſays that this General was made a count at the Diet of Ratisbon, in the year 1623: I ſhall only ſay, that according to Father Labbe, John and James de TILLI were created Counts of the Empire by the Emperor at Vienna the 3d of September 1622 (c). The Sieur Blanc obſerves that Count Werner, nephew of Count de Tilli, was wounded at the battle of Statlo in the year 1623 (d).

(a) That is, in the year 1696. The Gazettes are continually mentioning them.

(b) Lieutenant-General of Horſe, and Governor of Arnheim, in 1701. See the Lettres Hiſtoriques, of November 1701, pag. 607.

(c) Labbe, Chron. Franc. Tom. v, pag. 846.

(d) Blanc, Hiſt. de Baviere, Tom. iv, pag. 190.

From this marriage proceeded John t'Serclaes, created count by the Emperor Ferdinand II (4), and one of the greateſt Generals of the XVIIth century.

[B] One . . . . raiſed to the dignity of a Prince by the King of Spain.] This is the tenor of the Letters-patents, as abridged and publiſhed by the Baron le Roy. They are dated at Madrid the twenty-ſecond of December 1693. 'Charles, by 'the Grace of GOD, King of Caſtile, &c. Being in'formed, that ſeveral anceſtors of our moſt dear and 'royal Lord Albert T'Serclaes de Thilly, Count of 'the holy Roman empire, Gentleman of our bed'chamber, Serjeant-General of battalia in our 'armies in the Low-countries, and, at preſent, by 'our permiſſion and conſent, General of the troops 'of the Prince and Biſhop of Liege, our ally, and 'others of his family have, with the utmoſt bravery 'and reſolution, done ſeveral important ſervices to 'the Emperors, Kings, and Princes, our auguſt prede'ceſſors. As alſo that the ſaid Albert T'Serclaes de 'Thilly, hath ſerved in our armies from the year one 'thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty ſix, as Captain, 'Lieutenant-Colonel, Colonel of horſe, and Serjeant'general of battalia, and that on all occaſions which 'have offered in our ſervice, he hath neither ſpared 'his life nor eſtate, of which we have received the 'utmoſt ſatisfaction which we can deſire. As well 'as of the ſervices he continues at preſent to perform 'in the quality of General of the forces of the Prince 'and Biſhop of Liege, for the common cauſe, with 'a zeal, bravery, and experience ſo well known to all 'the world. Knowing moreover, that the ſaid Albert 'T'Serclaes de Thilly is deſcended from a very illuſtri'ous and antient family, which has always been ſup'ported by ſeveral great, high, and very conſiderable 'alliances, and that beſides he poſſeſſes ſeveral lands, 'lordſhips, and eſtates, ſufficient to maintain his ho'nour, as thoſe of Montigny, Farciennes, Prelle, and 'others; and being willing, for this reaſon, to raiſe, 'advance him, and diſtinguiſh with greater honours, 'rights, prerogatives, and pre-eminencies; we have 'of our certain knowledge, &c. made and created, 'and we do by theſe preſents make and create, Albert 'Count de T'Serclaes de Thilly, Prince of T'Serclaes, 'conſenting and granting that he may beſtow the ſaid 'title of Prince upon the ſeat and lordſhip, which he 'ſhall name, under our obedience and juriſdiction in 'our ſaid Low-countries: which ſeat and lordſhip we 'have to that end erected, and do by theſe preſents 'erect into the dignity, title, name, ſtile, and pre'eminence of Principality of T'Serclaes, &c (5).'

[C] There are ſome faults in Moreri's Article Tzerclas.] I. He has forgot to ſet down the ſirname of this General of the troops of the Catholic league. II. The name of the town which he took after the battle of Prague, is Ellenbogen and not Elbogen. III. It ſhould have been obſerved that Ellenbogen was a town of Bohemia. IV. The defeat of the Margrave of Baden at Wimphen did not follow, but preceded the taking of Heidelberg. V. What happened at Manſfeld near Darmſtad (6) was not a defeat, but only a check, and likewiſe preceded the conqueſt of Heidelberg; therefore theſe words of Moreri, Tilli had formerly . . . . taken Heidelberg, contain an anachoriſm. VI. Theſe words are not intelligible. He had formerly aided the Arch-duke Leopold in the taking of Breda. This, perhaps, is an error of the preſs, and ſhould have been Bretta, the Latin name of Bretten, a ſmall town in the Palatinate. This Arch-duke Leopald was Biſhop of Straſbourg, and joined his troops with thoſe of Count Tilli at the ſiege of Heidelberg (7). VII. Inſtead of ſaying that the Duke of Weimar, and the Duke of Alkenburg (8) were made priſoners at the battle of Statlo, he ought to have ſaid Duke William Saxe-Weimar, and Frederic Duke of Saxe-Altemburgh. For want of this particular diſtinction of names, which the Sieur Blanc has uſed (9), there ariſe many ambiguities, which are diſagreeable to the accurate reader. VIII. To ſay that there were among the priſoners ſeveral other Princes, is advancing an untruth; for the Sieur Blanc, who names the principal priſoners, only names theſe two who were princes. Obſerve that in the edition of France, in 1698, they gave the right title of the book of Julius Bellus Laurea Auſtriaca; but in that of 1699, they called it, agreeably to the Dutch editions, Maurea inſtead of Laurea.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Idem, Erection de toutes les Terres, Seigneuries, & Familles titrées du Brabant, pag. 106.

(6) Thus it muſt be called, and not d'Armſtad, as Moreri has it. In the Paris edition, 1699, this fault is corrected.

(7) See Blanc, Hiſtory of Bavaria, Tom. iv, pag. 153.

(8) They have ſaid Altemburg in the Dutch editions.

(9) Hiſtory of Bavaria, Tom. iv, pag. 190.

TIMÆUS, a Greek Hiſtorian, the ſon of an illuſtrious father [A], was of Tauromenium in Sicily, and flouriſhed in the time of Agathocles, who died in the fourth year of the CXXIIId Olympiad (a). He wrote ſeveral books [B], and among others, the hiſtory

(a) Athen. lib. ii, pag. 37, & alibi.

[A] The ſon of an illuſtrious father.] He was the ſon of Andromachus, who was very famous for his riches and excellent qualities, and may be eſteemed the founder of one of the moſt conſiderable towns in Sicily; for he aſſembled all the fugitives of Naxus, a city which Dionyſius the tyrant had ruined, and ſettled them on a hill called Taurus. This gave riſe to Tauromenium (1). This he did in the ſecond year of the CVIth Olympiad (2). It was long before this time that Dionyſius had deſtroyed Naxus (3). Note, that Andromachus reigned with very great lenity in his new city, and ſhewed himſelf an enemy to all tyrants. He received Timoleon's troops, and animated his ſubjects to aſſiſt them, in order to deliver all Sicily from the yoke of tyranny (4).

[B] He wrote ſeveral books.] Three of Syria: ſixty-eight de Argumentis Rhetoricæ: Ολυμπιονικὰς ἢ Χρονικὰ πραξίδια, Olympionicas ſeu acta Chronica. Ἰταλικὰ καὶ Σικελικὰ libris 8. Ἑλληνικὰ καὶ Σικελικά. In the firſt of theſe two laſt works, he gave the Hiſtory of Sicily, ſo far as it was concerned with the Roman Hiſtory; and in the other he did the ſame, ſo far as it is concerned with the Grecian Hiſtory (5). He wrote the Hiſtory of Pyrrhus, by itſelf, as we are informed by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (6), and by theſe words of Cicero: 'Deeſſe mihi nolui quin 'te admonerem ut cogitares conjunctene malles cum 'reliquis rebus noſtra contexere, an, ut multi Græci 'fecerunt, Calliſthenes Troicum bellum, Timæus Pyr'rhi, Polybius Numantinum: qui omnes à perpetuis

(1) Diodorus Siculus, lib. xvi, cap. vii.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Id. lib. xiv, cap. xvi.

(4) Taken from Plutarch, in the Life of Timoleon. pag. 240.

(5) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, pag. 82. See Suidas.

(6) Dionyſ. Hal. lib. i, cap. vi.

hiſtory of his own country. All theſe are loſt; we have not the leaſt remains of them. He was very much addicted to detraction [C], and great doubt has been made of his veracity [D]. His reſentments againſt Agathocles, and the affectation of purſuing him with ſo little juſtice, was highly diſguſting. He liſtened too much upon this occaſion to the ‘ ſuis hiſtoriis ea quæ dixi bella ſeparaverunt (7). - - - I would not be ſo far wanting to myſelf, as not to adviſe you to conſider, whether you had rather incorporate the hiſtory of my affairs with that of others; or, as many Greeks have done, Calliſthenes the war of Troy, Timæus that of Pyrrhus, and Polybius that of Numantia; who have all of them ſeparated thoſe wars I have mentioned, from their general Hiſtories.’ We have already ſeen that Timæus's Hiſtory conſiſted of two parts, and they ſay that the firſt contained eight books, without taking any notice of the number contained in the ſecond. But it is neceſſary to add, that ſeveral cite it without obſerving this diviſion; they mention in general ſuch or ſuch a book of his Hiſtories. The higheſt number, quoted by Athæneus, is the twenty-eighth (8). Diogenes Laërtius does not go beyond the eighteenth (9).

[C] He was very much addicted to detraction.] This was the reaſon why they added ſome letters to his name, in order to give him a title, which might ſignify his fondneſs for cenſure. Τίμαιος μὲν οὖν μεγίστην πρόνοιαν πεποιημένος, τῆς τῶν χρόνων ἀκριβείας, καὶ τῆς πολυπειρίας πεφροντικώς, διὰ τὰς ἀκαίρους καὶ μακρὰς ἐπιτιμήσεις εὐλόγως διαβάλλεται. καὶ διὰ τὴν ὑπερβολὴν τῆς ἐπιτιμήσεως Ἐπιτίμαιος ὑπό τινων ὠνομάσθη. Timæus ſanè, & in temporum notatione exquiſitam adhibuit diligentiam, & ut variâ rerum cognitione abundet, ſollicitè laborat. At propter intempeſtivas, & verboſas reprehenſiones, jure etiam ipſe reprehenditur. Quare ob nimiam taxandi libidinem, & acerbitatem, Epitimæus (id eſt, taxator) à quibuſdam nominatus fuit (10). - - - Timæus therefore applying himſelf with much induſtry to the diſtinctions of times, and ſtudying great variety of ſubjects, yet for his unſeaſonable and long cenſures is juſtly cenſured himſelf, and for his exceſſive ſeverity this way, was by ſome intituled the Cenſurer. You ſee that the Hiſtorian who has given him this blow, does not fail to praiſe him on other accounts, I mean, for the exactneſs of his Chronology, and his general learning. All thoſe who have criticiſed on him have not been ſo juſt; one of them has only ſhewn his worſt ſide, to which purpoſe he hath employed a parentheſis. Τούτων δὲ μαρτυρία ἐστὶ τὰ γενηθέντα τότε ψηφίσματα· ἅπερ ἀγνοοῦντα φησὶν ὁ Ἀρτεμίδωρος τὸν Ταυρομενίτην Τίμαιον, καὶ ἄλλως βάσκανον ὄντα, καὶ συκοφάντην (διὸ καὶ Ἐπιτίμιον κληθῆναι) λέγειν ὡς ἐκ τῶν Περσικῶν παρακαταθηκῶν ἐποιήσαντο τοῦ ἱεροῦ τὴν ἐπισκευήν. Teſtantur hoc quæ tum facta ſunt decreta: quæ ignorantem ait Artemidorus Timæum Tauromenitam, hominem alioqui invidum & calumniatorem, ac cui propterea nomen Epitimii, id eſt reprehenſoris factum ſit ſcripſiſſe, id templum eos è depoſitis Perſarum condidiſſe (11). - - - The truth of all this appears from the decrees at that time made, which Artemidorus ſays were unknown to Timæus the Tauromenian, a man who was full of envy and calumny, ſo as to be intituled the Cenſurer, and who aſſerts, they cauſed the temple to be built with the Perſian money intruſted with them. In order to elucidate this paſſage, I add, that it relates to the refutation of a falſity, which our Timæus had publiſhed concerning the Epheſians. He had ſaid, that they made uſe of the Perſian treaſure depoſited in their hands, to build the temple of Diana. Here is a third cenſure which touches to the quick. Διὸ δὴ καὶ νῦν ἡμεῖς μὲν εἰκότως ἂν δόξαιμεν ἀθετεῖν τοῖς ὑπὸ Τιμαίου κατὰ Δημοχάρους εἰρημένοις. ἐκεῖνος δὲ ἂν οὐκ εἰκότως τυγχάνει συγγνώμης, οὐδὲ πίστεως ὑπ' οὐδενὸς, διὰ τὸ προφανῶς ἐν ταῖς λοιδορίαις ἐκπίπτειν τοῦ καθήκοντος διὰ τὴν ἔμφυτον πικρίαν: Quocirca nunc quoque nos ea, quæ à Timæo dicta ſunt in Democharem, meritò improbare videamur. Ille autem indignus, cui à quoquam ignoſcatur, & fides habeatur, videri debet: quia apertè in maledictis ab officio diſcedit, ac deflectit propter inſitam acerbitatem (12). - - - Therefore we alſo now may juſtly ſeem to condemn thoſe things which Timæus has thrown out againſt Demochares. For he appears neither worthy of pardon, nor of credit from any body, becauſe of his deviating ſo notoriouſly from his duty into calumny, out of his natural malicíouſneſs. Clemens Alexandrinus gives us Timæus and Theopompus for a couple of ſatirical and fabulous Hiſtorians. Ἀλλ' ἄρα Θεοπόμπῳ μὲν καὶ Τιμαίῳ μύθους καὶ βλασφημίας συντάττουσιν. Sed Theopompo quidem & Timæo qui fabulas & maledicta componunt (13). Cornelius Nepos does much the ſame thing (14). Note that Athenæus obſerves, that Iſter writing againſt Timæus, called him Epitimæus (15). He was perhaps the firſt inventer of this pun. Note alſo that Ariſtotle was one of thoſe abuſed by Timæus (16), and we muſt not forget this circumſtance, viz. that this Hiſtorian vented all his ſpleen againſt perſons, even when they were not in the wrong. Thus he exclaimed againſt thoſe who mentioned Phalaris's Bull. He loudly proclaimed them fabulous writers; and with the utmoſt heat maintained that there was never any ſuch thing (17); when it was he himſelf who was miſtaken, for this Bull was ſtill in being in the time of Diodorus Siculus (18). It had been tranſported to Carthage, when Imilcar ſacked Agrigentum, and was reſtored to the Agrigentines two hundred and ſixty years after, when Scipio Africanus deſtroyed Carthage. Theſe particulars are related by Diodorus Siculus (19), as affording a favourable opportunity to cenſure our Timæus, and to ſhew the conjunctures wherein we ought to excuſe or not excuſe the errors of Hiſtorians. We ought to excuſe them, when the facts lie ſo obſcure that even with very great diligence they cannot be diſcovered: but we ought never to excuſe them, when either negligence, or an inclination to flatter or calumniate any perſon, carry them out of the right way. The author's words in the original will much better pleaſe thoſe who are capable of underſtanding them. It is on their account I have tranſcribed them: other readers ought not to be diſpleaſed, they may paſs them by without the trouble of reading them, and yet underſtand in general the thought of the Hiſtorian. Περὶ δὲ τούτου φιλοτιμότερον εἰπεῖν προήχθην, διό τι Τίμαιος ὁ τῶν πρὸ ἑαυτοῦ συγγραφέων πικρότατα κατηγορήσας, καὶ συγγνώμην οὐδεμίαν τοῖς ἱστοριογράφοις ἀπολιπὼν, αὐτὸς εὑρίσκεται σχεδιάζων, ἐν οἷς μάλιστα ἑαυτὸν ἀποπέφαγκεν ἀκριβολογούμενον. δεῖ γὰρ, οἶμαι, τοὺς συγγραφεῖς ἐν μὲν τοῖς ἀγνοήμασι τυγχάνειν συγγνώμης, ὡς ἂν ἀνθρώπους ὄντας, καὶ τῆς ἐν τοῖς παρῳχομένοις χρόνοις ἀληθείας οὔσης δυσευρέτου· τοὺς μέντοιγε κατὰ προαίρεσιν οὐ τυγχάνοντας τοῦ ἀκριβοῦς προσηκόντως κατηγορίας τυγχάνειν, ὅταν κολακεύοντές τινας ἢ δι' ἔχθραν πικρότερον προσβάλλοντες, ἀποσφάλλωνται τῆς ἀληθείας (20): Quâ de re ſtudioſius diſſere mihi libuit; quia Timæus, cum magnâ acerbitate ſcriptores ætatem ſuam antecedentes reprehendat, nullumque hiſtoricis veniæ locum relinquat; ipſe tamen, ubi diligentiſſimum veritatis ſtudium profitetur, nugari & alucinari deprehendatur. Scriptoribus enim in iis, quæ non aſſequuntur, veniam (meo quidem judicio) tribui æquum eſt, quippe, cùm homines ſint, & temporum præterlapſorum veritas difficulter è caligine eruatur. Contrà verò, qui datâ operâ exactam inquiſitionem negligunt, hos meritò accuſandos, arbitror, & quando nimirum nonnullis adulando, vel per odium virulentiùs alios impugnando, à regiâ veritatis viâ exorbitant & aberrant. - - - I have choſen to ſpeak of this the more zealouſly; becauſe Timæus tho' he condemns moſt bitterly the writers who preceded him, and leaves no excuſe at all for Hiſtorians, yet is himſelf found defective in thoſe very things where he moſt of all values himſelf for his accuracy. For it is but reaſonable, I think, that authors ſhould be intituled to pardon in thoſe things which are unknown to them, as they are men, and as truth is difficult to be diſcovered in ages that are paſt. But, on the contrary, that thoſe ſhould be deſervedly condemned, who purpoſely are inaccurate, when in flattering ſome, or abuſing others, they deviate from truth.

[D] Great doubt has been made of his veracity.] See the paſſage of Polybius cited in the preceding remark, and that which ſhall be quoted below (21). In ſhort read what is remaining to us of the twelfth book of Polybius.

---

(7) Cicero, Epiſt. xii, lib. v, ad Familiares, pag. m. 255.

(8) Athen. lib. xi, cap. vi, pag. 471.

(9) Diogen. Laërtius, in Empedocle, lib. viii, num. 60.

(10) Diodorus Siculus, lib. v, circa init.

(11) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 440.

(12) Polybius, lib. xii, p. 659.

(13) Clem. Alexandr. Stromat. lib. i, init. pag. m. 269.

(14) Theopompus . . . & Timæus qui quidem duo maledicentiſſimi. Cornel. Nepos in Alcibiade.

(15) Athen. lib. vi, cap. xx, pag. 272.

(16) See Diogenes Laërt. lib. v, num. i, & Ariſtocles apud Euſebium, Præpar. lib. xv, cap. ii, pag. 791.

(17) Diodorus Siculus, lib. xiii, cap. xc, pag. 543, Edit. Lat. 1611, in 8*vo.*

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Id. ibid. pag. 380. Edit. Græcæ Henrici Stephani 1559 in folio.

(21) In the remark [E].

the ſpirit of revenge [E]. Several other faults have been diſcovered in his Hiſtory [F]; but ſome excellent judges allow him to have been very learned, and very eloquent [G].

He

[E] To purſue Agathocles with ſo little juſtice..... He liſtned too much to the ſpirit of revenge.] Agathocles had forced him to fly out of Sicily: this indeed coſt him nothing during his life, but after his death he paid for it. Agathocles, when living, was out of the reach of Timæus's reſentment: the latter was obliged to defer his vengeance until Agathocles was in his grave. Then he diſcharged the torrent of his rage againſt him: this tyrant was not only defamed by a deſcription of his crimes and ill qualities, but alſo by fabulous calumnies. He robbed him of all the glory of his ſucceſsful enterprizes, and laid to his charge all the misfortunes which befel him, not excepting the moſt fortuitous: he repreſented him as a coward, tho' it was evident enough that this General had given a thouſand proofs of his courage and valour. If it had not been ſo, was it poſſible for him, only a potter's ſon, as he was, to have ſubdued all Sicily, and a great part of Italy and Libya? Doth not Timæus contradict himſelf? In all the reſt of his book he exalts the valour of the Syracuſans to the ſkies, and yet he pretends that Agathocles, who ſubdued them, was the greateſt of cowards. Παρ' ὅλην γὰρ τὴν γραφὴν ἐγκωμιάζων τὴν τῶν Συρακουσίων ἀνδρείαν τὸν τούτων κρατήσαντα θειλίᾳ φησὶ δίενηνοχέναι τοὺς ἅπαντας ἀνθρώπους. Cum per totam hiſtoriam Syracuſanorum fortitudinem laudet illum qui ſubegit iſtos omnes mortales ignavia longe ſuperaſſe dicit (22). He betrays therefore too plainly his paſſion and hatred. The five laſt books of his hiſtory, which treat of the actions of Agathocles, do not deſerve any praiſe. Suidas, to whom I am obliged for all this (23), allows that in all the other parts of his hiſtory, he took extraordinary care to ſpeak the truth. Οὗτος ὁ Τίμαιος τὰς ἁμαρτίας τῶν πρὸ ἑαυτοῦ συγγραφέων πικρότατα ἐξελέγξας, κατὰ μὲν ἄλλα μέρη τῆς γραφῆς πλείστην πρόνοιαν εἶχε τῆς ἀληθείας. ἐν δὲ ταῖς Ἀγαθοκλέους πράξεσι, τὰ πολλὰ κατέψευσται τοῦ δυνάστου, διὰ τὴν πρὸς αὐτὸν ἔχθραν: Timæus iſti qui veterum hiſtoricorum peccata graviſſime redarguit, in aliis quidem ſcripti partibus maximam veritatis curam provide geſſit. In Agathoclis vero rebus pleraque ementitus eſt in principem illum propter odium quo proſequebatur eum (24). - - - - The very ſame Timæus who moſt ſeverely reprehends the faults of all preceding authors, in other parts of his writings ſhews the greateſt regard to truth. But in the affairs of Agathocles, he very much belies that prince, out of hatred to him.

We find in Polybius ſome of the calumnies which Timæus diſgorged againſt Agathocles. He repreſented him in his younger days, as the moſt abandoned proſtitute to the luſt of every comer, and in all manner of ways: Γεγονέναι τὸν Ἀγαθοκλέα κατὰ τὴν πρώτην ἡλικίαν κοινὸν πόρνον, ἕτοιμον τοῖς ἀκρατεστάτοις, κολοιὸν, τριόρχην, πάντων τῶν βουλομένων, τοῖς ὄπισθεν ἔμπροσθεν γεγονότα: Agathoclem in prima ætate publicum fuiſſe proſtibulum, paſſim omnium incontinentiſſimorum libidini expoſitum, graculum, triorcham ſive buteonem qui averſus & adverſus impudicus obviiſque quibuſque pateret (25). And he related that the wife of this prince breathed out the following complaint on the ſight of his corps; Which way have I not enjoyed thee, and which way haſt thou not enjoyed me? Words which Polybius charges with the utmoſt infamy. Ὅτ' ἀπέθανε τὴν γυναῖκα φησὶ κατακλειομένην αὐτὸν. οὕτω θρηνεῖν. τί δ' οὐκ ἐγώ σε; τί δ' οὐ ἐμὲ σύ; Ubi fato functus eſſet, ejus uxorem mortuum maritum lamentantem hujuſmodi plangorem edidiſſe, quid non ego tibi? quid non tu mihi (26); Polybius does not deny that Agathocles was the moſt impious of all men (27); but he pretends that this cannot excuſe the ſcurrilous malignity of Timæus, and that it refutes it ſelf: for it is evident, by the relation of that author, that Agathocles, without the advantages of birth or eſtate, arrived to the height of grandeur: he ſubdued all Sicily, endangered Carthage, maintained his tyranny even to his old age, and died a king. This ſhews that nature had beſtowed on him great qualifications. The Hiſtorians ought therefore not only to have recorded him for his ill actions, but alſo for thoſe which deſerved to be praiſed; and conſequently Timæus is inexcuſable, ſince he has with the utmoſt malice and ill-nature been hyberbolical, in the relation of whatever was to be blamed in Agathocles's conduct, and intirely ſuppreſſed whatever would admit of praiſe. Ὁ δὲ παρεσκοτισμένος ὑπὸ τῆς ἰδίας πικρίας τὰ μὲν ἐλαττώματα δυσμενικῶς καὶ μετ' αὐξήσεως ἡμῖν ἐξήγγελκε, τὰ δὲ κατορθώματα συλλήβδην παραλέλοιπε: Egregius hic ſcriptor maledicendi ſtudio occæcatus minus recte facta cum quadam animi malignitate ſolitus narrare, & ſimul omnia in majus extollere, præclara facinora ſimul cuncta prætermiſit (28). - - - - But being blinded by his ill-nature, he has related the worſt things with malice and exaggeration, and omitted by the lump thoſe that are right. Nothing can be more judicious than this whole diſcourſe of Polybius.

[F] Several other faults have been found in his hiſtory.] We learn from Suidas (29), that Timæus was called a rhapſodical old woman γραοσυλλέκτρια, becauſe whatever came in his way he inſerted in his hiſtory. This is the ſame thing as if they had called him a compiler of old wives tales. Polybius charges him with ſpeaking very ignorantly of Italy (30), and that in his deſcription of Africa, beſides being guilty of the ſame fault, he betrayed a trifling genius, a want of judgment, and a great deal of credulity with regard to obſolete traditions. Τὸν δὲ Τίμαιον εἴποι τις ἂν οὐ μόνον ἀνιστόρητον γεγονέναι περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὴν Λιβύην, ἀλλὰ καὶ παιδαριώδη καὶ τελέως ἀσυλλόγιστον καὶ ταῖς ἀρχαίαις φήμαις ἀκμὴν ἐνδεδεμένον: 'Timæum jure pronuntiet aliquis non ſolum imperitum rerum Africæ, ſed etiam puerili ingenio virum, ac prorſus infirmo judicio & qui antiquitus traditis opinionibus ſupra modum fuerit deditus (31). - - - - But it may be ſaid that Timæus, was not only an ignorant Hiſtorian, as to the affairs of Libya, but alſo trifling, extremely injudicious, and too much addicted to old ſtories. He blames him for writing on hearſay, and having ſhewn little judgment Περὶ τὰς ἀνακρίσεις ῥαθύμως ἀνεστράφη. In dijudicandis iis quæ ſibi narrarentur negligens fuit (32). This was undoubtedly the cauſe of the contradictioas which were laid to his charge (33). To theſe may be added the paſſage of Longinus, which I ſhall cite in the remark [I], and thoſe of Plutarch quoted hereafter: and obſerve, by the way, that he was not ſo bigotted a follower of the antient traditions, as not to refute ſome of them: but he was not very happy in his choice; ſince, for inſtance, he wrongfully rejected the tradition of Phalaris's Bull (34), and that of the colony of the Locrians (35); nor did he probably go upon a better foundation, when he denied that Zaleucus gave laws to that people (36). Nay, he denied, that there ever was ſuch a perſon as Zaleucus (37).

[G] But ſome excellent judges allow him to be very learned and very eloquent.] The paſſage of Diodorus Siculus above cited (38), may ſerve me here for a commentary; but I find my account much better in the following words of Cicero. 'Minimus natu 'horum omnium Timæus, quantum autem judicare 'poſſum longe eruditiſſimus, & rerum copia ac ſen'tentiarum varietate abundantiſſimus, & ipſa compo'ſitione verborum non impolitus magnam eloquentiam 'ad ſcribendum attulit, ſed nullum uſum foren'ſem (39). - - - - Timæus, later than all theſe, but, as 'far as I am able to judge by far the moſt learned, 'and moſt abounding both in the copiouſneſs of his 'materials, and in the variety of his maxims, and 'not without politeneſs in the compoſition of his 'words, diſcovered a great deal of eloquence in his 'writing, but no forms of oratory.' He had been naming Herodotus, Thucydides, Philiſtus, Theopompus, Ephorus, Xenophon, and Caliſthenes. I mention this only to ſhew what place Timæus poſſeſſed in Cicero's eſteem. All theſe great hiſtorians were inferior to him in point of knowledge, as well as in fertility of ſubject and thought. This is ſaying a great deal. He has not ranked him diſadvantageouſly with regard to his eloquence: you will apprehend this yet better by the following words. 'Genera Aſiaticæ 'dictionis duo ſunt, unum ſententioſum & argutum, 'ſententiis non tam gravibus & ſeveris quam concinnis '& venuſtis qualis in hiſtoriæ Timæus (40). - - - - The 'Aſiatic way of ſpeaking is of two kinds, the one ſen-

' tentious

---

(22) Suidas, ubi infra.

(23) Suidas, in Τίμαιος, pag. 911.

(24) Id. ibid.

(25) Polyb. lib. xii, pag. 659, Edit. 1619, in folio. Add to this the words of Juſtin, lib. xxii, cap. i. In Sicilia patre figulo natus (Agathocles) non honeſtiorem pueritiam, quam principia originis habuit. Siquidem forma, & corporis pulcritudine egregius, diu vitam ſtupri patientia exhibuit. Annos deinde pubertatis egreſſus, libidinem à viris ad feminas tranſtulit. Poſt hæc apud utrumque ſexum famoſus, vitam latrociniis mutavit.

(26) Id. ibid. See Juſtin. Variorum, of Mr Grævius, lib. xxii, init. and Suidas, in Τρίορχης.

(27) Πάντων γέγονεν ἀσεβέστατος. Fuit ille ſane omnium maximæ impius, Polyb. lib. xii, pag. 659.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 660, Edit. 1619, in folio.

(29) Suidas, in Τίμαιος, pag. 911.

(30) Polybius, lib. ii, pag. 105.

(31) Id. lib. xii, init. pag. 653.

(32) Id. ibid. pag. 668.

(33) Athenæus, lib. vi, p. 272.

(34) See the remark [C], citation (17).

(35) Polyb. lib. xii, pag. 656.

(36) Cicero, Epiſt. i, lib. vi, ad Atticum, pag. m. 589.

(37) Id. lib. ii, de Legibus, folio 333, C.

(38) Citation (10).

(39) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. ii, fol. 73, D.

(40) Idem, in Bruto, circa fin. pag. m. 451.

He was not leſs exorbitant in his praiſes than in his invectives, which appears by the elogies he beſtowed on Timoleon [H]. He lived ninety-ſix years (b). His fortune ſeems to have been but moderate. He lived very quietly in the place of his exile (c); he renounced an active courſe of life, as travelling, war, and the offices of the robe (d). This was the cauſe that ſome were ſurprized, that he ſhould ever acquire the reputation of an able Hiſtorian (e). Longinus criticiſes on him for what doth not deſerve a cenſure [I]. But Plutarch

(b) Lucian. in Macrobiis, pag. 642, Tom. ii.

(c) That is, at Athens, if we believe Corradus in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 115.

(d) Polybius, lib. xii, p. 670.

(e) Id. ibid.

'tentious and ſprightly, not affecting gravity and ſtrictneſs in its ſentences, ſo much as neatneſs and beauty, ſuch as Timæus uſes in his hiſtory.' But that the reader may ſee that the beſt judges of ingenious works did not better agree antiently than they do now. I ſhall cite an excellent paſſage of Plutarch (41): Timæus the hiſtorian, aiming to exceed Thucydides in vivacity of eloquence, and to diſgrace Philiſtus as ignorant, diſagreeable, and impertinent, attempts in his hiſtory the deſcription of engagements both by ſea and land, and the eloquent ſpeeches compoſed by both of them, where indeed, begging his pardon, he approaches them no more than a man walking on foot approaches a Lydian chariot, as Pindar ſays, and diſcovers himſelf in this to have an aukward grace, and very little judgment, or, as Diphilus ſays,

Fat, and ſtuffed out with dull Sicilian greaſe.

Cicero citing one of Timæus's thoughts as a witty ſaying, obſerves that there are ſeveral of the ſame nature in this Hiſtorian (42). But Plutarch, who attributes it to another author, repreſents it as flat and childiſh.

[H] The elogies he beſtowed on Timoleon.] He placed him above the greateſt gods (43), if we believe Suidas, who adds, that this flattery deſerved a greater puniſhment than that of Calliſthenes; for the latter only deſigned the deifying of Alexander, a prince infinitely more illuſtrious than Timoleon; but Timæus not contented with that, exalts his hero to a ſuperiority above the higheſt divinities. Suidas's reaſoning turns upon a very juſt parallel; there is on the one ſide more merit in the perſon honoured, and leſs exceſs in the honours conferred; and, on the other, the honours are greater, and the merit leſs in him who receives them. Therefore Suidas very reaſonably concludes, that if Calliſthenes was moſt juſtly puniſhed with death for his flattery, Timæus deſerved that puniſhment much more than he. I am ſurprized to read in Suidas this particular concerning Calliſthenes for ſeveral others relate that he rendered himſelf odious to Alexander, by ſpeaking too freely of him, without flattery, and particularly on the ſubject of divine honours. We may obſerve that Suidas charges Timæus with two great faults; the firſt is, the condemning too ſeverely in others the very ſame vices to which he himſelf was addicted; the ſecond, in being himſelf a wicked man, conſidering thoſe maxims which he lays down, and the opinions which he would inſinuate into his readers (44).

[I] Longinus criticiſes on him for what does not deſerve cenſure.] 'As for the cold and puerile ſtile we are ſpeaking of, Timæus abounds with it. This author is on other accounts a man of parts, ſometimes he does not come ſhort of the lofty and ſublime ſtile: he has an extenſive knowledge, and even appears judicious in his expreſſions: but he is naturally addicted to reprehend the vices of others, whilſt he is blind to his own; and beſides, ſo ſollicitous to diſplay new thoughts, that he too frequently falls in to the very loweſt puerility. I ſhall content my ſelf with giving one or two examples only; becauſe Cecilius has already cited a vaſt number. Intending to compliment Alexander the Great. He has, ſays he, conquered all Aſia, in leſs time than Iſocrates employed in compoſing his panegyric. An admirable compariſon truly between Alexander the Great and a Rhetorician. By a parity of reaſon, it will neceſſarily follow, that the Lacedemonians ought to give place to Iſocrates, ſince they were thirty years in taking the city of Meſſina, and he was but ten years in writing his panegyric (45).' That reflexion is unworthy of Longinus, and I do not know what had ſpoiled his taſte when he wrote theſe lines. A modern author, a man of great wit, judges of him in the following manner. Longinus, ſaith he (46), is a caviller, and a falſe pretender to ſubtilty. Timæus had ſaid, that Alexander ſpent leſs time in the conqueſt of all Aſia, than Iſocrates in finiſhing his panegyric. Longinus cenſures him for comparing a great prince to a ſophiſt; and maintains that by the ſame reaſon, we might believe, that the Lacedemonians were leſs valiant (47) than Iſocrates, ſince he was but ten years in compoſing his panegyric, when they ſpent thirty in the conqueſt of Meſſina. What conſequence is here? did Timæus ſpeak of the valour of Iſocrates? Is it comparing an orator with a conqueror; to compare the time in which one writes, with that in which the other conquers? Tho' there is no proportion betwixt actions entirely different, does it follow, that there is none betwixt the long and ſhort ſpace of their duration? May we not ſay, that the great Guſtavus Adolphus rendered himſelf maſter of part of Germany, in leſs time than Mr Vaugelas ſpent in tranſlating Quintus Curtius, or Father Strada in finiſhing his hiſtory, or Scriverius in publiſhing his Martial * ?

Mr Coſtar hath not obſerved all the faults of this place of Longinus: he might have added that there are ſome things which we cannot exceed or equal, without an extraordinary merit, to which we may yet be inferior, without being contemptible. A prince, who ſhould ſubdue three kingdoms in as little time as is requiſite for a Geographer to draw three maps, would undoubtedly perform a great action; but if he ſhould conquer but one province, whilſt a Geographer is drawing ten maps of the world, we cannot be allowed to infer from hence, that in conduct and expedition he is inferior to the Geographer. I mention this to make it appear, that Longinus had no reaſon to conclude, that Timæus's compariſon might beſtow more honour on Iſocrates than on the Lacedemonians; for ten years ſpent in compoſing an oration, may imply a leſs expedition than thirty, ſpent by a handful of people in the conquering of a neighbouring ſtate.

A REMARK on the deſign of compariſons.

This cenſurer of Timæus hath not conſidered the deſign of compariſons. They are intended to expreſs, in a lively manner, the greatneſs or ſmallneſs of objects. There is nothing therefore more proper to be compared to certain things, than what moſt apparently enlarges the idea of them. So to render the rapidity of Alexander's victories the more conſpicuous, they may be very well oppoſed to the ſlowneſs of a panegyriſt. Conſider, on one hand, the obſtacles of war, the great number of enemies which Alexander engaged, and the vaſt extent of land which he ſubdued; conſider on the other, the facility of writing a diſcourſe which may be recited in an hour: and it is impoſſible but that you muſt be ſtruck with the incredible ſwiftneſs of this conqueror, if you imagine that he ſpent no more years in his conqueſt than the Rhetorician in compoſing an oration. Another conqueror who had not ſubdued ſo many provinces in 30 years as Alexander in ten, would not have ſerved ſo well in this compariſon as Iſocrates; for we are naturally inclined to imagine almoſt an infinite diſproportion betwixt the labour of a Rhetorician, and that of a conqueror. We think it infinitely more eaſy to range words, than ſubdue kingdoms. We muſt allow therefore that Timæus was very happy in his choice. He took what might ſtrike the imagination of his readers in the moſt lively manner. I have read in a modern author (48), that the Duke of Candale, and Cardinal de la Valette, Generals of the French army, in the year 1637, took Landrecies almoſt in fewer days than Charles V, formerly employed months in the not taking it, being forced, after ſix months time, ſhamefully to raiſe the ſiege. This is without doubt a beautiful, lofty, and noble idea; but I am ſure that we ſhould be yet more ſenſibly touched with the expedition of a conqueſt, if it ſhould be ſaid, A famous Engineer formerly ſpent as much time in drawing a plan of this place, as the General in taking it. The precedents of the beſt authors declare as ſtrongly in favour of Timæus as theſe reaſons. The greateſt Roman Orator ſaid, that Pompey had finiſhed more wars than others had read, and

(41) Plutarch. in Nicia, initio pag. 523.

(42) You will find this in the remark [C], of the article FONTARABIA.

(43) Μείζω ποιεῖν Τιμολέοντα τῶν ἐπιφανεστάτων Θεῶν Timoleontem illuſtriſſimis Diis majorem facere. Suidas, in Τίμαιος, pag. 910.

(44) Suidas, ubi ſupra.

(45) Longinus, de Sublimi genere, cap. iii.

(46) Coſtar, Apologie, p. 88, 89.

(47) So it ought to be tranſlated; for there is in Greek κατ' ἀνδρείαν, quoad titudinem. Mr Boileau has ſkipped this in his tranſlation of Longinus, and perhaps he did it the better to hide the falſe thought of his author.

* Scaliger calls him ſomewhere in his Epſtiles, Lentulum Martialis editorem.

(48) Girard, Vie du Duc d'Epernon.

Plutarch has condemned him juſtly on account of his puerility with relation to a common-place, and that travellers never went through ſo many countries in ſo little time, as he ſubdued them by his victories. 'Qui ſæpius cum hoſte conflixit quam quiſquam cum inimico concertavit: plura bella geſſit quam cæteri legerunt: plures provincias confecit quam alii concupiverunt (49)..... Quis unquam aut obeundi negocii aut conſequendi quæſtus ſtudio tam brevi tempore tot loca adire, tantos curſus conficere potuit quam celeriter Cn. Pompeio duce belli impetus navigavit (50)? ---- Who has oftner engaged in a pitched battle, than any other perſon has done in an ordinary quarrel: waged more wars than others have read; conquered more countries than others ever coveted...... Who could ever go to ſo many places, and perform ſo many expeditions in the way of buſineſs or trade, in ſo little time, and with ſo great diſpatch, as Pompey employed in carrying on his wars?' Is not this comparing Pompey with the meaneſt man who is but juſt able to read, and with a merchant, whoſe thirſt for gain tranſports him from place to place (51). If the compariſon betwixt Alexander and a Rhetorician ſo much blamed by Longinus is not good; ought we not to condemn this, which notwithſtanding is really admirable, and the moſt proper thing in the world to excite thoſe ideas in the mind, which the orator propoſed to excite? But to come to modern examples. I ſhall not alledge what was ſaid of Charles VIII, that he run through Italy ſwifter than a quarter-maſter with chalk in hand, and without ſtopping. I ſhall come directly to Mr Boileau, one of the greateſt maſters. He aſſigns two reaſons in excuſe for not ſinging the victories of 1672. The firſt is, that the names of the towns which the king conquered in Holland, were harſh and barbarous, affording only ſuch whimſical ſyllables as were ſubject to no meaſure (52). The ſecond reaſon is, that the conqueror marched too faſt for the Muſes to keep pace with him.

Encor ſi Tes exploits moins grands & moins rapides
Laiſſoient prendre courage à nos Muſes timides,
Peut-eſtre avec le temps, à force d'y rêver,
Par quelque coup de l'Art nous pourrions nous ſauver.
Mais dés qu'on veut tenter cette vaſte carriere,
Pegaſe s'effarouche & recule en arriere:
Mon Apollon s'etonne, & Nimegue eſt à Toy,
Que ma Muſe eſt encore au camp devant Orſoy (53).

Were your exploits leſs rapid, or leſs grand,
My tim'rous Muſe might take her pen in hand;
Perhaps by force of thought, and length of time,
Attempt ſome tolerable work in rhime.
But at the ſight of ſuch a vaſt career,
Pegaſus trembles, and ſtarts back with fear.
Apollo wond'ring ſees Nimeguen yield,
Before my lagging Muſe can take the field.

Mr Pelliſſon made uſe of this thought in his invocation to Pegaſus, a piece of poetry which was extreamly admired; the whole deſign of which is to expreſs that the king's conqueſts were ſo incredibly ſwift, that the Poets could not follow the rapid torrent. Since Mr Pelliſon's choice of this image, ſo many authors have uſed it, that it is become a common-place. I remember to have ſeen it in the Paris Gazette, and this was, if I am not miſtaken, when Mr de Guilleragues had the direction of that paper. He declares that he is forced to take advantage, that is, to anticipate his majeſty's victories, that he may in ſome meaſure keep pace with his rapid expeditions. Mr Pavillon, who knows how to manage a ſubject with ſo much dexterity, has very agreeably turned this thought in his ode on the taking of Namur in the year 1693. Note, that this manner of complementing the king, is very well approved by an excellent judge of the juſtneſs and delicacy of thoughts: Perhaps you have not heard, ſays he (54), of another madrigal with which I am infinitely pleaſed.

Louïs plus digne du trône
Qu'aucun Roy que l'on ait vû,
Enſeigne l'art à Bellone
De faire des impromptu.
C'eſt une choſe facile
Aux diſciples d'Apollon:
Mais ce Conquerant habile
A pluſtoſt pris une ville
Qu'ils n'ont fait une Chanſon.

Lewis more worthy of a throne,
Then any monarch we have known,
Inſtructs Bellona in his ſight,
Imprompou's with the ſword to write.
Apollo's ſcholars with their quill,
Here eaſily diſplay their ſkill;
Yet this great conqu'ror's not ſo long
About a town, as they a ſong.

All theſe thoughts are ingenious, continues Eudoxus; but the elogy here appears very viſibly, and theſe authors profeſs their deſign of praiſing, whereas he who ſaid,

Croit que l'on fait les vers comme l'on prend les villes,

Believes that Rhymes are made, as towns are won,

ſeems not to think of praiſe: he ſeems to be in an angry mood, and to think only of coming off: and by this means the praiſe, that he beſtows by the by, is ſo much the more nice. The exact conformity betwixt theſe thoughts and Longinus's parallel will not allow us to doubt that this paſſage carries in it Father Bouhours's approbation of Timæus. But to prevent all ſcruples on this head we ought to have recourſe to the expreſs words of this Jeſuit (55): 'I am not of Longinus's ſide; his criticiſm went too far in charging Timæus with puerility as to his praiſe of Alexander. He that ſhould ſay of Lewis le Grand, that he conquered the firſt time Franche-Comté in fewer days than it was poſſible to write his Panegyric, do you think he would ſay any thing ridiculous? And if, at his return from a campaign ſo ſhort and ſo glorious, it had been ſaid that thoſe who on that account were obliged to compliment his majeſty, had occaſion for more time to prepare their ſpeeches than he employed in the conqueſt: would you cenſure the thought? I do not believe I ſhould, replied Eudoxus; and yet I take Timæus's thought to be ill founded, becauſe the ſpeeches which you mention relate to the King and his conqueſts; but Iſocrates's Panegyric did not concern Alexander or his victories.' With all due deference to this Eudoxus, I believe it would have been better for him to have given his approbation without any reſerve, I agree, the Greek author's thought would have been more perfect, if Iſocrates's Oration had been a Panegyric on Alexander. This would have given it an additional beauty: but I cannot allow that the want of this circumſtance vitiates the compariſon. Without this, it ſtill retains a lively image of the rapidity of Alexander's conqueſts.

I ought not to forget that Mr Racine muſt needs be for Timæus againſt Longinus. Read this paſſage in Madam de Sevigni's letter to the Count de Buſſy, dated the 3d of November 1677. 'What you ſay of Racine and Boileau is indeed very juſt. The King ſaid to them four days ago: I am ſorry that you did not come to the laſt campaign, you would have ſeen the war, and your journey would not have been long. Racine anſwered: Sir, we had only dreſſed cloaths; we indeed beſpoke riding cloaths, but the places you attacked were taken before they were made. This compliment was very agreeably received (56).' I cannot tell whether any body has yet made uſe of a thought of Martial. It concerns the Amanuenſes, who wrote faſter than the words were dictated to them.

Currant verba licet, manus eſt velocior illis,
Nondum lingua, ſuum dextra peregit opus (57).

Before the words, the writer runs along,
And the quick hand quits diſtances the tongue.

---

(49) Cicero, pro Lege Manilia, fol. 104, B.

(50) Id. ibid. D.

(51) Impiger extremos curris mercator ad Indos,
Per mare pauperiem fugiens, per ſaxa, per igneis.
Horat. Epiſt. i, lib. i, ver. 45.

(52) This puts me in mind of theſe two verſes,
Ilion & Tenedos, Simoïſque & Xantus & Ide
Nomina ſunt ipſo pæne timenda ſono.
They are Laodamia's words, in her letter to Proteſilaus, apud Ovidium Heroid. Epiſt. xiii, ver. 53.

(53) Deſpreaux, Epitre IV, ver. 20.

(54) Bouhours, Maniere de bien penſer dans les Ouvrages d'Eſprit, pag. 199, 200. Dutch edition.

(55) Id. ibid. pag. 81, Dutch edition.

(56) Lettres du Comte de Buſſy Rabutin, Tom. i, pag. 226, Dutch edition.

(57) Martial. lib. xiv, Epig. ccviii.

place, very much uſed in antient Hiſtory. That is, the compiling of good or ill preſages [K]. From the character of Timeus, it is eaſy to conclude, that he was very unfit to be an Hiſtorian; and that he ought eſpecially to have avoided exerciſing his pen on the actions of Agathocles [L].

Why might we not ſay, that the arm of a Conqueror finiſhes a war with greater expedition, than the tongue of an Orator does a ſpeech?

[K] Plutarch has condemned him juſtly on account . . . of the common-place . . . . of preſages.] ‘He falls into the fooliſh conceits of Xenarchus in ſeveral places, as where he ſays, that he took it for an ill boding Omen for the Athenians, that the Captain Nicias, having his name derived from the word Niké, which ſignifies victory, ſhould oppoſe the Sicilian enterprize: and that by the mutilation of the Hermes's, that is, the images of Mercury, the gods advertiſed them, that in this war they ſhould ſuffer a great deal of miſchief from the Syracuſian General, whoſe name was Hermocrates the ſon of Hermon: and beſides, that it was probable Hercules would ſupport the Syracuſians on account of the goddeſs Proſerpina, who was the protectreſs of the city of Syracuſe, in return for the favour done him, in ſurrendring to him the infernal dog Cerberus; and on the contrary, that he would oppoſe the Athenians, becauſe they defended the Ægeſtæ, who were deſcended from the Trojans, his mortal enemies, by reaſon he deſtroyed their city, in revenge of the violated faith, and of the injury done him by King Laomedon. But perhaps his judgment was juſt as remarkable in writing theſe fine ſtories, as in cenſuring Philiſtus's ſtyle, or railing at Plato and Ariſtotle (58).’ We may here, obſerve by the way, what falſe notions the Pagans had of GOD. The Decalogue teaches us that the iniquity of the Fathers are viſited on the children no farther than to the fourth generation. And here is a Pagan Hiſtorian who imagined that the Trojans drew on their Protectors the hatred of Hercules, eight hundred years after the differences which had happened between this demi-god and a Trojan prince.

[L] Timæus . . . . was very unfit for an Hiſtorian; and he ought eſpecially to have avoided exerciſing his pen on the actions of Agathocles.] His favourite talent was the imprinting a ſatirical character on his writings: he naturally loved to criticize and cenſure. For this reaſon it was impoſſible that an Hiſtory written by him ſhould be good, even tho' he had poſſeſſed all the other talents neceſſary for an Hiſtorian (59). This ſatirical ſpirit prompts a writer to ſupreſs all laudable actions, and only to preſent to the reader the weak or the ill ſide of things. It exerts itſelf principally when we are repreſenting the actions of a man who has injured us. There was no Hiſtory therefore which our Timæus was ſo little capable of writing well as that of Agathocles, for he wrote it in a town, where he was in exile, having been baniſhed his own country by Agathocles. The memory of that injury was every moment before his eyes, and cried aloud for vengeance in the ears of the writer. I leave it to you to determine whether an author naturally ſatirical, could in theſe circumſtances preſerve an exact neutrality betwixt the good and ill qualities of the tyrant who had baniſhed him. Thoſe who are fond of railing, would find without doubt, if they would give themſelves the trouble of a narrow ſearch, that their ſatirical humour is the product of a choleric and arrogant temper. Now as this temper excites ſtrong deſires of revenge, even on account of the ſmalleſt offence, it is reaſonable to conclude that Timæus found in himſelf a violent paſſion to be revenged on Agathocles. For which reaſon he ought not to have mentioned him in his Hiſtory, becauſe he muſt be ſure that if he mentioned him he could not avoid violating the laws of Hiſtory. The moſt modeſt and moderate ſhould diſtruſt their own virtue, when deſcribing the actions of a perſecutor. They ought very juſtly to apprehend, that the injuries of baniſhment may raiſe thoſe clouds, which will conceal from them the true ſtate of affairs, and thereby hinder their diſcharging the duties of an Hiſtorian (60). With much more reaſon ought ſuch a man as Timæus to be apprehenſive of the illuſions of reſentment. I am of opinion that there are ſome men ſo conſiderate, that they would rather chooſe not to write at all, than to ſet up for Hiſtorians in ſuch circumſtances as expoſe them to theſe miſrepreſentations: they would not content themſelves with calming the firſt commotions of the mind, and ſtaying till time had cloſed up the wound; but they would for ever renounce writing on a ſubject which would infallibly open it again. But Timæus was not of this temper; and I dare affirm that the ſole deſire of revenging himſelf on Agathocles, would have determined him to take pen in hand immediately to compoſe a Hiſtory of Sicily. Every age can furniſh us with examples of authors, who had never thought of writing Hiſtories, if perſonal reſentments and modiſh paſſions had not been their motive. They have not patience to ſtay till their paſſion is over, which is the leaſt they ought to do; but they write from the firſt beginning of their reſentment. They ſhould remember this fine precept,

Ne frena animo permitte calenti,
Da ſpatium tenuemque moram: male cuncta miniſtrat Impetus *. . . . .

Cool firſt, nor give your angry mind the rein,
For violence your end will ne'er obtain.

But perhaps they are afraid they ſhould not be able to write, if they ſhould ſtay till their minds are compoſed. Perhaps they fancy that anger gives them a talent which they had not before.

Si natura negat facit indignatio verſum (61).

If nature does not, anger makes us write.

Hence we find their Hiſtories to be ſo very partial, and that they add their own comments on every action which they relate. One would be apt to take them for Judges of the Inquiſition: they give ſentence on every fact; they pronounce it weak and baſe, &c. why do they not give the reader leave to form this judgment? They ought to confine themſelves to a narration which only contains the principles or the premiſſes of reaſoning; the reader would draw the concluſion himſelf, whether it tends to cenſure or to commend. It is enough therefore to repreſent facts: ſentences of this kind ought to be managed in the ſame manner as thoſe called maxims: they ought not to ſhew themſelves in Relievo; but ought to be incorporated in the narration, as has been already obſerved (62). There are a great many modern Hiſtories, in whoſe titles the epithet Critical is wanting; for the authors of them do nothing elſe but criticize, and ſometimes engage in a regular diſpute. They relate and then refute alternately.

---

(58) Plutarch. in Nicia, pag. 523. Note that Longinus on the Sublime, ch. iii, laughed at the reaſon taken from Hermocrates's name.

(59) Compare with this the remark [D], of the article REMOND.

(60) See the remark [B], of the article HALL (RICHARD).

* Stat. Theb. lib. x, ver. 697.

(61) Juven. Sat. I, ver. 79.

(62) In the remark [C] of the article THEON.

TIMESIUS, [A] was a very conſiderable man in Clazomenæ, the place of his birth. He there enjoyed ſo great an authority, that he did whatever he pleaſed ; and as the public was obliged to him for ſeveral ſervices, he did not apprehend that he ſhould become odious by his greatneſs. But he was ſatisfied to the contrary, when paſſing by a place where ſome little children were playing at cockals, he liſtened to their talk. One of them was buſied in making a cockal fly out of a hole : The thing appeared ſo very difficult, that moſt of the children believed he would not be able to do it : But he who was to play being of another opinion, I wiſh to God, ſaid he, that I could make Timeſius's brains fly out, as I will do this cockal. Timeſius no longer doubted but that he was extremely hated in the city ; and as ſoon as he came home, he told what he had heard to his wife, ordered her to pack up her things and follow him, and departed from Clazomenæ (a). I am ready to believe it was after this time that he undertook to conduct a colony into Thrace, and to rebuild Abdera. We have ſeen elſewhere (b) that his deſign did not ſucceed, and that he was driven out by the Thracians before he had regulated his new eſtabliſhment. The Teians who in the LIXth Olympiad abandoned their city, ſucceeded much better in the deſign of building Abdera. They retained ſuch a vaſt reſpect for him, that they honoured him as a hero (c). He experienced the truth of the anſwer, which the oracle gave, when conſulted concerning the conducting of a colony, which was ; Look for ſwarms of bees, and you will find abundance of waſps (d). The misfortune was, that inſtead of ejecting the drones like the bees in Virgil (e), the waſps conſtrained him to give over his enterprize.

(a) Plutarch. Præc. Reip. ger. pag. 812.

(b) In the article ABDERA.

(c) Herodot. lib. i, cap. clxviii.

(d) Plut de Amicor. multitud. pag. 96.

(e) Ignavum fucos pecus à præſepibus arcent. Virgil. Georg. lib. iv, ver. 168.

[A] Timeſius.] I call him by the name which Herodotus has given him, and not by that of Timeſias given him by Plutarch. I have elſewhere obſerved (1), that a very learned man has called him Tiſamenes, and probably by a typographical error has aſcribed to him the driving out the Thracians (2). Another has ſaid that he was expelled by the Teians ; I have alſo taken notice of this miſtake (3).

(1) In the article ABDERA, remark [K].

(2) Ibid. remark [B].

(3) Ibid. remark [C].

TIMOLEON, the General of the Corinthians, was one of the greateſt men of antient Greece. He might have been called the ſcourge of tyrants ; for his ſtrongeſt inclination and principal employment was to puniſh the uſurpers of ſovereign power, and to maintain or re-eſtabliſh liberty. If he fought againſt tyrants, it was not to rid himſelf of competitors, and to ſeize the unlawful authority of which he would deprive them. We find but too many ſuch enemies of uſurpers. As to him, all his undertakings were in favour of the people. He carried his zeal for the intereſt of his country ſo far, that he cauſed his eldeſt brother Timophanes to be killed [A], after having found that all his remonſtrances and intreaties were not capable of converting him. We ought to know that Timophanes ſet up for a tyrant in the city of Corinth. His death drew after it conſequences very diſagreeable to Timoleon. Some people reproached him with it as an execrable parricide, and his mother loaded him with curſes [B]. This threw him into [A] He cauſed his elder brother Timophanes to be killed.] He did not ſtain his own hands with his brother's blood ; but he was however one of the real authors of his murder, which happened in the following manner. Timoleon confederated himſelf with two perſons, one of whom, named Æſchylus was Timophanes's wife's brother, the other was a Soothſayer named Satyrus (1). They all three went to the tyrant, and endeavoured to perſuade him for the laſt time to reſtore liberty to the people. He at firſt laughed at them, and afterwards grew very much enraged. Upon this Timoleon ſtepped a little aſide, covered his face and wept whilſt the other two killed Timophanes (2). This is Plutarch's relation, which generally ſpeaking agrees with that of Cornelius Nepos (3). But Diodorus Siculus ſays that Timoleon himſelf killed his brother (4). There is one difference obſervable betwixt Cornelius Nepos and Plutarch. The firſt ſays that Timoleon joined with his brother-in-law ; the other tells us that it was with Timophanes's brother-in-law. Let us expreſs this more clearly. This aſſociate, according to Plutarch, was Timophanes's wife's brother (5) ; but, according to Cornelius Nepos, he had married a ſiſter of Timophanes and of Timoleon. ' Per aruſpicem communemque affinem cui ſoror ex ' iiſdem parentibus nata, nupta erat, fratrem tyrannum interficiendum curavit (6). - - - He procured his ' brother to be killed by a Soothſayer, and a relation in ' common to both brothers, having married their own ' ſiſter.' Mr Moreri is here guilty of an error. Timoleon, ſays he, conſented that Satyrus, who had married their ſiſter ſhould kill this upſtart tyrant. He cites Diodorus Siculus, and Plutarch : the firſt does not mention him ; and the other does not ſay that Satyrus was any way related to Timoleon ; he only calls him a Soothſayer. And as to the other accomplice, he calls him Æſchylus, and makes him Timophanes's wife's brother. It is not impoſſible that this Æſchylus might have married Timophanes's ſiſter, and yet be Timophanes's wife's brother. Upon this foot Cornelius Nepos and Plutarch would both be in the right, tho' each muſt have omitted a part of his relation to that family.

[B] Reproached him with it as an execrable parricide, and his mother loaded him with curſes.] Let us take this fact in its full extent as related by Plutarch. Thoſe who could not bear popular liberty, or who had been long accuſtomed to be near the perſons of great men and to make their court, made a ſhew of being very well pleaſed with the tyrant's death ; and yet by continually reproaching Timoleon for having committed a parricide execrable and abominable both to the gods and men, they made ſo great an impreſſion upon him, as occaſioned his repenting that he had any concern in it : and beſides being informed that his mother bore it very impatiently, and that ſhe was continually uttering againſt him the moſt terrible expreſſions and horrid maledictions, he went to her, with a deſign to comfort her : but ſhe ordered the door to be ſhut upon him and would not ſee him. Being thus overwhelmed with grief, and troubled in mind, he took a ſudden reſolution to ſtarve himſelf to death : but his friends who did not abandon him in this deſperate melancholy, continued to urge him by perſuaſions and earneſt intreaties, till they forced him to eat. After this he reſolved to retire for the remainder of his life to a country ſolitude, and to quit all concern in the government of public affairs. He at firſt led ſo rigorous a life, that he not only abſtained from ever coming to the city, but avoided all company, and did nothing elſe but wander up and down from place to place, in the moſt remote and ſolitary parts of the country he could find, and conſume himſelf with melancholy (7). . . . . Whether it was his regret for the death of his brother, or his being aſhamed to appear before his mother, which ſoever it was, it ſo broke his

(1) So Theopompus calls him : but Ephorus and Timæus call him Orthagoras. Plut. ubi infra.

(2) Taken from Plutarch, in the Life of Timoleon, pag. 237.

(3) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Timoleontis. cap. i.

(4) Diodor. Siculus, lib. xvi, cap. lxvi.

(5) Ἀδελφὸν ὄντα τῆς Τιμοφάνους γυναικὸς Fratrem uxoris Timophanis. Plut. ubi ſupra.

(6) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Timoleontis, cap. i.

(7) Plutarch in the Life of Timoleon, pag. 238.

into a deſpairing melancholy ; he deſigned to put an end to his life ; and when at laſt his friends had engaged him to alter his reſolution, he renounced all public affairs, and confined himſelf to an obſcure ſolitude. Here he ſpent twenty years, as in all probability he would have done his whole life, if an opportunity had not offered of reſtoring Syracuſe to its liberty. This city oppreſſed by the tyranny of Dionyſius, had recourſe to the Corinthians. They reſolved to aſſiſt them, and gave Timoleon the command of the troops deſigned for that ſervice. That voyage was accompanied with very favourable omens [C] ; but he met with many difficulties to be ſurmounted in order to his landing in Sicily ; for Icetes the tyrant of Leontium, who had pretended to join with the Corinthians in the recovery of the liberty of Syracuſe, but at the bottom aimed at dethroning Dionyſius, for no other end, but in order to render himſelf maſter of that city, had joined with the Carthaginians, and poſſeſſed all the paſſes. He kept Dionyſius beſieged in the fortreſs of Syracuſe, having already taken the reſt of the town. Notwithſtanding theſe obſtacles, Timoleon by ſtratagem landed in Sicily, defeated Icetes's army, and in a little time after became maſter of the citadel of Syracuſe, and afterwards of the whole city. The citadel fell into his hands, by means of Dionyſius the tyrant ſurrendring it, together with his perſon into his hands (a) ; and he took the city by ſtorm, without having ſo much as one of his ſoldiers either killed or wounded. He cauſed the fortreſs to be raſed, in order to aſcertain to the inhabitants the duration of that liberty which he had recovered, and after having been ſucceſsful in his endeavours to re-eſtabliſh good order in this place, he applied himſelf to the reſtoring of the antient liberty of all the cities in Sicily, which then groaned under tyrants. He forced Icetes to renounce his alliance with the Carthaginians, and to content himſelf with living in a private capacity in the city of Leontium. He obliged Leptines the tyrant of Apollonia to ſurrender himſelf, and ſent him to Corinth. He obtained a ſignal victory over the Carthaginians. He puniſhed the treachery of Icetes who entred into new alliances with them [D]. He defeated his ſpirit and diſheartned him, that for twenty years after he did not in the leaſt intermeddle in any honourable or public affair (8). Cornelius Nepos ſays much the ſame thing (9) : But Diodorus Siculus ſays nothing of this long melancholy of Timoleon ; but, on the contrary, gives us to underſtand, that there was only a ſmall diſtance of time between the death of Timophanes, and the expedition of Syracuſe (10). He ſays, that as ſoon as Timoleon had killed his brother there aroſe a great tumult ; one part of the inhabitants demanded juſtice on the murderer, and others requeſted that thoſe elogies ſhould be beſtowed on him, which were due to the deſtroyers of tyrants. This diſpute was referred to the deciſion of the ſenate ; the cauſe was pleaded on both ſides by the counſel for and againſt Timoleon : The judges had not pronounced their ſentence, when the Syracuſian ambaſſadors came to requeſt the aſſiſtance of the Corinthians. The ſenate ordered that Timoleon ſhould be ſent to Syracuſe, and that if he diſcharged that truſt well, he ſhould be treated as the killer of a tyrant ; but if the contrary, as a parricide. I ſhall once more cite Plutarch, to evince, by an unqueſtionable example, how much the beſt Hiſtorians can wreſt the moſt eſſential characters of a fact. Here is Diodorus Siculus, who aſſures us that the Corinthian ſenate did not intruſt Timoleon with the command of their forces, otherwiſe than under a diſagreeable condition, namely, that his criminal proceſs ſhould end in his abſolution or condemnation, according as he ſhould behave himſelf well or ill in that poſt. But Plutarch's relation is quite different : he ſays that Timoleon was elected General abſolutely, and without any condition, by the voice of the people : After which Teleclides, who was then a perſon of the greateſt authority in the Corinthian affairs, riſing up, made a ſpeech to Timoleon, in which he exhorted him to behave himſelf like a good man and brave commander in this charge : for, ſaid he, if you do this we ſhall pronounce ſentence on you, that you have killed a tyrant ; but if you do not diſcharge this truſt well, we ſhall condemn you for murdering your brother (11). Theſe are no trifling variations, but eſſential differences, and, to uſe a Latin phraſe, toto cœlo diverſi ; - - - diametrically oppoſite. We cannot poſſibly excuſe both theſe Hiſtorians ; one of them muſt neceſſarily have fallen into a very great miſtake.

[C] With very favourable omens.] I ſhall not mention the happy preſage he met with at Delphi : Moreri hath already done it. But here are others : When the fleet was ready, and the forces compleatly equipped for their departure, the prieſteſſes of the goddeſs Proſerpine declared, that in their ſleep the night before, the goddeſſes Ceres and Proſerpine appeared to them in travelling dreſſes, and told them they would go with Timoleon to Sicily. On this account the Corinthians fitted out a galley, called the galley of Ceres and Proſerpine (12).... When Timoleon was on the main ſea, having the wind a-ſtern, in the night he thought that on a ſudden the heavens opened, and diſplayed a large quantity of bright and viſible fire, expanding itſelf over his ſhip, and appearing in the form of a burning torch, like thoſe uſed in religious ceremonies. This torch accompanied and conducted them throughout their voyage, and at laſt diſperſed and vaniſhed at a place near the coaſt of Italy, where the pilots had conſulted to land. The Soothſayers being aſked the ſignification of this preſage, anſwered, this miraculous apparition confirmed the dream of the prieſteſſes of Ceres, and that the goddeſſes favouring the enterpriſe, had ſent this light from heaven to ſhew them the way ; the iſland of Sicily being ſacred and dedicated to Proſerpine, the rape on which goddeſs was alſo ſaid to be there committed, and the ſovereignty of it given her as a nuptial gift on her wedding-day (13). This relation of Plutarch might have been more accurate ; but nevertheleſs, all circumſtances duly weighed, it clearly enough appears that this was only a dream, and that there was no ſuch thing as a real conducting fire which went as a guide before the fleet. So that this cannot reaſonably be compared with the pillar of fire which went before the Iſraelites, or with the ſtar which led the wiſe-men to Bethlehem.

[D] He puniſhed the treachery of Icetes, who entred into new alliances with the Carthaginians.] Timoleon's glory was by this ſomewhat eclipſed ; for he permitted vengeance to be carried too far, and cruelty to be exerciſed upon thoſe perſons whom he had much better have exempted from puniſhment. Plutarch's words are theſe : ‘ A few days after, Timoleon bringing his ‘ army before Leontium, took Icetes, his ſon Eupo‘lemus, and the General of his horſe, alive, they be‘ing delivered up into his hands by their own ſoldiers. ‘ Icetes and his ſon were puniſhed with death, as tray‘tors and tyrants ; and Euthydemus, tho' a valiant ‘ man and brave warriour, met with no more mercy, ‘ for ſome reflecting expreſſion he was accuſed of ‘ having uttered againſt the Corinthians. For it was ‘ affirmed, that in a ſpeech he made to the Leontines, ‘ on occaſion of the Corinthians firſt arrival in Sicily ‘ to wage war againſt the tyrants, he ſaid, amongſt ‘ other things, that they ought not to be ſurprized ‘ or affrighted, if Corinthian dames were goſſiping abroad *.

‘ Thus we ſee moſt men are very frequently more en‘raged at reflecting words than injurious actions ; ‘ they more patiently ſuffer a real injury than a ‘ reflection

---

(a) He was ſent to Corinth : but it cannot be ſaid, as it is in Moreri, that he was ſent thither, after he had been overcome by Timoleon ; for Dionyſius did not oppoſe Timoleon.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Hoc præclariſſimum ejus factum non pari modo probatum eſt ab omnibus. Nonnulli enim læſam ab eo pietatem putabant : & invidiâ laudem virtutis obterebant. Mater verò poſt id factum, neque domum ad ſe filium admiſit, neque aſpexit, quin eum fratricidam impiumque deteſtans compellaret. Quibus rebus ille adeò eſt commotus, ut nonnunquàm vitæ finem facere voluerit, atque ex ingratorum hominum conſpectu morte decedere. Cornel. Nepos, ubi ſupra.

(10) Diodorus Siculus, ubi ſupra.

(11) Plutarch. ubi ſupra, pag. 238, 239.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Id. ibid. pag. 239.

* It is the beginning of Euripides's Medea.

defeated Mamercus the tyrant of Catana, and purſued him to Meſſina, where the tyrant Hippo had given him ſhelter. He beſieged that place, and had the ſatisfaction to get both thoſe tyrants into his hands [E]. So many glorious actions did not inſpire him with the leaſt inclination for ſupreme power: But, on the contrary, he rejoiced that there were ſome perſons in Syracuſe who publickly accuſed him [F]. He ſpent the reſt of his life in this city [G], where he received all the marks of gratitude which he deſerved: He really enjoyed there all the advantages of ſupreme power [H], without loſing the glory of having never acted for any other end than the liberty of the people, and without reflexion, and pardon their enemies, when they have revenged themſelves as to the fact, becauſe they can do no leſs: but provoking expreſſions ſeem to proceed from too great an exceſs of hatred and malignity. After this, Timoleon returning to Syracuſe, the Syracuſians tried, condemned, and executed the wives and daughters of Icetes and his ſon. This ſeems the harſheſt action of Timoleon's life: for if he had pleaſed he could eaſily have ſaved the lives of theſe unhappy women: but he was not at all ſollicitous about it, he entirely abandoned them to the fury of the citizens, who were reſolved to revenge on them the injuries done to Dion after he had expelled the tyrant Dionyſius: for Icetes had cauſed Dion's wife, Arete, his ſiſter Ariſtomacha, and his ſon, who was but a child, to be drowned in the ſea, as we have related in the life of Dion (14).' Plutarch's reflexion on human weakneſs, which pardons injurious actions eaſier than reflecting words, is very judicious.

[E] He had the ſatisfaction to get both thoſe tyrants into his hands.] They both came to an unhappy end. Hippo, finding Meſſina beſieged by ſea and land, embarked on board a ſhip in order to eſcape: but he was taken before he got out of the harbour; and the Meſſinians having got him into their hands, cauſed the children to come from the ſchool to the theatre to ſee one of the fineſt ſpectacles in the world, which was the puniſhment of a tyrant, who was publickly whipt, and afterwards executed. As to Mamercus he ſurrendered himſelf to Timoleon to be tried by the Syracuſians, on condition that Timoleon ſhould not be his accuſer. He was brought to Syracuſe, where he endeavourd to pronounce a ſtudied oration which he had compoſed for that end: but finding that the people cried out, and made a great noiſe, to prevent the hearing of him, and conſequently that it was not very likely they would pardon him, run croſs the theatre, and ſtruck his head with all his force againſt one of the ſteps on which the people ſat, deſigning, by daſhing out his brains to diſpatch himſelf immediately; but he had the misfortune to miſs his aim, for he was taken up yet alive and ſuffered the ſame puniſhment which was uſually inflicted on thieves and robbers (15). We muſt not forget that Mamercus was a Poet, and had irritated the Syracuſians by his ſatirical verſes. Let us hear Plutarch on this head (16). 'The common people of Syracuſe bore very impatiently the jeſts which their tyrants made and ſaid of them: for Mamercus, among others, valuing himſelf extremely on his talent in poetry and tragedy, having, in ſome engagements, gotten ſome advantage over the ſtrangers which were in the Syracuſian pay, gloried in his ſucceſs, and dedicating the bucklers he had taken from them in the temple of the gods, added the following galling verſes, in raillery and contempt of the conquered.

Theſe ſpacious ſhields ſhining with Tyrian dye,
And richly wrought with gold and ivory,
We by the dint of valour did obtain,
Altho' our bucklers were but ſmall and plain.

Here is a Poet not mentioned by Voſſius. Hieronymo Raguſa, the Jeſuit, does not forget him in his elogies of the antient Sicilians (17); but inſtead of referring us to Plutarch he only cites Giovanni Vintimiglia.

[F] He rejoiced that there were ſome perſons in Syracuſe who publickly accuſed him.] This ſeems to me the moſt ſhining part of his life: we ſhall relate it without retrenching any of Plutarch's words: But ſince it is, as we may ſay, neceſſary that not only all larks which the Latins call Caſſitæ, ſhould have creſts on their heads, as Simonides proverbially expreſſes it; ſo in all cities governed by democracy, there will be detractors. There were two of theſe at Syracuſe, who being accuſtomed to harangue the people, impeached Timoleon, one of them named Laphyſtius, the other Demænetus. Upon the appointing a certain day by the former of theſe, for Timoleon to appear before the people to anſwer to a crime of which he pretended to convict him, the citizens mutinied, and would not allow the authority of the ſummons. But he appeaſed them by remonſtrating to them that he had run through ſo many fatigues, and expoſed himſelf to ſo many dangers, to the end that every Syracuſian might freely enjoy the full benefit and privilege of the laws. Another time Demænetus in a full aſſembly of the people having reprehended and cenſured ſeveral of his actions, during the time that he was General, Timoleon made no anſwer to it; but only told the people that he heartily thanked the gods for having granted what he had ſo often requeſted and deſired in his prayers: which was, that he might once ſee the Syracuſians enjoy the perfect freedom and privilege of ſaying whatever they pleaſed (18). Thoſe who ſhall prefer the Latin of Cornelius Nepos, may read it here. Huic quidam Laphyſtius homo petulans & ingratus, vadimonium cùm vellet imponere, quod cum illo ſe lege agere diceret, & complures concurriſſent, qui procacitatem hominis manibus coërcere conarentur: Timoleon oravit omnes, ne id facerent, namque id ut Laphyſtio ceteriſque liceret, ſe maximos labores ſummaque adiiſſe pericula. Hanc enim ſpeciem libertatis eſſe, ſi omnibus quod quiſque vellet, legibus experiri liceret. Idem, cùm quidam Laphyſtii ſimilis, nomine Demænetus in concione populi, de rebus geſtis ejus detrahere cœpiſſet, ac nonnulla inveheretur in Timoleonta: dixit, nunc demum ſe voti eſſe damnatum: namque hæc à diis immortalibus ſemper precatum, ut talem libertatem reſtituerint Syracuſanis, in qua cuivis liceret, de quo vellet, impune dicere (19).

[G] He ſpent the reſt of his life in Syracuſe.] There is nothing more extraordinary than a great man, who knows how to enjoy his glory in quiet, without aſpiring after new dignities. Moſt of thoſe who arrive to a great height of reputation and an extenſive authority, imprudently aim at mounting yet higher, and by this means expoſe themſelves to ſome mortifying oppoſitions, and eſpecially in popular ſtates. Timoleon was wiſer: He never afterwards returned to Corinth, but obliged his wife and children to come to him: he never intermeddled with thoſe troubles which afterwards aroſe among the Greeks, nor expoſed himſelf to the envy of his fellow-citizens, which moſt governours and generals have raiſed by their too great and inſatiable deſire of honours and authority. He ſpent the remainder of his days in Sicily, in the happy enjoyment of the fruits of his own labours, the greateſt of which was to ſee ſo many cities, and ſo many thouſands of men obliged to him for their happineſs (20).

[H] He really enjoyed there all the advantages of ſupreme power.] If we may believe Cornelius Nepos, Timoleon's conduct was that of a very wiſe man; he voluntarily quitted all authority, and by this means acquired a power more ſecure than that of kings: 'Quum tantis eſſet opibus, ut etiam invitis imperare poſſet, tantum autem haberet amorem omnium Siculorum, ut nullo recuſante regnum obtineret: maluit ſe diligi, quam metui. Itaque cùm primum potuit, imperium depoſuit, & privatus Syracuſis, quod reliquum vitæ fuit, vixit. Neque verò id imperitè fecit. Nam quod ceteri reges imperio potuerunt, hic benevolentia tenuit. Nullus honos huic defuit: neque poſteà Syracuſis res ulla geſta eſt publica, de quâ prius ſit decretum, quàm Timoleontis ſententia cognita. Nullius unquam conſilium non modò antelatum, ſed ne comparatum quidem eſt. Neque id magis benevolentiâ factum eſt, quàm prudentiâ (21). - - - - Altho' he was ſo very wealthy as to be able even to take the government by force, and alſo ſo univerſally beloved by the Sicilians, that he might have obtained it with their conſent, yet he rather choſe to be the object of their affection, than of their fear. Therefore as ſoon as out expoſing himſelf to the envy of republican ſpirits. His funeral ſolemnities were very magnificent. I muſt not forget his acknowledging that all his great exploits were the work of the gods [I], a favour of fortune, a good luck, and not the effect of his own prudence

---

(14) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 252.

(15) Id. p. 252.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 251.

(17) Mamercus quoque poëtarum Siculorum gloria effulſit. Ex Joanne Vigintimillio in Tabula Poëtarum Siculorum. Hier. Raguza, in Elogiis Siculorum, pag. 178.

(18) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 253.

(19) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Timoleontis, cap. iv.

(20) Plut. in Vita Timoleontis, pag. 253.]

(21) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Timoleontis, cap. iii.

‘he poſſibly could, he laid down his command, and ſpent the remainder of his life at Syracuſe in a private capacity. Nor was this ill judged. For what other ſovereigns hold by power, he enjoyed by benevolence. No honour was unpaid to him: nor was any ſtep ever after taken by the Syracuſians without firſt conſulting Timoleon. The opinions of others were not only not preferred, but even not put in competition with his. Nor was this more owing to his goodneſs, than to his prudence.’ This Hiſtorian adds, that tho’ Timoleon became blind he did not give over being ſerviceable to the public. He cauſed himſelf to be carried in a litter to the aſſembly, and gave his opinion without ſtirring out of it. We ſhall relate this a little more particularly from Plutarch. ‘It was a great pleaſure to ſee how highly he was honoured in their councils. For if the affair in debate was of ſmall conſequence, they diſpatched it themſelves without him: but if it were of importance, and required mature deliberation, they called him to their aſſiſtance: he was carried in his litter croſs the public place to the theatre, where the aſſembly of the people was held, which he alſo entred in his litter: the people unanimouſly ſaluted him, and he returned their ſalutations; and after the praiſes and benedictions of the whole aſſembly were beſtowed on him, the buſineſs in debate was propoſed to him, and he gave his opinion; which being approved by the voices and ſuffrages of the people, his ſervants carried him back a-croſs the theatre in his litter, and the citizens received him with clapping of hands and loud acclamations of joy. After which the council proceeded to diſpatch the remainder of their public affairs by themſelves (22).’

[I] I muſt not forget his acknowledging that all his great exploits were the work of the gods.] ‘And in his familiar letters written to his friends at Corinth, as well as in ſeveral ſpeeches made to the people of Syracuſe, he often ſaid, that he rendered thanks to GOD for having been pleaſed to make him the glorious inſtrument, in his gracious purpoſe of ſaving and delivering Sicily from ſlavery. And having built a temple in his houſe, he dedicated it to Fortune, and there ſacrificed to her: and, which is more, he conſecrated and dedicated his whole houſe to holy Fortune (23).’ Cornelius Nepos relates the ſame thing. ‘Nihil unquam neque inſolens, neque glorioſum, ex ore ejus exiit: qui quidem, cùm ſuas laudes audiret prædicari, nunquàm aliud dixit, quàm ſe eâ re maximas diis gratias agere atque habere, quòd, cùm Siciliam recreare conſtituiſſent, tùm ſe potiſſimùm ducem eſſe voluiſſent. Nihil enim rerum humanarum ſine deorum numine agi putabat. Itaque ſuæ domi ſacellum αυτοματίας conſtituerat, idque ſanctiſſimè colebat (24). - - - Nothing that was preſuming or boaſting ever came out of his mouth: who even when he heard himſelf praiſed, never made any other reply, than that he was and ought to be extremely thankful to the gods, that when they had reſolved on the relief of Sicily, they had made choice of him to be the General. For it was his opinion that no human affairs are tranſacted without the direction of the gods. In conſequence of which he built a temple in his houſe to Fortune, and paid his devotions there with great zeal.’

A REFLEXION on this acknowledgment of Timoleon.

This chapel which he cauſed to be built in his houſe to Fortune, and the ſtrict worſhip which he paid to this divinity, give us reaſon to believe that he ſpoke as he thought, when he attributed his happy ſucceſs not to his own prudence, but to the favour of heaven. Otherwiſe it is very probable that all thoſe who made theſe acknowledgments, had not always in view the duties of religion, I mean the gratitude with which we ought to attribute our ſucceſs to divine providence, and not to our own wiſdom. Several have talked in this manner only for a political end; either with a deſign to appeaſe the envious, or to create a greater confidence in their friends (25). Let us quote an author, who knew how to make very judicious reflexions. The greateſt obſtacle, ſays he (26), which the founders of ſects and empires have met with in their deſigns, is the natural averſion all men have to ſubmit one to another, to acknowledge a ſuperiority of merit and underſtanding. It has always been a certain rule among them to exclude from all manner of pre-eminence, thoſe who diſcover any pretenſion to it, or a belief of their deſerving it. And therefore all great men have with the utmoſt care avoided ever mentioning the extraordinary qualities which they had received from the liberal hand of nature. They have always exerted them with ſo much circumſpection, that while every body elſe admired them, they themſelves only might ſeem ignorant of them. . . . . : . . (27) But the moſt ſucceſsful artifice they ever made uſe of to avoid irritating the pride and natural independence of men while they were inſlaving them, was, that theſe illuſtriſtrious impoſtors encouraged the people to aſcribe all their excellent and ſuperior qualifications to ſome ſecret communication which they had with the gods: by means of this addreſs whatever was great in them ceaſed to offend any perſon, becauſe it was no longer looked upon as any perſonal merit, which men are naturally averſe to acknowledge, but only as an effect of good fortune, chance, or the favour of heaven which extends itſelf equally to the worthy, and unworthy, and does not debaſe the one or the other. . . . . (28) It is upon this foundation that Cicero when obliged to particularize all his conduct againſt Catiline, in order to juſtify one who was accuſed of being concerned in his conſpiracy; this great Orator very well knowing that a recital ſo glorious for him, would in his own mouth rather alienate than engage the minds of his auditors; to render this the leſs odious he very artfully, in the entrance of his Oration, aſcribes all his great actions on this occaſion to a divine inſpiration. ‘O Dii immortales (vobis enim tribuam quæ veſtra ſunt, nec vero poſſum meo tantum ingenio dare, ut tot res, tantas, tam varias, tam repentinas, in illa turbulentiſſima tempeſtate Reipub. mea ſponte diſpexerim) vos profecto animum meum tunc conſervandæ patriæ cupiditate incendiſtis, vos me ab omnibus cæteris cogitationibus ad unam ſalutem Reipub. contuliſtis, vos denique in tantis tenebris erroris & inſcientiæ clariſſimum lumen prætuliſtis menti meæ *. - - - O ye gods, cries he, at firſt ſetting out with this view, Immortal gods, (for to you I will render what is intirely yours, nor can I indeed preſume ſo much on my capacity, as to believe that I could ever by myſelf have provided againſt ſo many accidents, ſo great, ſo different, and ſo unexpected, and in ſo turbulent a ſtate of the common-wealth) yes, it is you who have inſpired my ſoul with this ardent zeal for the preſervation of my country; you who have taken me from all other cares to apply me ſolely to the proſperity of the republic: it is you, in ſhort, who have introduced this ſhining light into my mind, before overſhadowed by error and ignorance.’

If theſe reflexions of the Abbot de St Real are judicious, thoſe of Mr Coſtar are not leſs ſo, when he is enquiring into the reaſons why Sylla thought fit to aſſume the ſirname of Fortunate. He diſapproves Mr Girac’s opinion who ſays: ‘It was indeed an inſtance of moderation in ſo illuſtrious a commander to aſcribe to Fortune ſo many ſignal victories, which he might have attributed to his own valour. Nevertheleſs it was out of a conſummate prudence, and a refined policy, that he yielded to the envy which ordinarily attends thoſe who raiſe themſelves above others. The antient Sages always feared the goddeſs Nemeſis, who diverted herſelf with debaſing and deſtroying thoſe too highly exalted (29.)’ Let us ſee Coſtar’s reflexions on this paſſage of his adverſary: As for Sylla it was not the defeat of Mithridates, which engaged him to aſſume the name of Fortunate. † After having oppreſſed all the enemies of his greatneſs and perſon, and becoming Dictator by dint of his own authority, he made an ample recital of all the felicities which had attended both his military and civil actions: after which he declared that, in acknowledgment of thoſe favours which heaven had heaped upon him, he had reſolved for the future to add to his other names the title of Fortunate. ‡ That this was out of moderation and in order to avoid envy, as Mr Girac believes, is what I cannot perſuade myſelf. I rather imagine that it was to give a greater aſſurance to thoſe of his party, and greater terror to thoſe who oppoſed him. In effect, we are more apprehenſive of the fortune of a great man than of

(22) Plut. in Vita Timoleon. pag. 254.

(23) Ibid. pag. 253.

(24) Cornel. Nepos, ubi ſupra, pag. 344.

(25) Plutarch. in Præceptis Reip. gerendæ, pag. 816, where he expreſsly mentions Timoleon.

(26) The Abbot de Saint Real, de l’Uſage de l’Hiſtoire, Diſcours vii, p. m. 223.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 225.

(28) Id. ibid, pag. 229.

* Pro Sylla.

(29) Girac, Remarques ſur les Entretiens de Coſtar, p. 255.

† Plut. in Sylla.

‡ Pag. 255.

prudence (b). This gives me an opportunity to make ſome extracts concerning what the antients have ſaid on the influence of Fortune [K], and particularly to refute thoſe who affirm of his virtue, becauſe virtue is a cauſe purely human, of which we know pretty nearly the meaſure, and extent; whereas Fortune is a divine cauſe whoſe power is unlimited, It is for this reaſon alſo, that we more readily rely on the protection of the fortunate, than on that of the virtuous; and the Lord Chancellor Bacon is of opinion, that Cæſar had not ſo effectually encouraged the Pilot frightned with the tempeſt, if he had ſaid, Fear nothing, thou carrieſt Cæſar and his virtue, as he did by this encouraging expreſſion, Fear nothing, thou carrieſt Cæſar and his Fortune (30). It is better in my opinion to aſcribe to Sylla both theſe motives, that alledged by Girac and oppoſed by Coſtar, as well as that advanced by the latter; for it is certain, that in the Pagan times, they very much feared the goddeſs Nemeſis, and firmly believed her an enemy to the proud. It was thought, that the General Timotheus's reverſe of Fortune was owing to his refuſing to acknowledge his obligations to his ſtars. Let us hear what Plutarch ſays on this head: Timotheus, the Athenian, the ſon of Conon, whoſe malicious enemies attributed all his great actions to the favour of Fortune, to expreſs which they repreſented in pictures, Fortune bringing towns to him already taken in her net, whilſt he was aſleep; very warmly reſented it, and was very much incenſed againſt them on that account, urging that they robbed him of his juſt glory: on which occaſion once upon his return from a ſucceſsful war, after having given an account to the people, and publickly recited the particulars of his expedition, he added, Athenian Lords, Fortune has no hand in what I have related. The gods were ſo enraged at this ridiculous ambition of Timotheus, that he was never afterward ſucceſsful; they thwarted him in all his actions to that degree, that he became ſo odious to the people that he was at laſt baniſhed and expelled Athens (31). To this may be added what Plutarch tells us of Sylla's affecting the contrary. The facts are curious. 'Sylla not only patiently acquieſced with thoſe who cried him up as a particular favourite of Fortune, but backed their opinion, and glorying in it as a ſpecial favour of the gods, he aſcribed the glory of all his actions to Fortune (32), either out of a ſort of vain glory, or a real imagination that the gods conducted him in all his affairs; for he himſelf informs us in his commentaries, that of the enterprizes which ſeemed to have been well concerted, thoſe that he boldly hazarded according as opportunity offered, tho' directly oppoſite to his former thoughts and reſolutions in council, were ſuch as ſucceeded beſt. Beſides when he ſaid that he was rather born for fortune than war, he ſeems to acknowledge his ſucceſſes rather owing to his fortune than to his valour. In ſhort, he appears on all occaſions entirely to ſubmit to, and own his whole dependence on Fortune; ſince he even owns it as a ſingular favour of the gods, that he preſerved ſuch an union and amity with his father-in-law Metellus, who was a perſon in equal authority with himſelf (33).' See in Plutarch (34) ſome other facts which he has extracted from the commentaries of this Roman General; and obſerve that he ſuppoſes it poſſible to aſcribe to Fortune by way of rodomontade, whatever great actions have been performed. Εἴτε κόμπῳ χρώμενος, εἴθ᾽ οὕτως ἔχων τῇ δόξῃ πρὸς τὸ θεῖον, whether, ſays he (35), Sylla ſpoke thus out of a bravado, or from his having this real opinion of providence. To me the juſtneſs of this disjunctive does not clearly appear: for if this great Captain had not really believed that GOD had favoured him, I own he might yet have ſaid ſo for ſome political reaſons already mentioned: but I cannot ſee that vanity or vain-glory could induce him to it, ſince he was not one of thoſe nonſenſical romancers, who ground their bravadoes on extravagancies, and are ſufficiently ſatisfied if they do but talk. Such a man as he could not be ignorant, that he diminiſhed the merit of his prudence and valour, in proportion as he acknowledged that Fortune was the cauſe of his victories. How therefore could he make this acknowledgment out of a principle of vanity, ſuppoſing him to be guilty of a lie? I add this, becauſe Plutarch's disjunctive ſuppoſes, that Sylla could not have ſpoke thus from a motive of vain-glory, if he had been perſuaded of the truth of what he ſaid. In my opinion therefore the Hiſtorian ought to have joined theſe two particulars, which he hath ſeparated. He ought to have ſaid that Sylla being perſuaded that providence had heaped on him its moſt ſurprizing bleſſings, affected to boaſt of it, and from thence was ſupplied with matter for his vanity; for as all things are liable to be abuſed, it is certain, that if, on the one ſide, wiſe men humble themſelves, by acknowledging that they are only the inſtruments of providence; on the other hand, haughty men pride themſelves, by imagining that GOD has been pleaſed to make uſe of them for the execution of his deſigns. They look upon themſelves as his favourites, and from that time believe themſelves above all the reſt of mankind. Conſider that St Paul himſelf had occaſion for a ſtrong check, and ſevere mortification, to prevent his being puffed up with pride, by the excellency of thoſe Revelations which GOD by his ſpecial grace had communicated to him. But to ſay ſomething in defence of Plutarch: thoſe perſons who believe nothing of what they ſay concerning Fortune, may nevertheleſs aſcribe their greateſt actions to her out of vanity and preſumption. They may govern themſelves by the general opinion; and imagine that thoſe who believe GOD to be the ſovereign director of all things, will admire and firmly rely on his favourites. A modern author pretends that a certain boaſt of Tiberius (36) was rather political than vain. For it is of great importance for a Prince to be fortunate or to be thought ſo. And this paſſes among his ſubjects for merit and virtue ‡, and the more ſo as they believe their felicity depends on his. So Tiberius who perfectly underſtood all the maxims of government, loudly proclaimed the proſperity of his houſe, declaring that ſuch a fortunate incident had never before happened to a Roman Prince. From whence he thought to render himſelf more venerable to the people, by making them believe him to be the favourite of the gods * (37).

[K] What the antients have ſaid on the influence of Fortune.] If I would here collect all that they have ſaid on this ſubject, I ſhould be obliged to write a whole book on that head. I only propoſe to glean a few ears in this ſpacious field. It may be affirmed that no hypotheſis is better eſtabliſhed in the writings of the antients, than that human induſtry and prudence have a much leſs ſhare in events, than our good or ill fortune, or in other words, an unforeſeen concourſe or diſpoſition of circumſtances not in the leaſt depending upon us. 'Sunt in his quidem virtutis opera magna, ſed majora Fortunæ. - - - Among theſe indeed the actions of virtue are great, but thoſe of Fortune yet greater.' Pliny ſpeaks this (38), after having related ſeveral events: but who doubts that he might have ſaid the ſame of an infinite number of other particular occurrences? He lays down a little farther the ſame maxim, tho' ſomewhat more obſcurely. 'Plurimum refert in quæ cujuſque virtus tempora inciderit. - - - The times in which each perſon's virtue happens to appear are of very great importance.' Tho' Quintus Curtius ſhould not expreſsly tell us (39), that Alexander's conqueſts were leſs owing to valour than to fortune; his Hiſtory alone would have ſufficiently declared it. Cornelius Nepos affirms that in the diviſion of military glory, fortune has always the greateſt ſhare: 'Jure ſuo nonnulla ab Imperatore miles, plurima vero Fortuna vindicat, ſeque his plus valuiſſe quam ducis prudentiam verè poteſt prædicare (40). - - - The ſoldier juſtly claims ſome ſhare with the General, but fortune much more than either, ſince her aſſiſtance may truly be ſaid to be of greater conſequence than his conduct.' Mr Spanheim (41) conjectures that theſe words are only an imitation of the following: 'Nam bellicas laudes ſolent quidam extenuare verbis, eaſque detrahere ducibus, communicare cum militibus . . . . . maximam verò partem quaſi ſuo jure Fortuna ſibi vindicat, & quidquid eſt proſpere geſtum id pene omne ducit ſuum (42). - - - For ſome are accuſtomed to extenuate military ſucceſſes, and deprive the Generals of them ſharing them among the ſoldiers . . . . . but the greateſt part of all is claimed as it were of right by Fortune, who eſteems every thing her own which is performed with ſucceſs.'

(b) Taken from Plutarch, in the life of Timoleon.

(30) Coſtar. Apolog. pag. 317, 318.

(31) Plut. in Vita Syllæ, pag. m. 454.

(32) And yet Salluſt tells us, Atque illi (Sullæ) feliciſſimo omnium ante civilem victoriam nunquam ſuper induſtriam fortuna fuit, multique dubitavere fortior an felicior eſſet. Salluſt. de Bello Jugurth. pag. m. 362.

(33) Plut. in Sylla, pag. 454.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Ibid.

(36) The wife of Druſus, the ſon of Tiberius, being delivered of two boys, Tiberius ſaid in a full ſenate, that ſince the beginning of the empire, no man of his rank had been bleſſed with the like good fortune. Tacit. Ann. lib. ii.

‡ Quibuſdam fortuna pro virtutibus fuit. Hiſt. 2.

* Cœleſtis favor, & quædam inclinatio numinum oſtenderetur. Hiſt. iv.

(37) Amelot de la Houſſaye in his Tiberius, chap. lxxxiii, pag. 106, Edit. 1683, in 4*to.*

(38) Plinius, lib. vii, cap. xxviii, p. m. 49.

(39) Fatendum eſt quum plurimum virtuti debuerit plus debuiſſe fortunæ quam ſolus omnium mortalium in poteſtate habuit. Q. Curtius, lib. x, cap. v, num. 35.

(40) Cornel. Nepos, in Thraſybulo, cap. i.

(41) Spanheim ſur les Ceſars de Julien, p. 428.

(42) Cicero, Orat. pro Marcello.

affirm that there is no other cauſe of proſperity than prudence, nor of adverſity than imprudence, ‘ ſucceſs.’ Cicero who ſpoke this to Cæſar, had no reaſon to fear that he ſhould be offended at it; for no perſon more expreſsly acknowledged the empire of Fortune than Cæſar (43). You may ſee in Mr Spanheim (44) what Livy, Diodorus Siculus, and others, have acknowledged concerning this Empire, either in expreſs words, or by declaring that we ought not to judge of perſonal merit by the ſucceſs of actions, which is entirely ſubject to Fortune, but by the means that are uſed. Scarce any one of the Poets has expreſſed himſelf ſo nervouſly on this ſubject as Juvenal.

Si fortuna volet, fies de rhetore conſul;
Si volet hæc eadem, fies de conſule rhetor.
Vintidius quid enim? quid Tullius? anne aliud quam
Sidus & occulti miranda potentia fati (45)?

'Tis fate that flings the dice; and as ſhe flings,
Of kings makes pedants, and of pedants kings.
What made Ventidius riſe, and Tullius great,
But their kind ſtars, and hidden pow'r of fate?

Juvenal alſo ſays,

Plus etenim fati valet hora benigni
Quam ſi nos Veneris commendet epiſtola Marti,
Et Samia genitrix quæ delectatur arena *.

For one luckey hour is of more conſequence to a ſoldier, than a recommendation to Mars, either from his miſtreſs or his mother.

The ſentiment of princes being here of greater force than that of a poet; I ſhall cite the anſwer of Dionyſius the younger, when he was aſked this queſtion by Philip King of Macedon: Wherefore did you not maintain yourſelf in the kingdom which your father left you? Do not be ſurpriſed at that, replied he, for my father, who left me all his other effects, did not leave me his fortune by which he acquired them (46).

I might ſubjoin to theſe quotations the thoughts of ſeveral modern authors; but ſhall content my ſelf with a paſſage in Montagne. ‘ It is commonly obſervable in human actions, that Fortune, in order to convince us of the great power ſhe bears over all things, and of the pleaſure ſhe takes in checking our preſumption, not being able to make fools wiſe, makes them fortunate in ſpite of virtue. And ſhe is moſt inclined to favour thoſe executions, where the deſign is more eſpecially her own. Hence we daily ſee the moſt ſimple among us defeat the greateſt enterprizes, both public and private. And as Sirannez the Perſian anſwered thoſe, who were very much ſurpriſed at the ill ſucceſs of his affairs, conſidering that his deſigns were ſo well laid; that he alone was maſter of his deſigns, but as to the ſucceſs that was in the breaſt of fortune: So theſe may anſwer in the ſame manner, but in a different ſenſe. The greateſt part of the affairs of the world are done of themſelves.

‘ Fata viam inveniunt.

‘ Fate finds the way.

‘ The event frequently authorizes a very fooliſh conduct. Our interpoſition is only a thing of courſe, and more commonly in conſideration of cuſtom and example than reaſon. When I have been aſtoniſhed at the greatneſs of an action, and upon enquiry of thoſe who have accompliſhed it, have been let into the motives and management; I have found their counſels very common, and the moſt vulgar and cuſtomary are perhaps alſo the moſt ſecure and beſt adapted to practice, if not for ſhew..... Good luck and ill luck are in my opinion two ſovereign powers. It is ridiculous to think that human prudence is able to act the ſame part as fortune will do. And his enterprize is very vain, who preſumes to ſecure both the cauſes and conſequences, and lead as it were by the hand the progreſs of his undertaking. Vain more particularly in martial councils (47).’

Notwithſtanding all the authorities juſt now cited, it is certain that ſeveral good writers have maintained that every one is the author of his own fortune, and is either miſerable or happy as he acts imprudently. Plautus has laid down this maxim.

LY. Ne opprobra, pater. Multa eveniunt homini quæ volt quæ nevolt.
PH. Mentire edepol, gnate: atque id nunc facis haut conſuetudine,
Nam ſapiens quidem pol ipſe fingit fortunam ſibi.
Eo ne multa quæ nevolt eveniunt niſi fictor malu'ſt (48).

LY. Sir, blame me not. We cann't command events.
PH. Son, you're miſtaken: that's a vulgar error.
A wiſe man always cuts out his own fortune.
Nothing proves croſs but from an ill contriver.

It is alſo to be found as cited from an antient poet, in a diſcourſe (49) attributed to Salluſt. ‘ Res docuit id verum eſſe quod in carminibus Appius ait fabrum eſſe ſuæ quemque Fortunæ. - - - - Experience teaches the truth of what Appius ſays in his verſes, That every man is the maker of his own fortune.’ Cornelius Nepos, alledges it twice in his life of Pomponius Atticus. ‘ Itaque hic fecit ut vere dictum videatur SUI CUIQUE MORES FINGUNT FORTUNAM (50)... quantum poterimus rerum exemplis lectores docebimus, ſicut ſupra ſignificavimus, SUOS CUIQUE MORES PLERUMQUE CONCILIARE FORTUNAM (51).-- So that from this example it appears true, That the conduct of every perſon makes his fortune.... We ſhall convince the readers as far as we can by experience, as we have before hinted, That every perſon's fortune is generally owing to his conduct.’ Thoſe who have exclaimed ſo much againſt Theophraſtus (52) for praiſing that maxim, that fortune and not wiſdom is the directreſs of life, have come very near to Plautus's aſſertion. And what ſhall we ſay of Juvenal, who after having, in his 7th ſatire, preached up the omnipotence of fate tells us in his 10th ſatire that all depends on prudence?

Nullum numen abeſt, ſi ſit prudentia: ſed te
Nos facimus, fortuna, deam cæloque locamus (53).

Fortune was never worſhipp'd by the wiſe:
But, ſet aloft by fools, uſurps the ſkies. DRYDEN.

Some Moderns have approved Plautus's opinion. Galeotto de gli Oddi pronounced an oration on this ſubject in the academy of the Inſenſati at Perugia (54). Regnier declares for the ſame opinion in one of his ſatires:

Nous ſommes du bonheur de nous meſme artiſans,
Et fabriquons nos jours ou faſcheux ou plaiſans.
La fortune eſt à nous, & n'eſt mauvaiſe ou bonne,
Que ſelon qu'on la forme ou bien qu'on ſe la donne (55).

Proſperity's the work of our own hand,
And life is white, or black, as we command.
Fortune is but the creature of our will,
As we are pleas'd to form her, good, or ill.

Mr de Cailliere, in his book of the Fortune of perſons of quality maintains: That our good or ill fortune depends on our conduct (56). He declares in his Epiſtle Dedicatory, that he deſigns to deſtroy the idols of Fortune, to demoliſh her temples and altars, and to rob her of the ſounder part of her adorers. Tho' Mr de Silhon ſays, that Fortune is a fantome which religion hath aboliſhed, and whoſe invention was not uſeleſs ſince the unhappy and imprudent attribute to her the cauſes of their miſery, and the effects of their ill conduct (57), yet I do not reckon him as one of the favourers of Plautus's maxim; for he did not pretend, that, in order to ſucceed in our undertakings, it is ſufficient to comport ourſelves in them according to the rules of prudence, and to have a good

(43) See the article CÆSAR, remark [H].

(44) Spanheim ſur les Cæſars de Julien, pag. 428, & 255.

(45) Juven. Sat. VII, ver. 197.

* Juven. Sat. XVI, ver. 4.

(46) Ælian. Div. Hiſt. lib. xii, cap. lx.

(47) Montagne, Eſſays, Tom. iv, lib. iii, ch. viii, pag. 198, 199. of the Hague edition 1727.

(48) Plautus, in Trinummo, Act ii, Sc. ii, ver. 80, pag. m. 741.

(49) Intituled Oratio I ad Cæſarem de ordinanda Republica.

(50) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Pomp. Attici, cap. xi.

(51) Id. ibid. cap. xix.

(52) Vexatur idem Theophraſtus & libris & ſcholis omnium philoſophorum, quod in Calliſthene ſuo laudaret illam ſententiam. Vitam regit fortuna non ſapientia. Cicero, Tuſculan. lib. v, folio 273, B.

(53) Juven. Sat. X, ver. 365. See alſo Sat. XIV, ver 315.

(54) See Don Secondo Lancilotti, in the book intituled Chi l'indovina e ſavio, pag. 231.

(55) Regnier, Sat. XIV, fol. m. 96, verſo.

(56) It is the title of the firſt chapter.

(57) Silhon, Miniſtre d'Etat, book i, ch. i, at the beginning.

imprudence. But it ought not to be expected that I ſhould do it by inconteſtable reaſons. It a good cauſe. He owns a proſperity and adverſity, diſpenſed by the providence of GOD, without any neceſſary regard to our intentions and meaſures. There appeared ſome time ago a very good book, intituled, Reflexions on what is called Good or Ill Luck in Lotteries (58). The author is undoubtedly of Plautus's opinion; or, to ſpeak plainer, he does not believe that the fortunate lots run for or againſt certain perſons with any ſort of diſtinction. It is not therefore a general opinion, that there is ſome unknown cauſe which favours or croſſes certain perſons without any regard to their good or ill qualities, or the meaſures they take to attain their ends. But we muſt own, that the greateſt number of ſuffrages is for the affirmative; however as that is no manner of proof of the truth of an opinion, I wiſh that ſome able pen would examine this ſubject to the bottom, and diſcuſs what could be ſaid on each ſide. I hope there will be ſome perſons found to undertake this taſk; in the mean time I will here offer a few reflexions.

I. I obſerve firſt of all, that we ought not to imagine that the Pagans repreſented fortune, as a being which blindly diſtributed good and evil, without knowing what ſhe did. They called her blind (59), I own; but that was not in order to deprive her abſolutely of all knowledge; it was only to ſignify that ſhe did not act with a juſt diſcernment. So we ſay a Prince is blind in the diſtribution of his favours, when he beſtows and takes them away by caprice, and without any reſpect to the merit of his ſubjects. We do not pretend to ſay, that he does good or ill to ſuch and ſuch, without knowing that he gives or takes away the reſpective place from the reſpective perſon. We only mean, that he doth not govern himſelf according to the rules of reaſon and juſtice, and that he is determined raſhly by the inſtigation of his inconſtant paſſions. This is the idea which the Heathens formed of fortune. They were all perſuaded, except a few Philoſophers, that the Divine Nature was a ſort of being divided into ſeveral individuals. They attributed to every god a large ſhare of power; but did not exempt them from the imperfections of our nature; they believed them ſuſceptible of anger and jealouſy, litterally ſpeaking; they made no ſcruple to affirm, in their moſt ſerious writings, that a malignant and ſecret envy of the gods oppoſed their proſperity (60). They more particularly attributed to the god which they called Fortune, a conduct which was inconſtant, raſh, and capricious to the laſt degree. It was for this reaſon that an infinite number of temples were built to her, and that ſhe was worſhipped in a particular manner, in order to prevent the ill effects of her caprices. They did not therefore believe that ſhe wanted either eyes, or ears, or thought. Thoſe Philoſophers who acknowledged the unity of the deity, called that divine being Fortune, when they conſidered it only as a diſtributer of good and evil things, which did not conform itſelf in the leaſt to what we call merit, conſtancy, or reaſon. But the wiſeſt of them always owned that it never acted contrary to abſolute juſtice, or without good reaſons, which it underſtood very well. After all, GOD himſelf ſays, That his ways are not our ways, and his thoughts are not our thoughts.

II. My ſecond reflexion is, that under the goſpel diſpenſation we atrribute, to earthly goods, all the defects which the Pagans aſcribed to the goddeſs Fortune. We ſay, that the poſſeſſion of them is no ſign of merit, that they are very fleeting and periſhable, and that they miſerably deceive thoſe who rely on them, &c. It is eaſy to obſerve the reaſon of this diverſity of language. The Chriſtians acknowledge only one God, and by that word they underſtand a nature infinitely perfect, which governs all things, and diſpenſes all events; but the Pagans laviſhed the name of God into an infinity of limited beings, imperfect, full of faults and vicious paſſions. For which reaſon they made no ſcruple to charge on them the irregularities of human life, when they could not diſcover the cauſe of them amongſt the free actions of men. The Chriſtians, on the contrary, impute to the creature whatever infirmity they meet with in the univerſe; they aſcribe to the nature of the benefit what the Pagans placed to the account of the benefactor.

III. I ſay, in the third place, that it can ſcarce be denied, that there are fortunate and unfortunate people, that is, according to the Pagan language, that there are ſome people who are made the ſport of fortune in the whole courſe of their affairs, whilſt there are others, whoſe way ſhe ſmooths, and takes care to ſhew them numberleſs inſtances of her favour. Merchandiſe, gaming, and the court, have always furniſhed examples of theſe two things; but nothing ſo manifeſtly confirms this as the military life. It is there Fortune rules more than any where elſe: our Timoleon, Alexander (61), Sylla, Cæſar, and ſeveral other antient warriors, have acknowledged it in the moſt authentic manner: the moderns confeſs it alſo both in their memoirs and converſations. I have been told by a perſon of quality, that the Conſtable Wrangel aſſured him, that nothing was more raſh than to hazard a battle, which was liable to be loſt by a thouſand unforeſeen accidents; tho' at the ſame time the moſt exact meaſures have been taken, which the moſt conſummate military prudence can ſuggeſt. Girard, Secretary to the Duke of Epernon, has ſhewn, in the long life he has written of that famous favourite, ſo many happy events independent on precaution, that it is hardly poſſible to deny the truth of the popular opinion concerning the fortune of ſome people. After this, ſays the Hiſtorian, we ought not to wonder if the Duke never complained of Fortune in the adverſity of his old age: on the contrary, ſome of his friends once talking on that ſubject, he told them that he ſhould be very ungrateful for the benefits with which Fortune had conſtantly favoured him for above ſixty years, if he ſhould be diſguſted at her leaving him for the ſmall time he had then to live; that he had ſcarce ever obſerved an entire life fortunate, tho' much ſhorter than his; and that in the inconſtant ſtate of human affairs, it was no ſmall advantage, that his diſgraces were reſerved to a time, when he was hardly any longer capable of reliſhing proſperity.

IV. My fourth reflexion is, that it ſeems very falſe, that what we call good fortune depends only on prudence; and that what we name ill fortune, is only the reſult of imprudence. I freely own, that the aſſertion of the author (62) above cited does not appear to me well grounded. It is not true that the winning gameſter always plays better than the loſer. It is not true that the Merchant who grows rich, always ſurpaſſes in the knowledge of trade, or induſtry, and circumſpection, thoſe who do not grow rich. No perſon is ignorant, that in thoſe games which depend on chance, there is ſomewhat which contributes more to loſing or winning, than whatever depends on the ſkill of the gameſters. There are days when a man wins large ſums: this is not owing to his playing with greater application, or with a more ignorant gameſter; but he has a good game, the very cards are dealt him which he wants, or the dice turn up according to his wiſhes. On other days he experiences the quite contrary. In the very ſame ſitting, he finds ſometimes the turn of fortune; he is lucky in the beginning, and unlucky at the end; he loſes in the laſt hour, more than he won in all the foregoing. There are men who immediately after they begin to play, perceive their good or ill luck, and finding that the day does not favour them, they are ſo wiſe as not to puſh any farther, and give out in good time. Not that they diſtruſt their addreſs and capacity, but they diſtruſt what doth not depend on their ſkill. This ſomewhat is not ſo apparent in trade; it is nevertheleſs certain, that perſons of mean capacity, and of very little judgment, ſometimes gain immenſe ſums by ſuch ſort of dealings, as thoſe of better underſtanding and greater experience would not run the hazard of engaging in. It may be affirmed in general, that thoſe who acquire the moſt riches by trade, are neither more intelligent, nor more induſtrious, than ſeveral others whoſe gain is leſs conſiderable. The latter therefore are not ſo much the favourites of Fortune as the former. Conſequently there is a good or ill fortune in human life, independent on prudence or imprudence. I do not believe the author I am at preſent examining, will deny this, ſo far as relates to play and commerce: he only had in view the fortune which people of quality may make in the ſervice of their prince. If he only intended to adviſe a gentleman to chuſe the prudent part, I have nothing to ſay againſt his opinion; but he goes much farther: he would perſuade us, that

(58) Printed at Amſterdam, 1696.

(59) Spargitque manu munera cæca pejora fovens. Seneca.

(60) Hinc ſive invidia Deum, ſive fato rapidiſſimus procurrentis imperii curſus parumper Gallorum Senonum incurſione ſupprimitur. Florus, lib. i, cap. xiii. Indignantium voces exaudiebantur tam viridem & in flore ætatis fortunæque invidia Deum ereptum eſſe rebus humanis (Alexandrum.) Q. Curtius, lib. x, cap. v.

(61) Rex juſſum confidere felicitati ſuæ remiſit, ſibi enim ad alia gloriam concedere Deos. Q. Curtius, lib. vii, cap. vii. Rex fortuna ſua & conſiliis ſuorum ſe uſurum eſſe reſpondet, nam & fortunam cui confidat & conſilium ſuadentium ne quid temere & audacter faciat ſequuturum. Id. ibid. cap. ix.

(62) Mr de Cailliere in his book de la Fortune des Gens de Qualité.

It is not poſſible in a ſubject of this nature to lead the reader to evidence, or demonſtration.

that thoſe who ſucceed, owe their advancement to their wiſe conduct only, and that thoſe who do not make their fortune, ought to impute it to their imprudence. This is what I cannot believe. I will allow him to call it wiſe conduct, whatever a man does to conform himſelf to the preſent circumſtances, as to be a braggadocio, a debauchee, a wag, a buffoon, &c. whenever it is the certain way to pleaſe; or to pretend to be mad, when without it he cannot eſcape imminent dangers (63). I allow every thing to be called imprudence, which is contrary to the humour of the preſent times; as to be a very honeſt man in a depraved court, where there is nothing to be got by any but raſcals. Notwithſtanding all this, I cannot help maintaining my aſſertion, that the riſe and fall of great men are not commonly the meer effects of prudence or imprudence. Chance, precarious accidents, and fortune, juſtly claim a large ſhare. Some occurrences which we neither contrived nor foreſaw, diſcover the way, and make us haſten our pace. A caprice, a jealouſy, which it was impoſſible to foreſee, ſtops us ſhort all of a ſudden, and throws us entirely out of the way.

V. The better to refute Mr de Cailliere, I muſt add here a fifth reflexion. We muſt not affirm, that all events being connected with a determinate cauſe, fortune is a chimerical being, and ſo that we are no otherwiſe fortunate or unfortunate, but as we foreſee, or do not foreſee the chain of natural cauſes and effects. To ſhew the nullity of this objection, I will ſuppoſe a fact not only very poſſible, but which may alſo be proved by ſome examples. A Prince cauſes a town to be beſieged in the middle of winter: if rain, ſnow, or ice, come upon him, he is not likely to take it; but if the weather be dry, and the cold moderate, he will take it. There follows ſeveral ſucceſſive weeks of fine weather; no rain, no ſnow: the ſiege advances daily, and the town capitulates before the froſt comes. Another Prince beſieges a place in the middle of ſummer, and is likely to take it if the ſeaſon keeps it's ordinary courſe; but if it rains hard for ſeveral days, if the nights are cold, if this occaſions ſeveral diſtempers in the camp, he will not be able to take it. There happens a reverſe of ſeaſons, the ſummer is cold and rainy, the trenches advance but ſlowly, the army grows weaker daily by the diſeaſes which this unſeaſonable weather produces, he finds himſelf forced to raiſe the ſiege. Can you poſſibly aſcribe the happy ſucceſs of the firſt ſiege to prudence, or the ill ſucceſs of the ſecond to imprudence? This would be aſſerting two abſurdities; for in the firſt caſe, there was no foreſeeing the fine weather, nor the ill weather in the latter; and conſequently there was no prudence in attempting the firſt ſiege, nor imprudence in undertaking the latter. It is therefore purely owing to good fortune that the firſt ſucceeded, as it is to be aſcribed to ill luck that the latter miſcarried. I know very well, that if men could foreſee rain and fair weather, it would have been an act of imprudence to have formed the latter ſiege. The ill ſucceſs in that caſe would have been a great fault, and not a misfortune; but human foreſight does not extend ſo far, and if we are ignorant that the ſummer will prove rainy, it is not owing to imprudence. There are a hundred fortuitous accidents, which we can no more foreſee than theſe, that are equally capable of diſappointing the beſt concerted military enterprizes. Now as ſome Generals are much more frequently perplexed with theſe croſs occurrences than others, we may reaſonably acquieſce in the popular opinion, that there are fortunate and unfortunate Generals. But we muſt not hence infer, that the fortunate are always, or almoſt always, as prudent as the unfortunate. On the contrary, we muſt believe that the latter ſometimes ſurpaſs the former both in prudence and valour (64). Conſult Forſtnerus, in his notes on a paſſage of Tacitus, wherein that Hiſtorian aſſures us, that all human affairs are a continual ſport (65). This commentator will give ſeveral illuſtrious examples, which prove that the beſt concerted deſigns in this world are confounded by an inviſible force, which human prudence cannot guard againſt: this is particularly obſervable in the conclaves (66). And as for thoſe who pretend that every perſon is the author of his own fortune, you may find them ſolidly and amply confuted in a book of Don Lancelotti (67).

Obſerve carefully what I am going to ſay. Princes commonly judge of things by the ſucceſs. A General ſtands very well in their favour who ſucceeds in a military enterprize; but if the contrary happens, he forfeits their eſteem and friendſhip. Even when they are ſenſible, that the victory was barely a piece of good fortune, and the defeat was not in the leaſt owing to any fault of the General, they are always more diſpoſed to prefer the victor than the vanquiſhed; for with them to be fortunate is a recommendatory character, as, on the other ſide, an unfortunate, tho' ſhining merit, is but a diſagreeable quality. Since therefore battles are loſt and won by unforeſeen accidents, it is clear that misfortunes happen independently on imprudence, and that ſome make their fortune independently on prudence. A lucky raſhneſs, you will tell me doth not deſerve the name of temerity; for ſince it has ſucceeded, it is a ſign that it was proper to produce it's wiſhed effect. Now wherein does prudence conſiſt? Is it not in making uſe of proper means to accompliſh our deſigns? My anſwer is, that to act prudently, we ought to know that the means we uſe are proportioned to the end. A raſh fortunate man is unacquainted with this proportion; he is hurried on by an impetuous fury; there appears nothing in his conduct but what is to be met with in that of the raſh unfortunate; and therefore the ſucceſs of the enterprize ought not to be aſcribed to prudence but to fortune. Obſerve alſo another thing; it is no manner of imprudence not to be precautioned againſt thoſe things which human capacity cannot diſcover, and conſequently if a perſon doth not ſucceed at court, or if he loſes the fortune he has already made, it is not always to be attributed to imprudence. Is it poſſible for him to diſcover all the caprices, diſguſts and jealouſies that ariſe in the mind either of a monarch, or of his miſtreſſes or favourites? Can he diſcover all the grimaces of falſe friends, obviate their calumnies, and prevent their lies and falſe reports which wound without threatening. This was the confeſſion of a great miniſter, whoſe genius was not leſs than his anthority. In the poſt which you are in, ſaid Cardinal Richelieu to a Captain of the guards (68), it is eaſy for you know your friends and your enemies. No diſguiſe can conceal them from your diſcernment; but with reſpect to mine, in the poſt which I hold, I cannot penetrate into their ſentiments, they all ſpeak to me in the ſame language. They all make the ſame earneſt court to me, and thoſe who would ruin me, give me as great marks of amity, as thoſe who are ſincerely attached to my intereſts (69); Regnier, in the ſatire already cited, tells us:

La faveur eſt bizarre, à traicter indocile,
Sans arreſt, inconſtante & d'humeur difficile,
Avecq' diſcretion il la faut careſſer,
L'un la per bien ſouvent pour la trop embraſſer,
Ou pour s'y fier trop, l'autre par inſolence,
Ou pour avoir trop peu ou trop de violence,
Ou pour ſe la promettre ou ſe la denier,
Enfin c'eſt un caprice étrange à manier,
Son amour eſt fragile & ſe rompt comme verre,
Et fait aux plus matois donner du nez en terre (70).

Moſt fickle is the favour of the great,
Unſteady, whimſical, and ſtrange to treat.
Men ne'er can be enough upon their guard,
Some loſe her by careſſing her too hard;
Some by dependence; ſome by inſolence;
Some by too much, or little violence;
Some by preſumption, ſome by ſelf-denial;
In ſhort, ſhe'll balk your ſkill on ev'ry trial.
Brittle as glaſs itſelf, ſhe's quickly broke;
Nor can the wiſeſt ward the fatal ſtroke.

VI. Let us then take it for granted, which is my ſixth reflexion, that the prudence of a man is not the ſole nor even the principal cauſe of his fortune. There

(63) Inſipiens eſto, quum tempus poſtulat, aut res: Stultitiam ſimulare loco, prudentia ſumma eſt. Cato, Diſt. xix, lib. ii. David, and Brutus, and ſeveral others have been the better for ſuch a conduct. See Cornelius à Lapide in lib. i, Regum, cap. xxi.

(64) One may ſay of ſeveral great captains, what Florus ſaid of Sertorius, lib. iii, cap. xxii, vir ſummæ quidem ſed calamitoſæ virtutis.

(65) Mihi quanto plura recentium ſeu veterum revolvo, tanto magis ludibria rerum mortalium cunctis in negotiis obſervantur. Tacit. Annal. lib. iii, cap. xviii.

(66) See the Melanges de Vigneul Marville, Vol. ii, pag. 330, 331, of the Dutch edition. See above citation (16), of the article ANTONIANO.

(67) It is intituled Chi l'indovina e Savio, overo la Prudenza humana fallaciſſima: The author refutes in the third Diſganno of the ſecond book the Oration of Galeotto de gli Oddi.

(68) Mr de Fabert, who was Marſhal of France.

(69) Hiſtoire du Maréchal de Fabert, pag. 53.

(70) Regnier, Satire XIV, fol. 96.

tion. We find at moſt only ſtrong probabilities in it; and it is no ſmall objection againſt

There are ſome fortunate people, whoſe conduct is very imprudent: and others unfortunate, tho' their conduct is prudent. The difficulty is to know what this fortune is, which favours ſome people and perſecutes others, without regard to their merit or the meaſures they take. To recur to God, is not to remove the difficulty; for acknowledging him the general cauſe of all things, it will be aſked whether he directs immediately, and by particular acts of his will, all thoſe unforeſeen occurrences which cauſe the deſigns of one man to ſucceed, and confound the enterprizes of another. If you anſwer in the affirmative you will bring all the philoſophers, eſpecially the Carteſians on your back, who will maintain that you attribute ſuch a conduct to the Supreme Being, as is inconſiſtent with an infinite agent. He ought, they will tell you, to eſtabliſh a few general laws, and by this means produce an infinite variety of events, without recurring every moment to exceptions, or particular acts, which muſt needs be miracles, tho' we ſhould not call them ſo, by reaſon they would be ſo frequent (71). You may indeed reply to them, that the occurrences favourable to the fortunate, and contrary to the unfortunate, are a natural conſequence of general laws; but they will not eaſily believe you. You will never be able to perſuade me, that chance can produce what I am about to ſay. Let an hundred tickets well ſealed be ranged in order on a table; Let ten of them be blanks, and ten of them marked with the letter A, and write a ſentence on all the reſt; then let ten men be called in, and one of them directed to take up the 1, the 15, the 21, the 37, the 44, the 68, the 80, the 83, the 90, and the 99. Let another be ordered to take the 3, the 6, the 13, the 25, the 50, the 73, the 88, the 89, the 95, and the 100. Tell me, I pray, if the firſt of theſe men draws the ten blank tickets, and the other the ten marked A, can you ever hope to perſuade me that this was the reſult of the general laws of the communication of motion? Do you not perceive your ſelf that theſe twenty tickets were placed in ſuch an order, that one half of them by a premeditated deſign, ſhould fall entirely into the hands of the firſt of theſe ten men, and the other into the hands of the ſecond? I ſay alſo, that ſuppoſing certain gameſters had always, or almoſt always the beſt cards, (72) or in general, that certain perſons are almoſt always favoured by accidental occurrences; this would require ſomething beſides the natural reſult of the communication of motion, this muſt proceed from a particular direction and determination; and I ſhould rather chooſe with ſeveral learned men to deny the diſtinction of good or ill fortune, than to explain it only by the general laws of nature. But we argue here on the hypotheſis, that there are fortunate and unfortunate people.

Cannot we recur to occaſional cauſes, I mean, to the deſires of ſome created ſpirits? Platoniſm might eaſily be brought to favour ſuch an explication; but it is oppoſed by ſtrong arguments, according to the idea which Theology gives us of the angelical nature. This teaches us that the angels are ſome of them perfectly good, and others extremely wicked, and both endowed with an almoſt unlimited knowledge, under the general direction of God. This idea cannot eaſily be reconciled to the particular train of fortunate or unfortunate occurrences. But confining our ſelves to hypotheſes purely philoſophical, we ſhall be better able to anſwer theſe objections, if we ſuppoſe for example, that the inviſible ſpirits (73) are more different from one another, than men are amongſt themſelves; that there is a great ſubordination amongſt theſe ſpirits; that there are ſome who are ſometimes good and ſometimes evil, ſometimes in a good humour, and ſometimes in an ill one; that they are fantaſtical, inconſtant, jealous, envious, that they thwart one another, that their power is very much limited in certain reſpects, and that if they can perform a thing which is very difficult, it does not hence follow that they can accompliſh a thing which is much eaſier. Do not we ſee country-women ignorant of the alphabet, who know a thouſand excellent ſecrets to cure diſeaſes? Archimedes who invented ſuch admirable engines, could he ſow? could he ſpin? However it be, there is no fortune without the direction of an intelligent cauſe, and I cannot be ſufficiently ſurprized that a learned man ſhould venture to ſay, that Fortune was neither God, nor nature, nor underſtanding, or reaſon, but a certain natural and irrational impulſe (74). ‘Licet diſputatum ſit, fortunam à natura prorſus eſſe aliam, non defuere tamen, qui aſſererent, etſi à naturæ moribus, inſtitutiſque longe plurimum fortuna abhorreat, ſitque ipſa inconſtans admodum, & lubrica, non continua, non eadem ubique, non eorundem ſemper effectrix, non ſimileis ſibi retinens progreſſiones, non diſcriminata ſervans tempora, denique improvida ſit, repentina, inordinata, temeraria, qui ſive mores, ſive impulſus, neque naturæ conveniant, neque rationi, quarum utriuſque propria ſit conſtantia, maturitas, ordo, menſura, regula, diſcriminatio item rerum, temporum effectuum, non inquam defuere, fortunam qui aſſerant, irrationalem quandam eſſe naturam, nec aliud illam denique, quam naturæ impetum quendam, hoc eſt ratione carentem agitationem naturæ quandam, in iis ipſis videlicet, quæ nec rationi ſubjiciantur naturæ, neque hominum electionibus, ac conſiliis. Impetum itaque eſſe eam cenſent, quod ſit abſque ratione, feraturque ſuopte tantum agitatu, atque impulſu, quodque ubi impetus dominetur; illic rationi nullus omnino relictus ſit locus, nulla prorſus authoritas, aut penſitatio earum quæ gerantur rerum (75). - - - - Though it is diſputed, that fortune is intirely diſtinct from nature, yet there have been ſome who aſſert, that notwithſtanding fortune is very far from being reconcileable to the methods and laws of nature, being ſo remarkably inconſtant, fickle, unſteady, various, producing different effects, never obſerving the ſame meaſures, or any certain ſeaſons; laſtly improvident, ſudden, impetuous, raſh, which whether they be rules or impulſes, are neither agreeable to nature nor reaſon, to both of which belong conſtancy, perfection, order, meaſure, regularity, and a diſtinction of things, ſeaſons, and effects; there have been ſome, I ſay, who aſſert that fortune is a certain irrational nature, and nothing elſe but a certain impulſe of nature, that is, a certain natural agitation void of reaſon, namely in thoſe things that are neither ſubject to natural reaſon, nor to human choice or deſigns! They hold therefore that it is an impulſe, that it is exerted without reaſon, and carried by its own ſpontaneous directions and power, and that where this impulſe preſides there can be no room left for reaſon, no influence at all, nor conſideration about what is to be done.’ Perhaps you would gladly be informed for what reaſons he deprives God and nature of the acts of Fortune: wherefore, ſince his works are ſomewhat ſcarce, I will here inſert what he has ſaid on this head. ‘Fortunam non eſſe Deum, - - - That fortune is not God,’ Is the title of one of his chapters: and this is what he ſays in that chapter. ‘Quomodo enim Deus erit, ſi hæc tam ſæpe, tam inconſiderate, tam etiam inique, atque ex inopinato extollit ignavos, locupletat immeritos, vexat, atque affligit, inſontes, bonos in calamitatem adducit, ac ſervitutem, pravos ſtatuit in ſolio, liberat à periculis perverſos, moderatos, & honeſtos viros laboribus periculis ærumnis, ac miſeriis conficit? Tyrannorum hæc ſunt non Dei, cujus eſt ſumma bonitas, abſoluta juſtitia, rectiſſimum judicium, æquiſſima rerum omnium diſpenſatio (76). - - - - For how can ſhe be God, when ſhe ſo frequently, ſo inconſiderately, and ſo unjuſtly, and ſuddenly advances the lazy, inriches the undeſerving, vexes and afflicts the innocent, brings the good into calamity and ſlavery, fixes the wicked on a throne, delivers the perverſe from perils, and throws the temperate and juſt into difficulties, dangers, troubles, and miſeries? Theſe are the acts of tyrants, not of God, whoſe goodneſs is infinite, juſtice abſolute, judgment impartial, and diſpenſation of all things moſt equitable.’ The following chapter intituled ‘Fortunam non eſſe naturam, - - - That fortune is not nature,’ amongſt other things contains the following words: ‘Naturam quoque non eſſe eam hæc ipſa liquido ſatis docent, quod fortuna ipſa quidem inconſtans eſt, inordinata, varia, repentina, incerta. Contra vero quid natura ipſa ordinatius, conſtantius, certius? cujus is eſt ordo, ea lex, ac regula, ut non, niſi certis, conſtitutiſque è principiis ſuo tempore, ſuis progreſſionibus, menſuriſque tum univerſa proveniant, tum etiam ſingula quarumcunque ipſa rerum, effectionum, operum author eſt & cauſa.

‘Pergit

(71) There are ſome other objections taken from morality which may be ſeen hereafter in Pontanus's words. See alſo the Réflexions ſur le Bonheur & Malheur des Loteries, ch. viii, pag. 92, & ſeq.

(72) Take notice of this clauſe; for even if there was no providence, but only a fortuitous effuſion of good and evil throughout the univerſe, it muſt happen that ſome men would find themſelves in happy circumſtances, and others the contrary. See the article MAHOMET II, remark [F].

(73) I call them ſo in oppoſition to human ſouls, which are ſpirits united to ſenſible bodies.

(74) Jovianus Pontanus, de Fortuna, lib. i, fol. m. 129, & ſeq.

(75) Id. ibid. fol. 150 verſo, & fol. 151.

(76) Id. ibid. fol. 129.

againſt the opinion I defend, that Cardinal Richelieu, whoſe abilities were ſurpriſing, would ‘ Pergit natura ordine ſuo, graditur ſuis paſſibus, ‘ diſpenſat actiones ſuas cum temporibus, viribus, ‘ opibuſque ſuis utitur cum menſura, & penſo, non ‘ fluitat, non nutat, ſtabilis eſt in officio ſuo, ſibique ‘ ſemper conſtat (77.) - - - - That ſhe is not nature will ‘ alſo appear from hence, that fortune is inconſtant, in‘ordinate, various, ſudden, uncertain. On the con‘trary, what is more orderly, conſtant, and certain ‘ than nature? Since ſhe obſerves ſuch order, law, and ‘ rule, that not only univerſals but particulars alſo, ‘ among all the things, effects, and works, whereof ſhe ‘ is the author, are produced from certain principles, in ‘ certain ſeaſons, and by certain progreſſions, and mea‘ſures. Nature proceeds in her own method, purſues her ‘ own ſteps, diſpenſes her own acts with regard to ſea‘ſons, exerts her powers and faculties with weight ‘ and meaſure, ſhe never fluctuates, ſhe never nods, ſhe ‘ is ſteady in her duty, and always conſiſtent with her ‘ ſelf.’ See the margin (78).

VII. My laſt reflexion is, that men uſually are exceſſive in their murmurs againſt Fortune; for very often they impute to her what they ought to charge on their own imprudence. Homer was not ignorant of this fault, for he introduces the gods complaining of this injuſtice of men. Read theſe words in Aulus Gellius (79): ‘ Propterea negat (Chryſippus) oportere ‘ ferri audirique homines aut nequam aut ignavos & ‘ nocentes & audaces; qui, cum in culpa & in male‘ficio revicti ſunt, perfugiunt ad fati neceſſitatem, tam‘quam in aliquod Fati aſylum; &, quæ peſſimè fece‘runt, ea non ſua temeritati ſed fato eſſe attribuenda ‘ dicunt. Primus autem Homerus ſapientiſſimus & an‘tiquiſſimus poetarum dixit in hiſce verſibus?

Ω πόποι, οἷον δή νυ θεὺς βροτοὶ αἰτιόωνται.
Εξ ἡμέων γὰρ φασὶ κάκ᾽ ἔμμεναι. οἱ δὲ καὶ αὐτοι
Σφῇσιν ἀτασθαλίῃσιν ὑπὲρ μόρον ἄλγε᾽ ἔχουσιν (80).

‘ Therefore Chryſippus denied that there was an en‘couragement to be given to thoſe men, whether worthleſs ‘ and idle, or wicked and impudent, who, being found ‘ guilty of a fault or crime, fly immediately to the ‘ neceſſity of fate, as to ſome aſylum; and aſcribe the worſt ‘ act they can commit, not to their own ill conduct but ‘ to Fate. This was firſt obſerved by Homer, the wiſeſt ‘ as well as oldeſt of the poets, in theſe verſes.

Perverſe mankind! whoſe wills, created free,
Charge all their woes on abſolute decree;
All to the dooming gods their guilt tranſlate,
And follies are miſcall'd the crimes of fate.
Mr POPE.

Theſe three Greek verſes are taken from the firſt book of the Odyſſey, and ſignify in Latin.

Papæ, quomodo jam Deos mortales culpant
Ex nobis enim inquiunt mala eſſe: at illi ipſi
Ob ſua ſcelera præter fatum dolores patiuntur.

La Fontaine hath ingeniouſly deſcribed the ſame injuſtice; you will find his thoughts and ſeveral others in the book which I quote (81). But may it not be pretended, that, on ſeveral occaſions, the perſon who is unhappy by his own fault, has not a leſs right to complain of fortune, than the unfortunate who has punctually diſcharged his duty? May we not ſay that this power, which we call Fortune, occaſions miſery two ways? She ſometimes permits a man to uſe all the means which prudence can ſuggeſt, and yet deprives him of the ſucceſs he ought to expect; ſhe pleaſes her ſelf with this, in order to ſhew her ſuperiority, and the inſufficiency of our reaſon and of human wiſdom. Sometimes alſo ſhe plunges men into miſery, by obſtructing their uſe of the means which might have preſerved them from it: ſhe confounds their judgment, and hurries them on to irreparable miſtakes. It was probably thus that ſhe irretrievably ruined the affair of Pompey. She had declared for Julius Cæſar, and procured him the triumph, by allowing him to act agreeably to all the qualifications of a great commander, and by eclipſing in Pompey's ſoul thoſe eminent qualities which he poſſeſſed. They did not appear at the battle of Pharſalia; Pompey there ſhewed himſelf a weak man, and an unſkilful General. Was not this eclipſe ſupernatural? Was it not the influence of ſome ſuperior force, which had deſigned to raiſe Cæſar on the ruins of his competitor? Velleius Paterculus declares that when the deſtinies are reſolved to ruin a man, they deprive him of prudence (82): ‘ Sed pro‘fecto ineluctabilis fatorum vis cujuſcunque fortunam ‘ mutare conſtituit, conſilia corrumpit... (83) ſed præ‘valebant jam fata conſiliis omnemque animi ejus (84) ‘ aciem præſtrinxerant. Quippe ita ſe res habet, ut ‘ plerumque fortunam mutaturus Deus, conſilia cor‘rumpat, efficiatque, quod miſerrimum eſt, ut quod ‘ accidit, id etiam merito accidiſſe videatur, & caſus ‘ in culpam tranſeant. - - - - But indeed the irreſiſtible ‘ power of fate deſigns a reverſe of fortune, and corrupts ‘ their counſels: .... But now fate over-ruled their ‘ counſels, and clouded their underſtandings. For ſo it is, ‘ that when God intends a reverſe of fortune, he gene‘rally corrupts human counſels, and ſo orders it, which ‘ is the moſt miſerable circumſtance, that what happens ‘ ſhall ſeem to have happened deſervedly, and that the ‘ accident ſhall be conſtrued into a fault.’ The ſentiment of this grave Hiſtorian was very common amongſt the Pagans; and every day we uſe this ſaying as a proverb, ‘ quos Jupiter vult perdere de‘mentat. - - - - Thoſe whom Jupiter marks out for de‘ſtruction, he firſt deprives of their underſtanding.’ A certain writer being to prove that it is poſſible for two authors to expreſs the ſame thought without borrowing from one another (85), cites Philip de Commines, who without ever hearing of Paterculus's name, yet ſaid, as well as he, that when God begins to chaſtize princes, he firſt leſſens their ſenſe, and makes them avoid the counſels and company of the wiſe. I ſhall cite an excellent paſſage of Ammianus Marcellinus: ‘ Ut ſolent manum ‘ injectantibus fatis hebetari ſenſus hominum & ob‘tundi, his illecebris ad meliorum exſpectationem ‘ erectus, egreſſuſque Antiochiâ numine lævo duc‘tante, prorſus ire tendebat de fumo, ut proverbium ‘ loquitur vetus, ad flammam (86). - - - - As mens ſenſes ‘ uſe to be clouded and ſtupified by the controuling power ‘ of fate, being encouraged by theſe inducements to hope for ‘ better things, and going out of Antioch under the con‘duct of his evil genius, he went as the proverb ſays, ‘ out of the ſmoke into the fire.’ A little after ſpeaking of Nemeſis, he tells us that ſhe turns men out of their way, and perverts the ends and deſigns of men: ‘ Hæc ut regina cauſarum & arbitra rerum ac diſcepta‘trix, urnam ſortium temperat, accidentium vices ‘ alternans: voluntatumque noſtrarum exorſa interdum ‘ alio, quàm quo contendebant, exitu terminans, mul‘tiplices actus permutando convolvit (87). - - - She, as ‘ queen, arbiter and diſpoſer of cauſes and things, pre‘ſides over the turn of lots, varying accidents at her ‘ pleaſure: and terminating very often what our wills ‘ had begun, with a concluſion quite different from that ‘ to which they were directed, makes a ſtrange jumble ‘ and confuſion in things.’ She does not always effect this by error, ſhe ſometimes makes uſe of mere ignorance. What I call error is that falſe judgment which our mind makes of things, in comparing them together, and chooſing the worſt: and I call that ignorance, when a man is in ſuch a ſtate, that the neceſſary ideas do not offer themſelves to his imagination. Now when he takes the wrong ſide, either by rejecting the proper means actually preſent to his mind, or by reaſon of the abſence of thoſe ideas, which ought to have preſented thoſe means to him, he paſſes for imprudent; but it is certain, that in the firſt caſe imprudence is more voluntary than in the ſecond, and conſequently more to be condemned. Several philoſophers aſſert, that what is called pure omiſſion is never free. Who would venture to maintain that we are maſters of our memory, and that it is a moral fault not to remember certain things upon any occaſion when we want to remember them to conduct us in our deliberations? Thoſe who acknowledge the empire of Fortune, would, I think, be unreaſonable, if they ſuppoſed that ſhe doth not influence our forgetfulneſs or omiſſions: for, on the contrary, it is by them that ſhe frequently occaſions our ill ſucceſs. She removes thoſe ideas which would naturally occur to us, and hinder our committing faults. How often has it happened that a man of judgment has very much prejudiced himſelf by the anſwers he has made to ſeveral queſtions propoſed

(77) Id. ibid.

(78) Jerome Garimberto, who lived in the XVIth century, wrote in Italian a treatiſe della Fortuna, wherein he maintains in the tenth chapter of the firſt book che la fortuna è un impeto naturale privo di ragione ne gli huomini; - - That Fortune is a natural impulſe void of reaſon, and in the next chapter, that a man is happy, when he is led by a natural inſtinct to a thing, which he does not foreſee, and without any ſhew of reaſon.

(79) Aulus Gellius, lib. vi, cap. ii, pag. m. 171.

(80) Homer. Odyſſ. lib i, ver. 32.

(81) Réflexions ſur ce que l'on apelle bonheur & Malheur en matiere de Loteries, ch. vi, pag. 79, & ſeq. See alſo Regnier, ubi ſupra, fol. 96 verſo.

(82) Velleius Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. lvii.

(83) Id. ibid. cap. cxviii.

(84) That is, of Quintilius Varus.

(85) Ogier, Apologie pour Balzac, pag. 34.

(86) Amm. Marcell. lib. xiv, cap. xi, pag. m. 55.

(87) Id. ibid. pag. 59.

would not allow any other cauſe of unhappineſs beſides imprudence [L].

propoſed to him? All thoſe to whom he relates the queſtions, aſk why he did not make ſuch an anſwer? He is immediately convinced that he ſhould have done it. He owns it; he is ſurprized that he did not think of it; he proteſts that on all other occaſions this idea muſt neceſſarily have occurred to him, ſo natural does he find it, ſo eaſy, and exactly conformable to common ſenſe. Nevertheleſs, he is convinced that he did not in the leaſt think of it, and that even the moſt confuſed notion of it never reached his thoughts. Why will you not allow him to believe that his ill fortune preſided over this forgetfulneſs, and purpoſely directed it? Our divines do not deny that providence ſometimes blinds men, with reſpect to omiſſions, as well as with regard to actual judgment. Plutarch would never allow this doctrine, for he very ſtrongly recommends to thoſe who read the poets, the rectifying of all thoſe paſſages which repreſent the gods deceiving us, and inſtigating us to evil. He particularly warns us of theſe verſes in Euripides (88), thus tranſlated by Amyot:

Les Dieux puiſſans trop plus que nous ne ſommes,
Vont abuſant nous autres povres hommes
Par pluſieurs tours de ruſe trompereſſe.

The gods, whoſe nature pow'r ſuperior knows,
By various frauds on man's weak mind impoſe.

He is ſo far from owning that a divine power influences us to chooſe the wrong way, while at the ſame time we know the right way, that he would have us aſcribe it to a brutal paſſion.

Αἶ αἶ τόδ' ἤδη θεῖον ἀνθρώποις κακὸν,
Ὅ τάν τις εἰδῇ ταγαθὸν, χρῆται δὲ μή.

θηριῶδες μὲν ὂν, καὶ ἄλογον, καὶ οἰκτρὸν, εἰδότα τὸ βέλτιον, ὑπὸ τοῦ χείρονος ἐξ ἀκρασίας καὶ μαλακίας ἄγεσθαι.

Eheu, malum mortalibus divinitus
Venit, ut bonum videant, non utantur tamen:

Immò verò belluinum, non divinum eſt hoc malum, & brutum ac miſerabile, melius videntem intemperantia & molitie ad deterius rapi (89).

Alas! From heav'n to man all ill enſues,
We ſee the good, but want the pow'r to chuſe.

So far is this from being true, that evil is beaſtly, brutiſh, and wretched, inſtead of heavenly, and it is our intemperance and folly that hurry us away to ill, while the good is full in our view. But how ſolid ſoever theſe reflexions of Plutarch may be in ſome reſpects, we ought always to remember, that our Theology, and the univerſal language of all Chriſtians, founded on all paſſages of holy writ, lay it down as a certain truth, that the blindneſs of man, his raſhneſs, folly, and cowardice, are frequently the effect of a particular providence, which inflicts them on him as a puniſhment; and that his prudence, his wiſe anſwers to queſtions, his reſolution, and his underſtanding are favours inſpired by providence, in order to his preſervation and proſperity. The heathens were not ignorant of this doctrine; for we find that Manlius declared to the Roman citizens, that if the gods prevented his ruin, it would not be by deſcending on earth, but by inſpiring the Romans with a wiſe reſolution, as they had inſpired him with that valour and courage which ſaved the Republic: 'Benè facitis quòd abominamini; dii 'prohihebunt hæc: ſed nunquam propter me de cœlo 'deſcendent: vobis dent mentem oportet, ut prohibeatis: ſicut mihi dederunt armato togatoque, ut 'vos à barbaris hoſtibus, à ſuperbis defenderem civibus '(90). - - - - You do well in declaring your abhorrence: 'the gods will prevent theſe meaſures; but they will 'never deſcend from heaven for my ſake: let them give 'you the courage to prevent them; as they did me, both 'armed and unarmed, to preſerve you from barbarian 'enemies, and haughty fellow-citizens.'

I cannot conclude without obſerving, that if on the one ſide, we call that ill fortune, which is ſometimes the natural conſequence of imprudence; on the other ſide, we name that good fortune, which is ſometimes the reſult of prudence. We have ſeen ſome men ſo raſh in their conduct, that there was no room to doubt but that it would end in ſome cruel mortification; they attacked and fell foul of all the world, and if the firſt engagement diſcovered them to be wrong-headed, the following were only a long train of raſh, irregular and violent ſallies. According to all rules, theſe men ought to have been ſhamefully cruſhed, and nevertheleſs we have ſeen them triumph, or at leaſt retire from the battle without any mark of diſhonour. This is a great piece of good fortune, ſay ſome. But it is certain that ſome ſtratagem, ſome refined ſtroke of policy, had a greater ſhare in this good ſucceſs than fortune. Theſe pretended raſh men had taken their meaſures long before hand, with a great deal of prudence; they had rendred themſelves neceſſary to thoſe who were capable of extricating them out of every embaraſſment. They had found the ſecret of being ſubſervient either to their private pleaſures or ambition. The circumſtances of the times favoured them; the trade of directing ſpies or ſome other ſecret ſervice was of extraordinary uſe. They were ſure of ſucceeding in their unreaſonable quarrels; they did not therefore act raſhly.

[L] Cardinal Richelieu . . . . . would not allow any other cauſe of unhappineſs than imprudence.] Mr Auberi informs us of this particular. He ſays that Cardinal Richelieu, and the Duke d'Olivarez two prime Miniſters, the one of France, the other of Spain, were rivals and antagoniſts, (91) that their power was much of an equal duration; that they were compared to two ſtars of the firſt, or at leaſt of the ſecond, magnitude; which drew on them the eyes, the eſteem, and admiration, of all Chriſtendom. That the Cardinal was firſt eclipſed by a natural death, the 4*th of December* 1642. And that the other enjoyed the advantage of ſhining alone, not above five or ſix weeks, being diſgraced the 17*th of January* 1643. The motive or pretext of his diſgrace, was the ill ſucceſs which accompanied all his enterprizes. This was in effect accuſing him of imprudence. In Cardinal Richelieu's opinion, imprudent and unfortunate are but two words to expreſs the ſame thing (92). Thus he willingly put in practice one of his moſt conſtant maxims which was, to give it you in his own terms (93), 'That in ſtate-affairs it is impoſſible to be 'over-cautious, or to look out for too great ſecurity. 'That a ſtateſman, if he can, ought always to have 'two ſtrings to his bow; that to ſucceed he ought not 'to take too exact meaſures, but that in order to do 'much, he ought to exert himſelf, and make preparation for doing yet more: that in a word, in all important affairs, if he did not take thoſe meaſures 'which ſeemed too extenſive in Theory, he would always 'find them too ſhort in Practice.' It is hard to believe, that the Cardinal, on occaſion of the failure of ſucceſs in ſome of his enterprizes, never acknowledged that he had, notwithſtanding, taken all thoſe meaſures which prudence could ſuggeſt. If therefore on ſuch occaſions he thought himſelf guilty of ſome imprudence, he extended the idea of prudence beyond its true bounds; for if he believed that thoſe, who truſt a man who deceives them, are imprudent, he ſuppoſed prudence to comprehend the certainty of events which depend on free-will. But that is a palpable error. There are perſons who have given ſo many ſucceſſive proofs of their fidelity, and in ſo ſignal a manner that one may truſt them in an important affair, without the leaſt ſhadow of imprudence. And yet they diſcharge their duty very ill, they begin their treachery on this occaſion, and betray their truſt. It would be requiring a more than human knowledge from a prime Miniſter, to pretend that he has raſhly and imprudently relied on this man (94), that it is not his miſfortune but his fault if the affair has miſcarried, ſince he ought to have been aware of the inward change of this perſon. You ſee then that this queſtion is liable to ſeveral equivocations or diſputes about words. The ill fortune of an enterprize is always attended with ſome want of knowledge. If indeed you call this imprudence, and will argue in conſequence of this definition, you may fully and without reſerve maintain Cardinal Richelieu's poſition; but your definition will be falſe, and at the bottom you will agree with your adverſary.

(88) Πολλαῖσι μορφαῖς οἱ θεοὶ σοφισμάτων σφάλλουσιν ἡμᾶς κρείττονες πεφυκότες. Multis dii formis homines ſophiſmatum quod his potentia præſtant in fraudem agunt. Euripides, apud Plutarchum de audiendis Poëtis, pag. 20, 21.

(89) Id. ibid. pag. 33, E.

(90) Titus Livius, lib. vi, pag. m. 176.

(91) Auberi, Hiſtoire du Cardinal Mazarin. livr. i, p. 100.

(92) This is very different from the opinion of Garimberto, who maintained, della Fortuna, cap. xviii, that he who acts according to prudence, ought not to be called a fortunate man; and cap. xix, that no perſon is fortunate either by art, or prudence, or the favour of God, but by a natural impetuoſity raiſed in the ſoul; and cap. iii, iv, lib. iv, that fortune favours the bold, and is a friend to the preſumptuous, and very often to the raſh. See, above remark [K] of the article CHARLES V.

(93) See the ſame Auberi, Hiſt. du Cardin. de Richelieu, livr. vii, cap. iv, pag. m. 383.

(94) Compare what is ſaid above, remark [K], num. v.

TIMOMACHUS, a celebrated Painter, born at Byzantium, flouriſhed in the time of Julius Cæſar. He painted an Ajax and a Medea (a) which were purchaſed for eighty talents by that emperor, to be placed in the temple of Venus (b). The ſum is not inconſiderable, amounting according to Father Hardouin's computation to 192 thouſand French livres. Timomachus had not put the finiſhing hand to his Medea; which made it ſtill more valuable. Pliny juſtly admires this capricious taſte of men [A]. There are in the Anthology, ſome epigrams on this Medea, which Auſonius has tranſlated into Latin (c). This was not the Painter's maſter-piece; for beſides that his Iphigenia and his Oreſtes were not leſs eſteemed, his Gorgon was the picture in which he had diſcovered the greateſt art. I have collected ſome miſtakes [B].

(a) Moreri has aid very improperly, ſome pictures of a Medea and an Ajax.

(b) In Veneris Genetricis æde. Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. xi.

(c) Epigr. cxxi, cxxii.

[A] Pliny juſtly admires this capricious taſte of men.] If the ſketches of a great maſter ſhould be more valued than the finiſhed pieces of a mean artiſt, we ſhould not wonder at it; but that the perfect works of a great hand ſhould be leſs able to excite our admiration than his rough draughts, ſeems unreaſonable. Is pity concerned in this affair? Do we think it our duty to love theſe pieces, becauſe they have had the misfortune to loſe their author before they received his finiſhing hand? Perhaps we hunt after reaſons, which none are able to give. Let us therefore quit our ſearch; and only cite what Pliny has ſaid. ‘ Illud perquam rarum ac memoria dignum, etiam ſuprema opera artificum imperfectaſque tabulas, ſicut Irin Ariſtidis, Tyndaridas Nicomachi, Medeam Timomachi, & quam diximus Venerem Apellis, in majori admiratione eſſe quam perfecta (1). - - - It is ſomething very uncommon, and worth recording, that the laſt works and unfiniſhed pieces of Painters, ſuch as the Iris of Ariſtides, the Tyndaridæ of Nicomachus, the Medea of Timomachus, and this Venus of Apelles, which we have juſt now mentioned, have been much more admired than thoſe that were perfect.’

[B] His Gorgon was the picture in which he had diſcovered the greateſt art. I have collected ſome faults.] Read theſe words of Pliny, chap. xi. lib. 35. ‘ Præcipue ars ei faviſſe in Gorgone viſa eſt. - - - His art ſeemed to have ſucceeded more particularly in his Gorgon.’ Charles Stephens had cited the fifth book; Mr Lloyd has ſuppreſſed this quotation inſtead of rectifying it, and has added nothing to this article, but that Athenæus lib. 14. cites one Timomachus, who had written the Hiſtory of Cyprus. Moreri and Hofman cite no authorities. The article Timoniachus is left out in the laſt editions of Charles Stephens, tho' it remained in that of 1620, which was reviſed and corrected by Frederic Morel. It is ſtrange that this learned man ſhould not diſcover the change of an m into ni by a typographical error, had produced the pretended Painter Timoniachus.

(1) Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. xi.

TIPHERNAS (GREGORY) (a), a native of Tifernum in Italy (b), deſerves a very good place amongſt the learned humaniſts of the XVth century. He underſtood Greek, and tranſlated into Latin a part of Strabo. It is that which Guarinus Veronenſis had left untranſlated. Some tell us that Politian laid claim to the verſion of Herodian, of which Tiphernas was the real author; but this is ſcarce credible (c). The manner in which Tiphernas obtained the Greek profeſſorſhip in the univerſity of Paris [A] is very ſingular. You will meet with his Latin verſes in the Deliciæ Poetarum Italorum (d). He ſometimes bought his own proviſions, but he haggled in ſuch a ſtudied ſtile, that the peaſants did not like it [B].

(a) And not George, as Moreri has it.

(b) Leand. Albertus, in Deſcript. Ital. pag. m. 132.

(c) Taken from Paul Jovius, Elog. cap. cxvii, pag. m. 259.

(d) In Tom. ii, pag. 1171.

[A] The Greek Profeſſorſhip in the univerſity of Paris.] Theſe are the words of Peter Matthieu: Emanuel Chryſolora's ſchool produced Gregory Tiphernas, who came to Paris, and preſenting himſelf to the Rector, told him, that he came to teach the Greek authors, and demanded the recompence allotted by the holy decrees. The Rector was a little ſurprized at the aſſurance of this ſtranger, yet commended his deſign, and with the advice of the univerſity retained him, and granted him the appointment he deſired. Hermonymus of Sparta ſucceeded him (1). Gabriel Naudé relates the ſame thing, and makes uſe of it to prove the diſpoſition of Lewis the XI, to protect learned men. We may judge, ſays he (2), by Philelphus's epiſtle cited in the preceding chapter .... how he conſtantly encouraged the Conſtantinopolitan Greeks, who came to Paris, to reſide there, and continue the courſe of their ſtudies in hopes of his liberality. Gregory Tiphernas was the firſt who made way for the reſt (3), who being arrived at Paris preſented himſelf to the Rector, &c. Naudé cites Melanchthon in oratione de Capnione, tom. 3. Several authors mention this paſſage of Tiphernas, and amongſt the reſt Sixtinus Amama, who obſerves, that he came to Paris about the year 1470, and informed the Rector of what had been ordered by the council of Vienne: he did not forget to ſay that the univerſity of Paris was expreſsly mentioned in the decrees of that council (4).

[B] He haggled in ſuch a ſtudied ſtile that the peaſants did not like it.] Jovianus Pontanus, who was his diſciple, tells the ſtory in this manner: ‘ Gregorius Typhernas quo præceptore Græcis in literis uſus ſum adoleſcens, ad forum acceſſerat rerum venalium, dumque ruſticano cum homine non poteſt de mercimonio convenire, ſermone enim cum illo nimis compoſito utebatur, ibi ego qui rem perpendiſſem, converſus ad ruſticum, &c (5). - - - Gregory Typhernas who taught me Greek in my youth, went one day to market to buy ſome things, but could not agree with a countryman about the price of them, becauſe he ſpoke to him in too affected a language, which perceiving I turned to the peaſant, &c.’

(1) Peter Matthieu, Hiſtoire de Louïs XI, livr xi, pag. m. 734, 735.

(2) Naudé, additions to the Hiſtory of Lewis XI, pag. 185.

(3) One may infer from theſe words of Naudé, that he believed Tiphernas was a Greek.

(4) See Sixtinus Amama, in Parænefi de excitandis SS. Linguarum ſtudiis, pag. 197, of his Antibarbarus Biblicus, Edit. 1628.

(5) Jovian. Pontanus, de Sermone, lib. v, cap. i, pag. m. 1704, 1705.

TYPOTIUS (JAMES), you will find in Moreri what Mr Teſſier has already publiſhed concerning this Flemiſh Civilian (a). I ſhall correct ſome things in that account (b), and only add that Typotius was guilty of ſuch ill actions, and of writing a book in which he defamed ſo many perſons of quality in Sweden (c), that he narrowly eſcaped a capital puniſhment. He in particular abuſed the illuſtrious Pontus de la Gardie [A], whom he had accompanied in his embaſſy to Rome (d). The indignation of John

(a) Teiſſier, additions to the Elogies out of Thuanus, Tom. ii, pag. 3[illegible]3, Edit. 1696.

(b) See the remark [C].

(c) See the remark [A].

(d) See the Life of this Pontus, publiſhed in the year 1690, by Claudius Arrhenius Oernhielm, pag. 165.

[A] He abuſed ..... Pontus de la Gardie.] He accuſed him of gaining the favour of Eric King of Sweden by delivering to him the fortreſs of Wardberg which belonged to Denmark. He ſuppoſes that Pontus was in the ſervice of his Daniſh Majeſty at that time, which was in the year 1565. Mr Oernhielm refutes this accuſation by the paſſport which that King gave to la Gardie, March the 16th 1571. La Gardie being in the Swediſh ſervice was taken by the Danes in a battle in which the latter were victorious in the year 1569. He was detained in priſon till the peace was concluded on the 13th of December 1570, and ratified on the 16th of March 1571. The King of Denmark gave him a very honourable paſſport, which he would not have done if he had looked upon him as a traitor. ‘Non aliunde melius dilucet Typotiani mendacii vanitas, quâ, ut ſuperius indicavimus, nugatur, apud Ericum Sueonum Regem PONTUM captâſſe locum gratiæ, proditâ ei Wardbergenſi arce. Si ſic ſe res habuiſſet, quomodò potuiſſet Fridericus Rex, ſponte nullaque adactus neceſſitate, rerum ſibi cariſſimarum proditorem, cari dilectique ſibi Equitis nomine compellare? Quis unquam Regum, arcium, terrarum copiarumque ſuarum proditorem, dignatus eſt nomine tam honorifico, ac non potius quovis, pro atrocitate facti, proſcidit non injuſto convitio? Cur non æquam tanto facinori mercedem retulit? Cur alia omnia de ſe meritum, mancipio jam ſibi etiam traditum, non benignè tantum toto captivitatis tempore habuit Rex, ſed etiam redintegratâ cum Suecis pace, honoris gratiæque pleniſſimis literis ſecurum redire fecit in Sueciam (1)? - - - Nothing can more evidently diſplay Typotius's falſhood, which as we have before-mentioned, he invented againſt Pontus, by affirming that he had ingratiated himſelf with Eric King of Sweden, by betraying the caſtle of Wardberg to him. If it had been ſo, how could King Frederic, of his own accord, and without any neceſſity, call one who had been a traitor in delivering up ſo valuable a place, his dearly beloved knight? What King ever honoured with ſuch an apellation, the betrayer of his fortreſſes, dominions, and forces, or rather would not have given him the character due to his treachery? Why did he not reward him according to his villany? Why when he deſerved ſo ill at his hands, and was delivered up to him, did the King not only treat him kindly during his confinement, but alſo after concluding a peace with the Swedes, gave him a paſſport full of very honourable and gracious expreſſions.’ The author I am citing gives the very words of the paſſport, tranſlated out of the original into Latin A little before, he had told us that Typotius ſpoke very ill of Pontus de la Gardie's extraction, which, continues he, is not to be wondered at; for this writer had aſſurance enough to calumniate even the Kings of Sweden themſelves. He obſerves that this ſatirical piece had been lately reprinted by the care of ſome malicious perſons. ‘Quæ paulo liberaliore manu adduci à me oportuit, ut famoſum libellum Jacobi Typotii venenati convincerem mendacii, quo ille, ſuggerente veteri quodam congerrone Ægidio, ut ipſe fatetur, homine ignoto ac terræ filio, natalibus, vitæ famæque PONTI adſpergere voluit labem, quam fœdiſſimam conſcivit ſibi ipſi, typis committens fuco dictionis pictas livoriſque plenas calumnias. Sed quid mirum eſt, allatraſſe eum genus & famam PONTI, qui ne Regibus quidem, aut ulli Suecicæ gentis honeſto viro ſatis fuit æquus? Etenim, in monſtroſo illo ingenii fœtu, recuſo nuper à malevolis, nefandi in bonorum famam ſceleris conſciis, atque ideò nec loci nec editoris nomen proferre auſis, debacchatur in Ericum ipſum & Johannem Reges, adeò non parcit aliis viris illuſtribus ex ordine Equeſtri, quorum glorioſa ſemper fuit, ac deinceps erit apud poſteros memoria. Quin imo, in religionem, & nationem ipſam, cujus, ut Pontificius è Belgio ſacrificulus, flagrabat odio, ſtolidè nonnunquam invehitur (2). -- This I thought myſelf obliged to particularize more fully, that I might convict Typotius's ſcandalous libel of a malicious lie, with which, upon the authority of one Giles an old companion, as he himſelf confeſſes, a man of no family or conſideration, he intended to aſperſe the life and reputation of Pontus, but has in reality drawn a much greater reflexion upon himſelf, by committing to the Preſs ſuch invidious calumnies coloured over with fine expreſſions. But what need we wonder that he ſhould carp at the fame and family of Pontus, who has never done juſtice to any gentleman of the Swediſh nation, nor even to the Kings themſelves. For in that monſtrous production of wit, lately reprinted by ſome malicious perſons, conſcious of a wicked deſign againſt the reputation of the innocent, and therefore not daring to name either the place or the publiſher, he inveighs againſt both King Eric and John, and does not ſpare other illuſtrious perſons of the Equeſtrian order, whoſe memory has and will be to lateſt poſterity always glorious. Nay he even ſometimes exclaims very fooliſhly againſt their religion and nation, to which as a Popiſh Maſs Prieſt of Flemiſh extract he bore the utmoſt hatred.’ For this ſatirical boldneſs, adds he, and other crimes, Typotius was condemned to death, which he had certainly ſuffered if the King of Denmark had not interceded for him; but tho' the interceſſion of that Prince ſaved his life, it did not protect him from an ignominious baniſhment. *Ob quæ, aliaque * facinora, damnatus hic fuit capitis, luiſſetque factis dignum ſupplicium, niſi interceſſio Regis Daniæ interveniſſet, quæ quidem à meritâ morte illum liberavit, ſed non ab ignominioſâ ex hoc regno Relegatione* (3).

John III, King of Sweden, againſt this author, clearly appears from his anſwer to a letter, requeſting him to releaſe Typotius from his impriſonment [B]. He would not grant him this favour; the priſoner was not diſcharged till after the death of that prince; and having been again received into favour for ſome time, he found the face of affairs changed (e), and retired to the imperial court. He did not die in the year 1604, as Thuanus relates, but ſome time before. There is ſomething elſe to be rectified in his article [C].

[B] His anſwer to a letter requeſting him to releaſe Typotius from his impriſonment.] Frederic II, King of Denmark had written this letter to him: The King of Sweden's anſwer runs thus (4): ‘Quo minus (5) petitioni Majeſtatis Veſtræ in hac cauſa ſatisfacere poſſimus, facit magnitudo ſcelerum, quibus caput ſuum obſtrinxerat idem Typotius, quæ ſi æquè Majeſtati Veſtræ ac nobis nota fuiſſent, ſcimus, non tantum tributuram fuiſſe Majeſtatem Veſtram ejus deſideriis ac precibus, ut pro ipſo intercedere ſuſtinuerit. Etenim is homo eſt, qui virus mendacis linguæ, ſine ullo diſcrimine, in ſummos imoſque paſſim effundit. Inde eſt, quod non tetro tantum carceri mancipandum, ſed ultimo etiam ſupplicio afficiendum eum cenſuimus, in quem ſi quid mitius in poſterum decreverimus, id clementiæ noſtræ, Majeſtatiſque Veſtræ interceſſioni, non innocentiæ ſuæ debebit. Confidimus certò, majeſtatem Veſtram hanc excuſationem noſtram, ut juſtam & idoneam approbaturam. - - - What makes me incapable of gratifying your Majeſty's requeſt in this caſe is the greatneſs of the crimes which the ſaid Typotius has committed, and which if they were ſo well known to your Majeſty as they are to me, I am ſenſible you would not have had ſuch a regard to his prayers and intreaties as once to have interceded for him. For he is a perſon, who lets looſe the virulency of his lying tongue, againſt high and low, univerſally without any diſtinction. For this cauſe it is, that I thought him worthy not only of confinement in a loathſome priſon, but alſo of a capital puniſhment: and if I ſhould hereafter mitigate his ſentence, he will owe it to your Majeſty's interceſſion, and my clemency, not to his own innocency. I do not in the leaſt doubt, but your Majeſty will approve this excuſe as very juſt and reaſonable.’ This letter of the King of Sweden is dated the 17th of February 1583. Note that the King of Denmark interceded for James Typotius, at the requeſt of a perſon for whom he had a particular regard, and who was his Phyſician and brother to the priſoner (6).

[C] He died .... before the year 1604. There is ſomething elſe to be rectified in his article.] Thuanus's fault in placing his death in 1604 (7), has been obſerved by Mr Mollerus in his additions to Scheffer's Suecia Litterata (8). There is a book printed in 1602 (9) in which we find Typotius's funeral elogy by John Jeſſenius à Jeſſen, Phyſician to the Emperor. If Mr Teiſſier had been aware of this, he had corrected Thuanus's error. Some authors ſay that Typotius died in the year 1600 (10). We find in the Preface to the ſecond tome Symbolorum Pontificum, Regum, & Principum Octavii de Strada, dated the 15th of March 1602, that he died after having finiſhed the explication of the ſymbols of this ſecond tome. Theſe words, Jacobus Typotius .... in aula Suecica diu fuit, Carolo Sudermaniæ duci ac tandem Regi cum Sigiſmundo Poloniæ Rege nepote tunc diſſidenti percarus (11), are found tranſlated thus by Mr Teiſſier: ‘James Typotius ..... reſided a long time at the court of Sweden, where he was very much regarded by the Duke of Sudermania and the King, who had

(e) See the remark [C].

(1) Claudius Arrhenius Oernhielm, in Vita Ponti de la Gardie, pag. 19, 20.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 11, 12.

* Meſſenius Scondiæ Illuſtratæ l. VII, ad Anno 1581. A Ponto Typotius plurimarum convictus impoſturarum & calumniarum, carceri perpetuo adjudicatur mancipaturque, inquit, unde mirum non eſt, quod in illum in primis debacchetur.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 12, 13.

(5) That is, that Typotius ſhould be releaſed out of priſon.

(6) Vix evitato, Friderici II. Danorum Regis (cui Frater ejus Matthias gratiſſimus erat atque à cura valetudinis) interceſſione. Jo. Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Schefferi Sueciam litteratam, pag. 443.

(7) Thuan Hiſt. lib. cxxxi, pag. m. 1041.

(8) Pag. 443.

(9) It is Tom. ii, Symbolorum Octavii Stradæ. See Mr Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Sueciam litteratam, pag. 444.

(10) Witte, in Diario Biograph. Mollerus, ubi ſupra. Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 432, ſays that he died about the year 1600.

(11) Thuan. ubi ſupr.

‘ had at that time ſome difference with Sigiſmund King of Poland his nephew (12).’ This tranſlation is faulty; the Duke of Sudermania's chriſtian name ought not to have been ſuppreſſed, nor a King of Sweden been introduced diſtinct from this Duke; for it is viſible that Thuanus ſays that Charles was Duke of Sudermania, and afterwards King of Sweden. In this he was right, but he is wrong to affirm that Typotius was long in favour with this Charles. He ſhould have ſaid that Typotius continued a long time in favour with King John the third, brother to this Duke of Sudermania, and that he fell from it afterwards in a terrible manner, having been impriſoned and condemned to death, and obtained his life only by the interceſſion of the King of Denmark. He might have added, if I am not miſtaken, that after the death of John III, he was reſtored to favour, which he enjoyed under Sigiſmund the ſon of the ſaid John; but that he had no intereſt in Sweden when the Duke of Sudermania was created King upon the excluſion of Sigiſmund King of Poland his nephew; that he kept his ground during the conteſt betwixt the uncle and nephew, and at laſt retired when Sigiſmund's party was ruined. Theſe were, I think, the viciſſitudes of Typotius's fortune. I ground my opinion on what Valerius Andreas ſays in his Bibliotheca Belgica, that after the death of John III, he was ſet at liberty by Sigiſmund, and pronounced the inaugural oration at his coronation before the States of the realm. ‘ Mortuo deinde Suecorum Rege Joanne, ejus filius atque in Regno ſucceſſor Sigiſmundus III, annitente etiam Daniæ Rege Chriſtierno IV, Typotium priſtinæ mox reſtituit libertati: eique tum impoſita eſt provincia in ipſis Regni Comitiis Stocholmiæ Orationem illam, quam Inauguralem vocant, habendi, quâ Suecorum erga Regem ſuum fidei atque benevolentiæ cauſas diſerte expoſuit. Rege autem in Regnum Poloniæ, quod ei per electionem acceſſerat, profecto, Typotius à Romanorum Imp. Rhodolpho II, inter Aulæ ſuæ familiares adlectus, ac Cæſarei Hiſtoriographi titulo ornatus, Pragæ diem clauſi extremum circa annum ſalutis milleſimum ſexcenteſimum (13). - - - - Afterwards John, King of Sweden, dying, Sigiſmund III, his ſon and ſucceſſor, being alſo encouraged thereto by Chriſtian, King of Denmark, quickly reſtored Typotius to his former liberty; and alſo gave him in charge to ſpeak the inaugural oration before the aſſembly of the States at Stockholm, in which he very learnedly explained the reaſons of the loyalty and affection of the Swedes towards their King. But Sigiſmund going to Poland, where he had been elected King, Typotius was invited to court by Rodolphus II, Emperor of the Romans, and being honoured with the title of his Imperial Majeſty's Hiſtoriographer, ended his days at Prague, about the year of our Lord one thouſand ſix hundred.’ We find in the ſame Bibliotheque, that his Orationes Genethliacæ ad Annam Sueciæ & Poloniæ Reginam, were printed at Stockholm in the year 1594. The abovementioned inaugural oration was alſo printed at the ſame place in the ſame year (14), and he informs us (15), that he publiſhed the funeral oration of King John III, who died in November 1592. It was printed at Stockholm in the year 1594 (16). This ſhews that he was in a very good ſituation in Sweden after the death of that monarch. There is one thing not eaſily reconcileable in all this, which is, that very good authors affirm (17), that the interceſſion of his Daniſh majeſty ſaved him from a capital puniſhment, but not from the infamy of being baniſhed the kingdom. Frederic II, King of Denmark, interceded for Typotius either in the year 1582, or in the beginning of 1583. If on his account the puniſhment of death was changed into baniſhment, one would think it ſhould be ſaid that the priſoner was baniſhed in 1583. And yet we have ſeen (18), that Sigiſmund, the ſucceſſor of a Prince (19), who died in 1592, gave Typotius his liberty, and that Chriſtiern IV, King of Denmark, interceded for him. I am at a loſs to reconcile theſe two relations; perhaps, after the death of King John, Sigiſmund reverſed Typotius's exile, and recalled him.

Whilſt this is printing, I have met with a confirmation of my conjectures in a German treatiſe (20), ſome pages of which, relating to Typotius, I got tranſlated. I have there found a paſſage which makes me believe that Mr Ornhielm was miſtaken in ſaying that the interceſſion of Frederic II, King of Denmark, did not prevent this perſon from being baniſhed Sweden with infamy. This paſſage is contained in a letter from Zachary Palthenius to Typotius, and printed with a treatiſe of Typotius, at Franckfort, in 1595. Palthenius affirms, 1. That John III, King of Sweden, prevented Typotius's being entirely ruined by his enemies. 2. That Sigiſmund III, King of Poland and Sweden, reſtored this priſoner to his liberty. ‘ Quæ tibi ergaſtulum, aut, ut tu loqui ſoles, Dei gratia peperit, de fortuna & legibus, cum fortuna, quam liberatio, uti videre eſt, concepit, ego faſciis involvi, prodibuntque brevi in lucem. Felix infelicitas tua, quæ tibi veræ laudis, imo ſolidæ felicitatis principium exſtitit. Abſuiſti à familiarium commercio, doleo, dolet mecum litteratorum chorus, quanquam mœroris tui vehementioris nullum ſignum in libris tuis repererim, & tu Joannis III, Regis Sueciæ humanitatem ac clementiam prædicare ſoleas, ut per quem ſtetit, ne adverſariorum malignitate caderes. Sed cum abeſſes à tuis, verſatus es cum, quæ maxime tuæ ſunt, Muſis. Reſtitutus in libertatem à Sigiſmundo III, Poloniæ & Sueciæ Rege, huic enim ſecundum Dei, cui etiam ille cedit, miſericordiam, conſuetudinem noſtram refers acceptam, profers in lucem luce digniſſimos diverſi argumenti plurimos Codices (21). - - - Thoſe works of yours, de Fortuna & Legibus, which your priſon, or as you are uſed to ſay, the Divine Mercy produced, I have laid together, and ſhall very ſhortly make them public. Happy is your unhappineſs, which has proved to you the foundation of real glory, and even of ſolid happineſs. You have been ſecluded from the converſation of your friends, which was a misfortune that affected not only myſelf but all the learned world, tho' I perceived no ſign of any extraordinary affliction in your writings, and you are uſed to cry up the humanity and clemency of John III, King of Sweden, as your ſecurity againſt being made a ſacrifice to the malice of your adverſaries. But while you was abſent from your's, you was preſent with the Muſes, which are moſt entirely your's. Being reſtored to your liberty, by Sigiſmund III, King of Poland and Sweden, for to him, according to the Divine mercy, to which he himſelf is ſubject, you aſcribe the renewal of our converſation, you bring to light ſeveral pieces on different ſubjects, which mav highly deſerve to be made public.’ Mr Tentzelius ſays, that Typotius dedicated his treatiſe de Fortuna, printed at Francfort in 1595, to Sigiſmund III, King of Sweden, as he did his book de Fato, printed in the ſame year, and at the ſame place, to Chriſtian, King of Denmark; and that he ſays at the beginning of his treatiſe de Fortuna, that he had received many favours from King Sigiſmund, and that he had waited the return of that monarch at Calmar, and that his enemies prevented his going to meet his majeſty at Dantzic. You may obſerve that the Preface to this book was written at Wurtſbourg in December 1595. It is very ſurpriſing that Mr Ornhielm, Hiſtoriographer of Sweden, ſhould be ignorant that this man was honourably diſcharged out of priſon, and not by an infamous ſentence of baniſhment.

Here follow ſome miſtakes of Mr Moreri. I. He ſays that Sigiſmund, King John's ſucceſſor, gave Typotius his liberty, and employed him in ſeveral affairs of the utmoſt importance. Mr Teiſſier (22) has made uſe of the ſame words, quoting only Valerius Andreas, who ſays nothing of this kind, nor any thing farther than that Typotius being ſet at liberty, was appointed to make the inaugural ſpeech before the States of the kingdom. II. At laſt, adds Mr Moreri, like a faithful copier of Mr Teiſſier, Sigiſmund being elected King of Poland, Typotius retired to the court of the Emperor Rodolph II. This means, that Sigiſmund was elected King of Poland ſome years after he ſucceeded John III, King of Sweden. Nothing is more falſe; John III died in November 1592. Sigiſmund, his ſon, was not crowned King of Sweden till 1594, and he had been elected King of Poland in 1587. The third miſtake of Mr Moreri is in having fixed Typotius's death in the year 1604.

(12) Teiſſier's Elogies, taken out of Thuanus, Tom. ii, pag. 353.

(13) Valer. Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 432.

(14) Scheffer. in Suecia litterata, pag. m. 274.

(15) Typot. lib. ii, de ſalute Reipubl. pag. 122, apud Scheff. ibid.

(16) Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Sueciam litteratam, pag. 444.

(17) Mollerus, ibid. pag. 443. See alſo the remark [A], at the end.

(18) Above, citation (13).

(19) John III, King of Sweden.

(20) Mr Tentzelius's Conferences, month of September 1690.

(21) Zachar. Palthenius, Epiſt. ad Typotium, apud Tentzelium, Monatliche Unterredungen, September 1690, pag. 861.

(22) Teiſſier, Additions aux Eloges, Tom. ii, pag. 354.

TYRANNION,

TYRANNION.

TYRANNION, a celebrated Grammarian in Pompey's time, was of Amiſus in the Kingdom of Pontus. He was called at firſt Theophraſtus; but by reaſon of his tormenting his ſchool-fellows, his maſter Heſtiæus gave him the name of Tyrannion [A]. He was a diſciple of Dionyſius Thracius at Rhodes. He fell into the hands of Lucullus, when that Roman general put Mithridates to flight, and ſeized his dominions. This captivity of Tyrannion was not diſadvantageous to him, ſince it procured him an opportunity of rendring himſelf illuſtrious at Rome, and of acquiring great riches. Theſe he applied, among other uſes, to the erecting a library of above thirty thouſand volumes (a). He died very old, harraſſed and worn out with the gout (b). Suidas is miſtaken as to the time of his death [B]. I muſt not forget that Murena aſked Tyrannion of Lucullus, that he might have the glory of enfranchiſing a celebrated Grammarian. The reflexions of Plutarch on this occaſion are not improper [C]. The pains Tyrannion took in collecting books, very much contributed to the preſervation of Ariſtotle's works. The writings of this Philoſopher met with a ſingular fate [D]. It deſerves

[A] By reaſon of his tormenting his ſchool-fellows . . . he was called Tyrannion.] In the verſion of Suidas we find theſe Greek words, Τυραννίων ὠνομάσθη ὃς κατατρέχων τῶν ὁμοσχόλων, thus rendred, Tyrannio dictus eſt quod condiſcipulos excogitaret, l. ὡς κατατρέχων. - - - He was called Tyrannion, from his tormenting his ſchool-fellows. It is hardly neceſſary to acquaint the reader that excogitaret is a typographical error, inſtead of exagitaret; but we may very well ſay that Mr Moreri has not ſufficiently minded the title of his book; he gives his own conjectures for the tranſlations of the authors, whom he cites at the end of his articles. If he had writ a romance inſtead of an hiſtorical Dictionary, this liberty had been excuſable. No author had informed him that Theophraſtus becoming proud of his ſcience, and deſpiſing his equals, was named Tyrannion.

[B] Suidas is miſtaken as to the time of his death.] How was it poſſible that Tyrannion ſhould die in the third year of the CXXth Olympiad, as we read in Suidas, ſince he was not brought to Rome till after Lucullus had put Mithridates to flight in the CLXXVIIth Olympiad? Patricius (1) conjectures that inſtead of ὀλυμπιάδι ρκ΄, Suidas ſaid ὀλυμπιάδι ρπ΄. According to this, Tyrannion died in third year of the CLXXXth Olympiad. There is ſome probability in Patricius's correction; and yet it is certain that Tyrannion taught in Cicero's houſe, in the laſt year of the CLXXXth Olympiad (2); and as he took care to put Cicero's library into order (3); it is not very likely that he was then in the infirm ſtate in which he died, according to Suidas. What I am going to ſay is infinitely more concluſive, either againſt Patricius's correction, or againſt Suidas himſelf, if he ſpoke agreeably to Patricius's conjecture. When Cæſar was in Africa, making war againſt Juba, in the year of Rome 707, which was the ſecond of the CLXXXIVth Olympiad, Cicero and Atticus promiſed to meet one day, in order to hear Tyrannion read a book of his own compoſing (4); and Atticus was reproached by his friend for having heard it read without him (5).

[C] Plutarch's reflexions on this occaſion, are not improper.] Murena, ſays he, did not at all anſwer the generoſity of Lucullus; for, in ſeeming to enfranchiſe Tyrannion, he deprived him of his liberty. It had been much more honourable to have let him remained what he was. Theſe are Plutarch's words, in his deſcription of the ſacking of Amiſus, which Lucullus not being able to prevent, he repaired that loſs as well as he was able. Τότε καὶ Τυραννίων ὁ γραμματικὸς ἑάλω. Μουρήνας δ᾽ αὐτὸν ἐξητήσατο, καὶ λαβὼν ἀπηλευθέρωσεν, ἀνελευθέρος τῇ δωρεᾷ χρησάμενος. οὐ γὰρ ἠξίου Λούκουλλος ἄνδρα διὰ παιδείαν ἐσπουδασμένον δοῦλον γενέσθαι πρότερον, εἶτα ἀπελεύθερον. ἀφαίρεσις γὰρ ἦν τῆς ὑπαρχούσης ἡ τῆς δοκούσης ἐλευθερίας δόσις. ἀλλὰ Μουρήνας μὴν οὐκ ἐνταῦθα μόνον ὤφθη πολὺ τῆς τοῦ στρατηγοῦ καλοκαγαθίας ἀποδέων. Eadem tempeſtate captus eſt Tyrannio grammaticus. Hunc Murena petivit à Lucullo, quem ut accepit, manumiſit eum. Verum uſus eſt eo munere illiberaliter, nolebat enim inſigni virum eruditione Lucullus prius ſervum fieri, inde libertinum. Quippe ereptio præſentis erat illa ſimulatæ libertatis donatio. Cæterum non hic tantum oſtendit ſe Imperatore ſuo Murena honeſtate imparem (6). - - - At that time was taken Tyrannion, the Grammarian. Murena begged him of Lucullus, and having obtained his requeſt, manumiſed him, making but an ungenteel uſe of his preſent. For Lucullus did not think it by any means proper, that a man of ſuch extraordinary learning ſhould be firſt made a ſlave, and then enfranchiſed. For the ſeeming liberty which was given him, was, in reality, the taking away that which he had even then a title to. But this was not the only inſtance which diſcovered Murena to be far inferior to his General in generoſity.

[D] Ariſtotle's works met with a ſingular fate.] This great Philoſopher left them, together with his ſchool and his other books, to his diſciple Theophraſtus. The latter left his library to Neleus, who had been ſcholar both to him and to Ariſtotle. Neleus cauſed it to be removed to Scepſis (7), and left it to his heirs. They being ignorant and illiterate, took no other care of this library than to keep it cloſe ſhut up. Παρέδοκεν ἰδιώταις ἀνθρώποις οἳ κατάκλειστα εἶχον τὰ βιβλία οὐδ᾽ ἐπιμέλως κείμενα. Reliquit ineruditis hominibus, qui incuriè poſitos ſub clavibus repoſuerunt (8). And being informed how diligently the Kings of Pergamum, to whom they were ſubjects, ſought after books, they buried under ground thoſe of Neleus. A long time after this, their poſterity took them out of their priſon very much damaged by damps and vermin, and ſold, at a great price, thoſe of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus to one Apellicon, who cauſed them to be copied: but his tranſcribers very ill ſupplied thoſe places which the worms had eaten, or the damps defaced; ſo that thoſe books did not appear without innumerable faults. After Apellicon's death, his library was carried from Athens to Rome, by Sylla. Sylla's Library-keeper permitted Tyrannion, who was a great admirer of Ariſtotle, to take the writings of that Philoſopher. The Bookſellers cauſed them to be tranſcribed, but they made uſe of ignorant people, who did not collate their copies with the originals; ſo that the miſchief became greater at Rome than it had been at Athens. Thus far Strabo hath carried this relation, let us take the ſequel of it from Plutarch and others.

Plutarch (9) ſays, that Sylla having rendered himſelf maſter of Athens, ſeized upon Apellicon's library, where were the greateſt part of Ariſtotle's and Theophraſtus's works, then very little known to the public. He adds, that it was reported, that after Sylla had tranſported them to Rome, Tyrannion, the Grammarian, got ſeveral of them into his hands; and that Andronicus Rhodius having procured copies from him, publiſhed them, and made thoſe tables or indexes which were afterwards joined to them (10). Plutarch and Strabo agree, that for a long time the Peripatetics were unacquainted with the writings of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus, and that the ignorance of Neleus's heirs was the cauſe of it. Strabo ſays expreſsly, that the modern Peripatetics ſurpaſſed the antient, becauſe the latter having but very few of Ariſtotle's books, and thoſe few containing pieces of the leaſt conſequence (11), were not able to philoſophiſe with profound and methodical exactneſs. But after Ariſtotle's writings were diſcovered, it was much eaſier for thoſe of that ſect to reaſon according to their maſter's ſcheme; yet they were obliged to rely much upon conjectures, becauſe there was an infinite number of faults in his works. This is Strabo's obſervation (12).

Athenæus (13) has a paſſage very neceſſary to be cited. He ſays that Neleus the poſſeſſor of Ariſtotle's library, ſold it entire to Ptolomy Philadelphus, who removed

---

(a) Charles Stephens, Lloyd, Hofman, Moreri, ſay only three thouſand.

(b) Ex Suida, in Τυραννίων.

(1) Diſcuſſiones Peripateticæ. Tom. i, lib. iv, pag. 36.

(2) Cicero, Ep. iv, lib. ii, ad Q. Fratrem. It was written in the year, that Tullia was married to Craſſipes: it was the 697 year of Rome. See Fabricius in the Life of Cicero.

(3) See the remark [G].

(4) Epiſt. II, lib. xii, ad Atticum.

(5) Epiſt. VI, ejuſd. Libri.

(6) Plut. in Lucullo, pag. 504.

(7) It was the place of his birth, and a town of Troas.

(8) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 413. Salmaſius, in Tertul. de Pallio, pag. m. 177, proves by this paſſage that κατάκλειστον ſignifies a precious thing, which is carefully preſerved. Strabo inſinuates no ſuch thing. Beſides Salmaſius ſpeaks of Apellicon's heirs, whereas he ſhould have mentioned thoſe of Neleus.

(9) In Sylla, pag. 468.

(10) Add to this the paſſage out of Porphyrius, in Vita Plotini, which I have quoted in the article of ANDRONICUS, citation (9).

(11) Theſe were called ἐξωτερικοὶ: The others which contained a more profound doctrine, were called ἀκροαματικοί.

(12) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 413.

(13) Lib. i, p. 3.

Whether the difference between Athenæus and Strabo, has been juſtly reconciled by Patricius.

ſerves to be mentioned, eſpecially ſince it relates to ſo famous a Philoſopher. They were in removed it to Alexandria, together with thoſe books which he had purchaſed at Rhodes and at Athens. He obſerves, in the ſame place, that one Larentius, a citizen of Rome, under Marcus Aurelius, had made a larger collection of books, than either Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, Piſiſtratus, tyrant of Athens, Euclid, Nicocrates, the Kings of Pergamus, the Poet Euripides, or Ariſtotle the Philoſopher. Here are two things in which Athenæus contradicts Strabo. The latter affirming, that Ariſtotle was the firſt who collected a library, and who taught the Kings of Egypt how to erect one. Athenæus names ſeveral perſons who collected great numbers of books before Ariſtotle. He ſays further, that Neleus ſold all this Philoſopher's books to Ptolomy Philadelphus; but Strabo aſſures us, that Neleus left them to his heirs, who concealed them. The learned Francis Patricius (14) pretends to remove this laſt difficulty, by ſuppoſing that Neleus got Ariſtole's books tranſcribed, and ſold a copy of each book to the Kings of Egypt, and kept the other for himſelf. I allow that it was no very eaſy thing for Neleus to get ſo many volumes copied; but when I conſider Ptolomy's expences on account of his library, I cannot ſee any impoſſibility in it. What will not a man do, to furniſh himſelf with what he can to ſell to a Prince who pays well? on the other ſide, it is more than probable, that one of Ariſtotle's ſcholars, as he was, might be extremely fond of keeping his library, and there was no other way to ſatisfy theſe two paſſions, than to cauſe them to be copied. Voſſius (15) imagines that Neleus ſold his whole library, Ariſtotle's works only excepted. But beſides that this exception has no foundation in the text of Athenæus, how is it probable that the King of Egypt, buying Ariſtotle's library, ſhould ſuffer the writings of this great genius to be taken out? It was principally ſuch books that he wanted. I obſerve that Ammonius ſaith, that Ptolomy very carefully bought up the works of Ariſtole, and very liberally rewarded thoſe who brought them to him (16), but he doth not mention Neleus. The liberality of this King of Egypt was the occaſion of the fathering ſome ſuppoſititious pieces upon Ariſtotle. Ὅθεν τινὲς χρηματίσασθαι βουλόμενοι ἐπιγράφοντες. συγγράμματα τῷ τοῦ φιλοσόφου ὀνόματι προσῆγον. Quare quidam ditari inde volentes inſcripſerunt libros nomine Philoſophi eique detulerunt (17). Thoſe of other authors were aſcribed to him, in order to ſell them the dearer. What Patricius obſerves as to the other part of the difference betwixt Strabo and Athenæus, appears to me groundleſs. He pretends that Strabo ſays, Neleus was the firſt who erected a library, and that he taught the Kings of Egypt that art (18). But it is very evident, that Strabo ſays this of Ariſtotle and not of Neleus. If it be objected that Ariſtotle died a year after Alexander, when Ptolomy Philadelphus, the firſt founder of the Alexandrian library, was not yet king, nor even a king's ſon: I anſwer, that Ariſtotle might have taught people who lived long after him, the method of erecting libraries; for to do this it was only neceſſary to know how he placed his books. This therefore deſtroys the objection of Patricius, and, without doubt, is the true ſenſe of thoſe words of Strabo; διδάξας τοὺς ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ βασιλέας βιβλιοθήκης, σύνταξιν; Ægypti reges bibliothecæ ordinem docuit. - - - He taught the Kings of Egypt the method of putting a library in order. I know very well that Strabo is greatly miſtaken in the place, where he ſays that he knows of no body who had collected a number of books before Ariſtotle Ἀριστοτέλης . . . . . πρῶτος ὧν ἴσμεν συναγαγὼν βιβλία. Ariſtoteles . . . . . primus omnium quos ſcimus, libros congregavit (19). He had forgot Polycrates, Piſiſtratus, Nicocrates, and Euripides, who, according to Athenæus's obſervation, had made a great collection of books. This is a great ſlip in his memory, I own it; but it ſeems eaſier for Strabo to fall into this error, than to think that Ariſtotle was alive when Ptolomy Philadelphus ordered his library. Patricius aggravates Strabo's miſtake, when he makes him ſay that Neleus was the firſt collector of books. He muſt then have been ignorant how zealous Ariſtotle was in buying of them (20).

Rapin's account examined.

Father Rapin very agreeably relates the adventures of Ariſtotle's works; ſome fragments of which narration I deſign to cite here, becauſe they deſerve ſome reflexions. 'It is pretended that Ariſtotle could not 'prevail upon himſelf to publiſh his writings, out 'of pure reſpect for Plato; becauſe he oppoſed his 'doctrine in ſeveral places. But this conduct diſ'covered more policy than virtue; he was reſolved 'to proceed with diſcretion, becauſe mens minds 'were as yet too much prepoſſeſſed in favour of Plato's 'opinions. Hence it was that to conceal his works, 'he intruſted them to Theophraſtus, with a ſtrong 'injunction againſt their publication, which was re'ligiouſly obſerved. So that Theophraſtus, who was 'the truſtee of them, Strato, Lyco, Demetrius Pha'lereus, and Heraclides, who ſucceeded one another 'in the Lyceum, taught Ariſtotle's doctrine only by 'tradition. This tradition not being ſupported by 'any writing, in proceſs of time grew cool, and diſ'covered nothing of that warmth which appeared in 'the other ſects. . . . . . Theophraſtus, that he might 'ſtrictly obſerve his maſter's order upon his death'bed, intruſted Ariſtotle's writings to the deareſt of 'his friends and diſciples, on the ſame conditions 'with which he had received them. The name of 'this friend was Neleus. . . . . He died ſoon after; 'tho' not without informing his heirs of the value of 'the Depoſitum which he left them. This they ſo 'well apprehended, that being informed the King of 'Pergamum . . . . was making very diligent ſearches 'after books and writings, in order to erect a libra'ry, they buried Ariſtotle's works in a vault built on 'purpoſe, in order to ſecure them the better. This 'precious treaſure remained concealed in that place 'for about one hundred and ſixty years, from 'whence it was at laſt taken, half eaten with ver'min, and almoſt entirely deſtroyed with the damp'neſs of the place. It was at laſt taken out in order 'to be ſold at a very dear rate to a rich citizen of 'Athens, whoſe name was Apellicon. . . . . The Pro'feſſors who then taught in the Lyceum, being in'formed of this, made their court to this citizen, 'who lent them thoſe writings for ſome time. But 'he took them back again in order to ſecure them 'in his library, which he rendered very famous by 'this important Depoſitum. Some years after, Sylla '. . . . cauſed them to be taken away and carried to 'Rome . . . . he died quickly after, and theſe manu'ſcripts fell into the hands of a Grammarian named 'Tyrannion, who underſtood where they were from 'his intimacy with Sylla's library-keeper. Tho' this 'Grammarian was a very learned man, and had col'lected a library of above 30000 volumes, after his 'being brought to Rome by Lucullus . . . . . yet he 'did not know the value of Ariſtotle's works. But 'after his death, Andronicus Rhodius being come to 'Rome, and being perfectly acquainted with Ari'ſtotle's merit, becauſe he had been bred in the Ly'ceum, treated with Tyrannion's heirs for theſe books, 'and having them in his power, he ſo earneſtly ap'plied himſelf to examine them . . . . that he was in 'a manner their firſt reſtorer. . . . . It was this An'dronicus who firſt made Ariſtotle known at Rome, 'about the time when Cicero, by his great reputa'tion, roſe to the firſt poſts in the Republic (21).

The remarks I ſhall make on this diſcourſe, may be reduced to the following heads. I. Father Rapin doth not cite one author who ſays that Ariſtotle intruſted his writings to Theophraſtus, with a ſtrong injunction againſt their publication. Strabo and Plutarch, who obſerve that this Philoſopher's books remained a long time unknown, aſcribe the cauſe of it only to the ignorance of Neleus's deſcendants; and we have already cited an author (22) who aſſures us, that this Neleus ſold Ariſtotle's library to Ptolemy Philadelphus. So far is he from ſaying that Neleus preſerved theſe books according to the injunction laid on him againſt the publiſhing of them. II. Father Rapin miſrepreſents the narrative of the author whom he cites (23); for it is not remarked by Strabo that Neleus did not die without informing his heirs of the value of the Depoſitum which he left them; and ſo far is he from affirming that they well underſtood him, that he ſays they left thoſe books locked up and in confuſion (24). It is true that Strabo adds they buried them, when they heard the Kings of Pergamum were collecting books; this ſeems to ſignify that Neleus had forbidden his heirs to part with his library: but, in ſhort, Strabo

(14) Diſcuſſ. Paripatetic. Tom. i, pag. 29.

(15) De Philoſophorum Sectis, cap. xvii, pag. 86.

(16) Ammonius, Prolegomen. in Categorias.

(17) Ammonius, ibid.

(18) Patricius, Diſcuſſ. Peripatet. Tom. i, pag. 35.

(19) Strabo, ubi ſupra.

(20) A. Gellius, lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(21) Comparaiſon de Platon & d'Ariſtote, pag. 371, & ſeq. Dutch Edit. 1686.

(22) Athenæus, lib. i, pag. 3.

(23) He quotes Strabo, lib. xiii.

(24) Οὐδ' ἐπιμελῶς κείμενα, incuriè poſitos.

in the library of one Apellicon: I ſhall ſpeak of him below [E]. Sylla rendring himſelf maſter of Athens, ſeized upon this library, and ſent it to Rome. Tyrannion having found means to inſinuate himſelf into an intimacy with Sylla's library-keeper, got into his poſſeſſion all the works of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus which he could meet with. The ſequel of this has been ſeen in the article of ANDRONICUS Rhodius, and is more amply ſpecified below. Strabo was our Tyrannion's diſciple (c) [F]; as Cicero's ſon and nephew were alſo his diſciples at Rome. Cicero made uſe of him to put his library in order (G). Tyrannion wrote a book which Pomponius Atticus admired [H].

Strabo ſays no ſuch thing, and it muſt be left to the caſuiſts of Parnaſſus to inform us, whether it is lawful for an author to aſcribe to thoſe he cites, the conſequences, reaſons, and motives of what they have ſaid, ſuch as he fancies them to be. How do we know but that Neleus's executors were afraid that their Prince ſhould not give them any thing for theſe books, and therefore thought it more proper to reſerve them for a better opportunity? III. Father Rapin applies ſolely to Ariſtotle's writings, what Strabo ſays in general of all the books which Neleus left to his heirs. IV. Strabo does not ſay one word of thoſe Profeſſors of the Lyceum who made their court to Apellicon to borrow Ariſtotle's works of him for ſome time. He does not ſay that Apellicon having lent theſe books to them for ſome time, afterwards received them back; he ſays, on the contrary, that Apellicon cauſed them to be copied, and publiſhed them full of faults. V. No author ever ſaid that Tyrannion did not know the value of Ariſtotle's works. Strabo rather inſinuates the contrary by theſe words, Φιλαριστοτέλης ὢν, he was a zealous admirer of Ariſtotle. VI. Nor hath any one ſaid that Andronicus Rhodius came to Rome after the death of Tyrannion, and that he bought Ariſtotle's works of his heirs: on the contrary, Plutarch affirms (25), that Andronicus Rhodius received thoſe books at the hands of Tyrannion (26). If it was true that Andronicus did not come to Rome before the time mentioned by Father Rapin, he would not have found Tully in the beginning of his fortune, but at the height of his glory, recalled from his exile to the great ſatisfaction of the Roman people. The proof of this is drawn from Tyrannion's being brought to Rome in the CLXXVIIth Olympiad, where he became illuſtrious, enriched himſelf, collected a library of above 30000 volumes, and died very old (27). This was in the third year of the CLXXXth Olympiad, according to Patricius's correction of the paſſage of Suidas. Twelve years at leaſt muſt be requiſite for Tyrannion to ſtore up ſuch a large ſhare of riches and books at Rome. Now the third year of the CLXXXth Olympiad is the very year of Cicero's being recalled (28). But beſides, I have proved that Tyrannion was alive in the CLXXXIVth Olympiad, when Cicero was at leaſt aged ſixty years.

AN Inference very glorious for Ariſtotle, but which may raiſe ſome doubt concerning his writings.

I may conclude this remark with a reflexion which I find in Voſſius (29). It is no ſmall glory to Ariſtotle, that his works being ſo long unknown, were no ſooner come out than they out-ſhone the writings of ſeveral other Philoſophers, who had enjoyed a long and uninterrupted reputation. I ſhall add on my own bottom, that by a turn of fortune, the ſect which was deſtined to prevail moſt in the ſchools, happened to be that which for ſeveral ages found it moſt difficult to lift up its head, and riſe out of its obſcurity. Laſtly, I ſay that it is much more ſurprizing, that ſo many books of Ariſtotle are preſerved, than that we have loſt ſo great a number of them. It is true, there is room to doubt whether thoſe which paſs at preſent under his name, were the genuine iſſue of his pen. Voſſius rejects the judgment of Cælius Secundus Curio, who owns no more of Ariſtotle's works than the Hiſtory of Animals, the treatiſe of the world, and his Rhetoric to Alexander (30). But I am ſurprized that inſtead of alledging this Curio, he does not mention Francis Patricius, who has ſo learnedly diſcuſſed what are, and what are not, the genuine works of Ariſtotle, and has rejected a very great number as ſpurious. Ramus made the ſame attempt. Here is a paſſage which will inform us that he was not the firſt. (31) Is it not ſtrange that Francis Picus † who ſucceeded as well in the learning as in the principality of his uncle, this great Picus, the phœnix of his age, has laboured by a long train of reaſons to demonſtrate that it is utterly uncertain, whether Ariſtotle compoſed any one of all thoſe books which are at preſent contained in the catalogue of his works: which was however confirmed afterwards by Nizolius ⸸, and ſo well examined by Patricius ‡, that after having given proofs of his ſurprizing diligence in enquiring into the truth of this propoſition, he concludes at laſt, that of all the books aſcribed to this genius of nature, only four, and thoſe very ſmall and inconſiderable, with reſpect to the worth of the reſt, are handed down to us free from ſuſpicion or controverſy, namely his Mechanics, and three others which he wrote againſt Zeno, Gorgias, and Xenophanes: when, on the contrary, Ammonius teſtifies in his commentary on the Categories, that in the magnificent library of Alexandria, they found forty books of Analytics, which all bore Ariſtotle's name, tho' he only compoſed four of them, the two firſt of which anſwer the nine cited by Diogenes Laërtius. This is to be imputed, as Galen obſerves *, to the emulation there was between the Kings of Pergamum and Alexandria, in liberally rewarding thoſe who brought them a book of any good author, and eſpecially of Ariſtotle, the better to adorn their libraries: before which time none of the antient books had ever been falſely intituled. This I would ſhew more at large, if it had not already been done by Patricius . See Gaſſendus (32).

[E] One Apellicon, I ſhall ſpeak of him below.] I have ſaid nothing of him in his place, but referred the reader hither: it is therefore juſt that I ſhould ſay ſomething of him in this remark. APELLICON was of Teos, but ſettled at Athens, and was there made a citizen. He was very rich and of a troubleſome temper. He applied himſelf to Philoſophy, and embraced the Peripatetic ſect (33); but he made it appear that his talent lay more in purchaſing the works of the Philoſophers, than in acquiring any knowledge of their opinions. Φιλόβιβλος μᾶλλον, ἢ φιλόσοφος. Librorum amore tenebatur majore quam Philoſophiæ ſtudio (34). He bought Ariſtotle's, and ſeveral other numerous libraries. He ſpared no coſt to buy rare books, and found out an expedient to rob the archives of the original decrees which had been antiently publiſhed at Athens. If there were in other cities any original pieces valuable for their antiquity, or very little known to the public, by reaſon of their being kept concealed, he took ſo much care to recover them, that he got all papers of this nature into his hands. The Athenians having diſcovered this robbery, had probably puniſhed Apellicon with death, if he had not made his eſcape. His friends ſoon occaſioned his being recalled. He engaged himſelf in the cabal of Athenion, a Peripatetic Philoſopher, who was become very powerful by a popular ſedition during the war betwixt the Romans and Mithridates. The confuſions then reigning in Athens, contributed on the one hand to the elevation of Apellicon, and on the other to diſcover that he was utterly unfit for command. Athenion ſent him commander to the iſle of Delos; but Apellicon obſerved military diſcipline ſo ill, and took ſo little care to prevent being ſurprized by the enemy, that the Romans made a deſcent into the iſle, without being perceived by him, and ſlew the garriſon while aſleep. Apellicon had the good fortune to ſave himſelf (35). He died a little before Sylla made himſelf maſter of Athens (36). I have already ſaid what he did with regard to the writings of Ariſtotle, and what became of his library. He was an author; he is cited (37) as a defender of Ariſtotle againſt the calumnious reports raiſed againſt him on account of this Philoſopher's intimacy with Hermias.

[F] Strabo was our Tyrannion's diſciple.] I have cited the place where Strabo relates this particular: but it is falſe, that he was his diſciple in his own country, and that he was his countryman. Pompa who advances theſe two errors, hath miſtaken Amiſus, Tyrannion's native country, for Amaſia the country of this famous Geographer (38).

[G] Cicero made uſe of him to put his library in order.] This is what he writes to his friend Pomponius Atticus

---

(c) Strabo, lib. xii, pag. 377.

(25) Παρ' αὐτοῦ (Τυραννίωνος) τὸν ῥόδιον Ἀνδρόνικον εὐπορήσαντα τῶν ἀντιγράφων. A quo (Tyrannione) accepiſſe Andronicum Rhodium exemplaria. Plut. in Sylla, pag. 468, B.

(26) Add to theſe remarks concerning Father Rapin, what has been ſaid in the article of ANDRONICUS Rhodius.

(27) Ex Suida.

(28) See Calviſius, ad ann. mundi 3893.

(29) Voſſius, de Philoſoph. Sectis, pag. 88.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 87, where he obſerves that of theſe three works, the two laſt are not Ariſtotle's.

(31) Naudé Apologie des grans Hommes, ch. vi, pag. 101, 102, 103.

† Lib. 4. Examin. vanit. Doctrinæ Gentium.

⸸ Lib. 4. cap. 6. de recta ratione philoſophandi.

‡ Diſcuſſion. Peripat. tomi i. lib. 3.

* Comment. in lib. Hippoc. de natura humana.

 Diſcuſſ. Peripat. tom. 1. lib. 3.

(32) Gaſſend, Exercit. adverſ. Ariſtotelæos, lib. i, cap. iv.

(33) Athenæus, lib. v, pag. 214.

(34) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 419.

(35) Athen. ubi ſupra.

(36) Strabo, ibid. The taking of Athens falls on the CLXXIIId Olympiad, about the year of Rome 666.

(37) Ariſtocles Peripateticus, apud Euſebium Præp. lib. xv, cap. ii, pag. 793.

(38) Pompa in Ciceron. Epiſt. VI, lib. ii, ad Atticum, in Edit. Græviana.

Atticus. ‘ Perbelle feceris ſi ad nos veneris: offendes ‘ deſignationem Tyrannionis mirificam in librorum ‘ meorum Bibliotheca, quorum reliquiæ multo me‘ liores ſunt quam putaram. Etiam vellem mihi mit‘ tas de tuis librariolis duos aliquos, quibus Tyrannio ‘ utatur glutinatoribus, ad cætera adminiſtris (39). - - - ‘ You will do well to make me a viſit: the admirable ‘ method of Tyrannion in ordering my library, is worth ‘ your ſeeing; I find the remains of it make a better ‘ figure than I could have imagined. I muſt alſo beg ‘ the favour of you to ſend me any two of your Book‘ binders, who may be aſſiſting to Tyrannion in adjuſting ‘ the covers, and other purpoſes.’ He owns in another epiſtle (40) that the two perſons whom Atticus ſent him did wonders: ‘ Poſtea verò quam Tyrannio mihi ‘ libros diſpoſuit, mens addita videtur meis ædibus: ‘ qua quidem in re mirifica opera Dionyſii & Meno‘ phili tui fuit. - - - But after Tyrannion had metho‘ dized my books, my houſe ſeemed as if it was animat‘ ed; in which your Dionyſius and Menophilus were won‘ derfully aſſiſting.’

[H] He wrote a book which Pomponius Atticus admired (41).] Some believe it was a treatiſe of Proſody. They ground their conjecture on theſe words of Cicero: Quid ex iſta acuta & gravi refertur ad τέλος (42): Another paſſage (43) ſeems to import that Tyrannion pretended to Geography.

(39) Epiſt. IV, lib. iv. He wrote it ſoon after he returned from his baniſhment. Confer Epiſt. IV, V, lib. iii, ad Q. fratrem.

(40) Epiſt. VIII, lib. iv, ad Atticum.

(41) Vide Epiſt. VI, lib. xii, ad Atticum.

(42) Ibid.

(43) Epiſt. VI, lib. ii, ad Atticum,

TYRANNION, ſo called, becauſe he was the diſciple of the preceding [A], was firſt named Diocles. He was of Phœnicia. In the war betwixt Octavius and Mark Anthony he was taken priſoner, and bought by one of the emperor's freed men (a). He was afterwards given to Terentia, who enfranchiſed him. After this Tyrannion ſet up a ſchool in Rome, and compoſed ſixty-eight books. One of them was written to prove, that the Latin tongue was deſcended from the Greek (b). This Terentia had been Cicero's wife [B].

(a) His Name was Dymas.

(b) Ex Suida.

[A] Becauſe he was the diſciple of the preceding.] I do not know where Lloyd, Hoffman, and Moreri, have found that he aſſumed his uncle Tyrannion's name; for Suidas whom they cite, ſays no ſuch thing, and I cannot find it in the Paris edition of Charles Stephens 1620, nor in that of Geneva 1662.

[B] This Terentia had been Cicero's wife.] Though Suidas has not diſtinguiſhed the times, Moreri ought not to confound them. He ought not to ſay that Damas bought Tyrannion, nor that he gave him to Terence, Cicero's wife. He who bought the ſlave was called Dymas, and no body ſaid that it was he who preſented him to this woman. He ought to have named her Terentia and not Terence: and to prevent miſtakes, he ought not to have uſed an expreſſion which ſignifies that Cicero was then alive. He had been dead a long time: Terentia was neither his wife nor his widow; for he had divorced her ſeveral years before his death.

TIRAQUELLUS (Andrew) in French Tiraqueau, one of the moſt learned men of the XVIth century, was born at Fontenai-le Comte, a town of Poitou (a). I have but little to add to what Teiſſier and Moreri have already ſaid of him (b). I ſhall only ſay, that it is not at all probable he had ſo many children as ſome authors beſtow on him. They make the number amount to forty-five, and tell us that if he had drank wine, he had been yet much more fruitful, as well in the productions of his pen, as in thoſe of his bed [A]. He died very old in the year 1558 [B], Some have been much

(a) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. ii. pag. 18, ſays he was born at Fontanablau Terra del diſtretto di Poictiers. - - - Fontainebleau, an eſtate in the diſtrict of Poictiers.

(b) Moreri has committed two faults, which I correct in the remark [B].

[A] They make the number of his children amount to forty-five, and tell us, &c.] Not long ſince, I read in a Theſis de aquæ calidæ potu, maintained at Helmſtad, under Henry Meibomius, in the year 1689, that tho' Tiraquellus drank only water, he was father of forty-five children, and author of as many books, on which occaſion theſe four verſes are mentioned:

Fœcundus facundus aquæ Tiraquellus amator
Terquindecim librorum & liberûm parens,
Qui niſi reſtinxiſſet aquis abſtemius ignes,
Impleſſet orbem prole animi atque corporis.

Learn'd Tiraquellus, tho' to water true,
Yet forty-five both books and children knew;
And had his fire not been by water chill'd,
His double offspring muſt the world have fill'd.

I dare aver, that the fact is ſtretched too far (§α). Thuanus could not have been ignorant of a thing ſo remarkable as this, and would undoubtedly have mentioned it, if he had believed it true: but he contents himſelf with ſaying that Tiraquellus beſtowed a book and a child on the public every year (1). Some other writers have particularized the number; but confine themſelves to thirty. Tiraquellus was no leſs fruitful in the production of the children of his mind than of thoſe of his body; for in thirty years not one paſſed in which he did not give the world a book and a ſon, and if on the one ſide he extended his name and family by a large number of children, all excellent perſons, which he had by a virtuous wife, he acquired full as large a ſhare of glory by the great number of books with which he enriched the public; but what increaſes the wonder is, that he was thus fruitful tho' he drank only water (2). Mr Teiſſier, who cites Frey, admir. Galliæ, confines himſelf alſo to thirty (3). Nor can we reach ſo far as forty-five if we regulate ourſelves by the common obſervation of thoſe authors who mention this; they aver that Tiraquellus had but one wife, and that all his children were lawfully begotten. I am not ſurprized that this fecundity ſhould appear more wonderful to thoſe who reflect that this learned man drank only water: but this perhaps might even contribute to his prolific virtue. His natural heat would perhaps have been inflamed to an exceſſive degree by the uſe of rich wines, and in this exceſs he had been leſs fit for generation; for we are told of barren marriages, by reaſon of the too great ſalacity of the parties (4). However it be, Tiraquellus's wife had no reaſon to fear the attacks of the wits, as ſhe might have done if ſhe had been but ſeldom pregnant. Her huſband was fond of his ſtudies to an exceſſive degree; his works loudly proclaim that he ſpent whole days among his books. His writings diſcover a prodigious reading, labour, and reſearches, which require a ſtrong application. When a man is known to ſpend the day in this manner, he is ſuppoſed to have exhauſted himſelf, and to require a great deal of reſt in the night; for

Quod caret alterna requie durabile non eſt,
Hæc reparat vires feſſaque membra novat (5).

Our living to alternate reſt is due,
This can loſt ſtrength, and wearied limbs renew.

It is imagined that his ſpirits are waſted with ſtudying, writing, and reading, and that he endeavours to obtain freſh ſupplies by a ſound ſleep, inſtead of undergoing new fatigues. On this account his wife is rallied in company, ſhe is pitied, and bantered with very unacceptable complements of condolence: but if ſhe can ſhew a houſe-full of children ſhe is ſheltered from theſe jeſts. As all things have two faces, it is certain that a married author buried all day amongſt his books and papers, may paſs either for an eaſy or troubleſome

[(§α) Mr Bayle might have cited in this place, Beza's epigram, on Tiraquellus: Eſt tibi natorum quæ computat agmina conjux, Eſt tibi quæ natos bibliotheca parit, &c. Your wife with ſholes of lovely children teems, In books your ſtudy no leſs fruitful ſeems. &c. Rem. Crit.]

(1) Æque ingenii ut corporis numeroſa fecundus prole, cum ſingulis annis ſingulos libros ac liberos reipublicæ daret. Thuan. lib. xxi, pag. 432, ad ann. 1558. Sammarthanus, in Elog. pag. m. 33, ſays in general cum numeroſam ſobolem ex honeſtiſſima uxore ſuſceperit.

(2) Pierre de St Romuald, Abrége du Thréſor. Chronolog. Tom. iii, pag. m. 324, ad ann. 1558.

(3) Teiſſier, in the additions to the Elogies, Tom. i, pag. 154.

(4) See, above, the remark [H] of the article HERLICIUS.

(5) Ovid. in Epiſt. Heroïd. Epiſt. iv, ver. 89.

much more guilty of Plagiariſm towards him than ever he was towards others [C]. I have elſewhere (c) cited a paſſage, where it is obſerved that he inſerted ſeveral obſcenities in one of his books.

troubleſome huſband. This is juſt according to the wife he happens to marry. If ſhe is a coquet and looſe, he is a very eaſy huſband; for whilſt he ſtudies twelve ho[illegible]or more every day, ſhe has free liberty to diſpoſe [illegible]er perſon agreeably to her inclinations. But if ſhe would do her duty, he is not in all reſpects a good huſband, he ſometimes obliges her to wiſh herſelf a book (6), he goes to bed quite haraſſed with ſtudy, and his head full of a chapter which he could not finiſh. The inconveniencies of this diſpoſition of body and mind are viſible to every body. Note that every thing has its exceptions: in reading the lives of learned men, we may obſerve a great many of them who had large families. The reaſon is that ſome conſtitutions are ſo ſtrong and hearty, that they are ſufficient for every thing.

Obſerve, that in order to juſtify thoſe who aver that Tiraquellus had forty-five lawful children, tho' married but once, we cannot ſuppoſe of him, what the Menagiana relates of one Blunet (7), who had by his wife one and twenty chi[illegible]en at ſeven ſucceſſive births (8), three at each time; for if this learned Civilian's wife had very often brought him two or three at a time, it would have been the principal circumſtance which authors would have obſerved. But not one of them has mentioned any thing like it; on the contrary, they have told us that Tiraquellus produced every year a book and a child. Singulis annis ſingulos liberos reipublicæ daret (9).

[B] He died very old in the year 1558.) Sammarthanus obſerves two or three times almoſt in the ſame page, that Tiraquellus attained to a very great age; but he does not ſpecify the number of years: if he knew it, he is to blame, for not intimating it to his readers. I will not affirm that he did not know it, for it is his cuſtom to neglect dates. He certainly knew that Tiraquellus died in 1558, and yet he has not ſaid ſo; he makes uſe of a long periphraſis to expreſs the time of Tiraquellus's death. 'Obiit, ſays he (10), 'planè ſenex haud multò ante quàm inter Henricum 'ſecundum & Philippum Hiſpaniæ Regem poſt varias 'bellorum offenſiones de pace tandem per utriuſque 'legatos ageretur - - - - He died a very old man, not 'long before the embaſſadors on both ſides, after various 'hoſtilities, concluded a peace between Henry II, and 'Philip King of Spain.' Mr Bullart makes uſe of theſe words of Sammarthanus, and explains them with reſpect to the time he believes they point at; but he has not ſucceeded it. 'Having attained to a venerable 'and decrepit old age, he piouſly exchanged earth for 'heaven at the end of the year 1559, juſt at the time 'when Europe ſaw the charming hopes of peace begin 'to appear again after a bloody war, which divided 'its moſt potent monarchs (11)'. A rare explanation! The treaty of Cateau in Cambreſis, which gave peace to Europe, was concluded the 3d of April 1559. The world therefore could not be in hopes of this peace at the end of that year. Hence, doubtleſs, Mr Moreri was led into the miſtake he has committed in placing this Civilian's death in 1559. He has been guilty of another fault which Mr Bullart might have helped him to avoid. He ſaith Michael de l'Hôpital wrote a poem in honour of the Tiraquelli, he ought to have ſaid with Bullart in honour of Tiraquellus's writings (12). To ſpeak exactly he ought to have ſaid that Michael de l'Hôpital addreſſed one of his poems to Tiraquellus. For the reſt, Ghilini is yet more miſtaken than Mr Bullart, with reſpect to the circumſtances which Sammarthanus made uſe of: Ghilini, I ſay (13), believed that the year 1556 did but by a few days precede the peace of Cateau, betwixt Philip II and Henry II. It is a blunder, and falſity to aſſert as he doth (14), that the 23d of December 1556, was the day on which Tiraquellus died.

[C] Some have been much more guilty of plagariſm towards him, than ever he was towards others.] He accuſes Bartholomew Chaſſanæus of having ſtolen from his book de legibus connubialibus above ſix hundred pages entire, without making any alterations (15). In hunc furti nomine vehementiſſime invehitur Tiraquellus cum (16) alibi tum in tractatu de utroque retractu (17), ubi dicit eum pluſquam ſexcentas paginas integras ne vocabulo quidem mutato ex legibus ſuis connubialibus in tractatum ſuum de gloria mundi tranſcripſiſſe. Chaſſanæus had accuſed Tiraquellus of having ſtolen ſeveral things from Cælius Rhodiginus. Againſt this charge he juſtified himſelf, and accuſed Chaſſanæus in his turn. His accuſation is better grounded than that of his adverſary (18).

(c) Citation (14), of the ſecond article SANCHEZ.

(6) See Vol. ii, of the Chevræana, pag. 115, Dutch Edit.

(7) A mean citizen of Paris.

(8) Menagiana, pag. 327, of the firſt Dutch edition. It is further ſaid that he debauched his maid, who at nine months end was delivered of three boys.

(9) Thuan. lib. xxi, ad ann. 1158, pag. 432.

(10) Sammarthanus, Elog. lib. i, pag. m. 35.

(11) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, Tom i, pag. 220.

(12) Bullart, ibid.

(13) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom, ii, pag. 18.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Jacobus Thomaſius de Plagio Literario, num. 385, pag. m. 169. He quotes Speckh. Cent. I. qu. 88. n. 10. p. 376.

(16) Thomaſius quotes here ſeveral paſſages out of Tiraquellus, in Leges Connubiales.

(17) Thomaſius, quotes here, §. 1. gl. 9. num. 76, circa fin.

(18) See Thomaſius de Plagio Literario, num. 563, 564, pag. 249.

TIRESIAS, one of the moſt celebrated Soothſayers of antiquity, was the ſon of Everes (a), and of the nymph Chariclo, and derived his original from Udæus, one of thoſe (b) who proceeded from the ſerpent's teeth ſown in the earth by Cadmus. He was blind, for which ſeveral reaſons were aſſigned. Some ſaid that the gods, unwilling that he ſhould reveal to mortals what they deſired to conceal from them, ſtruck him blind. Pherecydes aſcribed it only to the anger of Minerva [A]. He ſaid that this goddeſs was ſo incenſed that ſhe had been ſeen naked by Tireſias, that ſhe put out his eyes. She was earneſtly ſollicited by Chariclo her favourite, and Tireſias's mother, to reſtore that unhappy man to his ſight. But not being able to do her that favour, ſhe endeavoured to make him ſome amends by perfecting his hearing to ſuch a degree, that he underſtood the language of all birds [B]. She alſo gave him a ſtaff, with which he could guide himſelf

[A] Pherecydes aſcribed it only to the anger of Minerva.] It will be very proper to compare this place of Apollodorus with a hymn of Callimachus (1), which ſays that Minerva having been ſeen by Tireſias, while ſhe was bathing her ſelf in company with Chariclo in the fountain Hippocrene, had no ſooner declared that he ſhould ſee no more, than he loſt his eyes. Chariclo was very much afflicted at this misfortune of her ſon. Minerva to comfort her, aſſured her, that it was an irrevocable law of the deſtinies, that all thoſe who ſaw a deity without her permiſſion, ſhould be ſeverely chaſtized (2); that a time would come when ſhe would be eſteemed a happy woman, for her ſons eſcaping with the loſs of his eyes. Minerva farther added out of her great affection for Chariclo, that ſhe would render Tireſias the moſt excellent ſoothſayer in the world; that ſhe would perfectly inſtruct him in the preſages taken from the flight of birds; that ſhe would give him a ſtaff which ſhould ſerve him inſtead of a guide; that ſhe would confer on him a long life; and that he ſhould be the only man, who after his death ſhould be eminent for his knowledge in hell, where Pluto ſhould particularly honour him.

[B] To underſtand the language of all birds.] Ἅπασαν ὀρνίθων φωνὴν ποιῆσαι συνιέναι: Omnem avium vocem feciſſe ut intelligeret. Methinks this favour of Minerva will not be underſtood in its full extent, if it be ſaid only that ſhe communicated to Tireſias a perfect knowledge of all the preſages which depend on the ſinging of birds: we muſt proceed further, and ſuppoſe that they meant that birds communicate their thoughts to one another by their notes, as men do by words; and that Tireſias received of Minerva the gift of underſtanding and interpreting this language of birds. It is thus, Porphyry underſtood the matter (3); for imagining that brutes have not only the faculty of reaſoning, but alſo that of ſpeaking to one another, he has ſaid, that Apollonius Tyanæus, Melampus, Tireſias, and Thales, underſtood and diſtinguiſhed the various languages made uſe of

(a) Moreri calls him wrong Iverus.

(b) They were called Σπαρτοὶ.

(1) Εἰς λουτρὰ τῆς Παλλάδος. In lavacrum Palladis.

(2) See an inſtance of it in the text of the article ADONIS, citation (g).

(3) Porphyr. lib. iii, de Abſtinent. See the article PEREIRA, citat. (32).

himſelf as ſafely as when he had his eyes. Heſiod tells the ſtory otherwiſe; he ſays that Tireſias having found two ſerpents copulating, he ſtruck them with his ſtaff (c) [C], and was immediately turned into a woman; that at the expiration of a certain time (d) he again found the ſame animals in the ſame ſituation, and reſumed the form of a man. Now as he had taſted the pleaſures of both ſexes (e), he was choſen judge of a diſpute which aroſe betwixt Jupiter and Juno, on the queſtion, whether women had a larger ſhare than men in the venereal pleaſure. Jupiter affirmed it, Juno denied it. Tireſias decided againſt the goddeſs Juno [D]; who was on that occaſion ſo enrag[illegible] that ſhe blinded by animals. With regard to Melampus we are told (4) that ſome ſerpents having licked his ears whilſt he ſlept, were the cauſe, that when he awaked he underſtood what the birds ſaid as they flew over his head; and that afterwards he declared to men the future events he learned that way. ‘ Qui credit iſta & Melampodi ‘ profecto aures lambendo dediſſe intellectum avium ‘ ſermonis dracones non abnuet. - - - - He who believes ‘ theſe things, will not deny the poſſibility of Melampus's being taught to underſtand the language of birds by ‘ ſerpents licking his ears.’ Theſe are Pliny's words (5), who immediately after adds that Democritus mentions the names of certain birds, whoſe blood mingled together would produce a ſerpent, which would inſtruct thoſe who eat it to underſtand the converſation of birds. Vel quæ Democritus tradit nominando aves, quarum confuſo ſanguine ſerpens gignatur, quem quiſquis ederit intellecturus ſit alitum colloquia. The Jews and ſeveral Mahometans maintain (6) that Solomon underſtood this language (7). To return to Tireſias, I obſerve that if we will take Apollodorus's expreſſion to ſignify only, that Tireſias perfectly underſtood that ſort of divination, which was properly called Augury, (or divining by birds) we ſhall find in Ælian (8) that Tireſias became principally famous on this account. Barthius imagines that this is quite contrary to Statius (9); but that conjecture is only founded on the falſe ſuppoſition that this Poet has introduced Tireſias deſpiſing auguries. I ſay this ſuppoſition is falſe, to prove which, againſt Barthius, I need only quote page 1069, of his own ſecond tome on Statius, where he acknowledges that Tireſias declares, that the other ways of ſounding the intentions of the gods, had not afforded him ſuch a profound knowledge of futurity, as what he had acquired by the invocation of the Manes. Is it deſpiſing a thing, not to acknowledge it for the very beſt of all?

[C] Struck them with his ſtaff.] Others ſay, that he trode upon them: ‘ In monte Cyllenio Tireſias ‘ dracones coeuntes calcaſſe dicitur: ob id in mulieris ‘ formam verſus, ut Ovidius refert. Deinde monitus ‘ ſortibus in eundem locum rediit, & in figuram priſtinam (10). - - - - On mount Cyllene Tireſias is ſaid to ‘ have trod upon ſerpents copulating; on which account ‘ he was turned into the form of a woman, as Ovid ‘ relates. Afterwards, by advice of the oracle he re- ‘ turned to the ſame place, and reſumed his former ſtate.’ Before Lutatius ſaid this, Hyginus had told us, ‘ In monte Cyllenio Tireſias Everis filius paſtor dra- ‘ cones venerantes dicitur baculo percuſſiſſe, alias cal- ‘ caſſe, ob id in mulieris figuram eſt converſus: ‘ Poſtea monitus à ſortibus in eodem loco, dracones ‘ cum calcaſſet, redit in priſtinam ſpeciem (11). - - - ‘ On the mountain Cyllene, Tireſias a ſhepherd, the ſon ‘ of Everes, is ſaid to have ſtruck with his ſtaff, other- ‘ wiſe to have trod upon, ſerpents in copulation, and ‘ for that reaſon to have been transformed into a woman: ‘ Afterwards being adviſed by the oracle he trod upon ‘ ſerpents in the ſame place, and reſumed his former ‘ figure.’ The commentators are very much puzzled about thoſe words, alias calcaſſe; but why ſhould not alias be taken for an adverb, after which there is no need of imagining that a gloſs hath ſlipt out of the margin into the text. Hyginus might very well mention both, in order to comprehend both traditions: but if nothing be wanting in the two mentioned paſſages, we may juſtly be ſurprized that theſe authors ſhould omit ſome eſſential circumſtances. The firſt forgot that Tireſias met a ſecond time the ſerpents copulating, and renewed his firſt blow; he forgot, I ſay, that theſe two circumſtances were neceſſary, in order to reſtore him to his manhood; he pretends that he was only obliged to return to the place. The other forgets the firſt of theſe two things. Ovid (12) with all his prolixity likewiſe forgets it. Heſiod in Apollodorus hath omitted the laſt of theſe two circumſtances; he has not told us that Tireſias ſtruck the ſecond time. Phlegon and Fulgentius are the perſons who have remembered them both. But, on the other ſide, Phlegon hath his peculiar variations; he will have it, that Tireſias ſtruck one of the ſerpents the firſt time, and the other the ſecond; but does not allow him to have ſtruck them both each time (13). Euſtathius, and the ſcholiaſt on Homer (14), as alſo Tzetzes on Lycophron, ſay, that the firſt time Tireſias killed the female and became a woman, and afterwards killing the male he was changed to a man again; and that this happened on mount Cithæron (15), and not on mount Cyllene (16).

[D] Tireſias decided againſt the goddeſs Juno.] We are told that the better to give a judicial air to this deciſion, he took into his hand the balance with which juſtice is painted. He conſidered at firſt as a ſum total the pleaſure in diſpute, then he made the diviſion, and aſſigned to each ſex its lot or quota in weight and meaſure; and pronounced that the whole being divided into ten parts the woman had nine, and the man one.

Οἴην μὲν μοίρην δέκα μοιρῶν τέρπεται ἀνήρ.
Τὰς δὲ δέκ' ἐμπίπλησι γυνὴ τέρπουσα νόημα.

Parte una è denis mas partibus oblectatur;
At mulier ſolidum coitus capit ipſa decuncem.

One part of pleaſure is the ſhare of men,
Women enjoy the other nine in ten.

Apollodorus, who cites theſe two verſes (17), ſaid juſt before, if we follow the preſent miſerable ſtate of his Greek text, that the pleaſure being divided into nineteen parts the man enjoys nine, and the woman the other ten (18); at which Juno was ſo incenſed, that ſhe deprived him of his ſight. Two things ſhew that this place is corrupted; the firſt is, that nothing can be more flat or inſipid, and more remote from the deſign of the inventers of this chimerical diſpute, than to repreſent Juno as condemned for ſo inconſiderable a difference. I ſay nothing of the ſevere puniſhment which ſhe inflicted on her judge, for a ſentence ſo little diſtant from truth; for I ſhould be anſwered that her character is choleric, haughty, and revengeful (19), and that on this occaſion her reſentment exceeded the bounds of reaſon.

Gravius Saturnia juſto
Nec pro materia fertur doluiſſe, ſuique
Judicis æterna damnavit lumina nocte (20).

Juno too angry for a crime ſo light,
Condemn'd her judge to everlaſting night.

The other reaſon is, that Apollodorus would be utterly void of judgment, if after having related the ſubſtance of the deciſion one way, he ſhould ſoon after make appear by citing the words of the ſentence, that he had miſerably falſified it. If this blow may be warded off by ſaying that we have only a ſmall abridgment of Apollodorus, what ſhall we urge againſt ſo many other authors, who follow not his text, as we have it at preſent, but the two Greek verſes he has cited, as the expreſs ſentence? Phlegon (21) and Lutatius (22) admit exactly the proportion expreſſed in theſe verſes. The Scholiaſt on Homer (23) cites theſe two lines with a very inconſiderable alteration. Euſtathius (24) quotes ſome words of them. Lucian (25) does not much differ from them at the bottom. Fulgentius differs ſtill leſs (26); and the Scholiaſt on Juvenal leſs yet (27), explaining a place where this Poet ſays, that thoſe women who were moſt fond of manly occupations, and moſt avoided thoſe of their ſex, would not become men: the reaſon he aſſigns for it, blinded him [E]: But amends was made him by the gift of prophecy [F], which Jupiter

---

(c) See in the remark [C], how this fable is variouſly reported.

(d) Ovid is the only author, that I know of who ſpecifies the time: he makes it ſeven years.

(e) Venus huic erat utraque nota. Ovid. Metam. lib. iii, ver. 323.

(4) Apollodor, Biblioth. lib. i, pag. 46.

(5) Plin. lib. x, cap. 49.

(6) Vide Pfeiffer. Theol. Judaicæ atque Mohamm. p. 307, 308.

(7) Bonaventure Baron, in the firſt Tome of the Scotus defenſus, mentions a Franciſcan Monk, who underſtood the converſations of animals, and by that means foretold things to come.

(8) Animal. Hiſt. lib. viii, cap. v. See alſo Euripides, in Phœnic. ver. 846.

(9) Barthius, in Statium, Tom. ii, pag. 1065, 1149.

(10) Lutatius, in Stat. Thebaid. lib. ii.

(11) Hygin. cap. lxxv.

(12) Metamorphoſ. lib. iii.

(13) Phlegon, de Rebus mirabil. cap. iv.

(14) In Odyſſ. K, ver. 494.

(15) In Bœotia.

(16) In Arcadia.

(17) Apoll. Bibl. pag. 193.

(18) Δεκαεννέα μοιρῶν παρὰ τὰς συνουσιας οὐσῶν, τὰς μὲν ἐννέα ἄνδρας ἥδεσθαι τὰς δὲ δέκα, γυναῖκας. De novem ac decem quæ inter coëundum voluptatis partes capiuntur, novem mares ac mulieres decem ſentire. Id, ibid. pag. 191.

(19) Es germana Jovis Saturnique altera proles, Irarum tantos volvis ſub pectore fluctus. Can Saturn's iſſue and Heaven's other heir, Such endleſs anger in her boſom bear? Æneid. lib. xii, ver 830.

(20) Ovid. Metam. lib. iii, ver 333.

(21) Phleg. de Rebus mirabil. cap. iv.

(22) In Statium, apud Barthium, Tom. ii, p. 318.

(23) In Odyſſ. K, ver. 494. Vide Munckerum in Hygin. pag. 128.

(24) In eumd. loc. Odyſſ.

(25) In Amoribus, where he ſays that according to Tireſias. Ἡ θήλεια τέρψις ὅλη μοίρα πλεονεκτεῖ τὴν ἄῤῥενα, muliebris delectatio tota parte maſculam ſuperat. - - - The woman's pleaſure exceeds the man's, by one part.

(26) Tireſias dixit tres uncias habere virum amoris, & novem feminam. - - - Tireſias ſaid the man had three parts, the woman nine. Fulgent. Mythol. lib. ii, cap. viii.

(27) Una uncia libidinis eſt in maſculis, undecim in feminis. - - - The men have one part, the women eleven. Scholiaſt. Juven. in Sat. VI, ver. 253.

it, is the too unequal diviſion of the venereal pleaſure.

> Quæ fugit à ſexu, viros amat, hæc tamen ipſa
> Vir nollet fieri; nam quantula noſtra voluptas!
>
> Inur'd to arms, and her own ſex to fly,
> Yet to be wholly man ſhe would diſclaim,
> To quit her ten-fold pleaſure at the game,
> For frothy praiſes, and an empty name.
>
> DRYDEN.

I ought not to forget that Barthius ſeems to me very happy in his correction of the text of Apollodorus in pag. 319, and 1066, of the ſecond volume on Statius.

Some may aſk whether this pretended judgment of Tireſias, is ſupported by natural or moral reaſons. As for the reaſons deducible from nature, I refer them to the Phyſicians; who, in all probability, will find it very difficult to give a clear deciſion of this queſtion. And as for moral reaſons, I do not believe any ſtronger can be alledged, than that it is agreeable to a wiſe and bounteous providence, ſuch as that of God, to make compenſations, and to multiply the female pleaſure in proportion to the whole train of loathings, inconveniencies, and pain, which the women endure from their conception to their delivery. On this foot, the ſhare of pleaſure ought to be prodigiouſly unequal in favour of that ſex: but beſides that the law of compenſations would be attended with conſequences that muſt lead too far; it may be ſaid that God has thouſands and thouſands of ways of compenſation beſides this, ſo that nothing can be determined about any of theſe ways in particular. But the beſt morality of this fable is never to mention this pretended hiſtory of Tireſias, without adding, that it is falſe, as well in fact as reaſon. The neceſſity of this addition Brantome will confirm to you. ‘I knew, ſays he (28), a young lady, of a very good and great family, who was ruined and became a whore, by having heard her ſchool-maſter relate the ſtory or rather fable of Tireſias, who having experienced both ſexes, was choſen by Jupiter and Juno, to decide a diſpute betwixt them, whether the male or female enjoyed moſt pleaſure in the act of copulation. The judge decided againſt Juno, that the woman enjoyed by far the greateſt pleaſure: the goddeſs enraged at the ſentence againſt her ſtruck the poor judge blind. It is not to be wondered at, if this girl was tempted by ſuch a ſtory: For as ſhe had often heard her companions, or other women ſay that the men ſo ardently purſued that pleaſure, and took ſo great delight in it, and that the women, according to Tireſias's verdict, took a great deal more, ſhe therefore muſt needs try it. Such leſſons are, indeed, very proper for girls! Are there no other for them? But their maſters will anſwer, that they will know every thing, and if in the courſe of their reading, hiſtories or fables occur, which want explanation, (or explain themſelves) they muſt explain them, and muſt not ſkip them, or turn to the next page. How many ſtudious girls have been undone by reading this very ſtory, that of Biblis and Caunus, and ſuch like, in Ovid's Metamorphoſis?’

As there are ſome who have objected, that I was in the wrong to ſuppoſe that this queſtion ſhould be referred to Phyſicians, it is neceſſary I ſhould ſhew them that it has been in reality debated and diſcuſſed already in Phyſical treatiſes. I can juſtify this with ſo much the more liberty, becauſe my whole quotation will be either in Italian or Latin: Queſto ſuo donare naſce dalla ſfrenata ſua libidine, e dal prendere maggior piacere nel atto venereo, che gli huomini non pigliano, e non ſentono: Come prova Avicenna nel libro nono, e venteſimoprimo de gli animali, & Hali Abbate nel ſeſto libro della ſua Teorica in queſto propoſito diſſe Duplicia eſt in fæmina concubitus voluptas, quia præter ſeminis motum, & orificii vulvæ in ſuggendo quoque naſcitur oblectatio, vulva ipſa diverſimode mota; il che conferma anco Galeno nel quarto libro de morbis, & ſymptomatis. E lo dimoſtra il giuditio di Tireſia, ſecondo i Poeti. . . . . . E lo confermò anco Pietro Aponenſe ſopra il decimo quinto problema d'Ariſtotile; benche Polibio in quel ſuo libro de genitura provi il contrario, facendo due voluttà: voluttà intenſiva, & eſtenſiva, voluttà intenſiva chiamando l'ultima, & eſtrema nel mandare fuora il ſeme genitale, & in queſta vuole, che ſi diletta più l huomo: eſtenſiva intende quella, la quale ſi piglia innanzi l'emiſſione nel maneggiarſi: & in queſta vuole ſi diletta più la donna, onde Gorreo Pariſino medico dottiſſimo nelle annotationi al libro di Polibio ſcriſſe le ſeguenti parole à favor delle Donne: Tametſi maribus ſemen calidius acrius copioſiuſque ineſt, motuque ipſi majore quam fæminæ in coitu concutiuntur, pluſque multò caloris, & ſpiritus obtinent, quamobrem ex his major eſſe maris quam fœminæ videri poſſit. Verum in fœmina alia privatim conſiderare oportet, quæ inter præcipuas, & potiſſimas voluptatis venereæ cauſſas eſſe poſſunt. Si quidem ejus uterus magno virili Seminis deſiderio tenetur, ipſumque mirum in modum appetit, & attrahendo, ſugendo, concipiendoque impenſiſſimè delectatur, eſt enim ea in re uterus ventriculo ſimilis, ſicut enim iſte ſuavibus cibis, potibuſque gaudet, eoſque avidiſſimè amplectitur; ita ille ſemen amat, habetque gratiſſimum. Mario Equicola nel quarto libro de natura amoris. Dice, che ſe ciò foſſe vero, che le donne haveſſero maggior piacere che gl'huomini non hanno nell' atto venereo ſempre le femine ricercherebbono i maſchi, del che (dice egli) ſi vede tutto il contrario (29).

[E] She was ſo enraged that ſhe blinded him.] Apollodorus does not acquaint us in what manner: but Hyginus informs us that ſhe did it with her own hand, Juno irata manu averſa eum excæcavit (30). - - - - - Juno in a paſſion ſtruck out his eyes with the back of her hand. Phlegon's expreſſion may very well be interpreted, that ſhe did it with her bodkin, κατανύξαι αὐτοῦ τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς. She pricked out his eyes. The ſcholiaſt on Statius adds, that ſhe cut off his hands; illa irata manus ejus præcidit & excæcavit; - - - ſhe in her fury cut off his hands, and blinded him. But he being the only author who ſays this, it is probable this place is corrupted. Barthius corrects it thus; manus ei ſuperjecit & excæcavit; - - - ſhe laid her hands upon him, and blinded him; and confirms this conjecture from Apollodorus, who ſpeaking of the puniſhment inflicted by Minerva on Tireſias, ſays ſhe did it with her own hands; τὴν δὲ ταῖς χερσὶ τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς αὐτοῦ καταλαβομένην πηρὸν ποιῆσαι (31); She laid hold of his eyes with her hands, in order to blind him.

[F] Amends was made him by the gift of prophecy.] He acquieſced in this exchange; it does not appear that he regretted the loſs of his eyes: he is never introduced deploring his deſtiny; this had not been conſiſtent with decency, after the great knowledge which his mind was ſuppoſed to have received. ‘Augurem Tireſiam quem ſapientem fingunt Poëtæ nunquam inducunt deplorantem cæcitatem ſuam. At vero Polyphemum Homerus cum immanem ferumque finxiſſet, cum ariete etiam colloquentem facit, ejuſque laudare fortunas quod quo vellet ingredi poſſet, & quæ vellet attingeret. Rectè hoc quidem, nihilo enim erat ipſe cyclops quàm aries ille prudentior (32). - - - - - Tireſias, the Soothſayer, who is deſcribed as a wiſe man by the Poets, is never introduced by them as deploring his blindneſs. But Homer having deſcribed Polyphemus as cruel and fierce, introduces him converſing with a ram, and envying it's lot, in being able to run and ſkip wherever it pleaſed. And in this he was conſiſtent, for the Cyclops himſelf was in no reſpect wiſer than the ram.’ Let the Cyclops, let ignorant men believe that the loſs of bodily ſight, is the loſs of the joys of this world. It is true, that all the unthinking crew are not agreed on this principle, witneſs the two begging rogues mentioned in the XIXth Serée of Bouchet. They were at a church-door, and could not agree what was the joy of this world; for the blind man cried out, Beſtow your alms on a poor man, who has loſt the joys of this world: The other raſcal, who by a faulcon-ſhot had loſt what ſhould have been in his codpiece, told him he lied, and averred that it was he who had loſt the joy of this world.

We are told of a Princeſs who would have put it out of diſpute by condemning the firſt of theſe beggars. The ſtory runs thus: ‘A Princeſs of great virtue, who remained a virgin all her life, loſt her ſight in her piter beſtowed on him. He acquired a great reputation by his divining ſcience [G], notwithſtanding which he was ignorant that the water of the fountain Tilphuſa would prove fatal to him; for having fled with his countrymen [H] in the time of the ſecond Theban war, he drank of this water and died. This is what we find in Apollodorus concerning him (f). We ſee in Strabo (g), that the Thebans at that time fled for refuge to the mountain Tilphuſa, that at the foot of this mountain there was a fountain of the ſame name, and that Tireſias's tomb was there alſo. Pauſanias (b) agrees with Strabo concerning the place where Tireſias's tomb was ſituated. This was, I confeſs, not very far diſtant from Alalcomenium; but yet Moreri is very much miſtaken, when he ſays (i) that Alalcomenium was remarkable for Tireſias's tomb. We have given, in its proper place, the article of MANTO, the worthy daughter of this great Diviner, to whom ſhe ſerved as a guide, and was the ſtaff of his old age (k); for it muſt not be forgot that he lived very

---

(28) Brantome, Mémoirs des Dames Galantes, Tom. ii, p. 45.

(29) Giuſeppe Paſſi of the academy of the Signori Riccovrati di Padoua, & Informi di Ravenna, in the 33*d and* 34*th pages of a book called* i Donneſchi Difetti, Printed at Venice 1618, in 4to, it is the fourth edition.

(30) Hygin. cap. lxxv. Vigenere upon Philoſtratus, pag. 50, of Tom. ii, in 4*to, renders it,* Junon indigné de cela lui donna une arrieremain dont il demeura aveugle.

(31) Barth. in Stat. Tom. ii, pag. 318. See alſo Munckerus in Hygin. pag. 128.

(32) Cicero, Tuſculan. V. circa fin.

'her old age: being in that condition, a poor blind 'man was led to her coach-ſide, and cried out to her, 'My good lady, have pity on a poor man who has 'loſt the joys of this world: the Princeſs hearing this, 'aſked one of her women, What is the matter with 'that man, is he then an eunuch? No, madam, re'plied the waiting-woman, it is becauſe he is blind, 'alas, poor man! He is in the right, ſaid the Princeſs, 'indeed I did not think of that. The natural ſimplicity 'of this good Princeſs's queſtion pleaſantly enough diſco'vered her opinion concerning the joys of this 'world (33).' It is very probable that Malherbe would have decided the diſpute conformably to the opinion of the beggar, who had loſt by a faulcon-ſhot, &c. For, his weakneſs, in that reſpect, made him inconſolable, and he would rather have choſen to be in a condition to reap the ladies favours, than to obtain the higheſt dignities of the king his maſter (34). By the pathetic air of his complaints (35) one would be apt to judge that he had been more than once in the ſame diſagreeable condition of the pretended hermit, who, in vain, had the charming Angelica at his mercy.

Già reſupina ne l'arena giace
A tutte voglie del Vecchio rapace.

Egli l'abbraccia, & à piacer la tocca.
Et ella dorme; è non puè fare iſchermo;
Hor le bacia il bel petto, hora la bocca:
Non è chi'l veggia in quel loco aſpro & ermo,
Ma ne l'incontro il ſuo deſtrier trabocca,
Ch'al deſio non riſponde il corpo infermo,
Era mal'atto, perche havea tropp'anni.
Et potrà peggio, quanto più l'affanni.

Tutte le vie, tutti li modi tenta:
Ma quel pigro rozzon non però ſalta.
Indarno il fren gli ſcote, è lo tormenta,
E non può far, che tenga la teſta alta (36).

Racan, Malherbe's good and faithful ſcholar, had alſo his maſter's taſte; he would not have parted with the remainder of his vigour for all the triumphs of the greateſt conqueror's, nor for all the policy of prime miniſters. I am not at all ſurprized, ſays he, in a letter wrote to Balzac (37), that N. hath adventured to cenſure your eloquence, ſince Mr de Malherbe has had the impudence to accuſe me of frigidity, when he himſelf is nothing but meer ice, and his laſt miſtreſs died of age, the laſt hard winter: In boaſting of the miracles of his youth, he plays a ſure game, there being none living who can give him the lie; as to my own part, I would not exchange the remainder of mine for the victories of the Prince of Orange, or the wiſdom of Cardinal Richelieu, and ſhould be very ſorry to change conditions with my accuſer. Malherbe's raillery ran thus: 'As for paſto'rals, his caſe ſucceeds the beſt in the world, but 'certainly as to what relates to the ſhepherdeſſes it 'could not go worſe. This affair requires a ſort of 'application of which his lazineſs is incapable. If he 'attacks a place it is in ſuch a manner as to make it 'believed, that it would be only an incumbrance to 'him if he had it; and if he takes it, he ſo ſlightly 'keeps it that it muſt be ſuppoſed a woman has been 'very much ſurprized who has broke her faſt for ſuch 'a wretched morſel (38).' Malherbe does not here ſpeak of himſelf in the third perſon, as I once imagined: he ſpeaks of his diſciple Racan, and it is on this account, that Racan juſtifies himſelf, and inſults the other in the paſſage juſt now cited. But be it as it will, here is a couple of mean, carnal men, to whom Minerva could not have made amends, if inſtead of blinding them, as ſhe did Tireſias, ſhe had made them eunuchs.

I conclude with the thought of a Philoſopher, but a Philoſopher who was of a ſect more reprobate and heretical in their notions of pleaſure, than that of Epicurus. He had loſt his eyes, and hearing the good women deplore his condition, he aſked them, whether nocturnal enjoyments were not to be accounted pleaſures. Illud Antipatri Cyrenaici eſt quidem paulo obſcœnius, ſed non abſurda ſententia eſt. Cujus cæcitatem quum mulierculæ lamentarentur, quid agitis, inquit? an vobis nulla videtur voluptas eſſe nocturna (39)?

[G] He acquired a great reputation by his divining ſcience.] This appears by ſeveral paſſages in Sophocles, and other antient authors. He was the only ſage in Hell (40), if we believe Homer (41).

Τῷ καὶ τεθνειῶτι νόον πόρε Περσεφόνεια
Οἴῳ πεπνύσθαι. τοὶ δὲ, σκιαὶ ἀΐσσȣσιν.

Huic etiam mortuo mentem tribuit Proſerpina
Solus ut ſaperet, reliqui verò umbræ circumvolitant.

Among the other flutt'ring ſhades below,
He only had Hell's favourite gift, to know.
Mr POPE.

He was honoured as a god after his death (42). Yet I cannot find, in the ninth book of Strabo, what Charles Stephens, Lloyd, Moreri, and Hofman quote from it, viz. that the inhabitants of Thebes paid divine honours to Tireſias, interred near Tilphuſa. I find only in Pauſanias (43) that they had in their city a place called Tireſias's obſervatory, οἰωνοσκοπεῖον Τειρεσίȣ, (which probably was the place from whence he contemplated the auguries) and an honorary tomb, or Cenotaphium: for the Thebans owned that he died near Haliartus (44); and conſequently that they had not his tomb amongſt them. The Hiſtorian has furniſhed them with a very odd argument; but it does not much concern us. Thoſe gentlemen who have cited Strabo, would have found their account much better in Didorus Siculus; who informs us that the Thebans celebrated a pompous funeral to Tireſias, and paid him divine honours (45).

[H] Having fled with his country-men.] Mr Moreri has very much miſtaken his original Charles Stephens, when he ſays, that Tireſias being in exile near the fountain Tilphuſa, died there. Charles Stephens's Latin runs thus; 'Juxta fontem ejuſdem nominis, ubi pro'fugus diem ſuum obiit: - - - Near a fountain of the 'ſame name, whither having fled, he died.' Which is taken from Strabo, ὑφ' ᾧ Τιλφωσσα κρήνη καὶ τὸ τȣ̃ Τειρεσίȣ μνῆμα ἐκεῖ τελευτήσαντος κατὰ τὴν φυγὴν, ſub quo fons eſt Tilphoſa, & monumentum Teireſiæ qui extorris ibi mortem obiit. If Mr Moreri had been acquainted with the hiſtory of Tireſias, he would not have rendred the word profugus by that of exile. From hence we may infer, that tranſlators are liable to commit ſtrange blunders, when they do not underſtand their ſubject; for they may, indeed, know three or four ſignifications of the ſame word, but this does not hinder them from chuſing that which by no means agrees with this or that place. I obſerve a conſiderable difference betwixt Strabo and Pauſanias. The firſt

---

(f) Biblioth. lib. iii, pag. 191, 197, Edit. Salmur. 1661.

(g) Lib. ix, pag. m. 285. See alſo pag. 283.

(b) Lib. ix, pag. m. 307.

(i) In the article of ALALCOMENIUM; for he forgot it in that of Tireſias: he places that monument right, and quotes Strabo.

(k) O noſtræ regimen vireſque ſenectæ. Stat. Theb. lib. iv, ver. 536.

(33) Mr de Cailliere, of the French Academy, Recueil des bons Contes & des bons Mots, pag. 132, Dutch Edit. 1693.

(34) See the article MALHERBE, remark [B].

(35) See his Letter to Balzac, in the collection of new Letters, printed at Paris, 1642, pag. 65.

(36) Arioſto, Orlando furioſo, Canto Ottavo, Stanza xlviii, & ſeq.

(37) Racan, Letter to Balzac, in Tom. ii, of the Collection of new Letters, printed at Paris, by Touſſaint Quinet, in 1634, pag. 295, & ſeq.

(38) Malherbe, Letter to Balzac, pag. 61, of the Collection of new Letters, printed at Paris in 1642.

(39) Cicero, Tuſcul. lib. v, fol. 278, B.

(40) See what what has been quoted out of Callimachus, in the remark [A].

(41) Odyſſ. K. ver. 494.

(42) Clem. Alexandr. I Stromat.

(43) Lib. ix, pag. 294, 295.

(44) That town was not far from the mountain Tilphuſa.

(45) Θάψαντες λαμπρῶς οἱ Καδμεῖοι τιμαῖς ἰσοθέοις ἐτίμησαν. In the tranſlation printed at Baſil, in 1548, lib. v, cap. vi, p. 124. Quem ſui cives magna cum pompa ſepelivere, Deorum ſibi honores tribuentes, there is ſibi, inſtead of ipſi.

very long [I]. Some beſtow on him another daughter called Hiſtoris (l), who by an ingenious ſtratagem deceived the goddeſs Lucina, and was the occaſion that Alcmena, whoſe labour had been prolonged by that goddeſs, was happily delivered. There has been handed about a certain book under Tireſias's name, by an impoſture which has been practiſed a thouſand times. This book treated of the preſages of frankincenſe, de thuris ſignis. It is twice cited by the ſcholiaſt on Statius (m). Tireſias dealt in all ſorts of predictions; he made uſe of Pyromancy (n), Capnomancy, Necromancy, &c. The latter, which conſiſted in calling upon the dead, pleaſed him more than the reſt (o); this he exerciſed very imperiouſly [K], and would not ſuffer the ghoſts to be tardy in appearing. As he was blind, Manto his daughter was obliged to inform him of the phenomena of fire, and ſmoak, &c. (p). Lucian in his treatiſe of Aſtrology obſerves, that Tireſias taught that the planets have not all the ſame virtue, nor the ſame ſex.

firſt makes Tireſias die in his flight without falling into the power of his enemies: the ſecond, on the contrary, depending on the Grecian hiſtories, ſays (46), that thoſe of Argos having taken the city of Thebes, were carrying Tireſias with the reſt of their booty, to the temple of Delphi, but that he died in the way, by drinking of the fountain of Tilphuſa. Diodorus Siculus (47) relates the fact in the ſame manner as Strabo. An author (48), whoſe memory I honour, ſaith, that Tireſias, in his latter days, retired to the mountain called Tilphoſſa, to end his life in repoſe, and remote from the tumults of the city. He does not cite any authority; but I make no doubt he had met with it in ſome celebrated writer. We muſt, however, ſay, that this retreat of Tireſias was not at all voluntary.

[I] He lived very long.] Hyginus, Phlegon, and Lutatius, agree in ſaying that Jupiter repaired Tireſias's loſs of ſight, by granting him, together with the knowledge of futurity, a life ſeven times as long as that of others ſeptem ætates (49). Agatharcides mentions but five ages; Lucian ſix: but, according to Tzetzes, ſome have made Tireſias eleven times the age of man (50).

[K] This he exerciſed very imperiouſly.] Seneca makes him uſe menacing words.

Carmenque magicum volvit, & rabido MINAX
Decantat ore, quicquid aut placat leves,
Aut cogit umbras (51).

His furious voice the Magic charm repeats,
While trembling ghoſts obey his awful threats.

Statius introduces him armed with threats and reproaches.

Atque hic Tireſias nondum adventantibus umbris
Teſtor ait, Divos quibus hunc ſacravimus ignem,
Jam nequeo tolerare moram. Caſſuſne ſacerdos
Audior, an rabido jubeat ſi Theſſala cantu
Ibitis, & Scythicis quoties armata venenis
Colchis aget, trepido pallebunt tartara motu?
Noſtri cura minor? . . . .

. . . .

Ne tenues annos nubemque hanc frontis opacæ
Spernite ne, moneo, & nobis ſævire facultas,
Scimus enim & quidquid dici noſcique timetis (52).

And here Tireſias, while the ghoſts delay'd,
Ye gods whoſe ſacred fires now blaze, he ſaid,
I cannot bear this loit'ring. Do I ſeem
An unſkill'd Prieſt? or at the witch's ſcream,
Muſt you obey, while her Theſſalian charms,
And Colchic pois'nous drugs all Hell alarms?
And ſhall you fear me leſs? . . . .

. . . .

You had not beſt, I friendly now adviſe,
My weaker years, and periſh'd ſight deſpiſe;
I too can make you tremble when I will,
And fly obſequious to my Magic ſkill.

See in Lucan (53) a long train of threats uttered by the Theſſalian witch againſt the infernal gods. This ſtile was very common in the magical rites. A Pagan Philoſopher ridicules them with a great deal of reaſon. Πολλῷ δὲ τούτων ἀλογώτερον, τὸ μὴ δαίμονι, εἰ τύχοι, ἢ ψυχῇ τεθνηκότος, αὐτῷ δὲ τῷ βασιλεῖ Ἡλίῳ, ἢ Σελήνῃ, ἢ τινι, τῶν κατ' οὐρανὸν ἀνθρώπων τῷ τυχόντι ὑποχείριον, ἀπειλὰς προσφέροντα ἐκφοβεῖν, ψευδόμενον ἵν' ἐκεῖνοι ἀληθεύσωσι. Quodque omnium abſurdiſſimum eſt, non jam vulgari cuipiam Dæmoni, aut defuncti animæ, ſed ipſimet Soli ſyderum principi, Lunæ, reliquiſque Diis cœleſtibus, homo cuivis e Populi fæce obnoxius minas intentat, atque ut eos ad vera dicenda compellat, falſum vanumque terrorem oſtendit (54). - - - But what is moſt abſurd in all this is, that not only a common dæmon, ſuppoſe, or a departed ſpirit, but even the majeſty of the ſun, or the moon, or ſome other of the celeſtial gods ſhall be frighted with threats by any vulgar wretch, and by falſe terrors compelled to ſpeak truth. This puts me in mind of our popular ſtories concerning Magic: I do not mean the moſt common ſort of ſtories, but thoſe which ſeem to be eminent above the reſt. It is pretended that there are ſome Magicians who exerciſe a ſort of command even to compulſion, over thoſe ſpirits which they raiſe up. As abſurd as this may ſeem, it may be thought poſſible, if we ſhould once allow that certain covenants or treaties are entered into betwixt men and evil angels: for there being doubtleſs a ſubordination amongſt theſe ſpirits, there may be ſome dæmons who reign abſolute over ſeveral others; cannot one of theſe ſuperior dæmons promiſe his Magicians that he will ſubject to them all the ſpirits under his command? Cannot he promiſe them to threaten thoſe with his diſpleaſure who ſhould prove ungovernable? Thuanus, who was preſent at a dialogue betwixt the Sieur de Calignon and a famous Magician, relates that the Magician did not deny his commerce with dæmons, but affirmed that his Magic tended only to the doing good to mankind, and that there was a very great difference between Sorcerers and Magicians. A Magician, ſaid he, has no correſpondence with any other than the aërial and celeſtial ſpirits, who are good and beneficent, and teach him a thouſand very profitable ſecrets, and beſides he commands thoſe ſpirits. But a Sorcerer is a vile ſlave to terreſtrial ſpirits naturally malignant and enemies to mankind. He added that there were ſchools of Magic in Spain, and that there had been alſo very flouriſhing ones in Germany, which were moſt of them diſperſed ſince Luther had divulged his Hereſies. ‘ Tam preclaræ artis ſcholas toto terrarum orbe ac profeſſores ſparſos, & adhuc in Hiſpania Toleti, Cordubæ, Granatæ, aliiſque ſocis frequentari, fuiſſe olim & in Germania celeberrimas, ſed magna ex parte defeciſſe, poſtquam Lutherus ſeminato hæreſis ſuæ fermento, tot ſectatores habere cepit (55). - - - That there are ſchools of ſo famous an art, and profeſſors diſperſed over the whole earth, and ſtill frequented in Spain, at Toledo, Corduba, Granada, and other places, as there were alſo ſome very much celebrated in former times in Germany, but are now moſt of them deſerted, ſince Luther, by ſpreading the leaven, of his Hereſy began to draw after him ſo many followers.’ He did not confeſs to his judges all that he owned to the Sieur Calignon; but this did not prevent the Parliament of Paris condemning him to death upon the evidence produced againſt him. The thing is in my opinion remarkable enough to deſerve being laid before my readers in Thuanus's own words (56): ‘ Magiam quam profitebatur Bellomontius, dæmonum, qui numinis divini particula ſunt, cum hominibus conciliatricem artem præclaram eſſe ad beneficium inventam non ad maleficium, quo Sortiarii qui vocantur vulgo utuntur, ipſi malorum ſpirituum vilia mancipia in

---

(l) Pauſan. lib. ix, pag. 290.

(m) See Barthius, in Stat. Tom. ii, pag. 1106, and Tom. iii, pag. 673.

(n) Ille coronatos jamdudum amplectitur ignes, Fatidicum ſorbens vultu flagrante vaporem. Stat. Theb. lib. x, ver. 598. See alſo Seneca, in Oedipo, Act. ii, Scen. ii.

(o) See the end of the remark [B].

(p) Stat. Theb. lib. x, ver. 598; and Senec. in Oedipo, Act. ii, Scen. ii.

(46) Pauſan. lib. ix, p. 307.

(47) Diod. Sicul. lib. v, cap. vi.

(48) Petrus Muſſardus (de quo vide Deckherrum de Scriptor. Adeſpot. pag. 397, Edit. 1686) Hiſt. Deor. fatidicorum, pag. 87.

(49) Some render it ſeven ages.

(50) See Munckerus, in Hygin. pag. 128.

(51) Seneca, in Oedipo, Act. iii, Sc. i.

(52) Statius, Theb. lib. iv, ver 500.

(53) Pharſal. lib. vi, ver. 732, & ſeq.

(54) Porphyrius, apud Euſebium, Præparat. Evangel. lib. v, cap. x, pag. 198, A.

(55) Thuanus, ubi infra, pag. 1234. See the remark [H], of the article PONTIUS.

(56) Thuanus, de Vita ſua, lib. vi, pag. 1233, 1234.

He was the inventer of Auſpices (q). He was worſhipped as a god at Orchomenus; his oracle was famous there for ſeveral ages, but ſilenced at laſt after a plague had rendred that city deſolate (r). Perhaps all the directors of the oracle periſhed by the contagion: or perhaps they believed that a god who ſuffered the inhabitants of Orchomenus to be deſtroyed by the plague, was not capable of predicting future events. I take no notice of ſupernatural reaſons.

(q) Auſpicia avium Tireſias Thebanus (invenit.) Plinius, lib. vii, cap. 56. pag. 102.

(r) Plut. de Oracul. defectu, pag. 434.

crassam ignorantiam demerſi, & veneno ac diris faſcinationibus eorum arbitrio perniciem humano generi machinantes, cum contra magi ipſis dæmonibus imperent, & eorum conſortio ac familiaritate arcana naturæ vulgo ignota nec libris prodita cognoſcere, futura rimari, mala declinare, pericula antevertere, amiſſa recuperare, corpora citerius quam humana ratione fieri poſſit, de loco in locum transferre, diſſidenteis componere, patres cum filiis, uxores cum maritis, & amicitiam cum iis quibus debet conciliare diſcant, denique ſibi rem cum aeriis ſpiritibus & cœlo participantibus eſſe, qui natura benefici nihil niſi juvare ſciunt, cum terreſtres & ſubterranea incolentes, qui Sortiariis imperant, ſint maligni & nocere tantum noverint: tam præclaræ artis ſcholas, &c (57). - - - Beaumont pretended that the Magic he profeſſed was the art of maintaining a commerce between ſpirits (who are a particle of the Deity) and men, invented for good and not for miſchief, which laſt is the end propoſed by thoſe called Sorcerers, themſelves being the vile drudges of evil ſpirits, and plunged into the moſt groſs ignorance, and with poiſon and dreadful enchantments by their direction contriving deſtruction to mankind; when, on the contrary, Magicians command the ſpirits themſelves, and by their commerce and acquaintance are able to find out the ſecrets of nature which are unknown to the vulgar, and not to be met with in books, to forſee futurities, to ſhun evils, to prevent dangers, to recover loſſes, to tranſport the body from place to place quicker than is poſſible by human means, to pacify enemies, to reconcile fathers with their children, huſbands with their wives, and re-eſtabliſh friendſhip where neceſſary; laſtly, that theſe have only to do with aërial ſpirits, and ſuch as partake of Heaven, who being naturally beneficent, know only how to do good, while the terreſtrial and ſubterraneous ones, who have the Sorcerers under ſubjection, are malignant, and know only how to do miſchief: that there were ſchools of ſo famous an art, &c.’ See the remainder of this paſſage in citation (55) of this article. Let us conclude with Cicero's words, who informs us that Tireſias was none of thoſe vulgar Diviners who make a trade of their impoſtures, and exerciſe them only for bread. ‘Ante hos Amphiaraus & Tireſias non humiles & obſcuri, neque eorum ſimiles, ut apud Ennium eſt, qui ſui quæſtus cauſa fictas ſuſcitant ſententias, ſed clari & præſtantes viri qui avibus & ſignis admoniti futura dicebant, quorum de altero etiam apud inferos Homerus ait ſolum ſapere, cæteros umbrarum modo vagari (58). - - - Before theſe were Amphiaraus and Tireſias not mean and obſcure, nor like thoſe mentioned by Ennius, who returned forged anſwers for gain, but famous and eminent men, who by the help of birds and ſigns foretold things future, of one of whom even in Hell Homer ſays he was the only wiſe ghoſt, that the others only wandered about like ſhades.’

(57) Id. ibid.

(58) Cicero, lib. 1, de Divinat. fol. m. 310, C.

TISSANDIER (N).

Author of a book no otherwiſe known to me than by a letter of Balzac. He died very old in the year 1628 [A]. La Croix du Maine does not mention him, and I do not think Du Verdier Vau-Privas, has taken any more notice of him [B].

[A] He died very old in the year 1628.] See the letter written the ſame year by Balzac to one Mr Tiſſandier (1). He comforts him on the death of his uncle, who was as old as the Hereſy and older than the League; for he had publiſhed a book to forewarn France of the conception of this monſter, when the Cardinal de Lorrain conceived it. I need not tell you theſe are Balzac's expreſſions.

(1) It is the 18th of the eighth book in the folio edition.

[B] And I do not think Du Verdier Vau-Privas has taken any more notice of him.] I expreſs myſelf in this manner, becauſe I had not time to examine page by page whether Tiſſandier were to be met with in this writer's Bibliotheque Françoiſe. The authors are there ranged according to their Chriſtian names, and without ſubjoining a table of ſirnames. Theſe are two inexcuſable faults when they meet together. The firſt is ſupportable when it is alone, as it is in La Croix du Maine; but not to repair this by a table of ſirnames is only mocking the world.

TITIUS (CAIUS)

a Latin Poet and Orator, was a Roman knight. He carried Eloquence as far as it was poſſible for one who did not underſtand Greek [A]. His orations abounded with ſubtilties, examples, and politeneſs, ſo that they ſeemed to be compoſed in the Attic ſtile. This ſubtilty of thought did not ſucceed on the ſtage, when he employed it in his tragedies, as he had done in his pleadings. It was not lofty enough to ſupport the gravity of the tragic character (a). When the Conſul Fannius propoſed his law againſt luxurious feaſting, Titius harangued the people to repreſent the utility of that law. We ſhall ſee in the remarks whether this fact will ſerve to diſcover the time when the Lex Fannia was made [B]. The oration made by Titius at that time demonſtrates

(a) Cicero in Bruto, pag. m. 280.

[A] He carried Eloquence as far as it was poſſible for one who did not underſtand Greek.] Cicero, the beſt judge in the world, gives him this character. ‘Ejuſdem fere temporis fuit eques Romanus C. Titius: qui meo judicio eo perveniſſe videtur, quò potuit fere Latinus orator ſine Græcis literis, & ſine multo uſu pervenire. Hujus orationes tantum argutiarum, tantum exemplorum, tantum urbanitatis habent, ut pene Attico ſtylo ſcriptæ eſſe videantur. Eaſdem argutias in tragœdias ſatis ille quidem acute, ſed parum tragice tranſtulit (1). - - - About the ſame time flouriſhed C. Titius a Roman knight: who in my judgment ſeems to have arrived to as great a height as it is poſſible for a Latin Orator to reach, without a knowledge of the Greek tongue, and great experience. His Orations were ſo full of ſubtilties, examples, and politeneſs, that they ſeemed to be written in the Attic ſtile. He introduced the ſame ſubtilties into tragedies, with ingenuity enough, but very little becoming tragic compoſitions.’

(1) Cicero in Bruto, pag. m. 280.

[B] The time when the Lex Fannia was made.] I have in another place (2) examined Glandorp's opinion and found it ill grounded. This author believed (3), that he who propoſed this law was not Caius Fannius the father, Conſul in the year of Rome 592, but Caius Fannius the ſon, Conſul in the year of Rome 632. For this he offers but one proof taken from a paſſage of Aulus Gellius, which is of no force. He might have alledged ſomething more ſpecious, if he had quoted Macrobius, who acquaints us that Titius contemporary with Lucilius adviſed the people to eſtabliſh the Lex Fannia (4). It is certain that Lucilius was born in the beginning of the VIIth century of Rome: this agrees wonderfully with Glandorp's hypotheſis;

(2) In the ſecond article FANNIUS, remark [B].

(3) Onomaſtic. pag. 333.

(4) Id oſtendunt tum multi alii, tum etiam C. Titius, vir ætatis Lucilianæ, in oratione qua legem Fanniam ſuaſit. Macrob. Saturnal. lib. ii, cap. xii.

ſtrates that drunkenneſs was arrived at its higheſt pitch [C]. The miſtake of an interpreter of Horace [D], is inſupportable: he has confounded our Titius with a Titius who pothesis; for according to that Lucilius was about thirty years old, when the Lex Fannia was made. Conſequently the Orator who adviſed this law muſt be Lucilius's cotemporary. But if you place the paſſing of that law in the year 593, this Orator and Lucilius could not be cotemporaries; for the former muſt have been an old man when the other was but juſt a youth, and conſequently Macrobius furniſhes a very plauſible proof for Glandorp. This may be ſtrengthned by theſe words of Cicero, ‘ Ejuſdem fere temporis fuit Eques Romanus C. Titius; - - - About the ſame time flouriſhed Caius Titius a Roman knight.’ For he had juſt ſpoke of three or four Orators who flouriſhed towards the year of Rome 660. Titius muſt have lived very near their time, if he recommended the Lex Fannia in the year 632. But there muſt have been a great diſtance of time between him and them, if this law was paſſed in 593. Notwithſtanding all theſe reaſons I perſiſt in my opinion declared in the articles FANNIUS. That paſſage in Pliny (5) which points out the preciſe interval of eleven years betwixt the Lex Fannia and the third Punic war, is more valid than ten citations, where it is only ſaid in general, ejuſdem ætatis, ejuſdem ferme temporis. Theſe looſe expreſſions, he lived almoſt cotemporary with another, or in the ſame age with another, will admit of ſome latitude, may be lengthned or ſhortned, and ſavour of a man who does not pretend to be very nice in his Chronology, and who ſpeaks only according to the confuſed ideas of his memory. But when an author makes uſe of a determinate number, when he names exactly eleven years; it is a ſign that he took pains, that he ſearched farther into the matter, and conſequently Pliny's teſtimony is here of very great weight to fix the Lex Fannia in the year 593, ſince the year 604 was the firſt year of the third Punic war. If theſe reaſons are not admitted, what ſhall we ſay, when we conſider that according to Macrobius the Lex Fannia was enacted in the year 588, and neverthelefs he advances that Titius and Lucilius lived at the ſame time, or in the ſame century (6)? I argue thus; either Macrobius was perfectly well acquainted with the age of Lucilius, or he was not: In the firſt caſe, we ſhall be obliged to conclude according to him, that an Orator who recommended a law in 588, and a Poet born twelve years after, lived at the ſame time, and ſo his words do not at all confirm Glandorp's opinion: In the ſecond caſe they confirm it yet leſs; for no Chronological proofs can be drawn from a man, who ſpeaks at random and without pretending to exactneſs. As for Cero's ejuſdem fere temporis, it is a phraſe which does not hinder us from believing that Titius made his harangue in the year 593. Obſerve that Afranius imitated Titius (7). I do not offer this as a neceſſary and demonſtrative proof that he was younger, but only as a ſign that he was ſo. Now Afranius was cotemporary with Terence (8), who died in the year 594 (9). Thus Cicero has here furniſhed us with a ſtrong proof againſt Glandorp. Let us therefore ſay that our Titius flouriſhed about the year of Rome 590.

[C] That drunkenneſs was then at its higheſt pitch.] The Judges drank ſo much wine before they went to the bench, that they were neceſſitated to piſs plentifully in every corner. After having heard the ſtate of the caſe, they cauſed the witneſſes to be called, and in the mean time went to the chamber-pot: being returned they gathered the votes; and could ſcarce refrain from ſleeping. Going to council they uſed to ſay, why ſhould we torment ourſelves with theſe fools, let us rather take a bottle and get ſome tid-bit to eat. Thoſe who underſtand Latin will be much better pleaſed with Titius's own words, than with the abridgment I have given of them. ‘ Ludunt alea, ſtudioſe unguentis delibuti, ſcortis ſtipati, ubi horæ decem ſunt; jubent puerum vocari ut comitium eat percunctatum quid in foro geſtum ſit, qui ſuaſerint, qui diſſuaſerint, quot tribus juſſerint, quot vetuerint. Inde ad comitium vadunt, ne litem ſuam faciant: dum eunt, nulla eſt in angiporto amphora, quam non impleant, quippe qui veſicam plenam vini habeant. Veniunt in comitium triſtes, jubent dicere, quorum negotium eſt, dicunt: judex teſtes poſcit: ipſus it minctum: ubi redit, ait ſe omnia audiviſſe, tabulas poſcit, literas inſpicit. vix præ vino ſuſtinet palpebras. eunti in conſilium ibi hæc oratio: Quid mihi negotii eſt cum iſtis nugacibus: quam potius potamus mulſum mixtum vino Græco, edimus turdum pinguem, bonumque piſcem lupum germanum, qui inter duos pontes captus fuit (10)? - - - They play at dice, being perfumed with fine ointments, and attended by their whores, when the tenth hour is come; they ſend a man to the court, to inquire what has been voted in the Forum, who ſpoke for and who againſt, how many tribes gave their affirmative, and how many their negative. From thence they proceed to court, for fear they ſhould have ſome accuſation againſt themſelves; as they go along, there is never a piſſing-place in the whole ſtreet, which they do not fill, their bladders being charged with liquor. They come into court in ill humour, order the parties to proceed. The caſe is ſtated. The Judge calls for the witneſſes: he himſelf goes out to piſs: when he returns, he declares he has heard the whole, he demands the tables, looks into the writings, ſcarce can keep his eyes open, going to counſel there makes this ſpeech; Why ſhould one trouble himſelf with theſe triflers; how much better is it for us to ſit down to ſome Muſcadel and Greek wine, to eat a fine fat Thruſh, or a delicate Sturgeon, catched between two bridges?’ Macrobius who hath preſerved this curious fragment of this Oration of Titius, had cited another paſſage of the ſame in chapter IX, for we ought not to doubt that Cincius in ſuaſione legis Fanniæ, in chapter IX, is a miſtake of the tranſcribers, who by degrees changed Titius into Cincius. This other paſſage informs us, that they uſed at Rome to cook ſeveral other animals together in a Hog's-belly, and that they called this a Trojan hog, in alluſion to the Trojan horſe which was filled with ſoldiers (11). Theſe exceſſes wanted to be ſuppreſſed; Luxury was then become ſo enormous, that ſeveral children of good families proſtituted and ſold themſelves in order to gratify their palate with delicious meats: drunkenneſs was become ſo common, that the citizens went drunk to the aſſemblies, where the public affairs were debated. This is what we are informed of by Sammonicus Serenus. ‘ Lex Fannia ſanctiſſimi Auguſti, ingenti omnium ordinum conſenſu pervenit ad populum. Neque eam prætores aut tribuni, ut pleraſque alias, ſed ex omni bonorum conſilio & ſententia ipſi conſules pertulerunt, cum reſpublica ex luxuria conviviorum majora quam credi poteſt, detrimenta pateretur. Siquidem eo res redierat, ut gula illecti plerique ingenui pueri pudicitiam & libertatem ſuam venditarent; plerique ex plebe Romana vino madidi in comitium venirent, & ebrii de reipublicæ ſalute conſulerent (12). - - - The Lex Fannia propoſed under the moſt ſacred Emperor Auguſtus, was given to the people with the univerſal conſent of all orders. Nor did the Prætors or Tribunes carry it through, as they uſually do moſt others, but the conſuls themſelves by the general advice and concurrence; ſince the common-wealth received more damage than can be imagined, from the luxury of entertainments. For the thing was come to ſuch a paſs, that to gratify their palate, a great many ſons of conſiderable families ſold both their chaſtity and liberty; crowds of the Plebeians came drunk to the aſſemblies, and in that condition gave their opinions concerning the ſafety of the republic.’ The ſucceeding ages which have ſeen at Rome the moſt horrid vices, have not ſeen drunkenneſs to reign there: at preſent it is a vice not known in that country; but as for the antient Romans, they lived like our true northern nations. See the drunkenneſs of the deputies of a ſynod in the remark [A] of the article BERENGARIUS. For the reſt, I am ſurprized that Corradus, who was ſo conſummate in the Hiſtory of particular perſons, knew our Titius only by this paſſage of Cicero: he was ignorant of thoſe of Macrobius. ‘ C. Titius, ſays he in page 282 of his commentary on Cicero's Brutus, de quo ſcriptum nihil nos præterea vidimus. - - - - Caius Titius, of whom we have never met with any farther account.’

[D] The miſtake of an interpreter of Horace.] It is Corradus who takes notice of this blunder without telling us whoſe it is. ‘ Unde videtur interpres Horatii

(5) Plin. lib. x, cap. l.

(6) C. Titius, vir ætatis Lucilianæ.

(7) Quem ſtudebat imitari L. Afranius poëta, homo perargutus in fabulis quidem etiam, ut ſcitis, diſertus. Cicero, in Bruto, pag. 280.

(8) Dulces Latini leporis facetiæ per Cæcilium, Terentiumque, & Afranium, ſub pari ætate nituerunt. Paterculus, lib. i, cap. xxvii.

(9) Sueton. in Vita Terentii.

(10) Apud Macrobium, lib. ii, Saturnal. cap. xii, pag. m. 366.

(11) In ſuaſione legis Fanniæ objecit ſæculo ſuo quod porcum Trojanum menſis inferant: quem illi ideo ſic vocabant, quaſi aliis incluſis animalibus gravidum, ut ille Trojanus equus gravidus armatus fuit. Macrob. ibid. cap. ix, pag. 356.

(12) Sammonicus Serenus, apud Macrobium, Saturnal. cap. xiii, pag. 367.

who lived in the time of Auguſtus.

'ratii deceptus, qui putavit eundem Titium fuiſſe 'pindarici fontis qui non expalluit hauſtus, & eum 'qui ſcripſit tragœdias, quum hic multo ante floruerit, & ille tempore Auguſti vixerit: quamquam ille 'potuit etiam utrumque præſtare. - - - From whence 'Horace's Commentator ſeems to be miſtaken, who thought 'that Titius who was not afraid to take a draught of 'the Pindaric fountain, was one and the ſame with him 'who wrote Tragedies, ſince the latter lived long before, 'but the former in Auguſtus's time: altho' he himſelf 'was able to excel them both.' Corradus ſeems to doubt whether Horace's Titius was at the ſame time a compoſer of Odes and Tragedies, though there does not appear much foundation for doubt, when we read theſe ſix verſes of the third epiſtle of the firſt book of Horace:

Quid Titius Romana brevi venturus in ora?
Pindarici fontis qui non expalluit hauſtus,
Faſtidire lacus, & rivos auſus apertos.
Ut valet? ut meminit noſtri? fidibuſne latinis
Thebanos aptare modos ſtudet auſpice muſa?
An tragica deſævit & ampullatur in arte?

And what doth Titius, he of growing fame,
Who doth not fear to drink of Pindar's ſtream?
Who ſcorns known ſprings and lakes, that glorious he,
And is he well, and doth he think of me?
Doth he the Muſe propitious nobly ſing,
And fit to Roman harps the Theban ſtring?
Or is he writing plays and treads the ſtage,
In murd'ring verſe, and ſwells with tragic rage?
CREECH.

The antient ſcholiaſt on Horace aſſures us that he here means Titius Septimius, who had written both Lyric verſes and tragedies, and whoſe tomb was to be ſeen below Aricia. Mr Dacier, after ſeveral others, pretends that this Titius was the ſame Septimius, to whom Horace addreſſed the ſixth Ode of his ſecond book, and for whom he wrote the ninth epiſtle of his firſt book. This may be; but ſince he gives no reaſon for it, and two reaſons ſeem to oppoſe this opinion, I ſhall remain a Sceptic on this ſubject. The ſixth Ode of the ſecond book contains twenty-four verſes, not one word of which inſinuates, that Septimius was a Poet; whereas all that concerns Titius in the third epiſtle of the firſt book relates to him as a Poet only. This is my firſt reaſon. The ſecond is, that Titius, in Horace's third epiſtle, is one of the wits who accompanied Tiberius, and compoſed a ſociety of learned men in his court: whereas in the ninth epiſtle, Septimius is one who deſires Horace to introduce him to Tiberius. I can ſay nothing in particular againſt another notion of Mr Dacier: he would have Horace's Septimius, and the Septimius who ſo ardently loved Acme in the forty-ſixth epigram of Catullus, to be the ſame perſon (13).

(13) Dacier, upon the ſixth Ode of the ſecond book of Horace.

TORELLI (POMPONIO) Count of Montechiarugolo, lived in the XVIth century. He was ſon of a daughter of John Francis Picus, Count of Mirandola, and a member of the academy of the Innomati at Parma, and had there the epithet of il Perduto (a). He wrote a book intituled Trattato del Debito del Cavalliero, a Treatiſe on the Duty of a Knight, in which he gives very uſeful inſtructions to thoſe who have already attained the honour of knighthood. He choſe this ſubject, becauſe he had a ſon who was a Knight of Malta. He loſt him while his book was in the preſs, as he informs us in the Epiſtle Dedicatory, dated at Parma the 15th of February 1596. He was vaſſal to the Duke of Parma Ranuccio Farneſe, to whom he dedicated his treatiſe. He frequently cites the Poets both antient and modern, and always in Italian verſe. His morality is good, and he enters into ſo particular a detail, that he gives even (b) rules concerning what the Italians call motteggiare (c). He is ſo zealous for his religion, that he cannot acknowledge him for a true knight, who is out of the Popiſh communion (d), and inſiſts upon a knight's abandoning the ſervice of his prince who is excommunicated by the Pope (e). He is of opinion that a Heretic is almoſt always guilty of ſome enormous crime, and he cites thereupon Pius V [A]. The difference which he puts between the antient and modern Poets requires ſome limitation [B].

(a) Pomponio Torelli, del Debito del Cavalliero, folio 143, edition of Venice, 1596, in 8*vo*.

(b) Id. ibid. folio 128, verſo.

(c) That is, witty ſayings.

(d) Ibid. fol. 25.

(e) Id. ibid.

[A] He is of opinion that a Heretic is almoſt always guilty of ſome enormous crime, and he cites thereupon Pius V.] There are ſome perſecutors who do not carry their prejudices to ſo high a degree of injuſtice: for they acknowledge that there are ſome Arch-Heretics whoſe morals have been unexceptionable. Our Torelli is more rigid. Gli Heretici, ſays he, (1) Cavallieri eſſe non ponno . . . . in the printed copy to the words Gli idolatri excluſively. Solea dire Pio V. di ſantiſſima . . . . in the printed copy to the word (2) Ma excluſively.

[B] The difference which he puts between the antient and modern Poets requires ſome limitation.] Our Poetry, ſays he, is more modeſt than either the Greek or the Latin; our Poets who write love-verſes imitate Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, and Ovid, only in ſuch things as are exempt from laſciviouſneſs and obſcenity. Nella Lirica (poeſia) & Italiana, & Franceſe, & Spagnuola ſi vede, che molto . . . . in the printed copy to the words (3) Non vollero gli excluſ. As for Porta whom he reckons among the Poets who avoid obſcenities, he is however very much decried on that account (4); but this is not my principal obſervation; I have a much more conſiderable thing to object. There were in the XVIth century, and even in the XVIIth, ſeveral famous Poets who wrote as wantonly as the antients (5); and conſequently Torelli's propoſition ought not to be underſtood without ſome limitations.

(1) Torelli, del Debito del Cavalliero, fol. 21, verſo.

(2) Id. ibid. folio 25.

(3) Torelli, fol. 155, verſo.

(4) See his article remark . . . .

(5) See the remark [D], of the article MOLSA, and the explanation concerning obſcenities, num. ii, iii.

TORI or THORI (JEFFERY) The King's Printer, and ſworn Bookſeller to the Univerſity of Paris (a) in the XVIth century, was of Bourges. He contributed greatly to the bringing the printing types to perfection (b); for he wrote a book intituled, Le Champ Fleury, contenant l'Art & Science de la proportion des lettres Attiques, ou Antiques, & vulgairement appellées lettres Romaines, proportionées ſelon le corps & viſage humain (c). - - - - The flowery field, containing the Art and Science of the proportion of Attic or antique letters, commonly called the Roman letters, according to the human body and face. He himſelf printed it at Paris in the year 1592 in 4to, and afterwards in 8vo (d). Claudius Garamont, who made punchions and prepared the moulds for the Roman capitals (e) was his diſciple (f).

We

(a) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 124.

(b) See La Caille, at page 76, of the Hiſtoire de l'Imprimerie.

(c) La Croix du Maine, ubi ſupra.

(d) Id. ibid. But du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 445, affirms that the book was printed by Giles Gourmont, in the year 1529, in fol.

(e) La Caille, Hiſt. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 76.

(f) Id. pag. 99.

We ſhall ſee below the titles of the other works of Jeffery Tori [A]. He had been ſchoolmaſter in the College of Bourgogne at Paris (g), and had taught Philoſophy with applauſe (h). He died in the year 1550 (i). Some called him the maſter of the broken pot, which was the ſign of his houſe (k). Others ſay that his mark was a broken pot filled with all ſorts of inſtruments, and that he added this motto round it, Non plus (l). Francis I. gave him a licence to print the Horæ, or Primer, in conſideration of the ornaments and flouriſhes which he made uſe of (m).

(g) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franç, pag. 124. (h) La Caille, Hiſt. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 100. (i) Id. pag. 99. (k) La Croix du Maine, ubi ſupra. (l) La Caille, ubi ſupra, pag. 98.

(m) Ibid. Note, that the Sieur la Caille ſays that this licence is dated on the 28th of September 1584. This cannot be true, ſince Francis I died in the year 1547.

[A] The titles of the other works of Jeffery Tori.] He tranſlated into French the Hieroglyphics of Orus Apollo: Plutarch's Morals, printed at Lyons (1) by William Bowle: the Table of Cebes, and Thirty Dialogues of Lucian, printed at Paris by John Petit in the year 1529*: John Baptiſt Egnatius's Summary of Chronicles, printed at Paris by himſelf, in the year* 1529 (2), and by Charles l'Angelier in the year 1543 in 8vo (3). ‘He procured an edition of Antoninus's Itinerary, in red and black, by HENRY STEPHENS in 1512, with a Preface and Advertiſement of his own . . . . . He is alſo the Author of a book intituled, Ædiloquium, ſeu Digeſta (4) partibus ædium urbanarum & ruſticarum ſuis quæque locis adſcribenda. Alſo Epitaphia ſeptem de Amorum aliquot paſſionibus, printed by SIMON COLINÆUS in 8vo, in 1530 (5).’ Mr Catherinot obſerves that there was printed in 1530, Diſtiques Latins de Geofroy Tori de Bourges, ſur les Maiſons de Ville & de Campagne avec pluſieurs Tombeaux in vieux Latin (6).

(1) According to Du Verdier Vau Privas, it was at Paris, in 8vo, in the year 1530.

(2) Taken from La Croix du Maine, pag. 125.

(3) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 445.

(4) It ſhould be Diſticha.

(5) La Caille, Hiſt. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 98.

(6) Catherinot, Annales Typographiques de Bourges, pag. 3.

TORQUATO (ANTONY) a famous Aſtrologer of the XVth century, was born at Ferrara. He gave Matthias King of Hungary a prediction in the year 1480, which was very fatal to Chriſtendom; for he threatned with an entire ruin the Ottoman empire after a fixed time, which cauſed the Hungarians to engage in a war (a) that ruined them (b). Some of the events he had foretold proved true; but the principal proved chimerical [A]. This hath not diſguſted people againſt uttering or believing ſuch prognoſtics. They have been ſo often reiterated, that I forgive an Italian Politician for believing that the Turks ſuborned this ſort of people to publiſh theſe predictions [B] in order to lull the Chriſtians aſleep. However, I believe that theſe Infidels did not bethink themſelves

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) See Leunclavius, in Hiſtoriæ Muſulmanæ Appendice.

[A] The principal proved chimerical.] The ſubſtance of this prediction was: The Turks ſhall make war upon the Chriſtians, and loſe great numbers of their troops (1). They will firſt attack the Venetians, and do them great miſchief: After which they will make peace with that republic, and take Belgrade, and Rhodes, and lay Hungary waſte. At laſt making many threats, ſacking Hungary, and attacking the Roman empire, they will fall under the power of the Hungarians, about the year 1594, or 1595. But before this they will enter into Apulia, they will diſturb and afflict Sicily, Italy, the coaſts of France and Spain. Soon after which their emperor ſhall be killed in a battle; their monarchy ſhall be deſtroyed under the 13th or 14th of their chiefs; they ſhall not exceed that number, nor the year 1596. The Chriſtians ſhall then become maſters of that vaſt empire (2). Read the reflexion made on this by a Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris. ‘Non eſt vel hujus loci, vel mei otii Hiſtorias retexere, quibus multa quæ hic exprimuntur, eveniſſe intelligamus, ſatis ſit expendiſſe corollarium hujus prædictionis quàm varium ſit, quàm falſum, quàm ridiculum, de Imperio Turcico funditus everſo, ad annum Chriſti 1596, cum hoc anno 1608, tam florens & potens, magno quidem Chriſtiani nominis malo, cernamus, quàm antea extiterit, nec ulla parte, aut hiare, aut nutare, aut inclinare, tanti Imperii moles perſpiciatur: nec in quarto decimo Imperatore Oſmanida ſeriem Sultanorum & Principum ſuorum defeciſſe videamus, cùm Sultanus Muhamet Cham, tertius hujus nominis, ſit decimus quintus Oſmanidarum Principum, à primò illo Oſmano Sultano. Magnò certè conſtitit Hungaris hæc prædictio, cui cùm ſtolidè inniterentur, motumque maximum ſub Sultano Soleimanno in Hungaria excitaſſent, ab eo magna clade affecti, ſuæ credulitatis veſanæ pœnas non minimas dederunt, quemadmodum narrat Leunclavius hiſtor. Muſulmanæ lib. 18. (3). - - - - This is not a proper place, nor have I leiſure to recollect paſſages of Hiſtory, by which it might appear that many things came to paſs which are expreſſed in this prediction: Let it ſuffice to examine the corollary of it, and obſerve how various, how falſe and ridiculous it is, that the Turkiſh empire ſhould be utterly deſtroyed about the year 1596*: Whereas in this preſent year* 1608, we behold it as flouriſhing and potent as ever, to the great detriment of the Chriſtian name: Nor is there any part of that vaſt empire which ſeems to be either in a disjointed, or tottering, or declining condition; and we ſee the ſeries of their ſultans and princes continued down without failing in the fourteenth emperor deſcended from Oſman: The Sultan Mahomet Cham, the third of that name, being the fifteenth prince deſcended from the firſt Sultan Oſman. This prediction coſt the Hungarians very dear; for having fooliſhly relied upon it, and raiſed a great commotion in Hungary under the Sultan Soliman, they were overthrown by him, and ſeverely chaſtiſed for their mad credulity; as Leunclavius relates in his Hiſtory of the Turks.

[B] I forgive an Italian Politician, for believing that the Turks ſuborned ſome people to publiſh theſe predictions.] What this Italian Politician ſaith on this head ſeems to me worth copying. But we ought to remember that when this was written, the Turks were more potent than they have been ſince the ſiege of Vienna, in the year 1683. ‘Molte preditioni d'Aſtrologi, oltre à molte profetie, ſecondo, che ſi dice, vi ſono, & ſe ne leggono ogni di, con le quali vien minacciata la, diſtruttione del Regno, & Imperio Turcheſco, & ogni tanti anni pare, che ſi vadano rinovando cotali credenze, ſenza vederſene l'effetto. Hora io m'auviſo, che non darebbe molto lontano dal ſegno, uno, che diceſſe ciò eſſer' intentione de' medeſimi Turchi, ò di qualche Chriſtiano rinegato; per addormentar gli animi de Prencipi Chriſtiani, con queſto ſonnifero, & rendergli negligenti, à penſar d'offendergli, con la ſperanza di dover veder, che il tempo debba eſſer quello, che trionfi di così fatto nemico: & non è dubbio, che Prencipi Cattolici, ricercati à colligarſi contro il Turco, hanno dato per riſpoſta, che egli era meglio ſtar à veder quel che partorirebbe il tempo, parendo impoſſibile, che ſignoria così violenta, debba eſſer di lunga durata. Et per non parere di dire coſe del tutto à vento, certo è, che per accelerar la morte di qualche Imperadore Romano, ſi ſerviva alcuno di ſparger voci, che le ſtelle promettevano il principato à tal' uno, che eſſi conoſcevano atto à dover, con ſi fatto preteſto, inſurgere contro al dominante, & accelerar' à ſe ſteſſi la ſucceſſione, con l'acceleratione della morte di lui. Onde al contrario potrebbe pur eſſere, che tra Turchi per diuturnar' il loro Imperio, ſi diffamaſſero queſte decerie, della ſua piccola durata, per indurre altri ad aſpettar, che illo pronoſtico ſi verifichi, ſenza venir' all' atto d'offenderlo, armata mano; Il che ſarebbe un ſottile, ma non impoſſibile ſtratagemma (4). - - - - We daily read many predictions of Aſtrologers and many prophecies, which threaten the deſtruction of the Turkiſh empire: and we ſee theſe prophecies and predictions renewed from year to year, without ever being accompliſhed. Now I think that a man would not be far from the truth, who ſhould ſay ‘that

(1) Turci magna ſtrage ſuorum in Chriſtianos arma movebunt. See Fileſacus, de Idolatria magica, fol. 33, verſo.

(2) See Fileſacus, ibid, & fol. 34, ex Leunclavio in Hiſtoriæ Muſulmanæ Appendice, poſt Epiſtolas.

(3) Fileſac. ibid. fol. 34.

(4) Bonifatio Vannozzi, della ſuppellettile de gli Auvertimenti Politici, Volume primo, pag. 97, Bologna, 1609.

themſelves of this ſtratagem. There would be no great craft in it, for nothing more animates men to arm againſt a monarch, than a belief that it is written in the deſtinies that he ſhall be very ſoon deſtroyed.

‘ that they were intended by the Turks themſelves, or by ſome Chriſtian renegado, as a ſoporific, to lay aſleep the minds of Chriſtian princes, and make them remiſs in attacking the Turks, in hopes that at the time predicted they ſhould triumph over ſuch an enemy. There is no queſtion but that the Catholic princes being required to enter into a league againſt the Turks, have anſwered, that it was better to wait for what time ſhould bring forth, it appearing impoſſible that ſo unnatural a government could be of long continuance. And that I may not be thought to ſpeak at random, this is certain, that in order to haſten the death of a Roman Emperor, a certain perſon ſet about a report that the ſtars promiſed the empire to ſuch a one, who was ready under ſuch a pretence to raiſe inſurrections againſt the emperor and haſten the ſucceſſion to himſelf, by haſtning the emperor's death. Thus, on the contrary, it might be true, that the Turks to perpetuate their empire, ſpread about theſe ſurmiſes concerning the ſhort continuance of it, in order to induce the Chriſtians to wait for the accompliſhment of that prognoſtic, and not to attack them with an armed force. This would be a ſubtle, but not an impoſſible ſtratagem.’ This may ſerve as a ſupplement to the remark [GG] of the article MAHOMET. I daily diſcover freſh matter to enlarge it, as it generally conſiſts of groſs errors. Here is an inſtance of it. A Father of the Oratory relates, that on certain days of the year, the Turks ſolemnly curſe the Chriſtians. They read in their moſques a prophecy of the deſtruction of the Ottoman empire by the Francs, after it has continued ten ages (5). During the reading of this prophecy the women cry diſmally, and ſweep the altars with their diſhevelled hair. They imagine that this ceremony will avert the impending fate with which they are threatned. This Father of the Oratory doth not aſfirm this of his own knowledge, but on the credit of one of his friends. Vias Maſſilienſis Poëta (ſi mihi creditur) valdè bonus, ſays he (6), mihi olim cùm Maſſiliæ Rhetoricen profiterer multùm familiaris, in ſuis ad Sylvas (7) notis, morem refert Turcarum cùm illi Chriſtianos, quos perditè oderunt, ultrò ſtatis diebus deteſtantur. Habent, inquit ille, Turcæ inter ſuos faſtos prophetiam, per id tantum tempus, M. ſcilicet annos, Ottomanorum permanſurum, mox ſubvertendum à Francis. Legitur illa quotannis ſüis in Moſquetis, ut illius omnis terrore ultrò Chriſtianis adverſentur. Lugent interim ululantes fœminæ, ſparſiſque comis infanda verrunt altaria: ſicque huic malo fato procurare credunt, dum tam funeſto vaticinio perterrentur.

(5) This prediction does not concern the Turkiſh empire, but the Mahometan religion. If it concerned the Turks, they would be a little too haſty; their monarchy would be very far from its deſtruction.

(6) Petrus Berthaldus, Libro ſingulari de Ara, cap. xv, pag. 181, 182, Edit. Nannetenſis, 1636.

(7) They are Statius's Silvæ, upon which Vias, a Poet of Provence, praiſed by Gaſſendus, in Vita Peireſkii, made ſome notes.

TORTELLIUS (John). See ARETIN (John.)

TOUCHET (Mary), miſtreſs to Charles IX, King of France, was a native of Orleans. What is affirmed by ſo many authors is not true; viz. That ſhe was an Apothecary's daughter [A]. Charles IX had children by her (a), and afterwards ſhe was married to a perſon of quality. I believe ſhe was not married to him till after the death of that monarch [B]. She had two daughters lawfully begotten, who followed her example; one was concubine to Henry IV, and the other to the Marſhal de Baſſompierre

(a) See the remark [F].

[A] It is not true that ſhe was an Apothecary's daughter.] She is obliged to Brantome for this origin, whom I ſhall cite below. Papyrius Maſſo ſeems to make her of a meaner deſcent, for one would think by what he ſays, that ſhe was a Perfumer's daughter (1), Amavit Mariam Tochetiam Aurelianenſis Unguentarii (2) filiam. Others ſay, ſhe was a Scrivener's daughter; but it is certain that ſhe was better deſcended, as Mr le Laboureur ſhews. ‘ John Touchet, her father, ſaith he (3), took the title of Sieur de Beauvais and du Quillart, Counſellor to the king, and Lieutenant-particular of the bailiwic and preſidial court of Orleans. He was the ſon of Peter Touchet, a citizen of Orleans, and grandſon of John Touchet, Advocate and Counſellor at Orleans, in the year 1492, whoſe father was Regnaut Touchet, a Merchant of the town of Parthai en Beauſſe. And all that could be ſaid againſt this lady's birth was, that her mother was Mary Mathy, the natural daughter of Orable Mathy, a Dutchman, and one of the king's Phyſicians, who to obtain this alliance, gave two thouſand crowns with her, which was then a conſiderable ſum.’

An error about the family of Madame de la Valiere.

Men commonly fall into two ſorts of extremes concerning thoſe whom providence hath very much exalted above their birth. Some by fabulous genealogies furniſh them with anceſtors of the firſt quality; others debaſe them to a much meaner extraction than their true one; either to indulge envy and calumny, or to repreſent the aggrandizing of their fortune as ſomething ſtupendious and more proper for exclamations. The Hiſtorian of the Amours du Palais Roial, hath degraded the nobility of Madam de la Valiere, in making her a mean citizen of Tours. Yet (4) ſhe was of a family related to that of Beauvau-le-Rivau, one of the moſt noble of the country; and about an hundred years ago, one Lord de la Valiere married a lady who had been maid of honour to Queen Louïſe, conſort to Henry III. Which doubtleſs he had never done, if he had not been a gentleman. We ſhall ſhew in their places, that ſlanders of this nature were raiſed againſt Albert de Gondi, firſt Duke of Rets, againſt Cardinal de Pellevé, the Conſtable de Luynes, Cardinal Mazarine, &c.

[B] That ſhe did not marry him till after the death of Charles IX.] Mezerai knew very well that Mary Touchet's father was Lieutenant-particular of the preſidial of Orleans; but I ſomewhat doubt what he adds, that Charles IX married this miſtreſs to Francis Balzac d'Entragues, governor of Orleans (5). I paſs over in ſilence that this Francis Balzac was not governor of Orleans, till ſeveral intrigues had occaſioned the Chancellor de Chiverni's loſing that government in the year 1588, before which he was only lieutenant of that city (6); I ſay only that his marriage with Mary Touchet, ſeems to be poſterior to the death of Charles IX. And this is all I can ſay at preſent, not being in a place where I can conſult the genealogy of this houſe, nor having yet in my poſſeſſion ſuch books as are capable of affording an entire certainty. But conſidering on one ſide what Papyrius Maſſo ſays, that King Charles, on his death-bed, durſt not himſelf recommend his miſtreſs to the queen his mother, but did it by the mediation of Charles de Gondi (7); and on the other ſide, what Mr le Laboureur tells us (8). That we ought not to be ſurprized, that Mary Touchet found ſo good a match after ſo great a figure ſhe had made at court, where ſhe maintained her rank as well as any of the ladies of the firſt quality (9). Conſidering, I ſay, theſe two things, I cannot think ſhe was married to the Lord d'Entragues in the life time of Charles IX. For if ſo, it would have been unneceſſary for that prince to cauſe her to be recommended to Catherine de Medicis, (ſuch an huſband being a ſufficient protector) and one could not apprehend why Mr le Laboureur offers ſo many reaſons why we ſhould not be ſurprized at the marriage of Francis de Balzac with Mary Touchet, without mentioning the chief, which muſt have been the great favours beſtowed by a living king upon his miſtreſs's huſband. This author obſerves, that ſhe was equally incomparable for wit and beauty, and that the anagram made on her name, Maria Touchet, Je charme tout, (I charm all) was very juſt. He ſaith alſo that Mr d'Entragues became

(1) Papyr. Maſſo, in Vita Caroli IX.

(2) Parhaps this word ought to be rendred an Apothecary, as le Laboureur renders it.

(3) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 656.

(4) Mr de Marolles, abbot of Villeloin, in the catalogue of his writings, pag. 8.

(5) Mezer. Ab. Chronolog. Tom. v, pag. 184.

(6) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. xcii.

(7) Brantome relates the thing ſomewhat differently. Being a dying, ſays he, he ordered Mr de la Tour to remember him to her (his miſtreſs) and never durſt ſpeak of her to the queen his mother.

(8) Le Laboureur, ubi ſupra.

(9) He had ſaid, pag. 70. That ſhe had no leſs ambition and dexterity than the Ducheſs of Etampes, and the Ducheſs of Valentinois, and that ſhe maintained her rank ſo well, that all the glory, and all the artifices of Queen Catherine, could not put her out of countenance.

pierre [C]. The reaſon ſhe ſtabbed a page, according to ſome authors, is ſomewhat curious [D]. What ſhe ſaid, as ſhe viewed the picture of the princeſs, whom Charles IX was became ſo enamoured of her, that he was called in deriſion, d'Entragues Touchet, Duke of Orleans, in a libel intituled, The king's edict diſguiſed (10), written in the year 1586, againſt certain ſparks called Bourbons, and ſome ſtupid ſots, and German drunkards.

[C] One was concubine to Henry IV, and the other to the Marſhal de Baſſompierre.] If the fact which I relate in the remark [D] is true, Henry IV might have been deceived; for perhaps the girl that was raviſhed might be the very lady d'Entragues, who ſo much valued the preſent of her virginity to this prince. A particular relation of her ſubtilties and cajoling is to be ſeen in Sulli's Memoirs, and Perefixe's Hiſtory. The hundred thouſand crowns with which the king preſented her, were not a ſhower of gold ſufficient to introduce him into her lap, and put an end to her artifices by which ſhe diſputed the ground. He muſt at laſt be forced to promiſe her marriage, to remove the difficulties and oppoſitions of the father and mother, which the daughter ſeaſonably cauſed to intervene, and which ſhe declared were not to be ſurmounted, unleſs theſe good people were brought over to ſuch a nice point, by this promiſe ſatisfying their conſciences towards God, and ſheltering their honour from the malicious world. This fair one ſo artfully repreſented to her lover (11), That he ought not to make any difficulty to ſatisfy their deſire, ſince it was only that he ſhould give her a ſmall bit of paper (12) in exchange for what to her was the moſt valuable thing in the world; that he obliged himſelf under his hand to marry her within a year, provided, within the compaſs of that time ſhe brought him a male-child. If the adventure mentioned by St Romuald, was meant of this lady, what vaſt expences and earneſt purſuits was a great monarch put to, in order to enjoy a page's leavings!

Mr de Roſni, the moſt zealous man in the world for the true intereſts of this prince, was not contented with tearing this promiſe of marriage when the king ſhewed it him; but he endeavoured to cure that prince, by urging to him more ſuſpicions concerning the lady's virtue, than he ſeemed to entertain of it. It is true, that monarch told this favourite, that he fatigued himſelf in queſt of a maidenhead, which perhaps he ſhould not find. But the other talked much more ſuſpiciouſly of her honour. 'If you remember, ſays he, what ' you have formerly ſaid to me concerning this lady ' and her brother, in the Ducheſs's time, how freely ' you then talked of them, and the commands which ' you obliged me to carry to that baggage, (for ſo ' you then called the houſe and family of Mr and Madam d'Antragues) to leave Paris, you will be apt to ' doubt more than at preſent you do, whether you ' will ever find what you expect.' See Sulli's Memoirs, pag, 248, and 253, tome 2. of the Dutch edition, 1652 in 12mo.

However, from all this we learn, that this lady was more tender of her daughter's honour than ſhe had been of her own. The puniſhment of the page (13), if true, is a proof of it, for ſhe would not probably have been guilty of a murder on that account, if ſhe had been treated in the ſame manner before. We may further obſerve how conſcientious a mother ſhe was, and how cautious with reſpect to the world, when her daughter was concerned, but ſhe had not been ſo in her own caſe with regard to Charles IX. Yet her care was ineffectual: for as ſhe trod in the ſteps of her grand-mother (14), ſo did her daughters in her's. One of them (15) furniſhed a natural race to Henry IV, as the other did to Marſhal Baſſompierre. Let us hear the marſhal himſelf on this head. 'I ' returned to Paris, ſays he (16), to ſee my miſtreſs ' (17) in the Coutellerie-ſtreet, where her lodging was, in which I had a private paſſage to ' the third ſtory which her mother did not rent; ' and ſhe came to me by a private ſtair-caſe of the ' wardrobe when her mother was aſleep.' A little after he hints ſomewhat from whence one might infer, that Henry IV would have made no conſcience of enjoying both ſiſters, which is that his prince was his rival. He informs us of another thing which confirms my laſt remark concerning Mary Touchet. 'By ' misfortune, ſaith he, the mother had notice of it, ' and kept the ſtricter guard. One morning, going ' to ſpit, and lifting up the curtain of her bed, ſhe ' ſaw that of her daughter's uncovered, and obſerving ' that ſhe was miſſing, ſhe roſe very ſoftly, and went ' up into the wardrobe, where ſhe diſcovered that the ' door of our private ſtair-caſe was open, which ſhe ' thought had been nailed up. This made her ſhriek ' out, and her daughter at her voice immediately ' ran to her. I in the mean time ſhut the door, and ' marched off in pain to know the event of this affair, which was that her mother beat her, and cauſed ' the door of the chamber, in the third ſtory, where ' we were in the night, to be broke open, which ' ſhe was ſurprized to find hung with velvet, and ' ſplendidly furniſhed with candleſticks and other utenſils of ſilver, as well as all other rich furniture. Then ' all our converſation was broke off; but I accommodated the matter with her mother, by means of a ' young gentlewoman named d'Azi (18), at whoſe ' houſe I ſaw her, and aſked her a thouſand pardons, ' proteſting that nothing had paſſed beyond kiſſing, ' which ſhe pretended to believe (19).' He was not long deprived of this lady's converſation, for after ſome months Madam d'Entragues being gone to court, he ſays (20), he paſſed his time very well with her daughter, and with others alſo. The young lady proved with child four years after, and being turned out of doors by her mother, ſhe deſired her lover to give her a promiſe of marriage to appeaſe her mother, offering at the ſame time all the counter-promiſes which he could deſire, urging that ſhe begged this only, that ſhe might lie-in quietly, and enjoy the benefit of her mother's aſſiſtance (21). She obtained her requeſt, and was ſo good natured as not to fail in her counter-promiſe.

There goes a ſtory which I ſhall here relate. That Marſhal taking the air in a coach with the Queen, when there was a great number of coaches in the ring, it happened that Madam d'Entragues's coach was obliged to ſtop for ſome time very near that of the Queen, by reaſon of the crowd. The Queen looking upon the Marſhal, There is, ſaid ſhe, Madam de Baſſompierre. That is only her nick-name, replied he, loud enough to be heard by his old miſtreſs: upon which ſhe cried out, You are a fool, Baſſompierre: Not enough to marry your ladyſhip, replied he; and then the coaches began to move. As this Marſhal had a vaſt number of amours, I cannot tell whether this other ſtory in Mr Menage relates to another, or the ſame miſtreſs: 'Marſhal Baſſompierre's coach being entangled with that ' of a lady whom he had loved, and on whom he ' had ſpent vaſt ſums, ſhe ſaid aloud; Is it you, Marſhal, from whom I have plucked ſo many feathers? ' It is true, Madam, replied he, but they were only ' the feathers of my tail, and my flight is not thereby ' hindred (22).'

[D] The reaſon why ſhe ſtabbed a page, is ſomewhat curious.] I ſhall here repeat, without the leaſt alteration, what I have ſaid in the project of this Dictionary. Dom Peter de St Romauld agrees in chronology with de Mezarai, as to the marriage of Mary Touchet (23); for he places it in 1572. His Printer was a perfect murtherer of proper names, after the example of ſeveral of his brethren. The paſſage contains an action ſo particular, that it deſerves to be ſet down entire. '(24) It was about that time (25) that ' Francis de Baſſac, Lord of Entragues-Marcouſte (26), ' governor of Orleans, married, for his ſecond wife, ' Mary Touchet, an Apothecary's daughter in that ' city, equally remarkable for wit and beauty, by ' whom King Charles IX had had a ſon, afterwards ' called the Count d'Auvergne. An action as ſtrange as ' bold is told of her, which ſhe did to one of her ' huſband's pages, who had raviſhed one of her ' daughters, very young and beautiful, in a ſummer-houſe in the garden, inſtigated by a mad fit of love. ' This wretch ſhe ſtabbed upon the ſtop, depriving ' him of life, who had robbed her daughter of her ' honour.' I wiſh that this honeſt Monk, who hath heaped up ſo many events of all ſorts, but not without being liable to ſome ſuſpicion, had told us where he had this; for I would not adviſe the reader to believe him upon his bare word.

[E] What

(10) By way of alluſion to the Duke of Guiſe.

(11) Perefixe, Vie de Henri IV, in the year 1600, wherein he is miſtaken by one year; for it was in the ſummer, of the year 1599, that the king enjoyed her. See Baſſompierre's Journal, Tom. i, pag. 58.

(12) It muſt be obſerved that ſhe gave her word to the king, never to make uſe of that promiſe, there being beſides no official ſufficient to ſummon ſuch a monarch to appear, and that it ſhould be with all the conditions ſhe knew were deſired by him. Memoires de Sulli, Tom. ii, pag. 247, 248, Dutch Edit. 1652, in 12mo.

(13) See the remark [D].

(14) I have ſaid above remark [A], that Mary Touchet's mother was a baſtard.

(15) Catherine Henrietta de Balzac, Marchioneſs of Verneuil, who died in 1633, being in her 54th year, according to Father Anſelme; from hence it would follow, that Mr de Perefixe ſhould have allowed her more than 18 years, in the year 1600.

(16) Journal of his Life, Tom. i, pag. 152.

(17) Mary de Balzac, whom he only calls d'Entragues, by whom he had the Biſhop of Xaintes, who died in 1676.

(18) Perhaps the ſame, whom he calls d' Achy, pag. 173, proper names being very much confounded in this Journal.

(19) Journal de Baſſompierre, ibid. pag. 157, ad ann. 1606.

(20) Ibid. pag. 165.

(21) Ibid. pag. 261.

(22) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 374, Dutch Edit.

(23) See the remark [F], towards the end.

(24) Pierre de St Romuald, abridgment of the iiid Tome of his Thréſor Chronol. & Hiſtor. pag. m. 348, ad ann. 1572.

(25) That is, the Paris Maſſacre.

(26) It ſhould be Balzac, Lord of Entragues and Marcouſſis.

was to marry, deſerves to be known [E]. I take this occaſion to obſerve, that thoſe who tell us that this king was no lover of women, have not looked narrowly into the matter [F]. It ought not to be thought ſtrange that I ſhould beſtow ſome articles on ſuch

[E] What ſhe ſaid, as ſhe viewed the picture of the Princeſs . . . deſerves to be known.] She eagerly aimed at the poſſeſſion of King Charles's heart, to the prejudice of his conſort. She was very curious, when the treaty of marriage with Elizabeth of Auſtria was on foot, in examining the picture of that princeſs, and having very well conſidered it, ſhe only ſaid, I am not afraid of her. Inſinuating by that, as Brantome ſaith (27), that ſhe preſumed ſo much on her perſon and beauty, that ſhe believed the king could not leave her. Papyrius Maſſo tells us, that when ſhe examined the picture, and ſaid, ſmiling, I am not afraid of that German lady, the queen was then arrived (28); but it is not at all probable that Mary Touchet ſhould have ſtaid ſo long before ſhe ſaw the Queen's picture; and Brantome's relation ſeems therefore more likely, with regard to the circumſtance of time. Gabrielle d'Etrée ſoon ſaw the pictures of the Infanta of Spain, and of Mary de Medicis, when there was a report of their marriage with Henry IV; they pretend ſhe ſaid, that ſhe had no apprehenſion of the brown Spaniard, but very much feared the Florentine (29). We have this from an Hiſtorian, who affirmeth that he heard it himſelf. I remember, ſaith he (30), that the King having intruſted to my keeping the pictures of theſe two Princeſſes, permitted me to ſhew them to the Ducheſs, and obſerve what ſhe would ſay; which was, I am not afraid of that black woman, but the other gives me ſome apprehenſions.

[F] Thoſe who tell us that this king was no lover of women, have not looked narrowly into the matter.] Thoſe Hiſtorians who have moſt freely ſpoken of his ill qualities, ſay that he was not very irregular with regard to women. Some had endeavoured to throw him into debaucheries, both as to women and wine; but once perceiving that wine diſturbed his reaſon, ſo much that it made him commit ſeveral violences, he abſtained from it the whole remainder of his life: and as for women, being ill ſerved by one of thoſe about his mother's perſon, he took an averſion to the ſex, and ſcarce ever was intimate with any of them again. So Mr Mezerai expreſſes himſelf (31), without obſerving the rule of the Grammarian, who cenſured the placing of the expreſſions in Voiture's famous ſonnet, where the laſt imported much leſs than the firſt, I bleſs my torment, and content to die, dare not complain of her tyranny (32). Brantome ſays, that this Prince did not at firſt appear very fond of the fair ſex, and that the reproaches of the ladies animated him. ‘ I remember, ſaith he (33), that in his briſkeſt age of ſeventeen or eighteen years, being once violently tormented with the tooth-ach, and the Phyſician's remedies proving ineffectual, a great lady at court, and who belonged to him, gave him a receipt, which ſhe had often experienced herſelf, and found very good; but it did him no good, and next day ſhe aſking him how he found himſelf; he anſwered, not well at all; and ſhe replied, I am not ſurprized at it, Sir, ſince you neither love, nor truſt the women, but prefer hunting and dogs to all of us. Whence, ſaid he, have you that opinion of me, that I love the exerciſe of hunting better than your's? By G . . ., if you provoke me once, I ſhall join you ſo cloſe, that I ſhall throw you all on your backs one after another. He was not as good as his word with regard to ALL, but he attacked ſome of them, rather on account of his reputation, than to gratify his laſciviouſneſs, and that very cooly too, and choſe for his miſtreſs a lady of a very good family, and whom I ſhall not name. She was a very beautiful, diſcreet, and virtuous lady, whom he treated with all poſſible honour and reſpect, and more, ſaid he, to form an agreeable air than for any other end; nothing, ſaid he, contributing more to poliſh a young man, than a love fixed on a fine and noble ſubject. He always loved this virtuous lady to his death, even when he had his Queen Elizabeth, a very agreeable and charming Princeſs. He alſo was very fond of Mary Jacoſſie, otherwiſe called TOUCHET, an Apothecary's daughter of Orleans, and a moſt beautiful creature, by whom he had the Grand-Prior, at preſent called the Count d'Auvergne:’ Here are three miſtreſſes (34), beſides a wife: for we ought not to confound her that Mr Mezerai ſaith ſerved the king ill, with her whom Brantome would not name, and whom this prince loved as long as he lived. When therefore we conſider that he died before he was quite twenty-four years of age, and after a long ſickneſs, and that hiſtory lays to him two natural ſons (35): I cannot ſee on what that averſion is grounded, which Mr Mezerai aſcribes to him. What would he have him do more? He wanted, it ſeems, a great deal to fix the character of debauchery on the lives of people. It is, indeed, true, that in compariſon of the horrible corruption of the court of France at that time, Charles IX might paſs for a ſort of a moderate man in that reſpect. This Hiſtorian mentions but one ſon of Charles IX by Mary Touchet, and tells us that he was born in 1572, and that he was firſt Grand-Prior of France, then Count d'Auvergne and Lauraguais, and afterwards Duke of Angoulême (36), and Count de Pontieu. Father Anſelme diſſents from this chronology, and ſays he was born (37) at the caſtle of Fayet in Dauphiné, near Montmelian, the 28th of April 1573. I cannot clearly account to my reader why this lady ſhould be ſent ſo far from the court, and her own country, to lie-in. This was not her firſt child; the high rank of the father took off the diſgrace, and nothing could engage her to affect privacy, as when upon ſuch an occaſion, a journey may ſeem neceſſary to conceal the thing, and to diſcharge the burthen unknown to the world.

If what Brantome relates, without believing it, was true, we ought not to entertain a great opinion of Mezerai's Memoirs, as to the averſion which he aſcribes to that Prince. Some ſay (they are Brantome's words) that during his illneſs he ran to the Queen, and ſo heated himſelf that he ſhortned his days, which gave occaſion to the ſaying, that Venus killed him with Diana, which I cannot believe, for this was never talked of at court amongſt thoſe that were moſt worthy of credit, for I was there. What he ſaith of Venus and Diana, is an alluſion to the two verſes which he had already cited, and were a kind of epitaph on Charles IX.

Pour aimer trop Diane & Cytherée auſſi,
L'une & l'autre m'ont mis en ce tombeau icy.

Too much I Venus and Diana ſought,
And therefore to my grave by them am brought.

PAPYRIUS Maſſo ill tranſlated by le Laboureur. Varillas criticiſed.

Papyrius Maſſo, who wrote an abridgment of this prince's life a year after his death, relates an event, perhaps, no truer than this, but at leaſt more probable. He ſaith the king, in his long illneſs, once went to ſee his miſtreſs Mary Touchet, and it was conjectured, that by diverting himſelf with her at an improper time, or to exceſs, he increaſed his diſtemper and haſtened his death. Sane Rex ipſe inter moras longiſſimi morbi ſemel ad eam divertit, ſuſpicioque eſt auctum morbum ex importuno aut immodico coitu & acceleratum vitæ finem (38). Mr le Laboureur (39) hath ill tranſlated theſe words thus: Alſo the king, once, during his tedious diſtemper, going to ſee her, it is taken for certain, that on account of not being in a condition to approach her, or being guilty of ſome exceſs, his diſeaſe increaſed, and this viſit haſtened his days. Not to take notice that he delivers that as a certainty, which amounts only to a ſuſpicion in the Latin, I am apt to think that there are ſcarce any readers who by theſe words, on account of not being in a condition, would not imagine ſomething elſe than the Hiſtorian intended to ſay; ſome accident like that which Mr Rabutin imitates out of Petronius (40). Mr Varillas has not failed to adopt this paſſage of Papyrius Maſſo. ‘ The king was dangerouſly ill, ſaith he (41), and thoſe who knew him intimately, whiſpered two cauſes of it. The firſt was his haſty journey from Paris to Orleans to viſit the beautiful Mary Touchet, his miſtreſs; and the ſecond the poiſon which they pretended was given him ſuch women as theſe are [G].

---

(27) Brant. Diſcours ſur Charles IX.

(28) Inſpecta Iſabellæ Reginæ, quæ recens in Galliam venerat, pictura, riſiſſe dicitur, addito verbo nihil me terret Germana.

(29) Du Pleix, Hiſt. de Henri IV, pag. 262.

(30) D'Aubigné, Tom. iii, p. 637.

(31) Mezerai, Abrégé Chron. Tom. v, pag. 183.

(32) See the pieces at the end of Balzac's Socrate Chretien.

(33) Brantome, ubi ſupra.

(34) Le Laboureur, additions to Caſtelnau's Memoires, Tom. ii, mentions a letter, where it is ſaid that Charles IX was in love with the wife of the Sieur de la Tour. See the laſt paragraph but one of this remak.

(35) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. Généalog. de France, pag. 146, does not ſay whether they had both the ſame mother: But Papyrius Maſſo mentions two, whom he had by Mary Touchet.

(36) The laſt Dukes of Angouleme are deſcended from him. He died at Paris the 24th of September, 1650.

(37) Hiſt. Généalog. p. 175.

(38) Papyr. Maſſo, in Vita Caroli IX.

(39) Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 879.

(40) In the Hiſtoire amoureuſe des Gaules. Ovid, Amor. lib. iii, Eleg. vii, deſcribes ſuch an accident at large.

(41) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, Tom. ii, pag. 365, Dutch Edit. 1684.

‘ him by his ſteward (42) la Tour, younger brother ‘ to the Marſhal de Rets and the Biſhop of Paris. The ‘ extraordinary vigour of this prince ſeemed to ſurmount his ſickneſs, and the apprehenſion which la ‘ Tour had conceived of the report ſpread concerning ‘ him, threw him into a phrenzy, which occaſioned ‘ his death ſoon after.’ Mr Varillas only cites Papyrius Maſſo.

(42) Brantome makes him maſter of the Wardrobe: Papyrius Maſſo calls him Carolum Gondiam Cubicularium. The Journal of Henry III, makes him maſter of the Wardrobe, and places his death on the 15th of June 1574, and attributes it to another cauſe.

This gives me occaſion to make ſome remarks; for, I. The author to whom Mr Varillas refers us, doth not ſay that Charles IX was obliged to take a journey to Orleans to ſee Mary Touchet; and there is very little reaſon to believe that ſhe ſhould keep ſo far from the king, ſince ſhe was his public miſtreſs, and had had children by him. In the ſecond place, it is falſe that Maſſo charges this poiſoning on la Tour; on the contrary, he makes him die of a diſtemper occaſioned by his grief, for having loſt, with Charles IX, the hopes of a vaſt fortune. I do not deny that la Tour was accuſed of this wicked act by others; but he ought then to have referred us ſomewhere elſe than to Papyrius Maſſo's elogy. Mr le Laboureur hath inſerted, in his additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs, page 462 of the ſecond tome, a ſatirical letter, in which Catherine de Medicis is reproached for having cauſed Charles IX to be poiſoned by the Sieur de la Tour, and afterwards la Tour by another. ‘ Your majeſty ‘ contrived it ſo, ſays the author of this letter, that the ‘ late Sieur de la Tour was made to underſtand, either by ‘ you, or by your appointment, that the late king ‘ your ſon deſigned to kill him, that he might the ‘ more eaſily enjoy his wife; which the ſaid la Tour ‘ was readily induced to believe, becauſe he very well ‘ knew that the late king paſſionately loved her, and ‘ was, on that account, without difficulty, engaged ‘ to poiſon his ſaid majeſty, &c.’ This letter is dated at Lauſanne, the third month of the fourth year after the treachery, (that is, the Paris maſſacre) and is ſigned Grandchamp, who was a gentleman of Nivernois, who had been ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, and engaged in the intrigues of la Mole and Coconnas. In the third place, it is impoſſible to gueſs, from Mr Varillas's words, whether la Tour died before or after the king; but we ſhould be more apt to conclude it was before than after: nevertheleſs he died after this prince, either of regret, or poiſon, or fear, or ſome other way.

Here is a particular which is not diſhonourable to Charles IX. ‘ That prince one day walking in the ‘ Tuilleries, and ſeeing a charming fine woman, ſtark-‘ naked, ſwim over the river from the Louvre to St ‘ Germains, ſtopped to obſerve her; but whilſt his ‘ eyes, as well as thoſe of the reſt of the court, were fixed ‘ on the beautiful object, ſhe dived out of ſight, and ‘ at laſt riſing to the ſurface of the water, as ſwift as ‘ lightning, flew aſhoar, began to wring her hair and ‘ do what Antipater ſays of Venus:

Voy n'agueres Venus hors de la mer ſortant,
Ouvrage d'Apelles, entre ſes mains tenant
Ses moettes cheveux; elle faict de ſa treſſe
Humide l'eſpraignant, ſortir l'eſcume eſpaiſſe.

Fair Venus, whom Apelles drew,
Ariſing from the ſeas,
Her wat'ry locks holds in her hands,
And thence thick foam does ſqueeze.

‘ After which ſhe retired, carrying with her the eyes ‘ and hearts of all the company. Nevertheleſs though ‘ the thing was diverting enough, it appeared ſo odd ‘ and ſtrange to the king, that he was not heard to ‘ ſay one word in her praiſe, tho' he heard the greateſt ‘ part of his retinue, and even the moſt reſerved, ‘ loudly expreſs their admiration (43).

(43) Peter de Lancre, Counſellor of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, Tableau de l'inconſtance & inſtabilité de toutes choſes, fol. 52, verſo.

[G] It ought not to be thought ſtrange that I ſhould beſtow ſome articles on ſuch women as theſe are.] The beginning of this article in my Project contains theſe words: ‘ Dictionaries ought not to omit perſons of ‘ this claſs: the figure which they make in the ‘ world, is high enough to place them there, and ‘ doubtleſs ſuch a work as Mr Colomiés promiſed (44) ‘ and deſigned to intitle, Cupid on the throne, or the ‘ Hiſtory of the Amours of our Kings ſince Dagobert, ‘ would be very curious.’ Since the impreſſion of the Project, a book has appeared which carries the ſubject higher than Colomiés deſigned it, and begins with Pharamond. I ſhould rather chooſe Colomiés's performance than this. Colomiés would have ſaid nothing but what he had taken from ſome book, he would have conſulted ſcarce books, and always have named his vouchers. But this anonymous author who hath given us the Hiſtory of the galantries of the Kings of France, from the beginning of the monarchy to Lewis XIV, hath cited no authors, and has not at all prevented our ſuſpecting his book as a Romance. The firſt edition is better than the following ones: it is more natural and leſs clogged, and looks more like a Hiſtory. I happened one day to praiſe it upon that account before the Bookſeller who printed it. But he very freely anſwered that he had found by the ſale of the book that it was the greateſt fault in the work, and that it would be ſupplied in the ſecond edition. The public did not find (ſaid he) a ſufficient number of intrigues and ſurprizing adventures in that piece, we ſhall inſert enough of them to ſatisfy the reader. After this I diſtruſted that performance more than before. There are ſeveral things in it concerning Mary Touchet which I have refuted, or have not related, not being ſure that they are not the author's invention; as I judge concerning the dozen of cut-purſes whom he has introduced, that the King might ſee the love-letter which his miſtreſs had received from another galant, the Biſhop of Valence's brother (45).

(44) Colomiés, Gallia Orient. pag. 67.

(45) See the Intrigues Galantes de la Cour de France, Tom. i, pag. 234, Dutch Edit. 1695.

TOULOUSE, a city of France on the river Garonne, being one of the largeſt and moſt antient cities of the weſt, and the ſeat of the ſecond parliament of the kingdom, deſerves a very long article; but Mr Moreri and the Author of his Supplement having deſcribed it at large, I ſhall not dwell upon it. I ſhall only ſay that its conſuls bear the title of Capitouls, and become noble by virtue of their office. Mr de la Faille publiſhed an excellent diſſertation on this ſubject (a), when a ſearch was made after the falſe pretenders to nobility (b). The world impatiently expects the continuation of the Annals of Toulouſe, which that illuſtrious Writer hath compoſed (c). This city which hath always abounded with learned men (d), and does ſtill as much as ever (e), did very well deſerve the eſtabliſhment [A] of the Academy of the Belles Lettres erected there.

(a) You may ſee the ſubſtance of it in a quarto book of Mr Giles de la Roque concerning nobility.

(b) That is about the year 1666.

(c) Mr de Beauval ſpoke of the firſt volume of thoſe Annals, September 1688, pag. 3, & ſeq. See alſo the Journal des Sçavans, of the 19th of April, 1688. (d) See Balzac, in the laſt page of his Oeuvres diverſes, and Sorberiana, at the word Toulouſe. (e) The Paris ſtage and the French academy may witneſs it.

[A] The eſtabliſhment of the Academy of the Belles Lettres erected there.] Mr de Baſville (1), who in the Provinces over which he has been appointed intendant has ſhewn himſelf a ſon worthy of his illuſtrious father the Preſident de Lamoignon, whilſt his brother the Advocate-General (2) ſhews himſelf worthy of the ſame honour in the parliament of Paris, contributed very much to this new eſtabliſhment. He reſolved to change the Floral Games of Toulouſe into an Academy of the Belles Lettres (3). The ſociety of the Floral Games alarmed at this deſign, publiſhed ſome memoirs to engage the city to let things remain in their preſent poſture. Theſe memoirs were refuted; the uſeleſſneſs of thoſe games was ſhewn, and the neceſſity of eſtabliſhing an Academy for the Belles Lettres in Toulouſe was urged, that the happy genius's which that city produces might be furniſhed with an opportunity of perfecting themſelves in eloquence. It was aſſerted that that city

(1) Intendant of Languedoc.

(2) I wrote this in 1696, ſince which time this Advocate-General is become Preſident au Mortier, in the Parliament of Paris.

(3) See the Journal des Sçavans, of the 14th of September 1693, pag. 666, Dutch Edit.

might furniſh a great many ſubjects to imitate the Academiſts of the other cities of the realm, and a long liſt of excellent genius's which Toulouſe has produced was collected (4). To know whether theſe reaſons were effectual we need only read the following paſſage extracted out of one of Mr Couſin's Journals. ‘ The FloralGames of Toulouſe have been at laſt erected into an Academy, the letters patents for that purpoſe were ſealed at the end of the laſt year. This ſociety is compoſed of thirty five perſons eminently diſtinguiſhed for their merit and learning. They will diſtribute two prizes annually, out of the rents of the Floral Games,which are conſiderable (5).

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary I have been informed by the Journal des Savans of the 11th of June 1696, that it was not long after the eſtabliſhment of the French Academy that Mr Pelliſſon, who was then at Toulouſe, formed a ſcheme of a ſociety deſigned to the ſame end; which yet was not brought to perfection till the year 1688, when ſome learned men began to meet at the houſe of Mr Carriere, chief Juſtice and Preſident of the preſidial court of that city, which they continued to do till the year 1694, when they removed to Mr de Mondran, a gentleman whoſe houſe was more conveniently ſituate (6). That thoſe who deſire to know who were the perſons that compoſed this ſociety, and what their exerciſes were, may be informed of it by reading the anſwer of Mr deMartel,one of the members and the worthy ſecretary of this ſociety, which he cauſed to be printed at Montauban in 1692, to take off the diſadvantageous impreſſions which the author of a Memoir againſt this eſtabliſhment endeavoured to make, under the pretence of defending the Floral Games. That the gentlemen who aſſiſt at theſe Academical Conferences, frequently compoſe in verſe and proſe, pieces in honour of the King and on other important ſubjects; ſeveral of which have been printed and met with a general applauſe. Their zeal went conſiderably farther in the year one thouſand ſix hundred and ninety four, when they beſtowed a prize of a gold medal amounting to the value of twelve piſtoles (7). All this and ſeveral other particulars much redounding to the glory of theſe gentlemen, are mentioned in an extract of a letter from Toulouſe, publiſhed by Mr Couſin author of the Journal des Savans. I have received from that city a long manuſcript memoir, the ſubſtance whereof I ſhould very willingly inſert here, if the Printer could give me time to write for and receive the information which I want. But as I did not examine this memoir till two days before I ſent this article to the Preſs, I cannot wait for that information: I am therefore obliged to confine myſelf to a few extracts, by which the reader may eaſily perceive that the Academy erected at Toulouſe, is diſtinct from the ſociety in which the academical conferences mentioned in the Journal des Savans of the 11th of June 1696, were held.

Theſe conferences began in two different places at Toulouſe in 1640, at Mr de Malepeires (8), and at Mr de Campunaut's (9): but theſe two ſocieties united at Mr de Garrigis's counſellor of the preſidial court, and choſe for their director Mr de la Garde, who had rendered himſelf equally famous for his Latin Poetry, and his excellent diſcoveries in natural Philoſophy; for he wrote againſt Ariſtotle's forms and accidents before Gaſſendus's works appeared. Mr Donneville, Preſident au Mortier, re-eſtabliſhed theſe literary exerciſes in a much more conſpicuous manner in the year 1667. Mr de Nolet, Treaſurer of France, ſome time after eſtabliſhed regular conferences in his own houſe under the direction of Mr Bayle (10) Doctor of Phyſic; and Mr Regis made excellent diſcourſes in theſe conferences on Des Cartes's ſyſtem. Another ſociety was afterwards formed in the college de Foix, and they began to erect an Academy of Wits. The ſociety of the Floral Games did not reliſh this project, and an anonymous author wrote a tract to prove it impracticable. Mr Martel a member of the Academy of the Ricovrati at Padua, refuted him in a book (11), the extract of which is extant in the Journal des Savans of the 14th of September 1693. He in conjunction with Mr de Carriere (12) and Mr de Malepeire formed regular conferences which continued to the year 1698. ‘ Mr Pelliſſon, who with Mr de Malepeire had formerly laid the foundation of ſuch literary exerciſes at Toulouſe, could not ſee this happy re-eſtabliſhment, without looking on it in ſome meaſure as his own work, ſince he had formed the firſt plan of it, and ſince the illuſtrious magiſtrate, whom he had formerly aſſociated in the firſt conferences, had ſo large a ſhare and was ſo much concerned in the reviving of them. This great man continually bent on the improvement of polite learning, ſuggeſted to the authors of theſe new exerciſes the erection of their ſociety into an Academy of the Belles Lettres, to be firmly eſtabliſhed at Toulouſe. He offered his intereſt, flattering himſelf with reaſon that he was able to procure the ſame advantage for Toulouſe, which he had formerly obtained, even in a conjuncture leſs favourable, in behalf of Soiſſons. To further this deſign he engaged the Prince du Mayne,Governor of Languedoc, to be their protector, who preſented a petition to the King, ſupplicating his Majeſty to approve the project and execution of that deſign. It was in acknowledgment of ſo ſignal a favour that Mr Richebourg, a member of this ſociety, had the honour to addreſs an ingenious fable to this Prince. . . . . This piece of Poetry alarmed ſome of the gentlemen of the Floral Games . . . . and then their ſociety, favoured by ſeveral illuſtrious magiſtrates who were members of it, fearing the new Academy would be erected on the ruins of theirs, which had the management of a conſiderable fund, took the moſt proper meaſures to get it eſtabliſhed by letters patents under the protection of the Chancellors of France. They preſerved as much as poſſible the name and cuſtoms it had, in order to follow the footſteps of its antient eſtabliſhment: for beſides that by their ſtatutes theſe gentlemen are reſtrained from printing any thing in the name of the ſociety, or returning any thanks on their reception, of the four prizes diſtributed, three, and even one of the moſt conſiderable, are appointed for Poetry. The gentlemen of the academical conferences redoubled their zeal to perfect their ſtudies; and as they had particularly in view eloquence, antiquities, and all that relates to the Belles Lettres, they choſe Terence's Comedies and Quintilian, for the ſubject of their conferences. Mr de Mondran, Treaſurer of France, who had an houſe very conveniently ſituated in the middle of the city, offered it to them for the performance of their exerciſes.’

The author of the memoir from whence I have extracted all this, concludes with ſaying that thoſe conferences, which would not have been interrupted on any other account than the death of ſeveral worthy members, may, it is hoped, be revived in a juncture ſo favourable to the ſciences as the general peace which prevails throughout Europe (13).

(4) Ibid. pag. 668.

(5) Journal des Sçavans, of the ſeventh of February, 1695, pag. 108, Dutch Edit. where this is ſaid to have been taken out of a letter written from Montauban the 12th of December 1695. It ſhould be 1694; and obſerve that theſe words laſt year relate not to the date of the letter, but to that of the Journal.

(6) Journal des Sçavans, 1696, pag. 426, Dutch Edit.

(7) Ibid. pag. 427.

(8) Now Dean of the Preſidial.

(9) Father of Mr Campunaut, Regius Profeſſor of the Civil-Law.

(10) He is Profeſſor of Philoſophy. See citation (132), of the article RORARIUS.

(11) Printed at Montauban, in 1692.

(12) Now Chief Juſtice.

(13) This was written in the beginning of the year 1700.

TRABEA (QUINTUS) a Comic Poet, ſome of whoſe verſes are cited by Cicero (a). The piece which he intituled Ergaſtulum, is cited by Nonnius Marcellus (b). Aulus Gellius informs us that Vulcatius Sedigitus gave him the eighth place among the ten Comic Poets of antient Rome (c). Muretus's fraudulent impoſition on the great Scaliger [A], which

(a) Cicero, Tuſcul. lib. iv, fol. m. 270, B. See alſo lib. ii, de Finibus, fol. 219, D.

(b) Noninus Marcell. Voce Rarenter, pag. m. 515.

(c) Aulus Gellius, lib. xv, cap. xxiii.

[A] Muret's fraudulent impoſition on the great Scaliger.] I ſhall collect ſeveral paſſages relating to this fact. ‘ Scaliger at the age of eighteen valued himſelf on diſcerning the different manners of writing of all ages. Muretus to intrap him, made ſome verſes which he ſhewed him, pretending that he had received them from Germany, and that they were tranſcribed from an old manuſcript. Scaliger after having attentively read them, aſſured him without heſitation that Trabea an antient comic Poet was the author of them: and continuing in the ſame opinion that his conjecture was infallible, he afterwards cited theſe verſes as written by this antient Poet in his commentary on Varro, Muretus laughed at it heartily, without the leaſt reſerve (1).’ Coſtar having expreſſed himſelf thus, in his apology, did

(1) Coſtar, Apolog. pag. 303, 304.

which made him cite ſome verſes of Trabea's which were of a much later date, deſerves did afterwards more particularly explain in a letter the circumſtances of that fact. ‘ Theſe verſes of Muretus, falſely aſcribed to the antient comic Poet ‘ Trabea, deſerve indeed your impatient deſire to ſee ‘ them. As I have the honour to know you, I dare ‘ ſay that you will learn them by heart; for they ‘ elegantly expreſs a moral and frequently uſeful reflexion.

Here, ſi querelis, ejulatu, fletibus,
Medicina fieret miſeriis Mortalium,
Auro parandæ lacrumæ contrà forent.
Nunc hæc ad minuenda mala non magis valent,
Quàm nænia Præficæ ad excitandos Mortuos.
Res turbidæ conſilium, non fletum expetunt.

Were moans, or cries, or tears, a cure
For all thoſe ills which men endure,
Then tears for money ſhould be bought,
And would by every one be ſought.
Now, Maſter, theſe ſtand us in ſtead
No more than ſongs to raiſe the dead.
Advice is needful in diſtreſs,
Whining affords us no redreſs.

‘ Scaliger cited theſe verſes in his commentary on ‘ Varro de Re Ruſtica, page 211 of Henry Stephens's ‘ edition. Producam autem, ſaith he, locum ve‘teris Comici Trabeæ ex Fabula Harpace, ubi hoc ‘ loquendi genus uſurpatur, &c (2). (He is ſpeaking of ‘ the phraſe, auro contrà) Quis enim tam averſus à ‘ Muſis, tamque humanitatis expers, qui horum ver‘ſuum publicatione offendatur, &c. - - - I ſhall quote ‘ a paſſage from the play Harpace of the antient comic ‘ Poet Trabea, where this manner of ſpeaking is ‘ uſed, &c. for who is ſuch an enemy to the Muſes, ‘ and ſo void of humanity, as to be offended with the ‘ publication of theſe verſes. Muretus bragged of ‘ having deceived that great man who thought him‘ſelf infallible, and Scaliger ſenſibly touched by ‘ this cheat, revenged himſelf by the following di‘ſtich.

Qui rigidæ flammas evaſerat ante Toloſæ
Muretus, fumos vendidit ille mihi.

Muretus, who had from the flames 'ſcap'd free,
Of rig'rous Tholouſe, ſold the ſmoke to me.

‘ You underſtand what he means by the flames of ‘ the ſevere Toulouſe, and have not forgot that Muretus ‘ was accuſed before the parliament of that city of a ‘ crime, which is puniſhed by fire. You will be ‘ glad to know too that Scaliger ſuppreſſed theſe ‘ verſes of Muretus in the ſecond edition of his com‘mentary (3).

Mr Borremans ſhould not have ſaid that this ſnare was laid for Julius Cæſar Scaliger (4). What is ſaid of this pretended paſſage of Trabea, being an epigram, is as groundleſs. ‘ Joſeph. Scaliger, cui ille (Muretus) ‘ verba dederat, atque epigramma recens a ſe compo‘ſitum pro vetere obtruſerat, &c (5). - - - Joſeph ‘ Scaliger, on whom Muret had impoſed, and obtruded ‘ a modern epigram written by himſelf, for an antient ‘ one, &c.' It was a paſſage in a ſcene of a comedy. See Mr Menage in the 83d chapter of the Anti-Baillet, where you will find ſeveral curious things concerning this fact, but not the whole paſſage of Scaliger. I cannot believe that Menage purpoſely omitted it. I ſuſpect that he had not by him the commentary on Varro; for if he had known that it contains another ſnare into which this great Critic fell, I am apt to think he had freely cited it. I have not that edition of Scaliger's commentary, but on the credit of Scriverius I ſhall venture to affirm that immediately after the words cited by Coſtar are the following (6). ‘ Quod ſi hi placent, non grava‘bor, & alios ejuſdem notæ, ſed alius Poetæ, adhi‘bere, qui tanquam ſuperiorum gemini & germani ‘ ſunt. Sunt autem Accii, veteris ac graviſſimi Tra‘gici, ex Oenomao:

Nam ſi lamentis allevaretur dolor,
Longoque fletu minueretur miſeria,
Tum turpe lacrumis indulgere non foret,
Fractaque voce Divûm obteſtare fidem,
Tabifica donec pectore exceſſet lues.
Nunc hæ neque hilum de dolore detrahunt,
Potiuſque cumulum miſeriis adjiciunt mali,
Et indecoram mentis mollitiem arguunt.

‘ Qui verſus hactenus latuerunt, eoſque nunc primum ‘ in vulgus publicamus, quorum priores Trabeæ mihi ‘ ad verbum è Philemone (vel Menandro, ſecundùm ‘ alios) mutuati videntur: qui eandem ſententiam ‘ extulit: Εἰ τὰ δάκρυ' ἡμῖν, &c. Hæc illuſtris he‘ros, qui poſteaquam dolum perſenſit, præ indigna‘tione hoc diſtichon, quod mihi de manu in manum ‘ vivus videnſque olim tradidit, ex tempore luſit:

Qui rigidæ flammas evaſerat ante Toloſæ,
Falſidico fumos vendidit ore mihi.

‘ Virum diſertum deſignans, cujus nomini heic parco. ‘ Heroe (æterno, heu, doctorum omnium dolore) de‘functo, incidi in Poſthuma quædam ſcripta M. A. ‘ M. C. R. (7) & inter poemata repperi hæc.

AFFICTA TRABEÆ.

Here, ſi querelis, ejulatu, fletibus, &c.

‘ prorſus eadem cum iis quæ ſupra recitavi. Illud ‘ alterum ex Acti Oenomao fragmentum nuſquam ‘ comparet: præterquam in Ritterſhuſii ad Oppianum ‘ Commentario: ubi Trabeæ & Actii hos verſus, ele‘gantes & memoria digniſſimos (ut ipſe vocat) pro‘ducit, tranſcriptos & mutuatos ex Notis Scaligeri. ‘ - - - But if theſe are agreeable, I ſhall add ſome others ‘ of the ſame ſort, but done by another Poet, which are, ‘ as it were, the twins and brothers of the former. ‘ They are thoſe of Accius, an antient and very worthy ‘ tragic Poet, from the Oenomaus:

Could lamentations eaſe our grief,
Or many tears give us relief,
No ſhame 't would be for us to moan,
And in our prayers to ſigh and groan,
'Till GOD ſhould ſend us a delivery
From waſting plague or other miſery.
But now we know all this is vain,
And rather adds unto our pain.
And thoſe that are that way inclin'd
Shew a baſe effeminate mind.

‘ Which verſes have been hitherto unknown, and are ‘ now firſt publiſhed by me; the former, done by Tra‘bea, ſeem to me to be borrowed verbatim from Phile‘mon (or according to others, Menander): who expreſ‘ſed the ſame ſentiment: If tears to us, &c. Thus ‘ ſpeaks that illuſtrious man, who, when he perceived ‘ the trick that was put upon him, out of revenge made ‘ the following diſtich extempore, which he himſelf for‘merly delivered to me,

He from the flames of harſh Tholouſe got free,
And with a lie, he ſold the ſmoke to me.

‘ Meaning a certain learned man, whoſe name I here ‘ forbear mentioning. That illuſtrious perſon being dead ‘ (to the ſorrow of all learned men) I happened to meet ‘ with ſome poſthumous writings of M. A. M. C. R. ‘ (Marc Antony Muretus a Citizen of Rome) and ‘ amongſt the Poems found the following.

FALSELY ASCRIBED TO TRABEA.

Were moans, or cries, or tears, a cure, &c.

‘ Exactly the ſame as I have above recited. The other ‘ fragment out of Accius's Oenomaus is no where to be ‘ found but in Ritterſhuſius's commentary on Oppianus: ‘ wherein he quotes thoſe verſes of Trabea and Accius, ‘ which ſerves to be mentioned here. The ſame miſtake is to be found in the Lexicon of Buchnerus (d).

---

(2) Theſe are the words that are wanting here: tum propter ſententiæ elegantiam, tum etiam quia vulgo nondum noti ſunt. Scaliger gives afterwards the ſix pretended verſes of Trabea.

(3) Coſtar, ubi ſupra, pag. 419, in his ſecond letter to Mr de Heurles.

(4) Borremans, Var. Lect. cap. iii, pag. x.

(5) Nicius Erythr. Pinac. I, pag. 12.

(6) Scriverius, Animadv. in Pervigilium Veneris, pag. 466, 467. Tractatus cui Titulus Baudii Amores.

(7) Thoſe five letters ſignify, Marci Antonii Mureti Civis Romani.

(d) Voce Præfica, fol. 1128. See Muretus's Poems, pag. 50, Edit. Lipſ. 1672.

‘ which he calls elegant and moſt worthy of remembrance, and which he tranſcribed and borrowed from the annotations of Scaliger.’ I have not concluded this citation with Scaliger's words, but choſe to continue it by citing thoſe which Scriverius adds to them, becauſe they afford matter for two critical remarks. In the firſt place you ſee that Scaliger's diſtich is otherwiſe expreſſed than Mr Baillet after Nicius Erythræus has quoted it (8), and otherwiſe than Mr Menage cites it (9) from the collection of Scaliger's Poems publiſhed by Scriverius from Scaliger's originals. In the ſecond place we plainly ſee that Scriverius was ignorant that the pretended verſes of Accius were any where elſe to be found than in Scaliger and Ritterſhuſius his copyer. But we ſhall immediately ſee that they were inſerted in an edition of Muretus's Poems publiſhed two years after Scaliger had publiſhed his commentary on Varro. Here is the proof of it (10): ‘ Muretus cauſed them to be printed in his collection of Poems of Aldus's edition in 1575, with this note: Cùm veteris Comici Græci Philemonis ſententiam à Plutarcho & à Stobæo acceptam, animi cauſâ exprimere tentaſſem, & dicendi genere, & numero, veterum Latinorum ſimillimo: Placuit etiam experiri, nunquid eandem comicè explicare poſſem. Viſum eſt utrumque non infeliciter ſucceſſiſſe. Per jocum itaque prioribus verſibus Accii, poſterioribus Trabeæ nomen aſcripſi, ut experirer aliorum judicia, & viderem num quis in eis ineſſet vetuſtatis ſapor. Nemo repertus eſt qui non ea pro veteribus acceperit. Unus etiam, & eruditione & judicio acerrimo præditus, repertus eſt, qui ea à me accepta pro veteribus publicaret. Ne quis igitur ampliùs fallatur, & rem totam detegendam, & carmina ipſa hic ſubjicienda duxi.

Affi&ta Accio.
Nam ſi lamentis, &c.
Affi&ta Trabeæ.
HERE, ſi querelis, &c.

‘ - - - - As I had attemptetd for my diverſion to expreſs a reflexion of Philemon, an old Greek Comic Poet, and adopted by Plutarch and Stobæus, in ſtile and verſe like the antient Romans; I thought fit likewiſe to try, whether I could explain it in a comic ſtile. In both which I imagined I ſucceeded pretty well. And therefore out of pleaſantry I aſcribed the former verſes to Accius, and the latter to Trabea, that I might know the opinions of others, and ſee whether they ſavoured of antiquity. Every body took them to be antient. There was likewiſe a man of great learning and penetration, who having received them from me, publiſhed them as ſuch. But that none may be further deceived, I thought proper to diſcover the whole matter, and ſubjoin here the verſes themſelves.

Falſely aſcribed to Accius.
Could lamentations, &c.
Falſely aſcribed to Trabea.
Were moans, &c.

Theſe words of Muretus detect a miſtake contained in the paſſage which is in the beginning of this remark. Mr Coſtar imagined that Scaliger ventured to find a father for the Latin verſes communicated to him; Mr Coſtar, I ſay, fancied that this great critic, not content to receive them as a fragment of an antient author, peremptorily decided that it was a part of a certain dramatic piece of Trabea. But Muretus ſhews that the fact was not ſo, but that he himſelf produced theſe lines as the verſes of that antient Poet. Scaliger was only deceived by giving credit to Muretus's words. As for the reſt, he clearly ſaw they were an imitation of ſome Greek verſes in Plutarch (11), which in Amyot's verſion run thus:

Si nos mal-heurs les larmes gueriſſoyent,
Et ſi nos maux incontinent ceſſoyent
Que l'on auroit larmoyé tendrement,
Au poids de l'or payees cherement
En un mal-heur les larmes devroyent eſtre:
Mais maintenant les afaires, mon maiſtre,
N'y penſent point, & n'y jettent point l'œil:
Ains ſoit, ou non, que tu pleures en dueil,
Par ne lairront d'aller la meſme voye.
Qu'eſt-il beſoin donc que noſtre æil larmoye?
Qu'y gagnons-nous? Rien: mais douleur produit,
Comme arbres font, des larmes pour ſon fruit.

If our miſfortunes tears could cure
And make our woes to ceaſe,
Then we ſhould purchaſe tears with gold,
To give us a releaſe.
But now, O maſter, in diſtreſs
No help from thence e'er came,
For, whether did you mourn or not,
It ſtill will be the ſame.
Why then ſhould we lament and cry?
What do we thereby gain?
Nothing: but e'en as fruit from trees,
So tears proceed from pain.

WRONG judgments in attributing books to ſuch or ſuch an author.

Scaliger was more excuſable on this occaſion than when he took the oration de duplici concordia, for a performance of Juſtus Lipſius (12), for nothing better reſembles the verſes of the antients than thoſe of the pretended Trabea (13). But the oration falſly attributed to Juſtus Lipſius (14), is not like any of that writer's works. The Poet Apollonius Collatius hath nothing in him which looks like antiquity, and yet Scaliger and ſeveral other very good critics have taken him for an antient Poet (15). Add to this Mr Colomiés words. ‘ I have heard Mr Voſſius ſay, that Boxhornius corrected and commented on a ſatire de Lite, which he believed to be antient, but was written by the Chancellor de l'Hoſpital. This to my great ſatisfaction I afterward found true. Pricæus an Engliſh Critic is guilty of the ſame fault in his commentary on Apuleius's Apology, page 54 (16).’ A Madrigal of Menage paſſed for Taſſo's: It is in the CXXXIIId chapter of the Antibaillet, and the Hiſtory of this Innocent Cheat is inſerted in the ſame Author's Meſcolanze. Muretus complains that he was wrongfully accuſed of being the author of ſome letters and poems (17). Compare with this the remarks [M] and [Y] of the article ERASMUS.

(8) Baillet Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, numb. 1333, cites it thus: Qui flammas rigidæ vitaverat ante Toloſæ Rumetus, fumos vendidit illi mihi.

(9) Menage, Anti-Baillet, chap. lxxxiii, cites it thus: Qui rigidæ flammis evaſerat ante Toloſæ, Rumetus, fumos vendidit ille mihi.

(10) Menage, ibid. Note that he cites all thoſe verſes of Muretus.

(11) Plut. de Conſol. ad Apollon. pag. 105.

(12) See the Scaligerana at the word Lipſius.

(13) See Bongars, letter cxix, to Camerarius.

(14) See the remark [I], of the article GOLDAST.

(15) See Barthius in Claudian. pag. 795, Edit. in 4*to.* See alſo the article COLLATIUS.

(16) Colomiés, Opuſ. pag. m. 123.

(17) Muret. Epiſt. I, lib. i.

TRAERBACH, a ſmall town in the Palatinate, with a caſtle ſituated on a rock, is the chief place of a Bayliwick in the county of Spanheim. It ſtands on the river Moſelle, over-againſt Mont-Royal, between Triers and Coblentz. The Spaniards put a garriſon in it in the year 1632. The Swedes took it in 1635 and delivered it to the French. But by the treaty of Munſter it was reſtored to it's former poſſeſſors. The French ſeized on it ſome time after the peace of Nimeguen, and fortified it with Mont-Royal. Both thoſe places were reſtored by the treaty of Ryſwick in the year 1697, upon condition they ſhould be diſmantled (a). The French, under the command of Count Tallard, became maſters of Traerbach, after a ſiege of ſome days in November 1702. The

(a) Extracted from the Dutch Gazette of Leyden, of the ninth of January 1705.

The allies retook it in December 1704, and met with more reſiſtance than they had expected [A]

[A] The allies . . . . met with more reſiſtance than they had expected.] They inveſted it on the third of November 1704, and began to cannonade it the ſixteenth or ſeventeenth of the ſame month. The Baron de Troſgné, a Brigadier in the Dutch army, and director of the attacks, boaſted that he would carry the place in five or ſix days, as it was ſaid in all the Gazettes. However, the caſtle ſtill held out the tenth of December, when the baron was killed by a muſquet ſhot, and did not capitulate till the eighteenth. The Governor of Traerbach and the Major were killed during the ſiege. A very honourable capitulation was granted to the garriſon.

TRAJAN, a Roman Emperor . . . .

. . . .

Moſt learned men of the Romiſh communion now refute the ſtory which was ſo much cried up, that the ſoul of this Emperor was delivered from hell by the prayers of Pope Gregory [A].

[A] The ſtory which was ſo much cried up, that the ſoul of this Emperor was delivered from hell by the prayers of Pope Gregory.] Paul and John Diaconus, who wrote the life of St Gregory, give an account of that affair (1). It is moreover aſſerted by St John of Damaſcus (2). The ſtory is related in this manner. ‘St Gregory paſſing Trajan's ſquare, which that prince cauſed to be adorned with ſtately edifices, where the principal actions of his life were repreſented, ſtopped particularly to conſider a baſſo relievo, which deſcribed the favour he did to a poor widow *. This emperor marching at the head of his army, and being obliged to uſe great diſpatch, a very old and poor widow came to beſeech him with tears in her eyes, to revenge the death of her ſon who had been murdered. Trajan promiſed her that when he returned from his expedition he would do her juſtice. But, Sir, ſays the widow, if you ſhould be killed in the battle, of whom may I expect it afterwards? Of my ſucceſſor, anſwered Trajan. What will it ſignify to you, Great Emperor, replied the woman, that any other than yourſelf render me juſtice? Is it not better that you ſhould do this good action yourſelf, than leave another to do it? It is ſaid, that the emperor being then moved at the tears of that poor mother, and perſwaded by her reaſons, alighted from his horſe, commanded thoſe who were accuſed of the murder of the widow's ſon to be brought before him, and took an exact cognizance of the whole affair: and tho' the principal officers of his army urged him very much, yet he would not continue his march till he had determined it. He ordered a conſiderable ſum of money to be paid to the widow, but ſpared the lives of the criminals. St Gregory, add they, touched with this action of juſtice and charity, prayed to God with many tears and groans, to take pity on that emperor. Being gone from thence to pray at St Peter's tomb, he there ſhed again a great many tears, and remained long in prayer on the ſame ſubject. Soon after he knew he had not prayed in vain: for falling into a ſleep, rather extatical than natural, God revealed to him that his prayers had been heard. But at the ſame time commanded him never to pray more for perſons that die unbaptized (3).’ John Diaconus, who believed this ſtory to be true (4), and ſaid that it was read in the Engliſh churches (5), owns however that it was not received by the Romans, and that it had appeared to them improbable (6). ‘It ought indeed to be rejected as a fable, that could find credit no where but with the Anglo-Saxons, who were as yet ignorant and uninſtructed in the Chriſtian religion: for John Diaconus evidently ſhews that it derived its original from them. I am ſurpriſed that learned men, who have been employed in collecting the acts of the ſaints, far from rejecting it, have made a † note to authorize and ſupport it: I fancy the reaſon why they judged ſo favourably of it was, becauſe they believed that the antient life of St Gregory, which they publiſhed as the performance of an anonymous author, was written by a cotemporary Hiſtorian, as they expreſsly declare ‡. But that anonymous author is at the ſame time called Paul Diaconus, and that cotemporary Hiſtorian is of the IXth century, younger than St Gregory by about 250 years, as I have proved in the Advertiſement. Cardinal Baronius ‡ has very amply refuted this ſtory in the 8th tome of his Annals, and after him Cardinal Bellarmin, not to mention ſeveral learned Critics of our own time, who have ſhewn the abſurdity and dangerous conſequences of it. But as that does not hinder people from making uſe of it every day, to authorize a very pernicious doctrine, and to teach that the interceſſion of the holy Virgin ſaves thoſe that belong to her, and that wear her livery, even tho' they die in mortal ſin; I believe, thoſe who love true piety will be glad to find this falſity refuted by St Gregory himſelf, and by what he ſays in his Dialogues (7).’

Sammarthanus recites afterwards divers paſſages of the XLIVth chapter of the fourth book of thoſe Dialogues, and ſhews thereby that St Gregory did not believe it poſſible to deliver a damned ſoul. He refutes likewiſe ſome anſwers that might be made in favour of the contrary opinion. See alſo page 409 of his work. He does not think it worth while to confute in particular another ſtory which is added to the former. It is reported, that this Pope felt continual pains in his feet and ſtomach, as a puniſhment of the ſin he had committed in praying for an emperor that was damned. Father Theophilus Raynauld ranks this amongſt the calumnies which have been publiſhed againſt great men (8). He quotes Toſtatus, who in the LVII queſtion on the IVth Book of the Kings affirms, that St Gregory then committed a mortal ſin. He ſays, that Alphonſus Ciacconius wrote a treatiſe to prove, that this ſtory of Trajan's deliverance was true: and adds that Rutilius Benzonius maintained the ſame thing in his Speculum Epiſcoporum, but that Melchior Canus, and Soto, had very well conjectured the falſity of that ſtory, and that Baronius, Bellarmin and Suarez, and ſeveral other moderns had clearly demonſtrated it to be a fable. All the ſubtilties invented to reconcile this pretended deliverance of Trajan with the irreverſibleneſs of God's decrees againſt perſons who are damned, he looks upon as meer cavilling: and rejects the reflexion of John Diaconus, that thoſe pains were inflicted on St Gregory, as an antidote againſt the pride wherewith he might have been puffed up, after ſo great an exploit as releaſing Trajan's ſoul from the pit of hell. Hoc ſane fundamento everſo . . . . . præciduntur tricæ variæ ab antiquis Theologis Scholaſticis excogitatæ, ad exponendum quo modo ſalva decretorum divinorum veritate de abyſſo nunquam ſeneſcente, (id eſt, ut ipſe D. Gregorius XXXIV. mor. c. 13. expoſuit, de nulla unquam in inferno redemptione) potuerit vir ſanctus, exorare Trajani a Tartaro ereptionem: quibuſdam dicentibus, Trajanum precibus ſancti Gregorii ad vitam revocatum egiſſe penitentiam; quod habet S. Thomas in 4. diſtinct. 45. quæſt. 2. art. 5. ad 5. Aliis aſſerentibus, ſuſpenſam fuiſſe Trajani condemnationem, & D. Gregorii oratione impeditam; ut videre eſt apud D. Thomam in 1. diſtinct. 43. quæſt. 2. art. 2. ad quintum & quæſt. 6. de veritat. artic. 6. ad quartum. Nihil horum neceſſarium eſt, ſuppoſita narrationis prædictæ falſitate, quæ item revicta, concidit quod ait Joannes Diaconus, ægritudines de quibus diximus, immiſſas eſſe Sancto Gregorio, ne ob eam Trajani ereptionem exoratam, tumeret animo (9).

(1) Dionyſius de Sammarth. Hiſtoire de St Gregoire, pag. 283.

(2) Ibid. pag. 284; but he obſerves that the learned doubt whether the ſermon concerning the dead, where this is aſſerted, and which is found amongſt the works of Joannes Damaſcenus, was written by him or not.

* No author that has writ the Roman Hiſtory, has related this fact, which was however very remarkable. Trajan's panegyriſts do not mention it neither.

(3) Ibid. pag. 283.

(4) Ibid. pag. 284.

(5) Ibid. pag. 283.

(6) Ibid. pag. 284.

† Bollandus, on the laſt chapter, of the Life of St Gregory, by Paul Diaconus.

‡ Auctore anonymo ſed ſynchrono, ſay they.

‡ Ad an. 604, num. 36, & ſeq. L. 2. de Purgat. c. 8.

(7) Dionyſius de Sammarth. ubi ſupra, pag. 284, 285.

(8) Theoph. Raynaud. Hoplotheca, §. ii, Serie iii, cap. xxiv, pag. m. 435.

(9) Id. ibid.

TRAPPE, an abbey ſituate in a very ſolitary place [A], on the frontiers of Perche in the dioceſe of Seez, is become very famous ſince the Abbot de Rancé hath reformed it. He held it in commendam above 25 years, but in 1662, he procured an agreement, by virtue of which the Monks of the ſtrict Obſervance entered and took poſſeſſion of the monaſtery. And the better to encourage their eſtabliſhment, he quitted to them the ſeat of Nuiſement which he enjoyed as Abbot in commendam (a). The following year he obtained of the king a permiſſion to become regular abbot of this abbey. He took the regular habit, and was admitted novice in the monaſtery of our Lady of Perſeigne, of the ſtrict Obſervance of the Ciſtertian order on the 13th of June 1663, being then aged 37 years and five months (b). --- On the 26th of June following having received his patent from Rome, impowering him to hold the abbey of la Trappe, as a regular abbot, he made his profeſſion in the abbey of Perſeigne (c). --- The 3d of July following he received the abbatial benediction (d) --- in the monaſtery of St Martin of Seez, and went to his abbey the 14th day of the ſame month (e). By his natural eloquence and example he prevailed on his Monks to ſubmit to the primitive auſterities of their rule. There was not one of them but would follow his abbot's ſteps, and in imitation of him abſtain from drinking of wine, eating of eggs and fiſh, and apply himſelf to manual labour for three hours every day (f). This abbey was fallen into great remiſſneſs of diſcipline. It was founded in the year 1140 [B].

(a) Deſcription de l'Abbaye de la Trappe, pag. 13, 14, Paris edition, 1682. It is a lettter of Mr Felibien, to the Ducheſs of Liancour, as it appears from the Journal des Sçavans, of the 28th of November, 1695, pag. m. 699.

(b) Felibien, ibid. pag. 15, 16.

(c) Felibien, ubi ſupra, pag. 19.

(d) By the hands of Mr Patrick Plunket, Biſhop of Armagh, in Ireland.

(e) Ibid. p. 20.

(f) Ibid. p. 22.

[A] ‘ Abbey in a very ſolitary place.] This abbey is ſituated in a large valley. The wood and the hills which ſurround it, are diſpoſed as if deſigned to hide it from the reſt of the world. They encloſe arable lands, plantations of fruit-trees, paſture grounds and nine ponds which encompaſs the abbey, and render it ſo difficult of acceſs, that it is very hard to come at it without a guide. There was heretofore a road from Mortagne to Paris behind the walls of the garden; but tho' it was in the wood, and above five hundred paces from the encloſure, and tho' it was not poſſible to remove it farther without a vaſt expence, yet the Abbot turned it another way, in order to render the place round the monaſtery more ſolitary. And indeed nothing is more ſo than this deſert: For tho' there are ſeveral towns and large villages at three leagues diſtance round it, yet to people who are there it ſeems to be a lonely and foreign country. Silence reigns throughout; and if any noiſe is heard, it is only the ruſtling of trees ſhaken by the wind, or the brooks running through the pebbles. This abbey diſcovers itſelf at going out of the foreſt of Perche, when one is coming from the ſouth; and tho' the traveller thinks himſelf very near, he finds it almoſt a mile before he reaches it: But having at laſt deſcended the hill, croſſed the heath, and gone on a little way amongſt hedges and through ſhady paths he comes to the firſt court, where the receiver's apartment is. It is ſeparated from thoſe of the Monks by a ſtrong palliſado of pales and thorns, which the Abbot cauſed to be made after he retired thither (1).

[B] It was fallen into great remiſſneſs of diſcipline. It was founded in the year 1140.] I ſhall continue to uſe the ſame authors words who furniſhed me with the preceding remark. ‘ The abbey of our Lady de la Maiſon-Dieu de la Trappe, (for ſo it is called) was founded by Rotrou Earl of Perche, in the year 1140, and conſecrated under the name of the bleſſed Virgin in 1214, by Robert Archbiſhop of Roüen, Ralph Biſhop of Evreux, and Sylveſter Biſhop of Séez. It felt for a long time the decay of the Ciſtercian order, and was fallen into the ſame irregularities, in which every body knows ſeveral monaſteries of that order continue to this day, ſince the remiſſneſs introduced two hundred years ago, having not yet embraced the ſtrict Obſervance of the rule re-eſtabliſhed in France, by the late Cardinal de la Rochefoucault, when Mr Armand John Bouthillier de Rancé, Doctor of Divinity, chief Almoner to the late Duke of Orleans, and Abbot in commendam of this abbey above twenty-five years, by his great care and frequent exhortations, brought the Monks of this abbey to conſent, and to requeſt that it might be put into the hands of the Fathers of the ſtrict Obſervance of the Ciſtercian order, to re-eſtabliſh the primitive and exact practice of the diſcipline. The Abbot de Barbarie of the ſtrict Obſervance, and viſitor of the province, being come thither, at the requeſt of the Abbot de Rance, with a commiſſion from the Abbot de Prieres, Vicar-General, made an agreement between the Abbot and the old Monks of la Trappe the 17th of Auguſt 1662, which was ratified in the Parliament of Paris the 16th of February 1663. By virtue of which the Monks of the ſtrict Obſervance entred and took poſſeſſion of the monaſtery (2).

(1) Felibien, Deſcription de l'Abbaye de la Trappe, pag. 6, & ſeq. printed at Paris in 1671, and the ſecond time in 1682.

(2) Felibien, ibid. pag. 11, & ſeq.

TREBATIUS (Caius) ſirnamed Teſta (a), was a very great Civilian. He had a vaſt memory (b), and tho' he profeſſed himſelf an Epicurean (c), he was a man of incomparable probity (d). During the war with the Gauls he was received into Julius Cæſar's favour by the recommendation of Cicero, and, if he would, might have enjoyed the profit of a Tribune's poſt without the exerciſe of that office [A]. Perhaps he would not have acquitted himſelf very well in it; for Cicero ſeems ſometimes a little to reproach his

(a) Cicero, Epiſt. xiii & xxi, lib. vii, ad Famil.

(b) See the remark [A].

(c) Id. ibid. Epiſt. xii.

(d) See the remark [A].

[A] He was received into Julius Cæſar's favour by the recommendation of Cicero .... and if he would, might have enjoyed .... &c.] Cicero recommended him in the following terms: ‘ Hunc, mi Cæſar, ſic velim omni tua comitate complectare, ut omnia quæ per me poſſis adduci ut in meos conferre velis, in unum hunc conferas: de quo tibi homine hæc ſpondeo non illo vetere verbo meo, quod, cum ad te de Milone ſcripſiſſem, jure luſiſti: ſed more Romano, quo modo homines non inepti loquuntur: probiorem hominem, meliorem virum, prudentiorem eſſe neminem. Accedit etiam, quod familiam ducit, in jure civili ſingularis memoria, ſumma ſcientia. Huic ego neque tribunatum, neque præfecturam, neque ullius beneficii certum nomen peto: benevolentiam tuam & liberalitatem peto: neque impedio, quo minus, ſi tibi ita placuerit, etiam hiſce eum ornes gloriolæ inſignibus. Totum denique hominem tibi ita trado de manu (ut aiunt) in manum tuam iſtam, & victoria & fide præſtantem (1). ---- I beg of you, my dear Cæſar, to receive this gentleman with all poſſible kindneſs, and to beſtow on him alone all the favours my intereſt with you can procure for my friends: I will anſwer for him, not in that old ſaying which I uſed, when I wrote to you concerning Milo, and which you juſtly laughed at: but in the Roman way, as wiſe men ſpeak, that there is not a better, honeſter or more prudent man living. Beſides, he excels in the knowledge of the Civil Law; is endowed with a vaſt memory, and great learning. I do not aſk for him the tribuneſhip, lieutenancy, or any particular poſt; I only intreat he may have your favour and friendſhip; and if you thought fit, I ſhould not be againſt his enjoying thoſe titles of honours. In fine, I deliver him entirely out of my own hand (as they ſay) into that of your's, excelling in victory and faithfulneſs.’ This recommendation had great effect, for Trebatius might, if he pleaſed, have been an honorary tribune, and enjoyed the profits of that high office:

(1) Cicero, Epiſt. v, lib vii, ad Familiar. pag. m. 375, 376. Note, that in the firſt letter of the tenth book to Atticus, he uſes theſe words, Trebatii boni viri & civis verbis te gaudeo eſſe delectatum. --- I am glad you was pleaſed with what was ſaid to you by Trebatius, an excellent man, and good citizen.

his want of bravery (e); and doubtleſs it was only his learned converſation which endeared him to Cæſar and his friends. Several of the letters he received from Cicero are yet extant. Thoſe who ſay that he engaged in Pompey's party, are very much miſtaken [B]. He was always firm to Julius Cæſar, and perſuaded Cicero to be of that ſide. He maintained his reputation ſo well after Julius Cæſar's death, that Auguſtus being in doubt concerning the validity of codicils, authorized the uſe of them by the advice and perſuaſive reaſons of Trebatius [C], after having conſulted the moſt able Civilians. Several are of opinion, that whenever we find in the Pandects (f) the ſayings of the Antients brought in, it ought chiefly to be underſtood of Trebatius, and his diſciple Labeo. The character of a learned man given to Trebatius by Horace, ſeems in my mind to ſignify a great deal in that place (g). This Civilian formed himſelf under Cornelius Maximus (h). He publiſhed ſeveral books [D]. He was ſometimes miſtaken in affirming, that certain things had never been conſidered [E].

(e) See Bertrand, de Juriſperitis, lib. ii, pag. m. 248; and Cicero, Epiſt. x, lib. vii, ad Famil.

(f) Bertrand, ibid. pag. 249.

(g) Horat. Sat. I, lib. ii, ver. 78.

(h) Pomponius, de origine Juris, lib. iii, cap. xi, num. 45.

fice: ‘Ex tuis literis cognovi præproperam quandam feſtinationem tuam, & ſimul ſum admiratus cur tribunatus commoda, demto præſertim labore militiæ contemſeris (2). - - - - By your letter I find you have been ſomewhat too precipitate, and withal I wonder that you refuſed the profits of the tribuneſhip, eſpecially as you were exempted from the trouble of the ſervice.’ Cicero foreſaw that he himſelf would prove the greateſt obſtacle to his fortune (3). He is not the only perſon of that turn: How many men are there who would have riſen, if they had had but patience enough, or if they had been importunate, or very aſſuming?

(2) Idem, Epiſt. viii, ejuſd. Libri.

(3) Tibi unum timendum ſit ne ipſe tibi defuiſſe videare. - - - One thing you ought to take care of, which is not to be wanting to yourſelf. Idem, Epiſt. vii, ejuſd. Libri.

[B] Thoſe who ſay that he engaged in Pompey's party, are very much miſtaken] Zazius advanced this falſity, and was refuted by Rutilius, as William Grotius obſerves: ‘Cum bellum civile incrudeſceret partes Cæſaris ſemper bona fide ſecutus eſt, ipſumque Ciceronem monere non deſtitit, ut vel ei ſe conjungeret, vel in Græciam proficiſceretur *, Ut mirum videri poſſit Zaſium ſcribere, Trebatium Pompejanarum fuiſſe partium, & Ciceronis interventu in gratiam receptum: ſed hæc jam Rutilius diluit (4) When the civil war broke out, he always faithfully adhered to Cæſar's party, and conſtantly adviſed Cicero either to ſide with Cæſar, or to go into Greece. So it is ſtrange that Zazius ſhould write that he was on Pompey's ſide, and received into favour by the recommendation of Cicero: but this has been already confuted by Rutilius.’ Suetonius relates, 1. That Trebatius adviſed Julius Cæſar to riſe when the ſenators went to him in the temple of Venus: 2. That Cæſar diſapproving his counſel, ſhewed him ſome coldneſs (5). This ſhows that our Civilian was a favourite of Julius Cæſar.

* Plut. in vita Cic.

(4) Guilel. Grotius, de Vitis Juriſconſ. pag. 78.

(5) Admonentem C. Trebatium ut aſſurgeret minus familiari vultu reſpexiſſe. Sueton. in Julio, cap. lxxviii.

[C] Auguſtus, being in doubt concerning the validity of codicils, authorized the uſe of them by the advice . . . . of Trebatius.] Bertrandus's words are, ‘Cæterum Juſtinianus in §. 1. de jure codicil. in Inſtitut. refert, Auguſtum, cum de codicillorum viribus dubitaret, qui antea in uſu non fuerant, convocaſſe ſapientes viros, inter quos Trebatium, cujus tunc maxima auctoritas erat, & quæſiſſe, an non abſonans à juris ratione codicillorum uſus eſſet, recipique poſſit: Trebatium id ſuaſiſſe Auguſto, quod diceret, utiliſſimum ac neceſſarium civibus eſſe, propter magnas & longas peregrinationes quæ apud veteres fuiſſent; ubi ſi quis teſtamentum facere non poſſet, tamen codicillos poſſet (6). - - - - - - Juſtinian relates, that Auguſtus, doubting of the validity of codicils, which had not been formerly in uſe, conſulted ſome able Civilians, amongſt whom was Trebatius, a man of great reputation at that time, and aſked whether the practice of codicils was not contrary to law, and whether it might be authorized: That Trebatius adviſed Auguſtus to authorize it, ſaying that it was very uſeful and neceſſary to the Roman citizens, on account of their great and long journies into foreign countries, where one might make codicils, if he could not make a will.’ Mr Menage rejects the thought of Heinſius, who pretends to prove, that Trebatius's opinions are moſt times condemned in the Pandects: ‘Longe plura ſunt, ſaith Mr Menage (7), in quibus Trebatii ſententiam ſequuntur cæteri Juris interpretes, & omnino falſa eſt Heinſiana Sententia. - - - - There are many more things in which the opinion of Trebatius is followed by the other Civilians, and the opinion of Heinſius is entirely falſe.’ It is certain that Trebatius's authority was very great for ſeveral ages. Which Ammianus Marcellinus's words plainly teſtify: ‘Hi ut altius videantur jura callere TREBATIUM loquuntur & Caſcellium, & Alfenum, & Auruncorum Sicanorumque jam diu leges ignotas cum Evandri matre abhinc ſeculis obrutas multis (8). - - - - That they may ſeem to underſtand the Law more profoundly, they talk of TREBATIUS, Caſcellius, and Alfenus, and the laws of the Arunci and Sicani which have been long ſince forgot, and buried in oblivion with the mother of Evander.’

(6) Bertrandus, de Juriſperitis, lib. ii, pag. m. 250.

(7) Menagius, Juris Civilis Amœnit. cap. xiv, pag. m. 79.

(8) Amm. Marcell. lib. xxx, cap. iv, pag. m. 594.

[D]. He publiſhed ſeveral books.] An antient ſcholiaſt (9) aſſerts, that Aulus (10) Trebatius a Roman Knight, and Civilian, compoſed ſeveral tracts on the Civil-law, and nine books concerning religions. This account is not very exact, for Macrobius (11), hath cited the 10th book of that work of Trebatius. And theſe words of Bertrandus are yet leſs exact: ‘Certum eſt Trebatium ſcripſiſſe de religionibus lib. duos (12.) - - - - It is certain that Trebatius wrote two books concerning religions.’

(9) Vetus Scholiaſtes Horatii in Sat. I, lib. ii.

(10) He ſhould have ſaid Caïus.

(11) Macrob. Saturn. lib. iii, cap. iii, pag. m. 388.

(12) Bertrand. ubi ſupra, pag. 252, 253.

[E] In affirming that certain things had never been conſidered.] Cicero once convicted him of falſity. I ſhall cite the paſſage at large, to inform the reader that Trebatius entertained his friends very handſomely. ‘Illuſeras heri inter ſcyphos, quod dixeram, controverſiam eſſe, poſſetne heres, quod furtum antea factum eſſet, furti recte agere. Itaque, etſi domum bene potus ſeroque redieram, tamen id caput, ubi hæc controverſia eſt, notavi, & deſcriptum tibi miſi: ut ſcires, id, quod tu neminem ſenſiſſe dicebas Sex. Ælium, M. Manilium, M. Brutum ſenſiſſe (13). - - - Laſt night, in our cups, you laughed at me for ſaying that it was a queſtion, whether an heir could laid an indictment for a theft, which had been committed before he was made heir: and therefore tho' I had drank pretty freely, and it was late before I returned home, yet I took down in writing the chapter where this controverſy is handled, and have ſent it to you, that you may ſee that Sex. Ælius, M. Manilius, and M. Brutus had thought of that caſe, which you imagined had eſcaped all other Civilians.’ Thoſe who quote this epiſtle of Cicero, to make it appear that Trebatius reduced the precepts of his ſect into practice, and that he lived like an Epicurean libertine, reaſon very ill. Doth not Cicero, ſo oppoſite to Epicurus, own that he had drank very freely that night? And is it reaſonable thence to infer any thing againſt his morals? It is therefore certain, that this paſſage doth not hinder Trebatius from being a proof that the impious opinions of the Epicureans were compatible with the practice of moral virtues; for, as I have already ſaid, Trebatius was a man of great probity. Bertrandus draws another conſequence from this epiſtle of Cicero: he pretends that it proves that Trebatius attempting to paſs for the inventer of his anſwers, magiſterially affirmed that no author had ever ſaid any ſuch thing: ‘Tantam autem Trebatius in reſpondendo vanam oſtentationem, inanemque gloriolam habebat, ut ſæpiſſime quæ plerique ante eum dixerant, neminem præter eum ſenſiſſe audacter profiteretur (14). - - - Trebatius was ſo ridiculouſly vain and oſtentatious in his anſwers, that he would often confidently maintain, that no body beſides himſelf knew a thing, tho' it had been ſaid by a great many before him.’

(13) Cicero, Epiſt. xxii, lib. vii, ad Famil.

(14) Bertrandus, ubi ſupra, pag. 251, 252.

TRISTAN L'HERMITE (LEWIS) was the inſtrument of the revenges and cruelties of Lewis XI (a). He was Provoſt-Marſhal, or, according to others, Great Provoſt of the king's houſhold. ‘He became ſo odious to all good men, that they were afraid to name him. . . . . He was not content to obey the barbarous commands of depriving thoſe of their lives who had not been convicted of any crime; but executed thoſe orders with a precipitation not excuſable in the moſt ſavage monſters of cruelty. This made him take ſometimes the innocent for the guilty; and in order to repair the fault committed by his miſtake, he was obliged to kill two perſons inſtead of one (b).’

He had been knighted by Charles VII, after the ſiege of Fronſac (c). His ſon PETER L'HERMITE was the father of JOHN L'HERMITE, who once ſhewed Thevet, the Coſmographer, in the houſe of Mortaigne, ſeveral antient deeds, importing the relation betwixt the lords of that houſe and the antient Romans (d). I take notice of this only as an inſtance of the folly of thoſe traditions which are preſerved in antient families. Thuanus wonders that Philip de Comines hath not mentioned this Triſtan, who left, ſays he, a great eſtate behind him, part of which was the principality of Mortaing in Gaſcony. . . . poſſibly it was he who impriſoned Philip de Commines, in a cage (e).

(a) See the remark [Q], of the article LEWIS XI.

(b) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louïs XI, livr. x, pag. 331. Dutch Edit.

(c) Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louïs, XI, livr. xi, pag. m. 751.

(d) Thevet, Coſmographie Univerſelle, livr. xiv, fol. 517.

(e) Thuana, pag. m. 37, 38.

TRISTAN L'HERMITE (FRANCIS) Gentleman in ordinary to the Duke of Orleans, and one of the beſt Poets of the XVIIth century, pretended to be deſcended from the Grand Provoſt of Lewis XI (a). He was born at the caſtle of Souliers (b), in the province of la Marche. He was brought up page of honour to Scævola de Sainte Marthe (c). His tragedy intituled Mariamne paſſed for an excellent piece (d) [A]. He was admitted into the French academy, in the place of Mr Colomby about the year 1649. After which he lived about ſix or ſeven years.

‘He died very piouſly at the palace of Guiſe, without ſuffering his friends to viſit him, and forgot them all to think of God (e).’ What is ſaid of his poverty, doth not ſeem true in all particulars [B], and would be no proof of the

(a) Chevræana, Tom. i, pag. 29. Dutch Edit.

(b) Pelliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Acad. Franç. pag. m. 339. I think it ſhould be Soliers.

(c) Chevræana, ubi ſupra. (d) See Mr Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, num. 1488, and Mr Pelliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Academie Françoiſe, pag. m. 359, where we may ſee the catalogue of his works. (e) Chevræana, ibid.

[A] His tragedy, intituled, Mariamne, paſſed for an excellent piece.] The Abbot Marolles obſerves, that this play was that with which the incomparable Mondori, the beſt actor of his time, ended (1). This is a little equivocal. He ſhould have ſaid, that this famous player loſt his life by the efforts he was obliged to make, to repreſent the paſſions which the author had deſcribed. In the Parnaſſe Reformé, an actor is introduced, ſaying to Triſtan, I believe you would have us act nothing elſe but Mariamne, and kill a Mondory every week in your ſervice (2).

(1) Marolles, Mémoir, Part. ii, pag. 242.

(2) Parn. Réformé, pag. m. 106.

[B] What is ſaid of his poverty doth not ſeem true in all particulars.] Let us hear what Mr Menage ſaid of it (3). ‘Mr Quinaut was a ſervant to Mr Triſtan. The Duke of Montauſieur ſaid, that when he died, he left him his poetical vein, and would willingly have left him his cloak too if he had had one: on which Mr de Montmor made this epigram, which is cited by Mr de Furetiere:

(3) Menagiana, pag. 146, 147, of the ſecond Dutch Edit.

Elie, ainſi qu'il eſt écrit
De ſon manteau joint à ſon double eſprit,
Récompenſa ſon ſerviteur fidele.
Triſtan eût ſuivi ce modele;
Mais Triſtan qu'on mit au Tombeau
Plus pauvre que n'eſt un Prophete,
En laiſſant à Quinaut ſon eſprit de Poëte,
Ne put lui laiſſer de manteau.

Elijah, to reward Eliſha's merit,
Left him his mantle and his double ſpirit.
Triſtan to do the like in vain had try'd:
Poorer than any prophet, when he died,
He left his friend his wit . . . but not a cloak beſide.

Mr Furetiere, whom Mr Menage cites, doth not aſcribe this rallery to Mr de Montauſier, but to Mr Bourdelot. It is no ſmall happineſs for Mr Quinaut, ſays he (4), ‘to have been ſervant to the illuſtrious Mr Triſtan, under whom he ſerved his apprenticeſhip in Poetry. Which one day drew on him the compliment of a great prince †, who, at the end of one of his plays congratulated him, by comparing him and his maſter, to Eliſha and Elijah. As Elijah, ſaid he, when taken up to Heaven, by giving Eliſha his mantle, left him the ſpirit of prophecy; ſo Triſtan, at his death, tranſmitted to Quinaut his poetical genius. Mr Bourdelot, who was preſent, obſerved that the ſimile was lame in this reſpect; for Triſtan had never a mantle or cloak: which occaſioned this epigram, that was then made to preſerve the memory of this parallel.

(4) Furetiere, troiſiéme Factum, pag. 22, Dutch. Edit.

† The Duke of Guiſe.

Elie, ainſi qu'il eſt écrit, &c.

Elijah left, as it is writ, &c.

I doubt not but Triſtan's wretched condition was here exaggerated, and I cannot perſuade myſelf that his poverty was like that of the famous Poet with whom Boileau begins his ſatires:

Damon ce grand Auteur, dont la Muſe fertile
Amuſa ſi long temps, & la cour & la ville:
Mais qui n'étant vetu que de ſimple bureau,
Paſſe l'été ſans linge, & l'hiver ſans manteau (5),

(5) Deſpreaux, Sat. I, at the beginning.

Damon, a mighty author, who had long
Amus'd the court and city with his ſong,
Aſham'd to ſee himſelf ſo meanly dreſt,
For drugget was at once his worſt and beſt,
That in hot weather he had ſcarce a ſhirt
To ſhift him, and his linnen ſtood with dirt;
And, what wou'd any man of wit provoke,
At Chriſtmas to be ſeen without a cloak.

I dare engage that ſome perſons, yet alive, might certify that they have ſeen Triſtan with a cloak, or at leaſt that they know ſome who have ſeen him with one in cold weather or rain. I am willing to believe that it was not a new, or a very valuable one, but, in ſhort, it was a cloak (6). A wit, diſpoſed to divert himſelf with the poverty of the Poets, chiefly turns on theſe two topics, viz. their being ill cloathed, and ill lodged; and this ſort of rallery moſt times exceeds the bounds of truth. Coſtar was puzzled when obliged to account for theſe words. ‘Arioſto and Taſſo have erected very rich palaces, not to ſpeak of that of Love, in Marino's Adonis; and yet they hired chambers to lodge in: this is not what we call ædificare caſas; building cottages. Theſe, Sir, are the people who, as you ſay, would delay building

(6) Add that it was without doubt rather his own cloak, tho' perhaps bought in a Broker's ſhop, than a borrowed or hired one.

the injuſtice of the age, nor any argument of the ſterility of the ſervices done to the Muſes ‘ building till the ſtones will ſucceſſively come of their own accord, and place themſelves one upon another (7).’ But his adverſary diſcovered his falſities and and their origin; he obſerved that Coſtar was not much concerned for truth, provided he could pleaſe his fancy. The whole criticiſm which falls ſeverely on him, runs thus: ‘ I own that Taſſo was poor, yet he did not live in lodgings; he had his apartments in the palace of the Dukes of Ferrara, and other princes, in whoſe court he reſided. And as to what concerns Arioſto, he was rich enough, and ſo far from being reduced to live in lodgings, that he built a very covenient houſe, where he generally reſided, as he himſelf aſſures us in theſe verſes which he cauſed to be engraved on it.

Parva, ſed apta mihi, ſed nulli obnoxia, ſed non Sordida, parta meo ſed tamen ære domus.

This is a ſmall, but neat convenient houſe,
To none obnoxious, built at my expence.

‘ Battiſta Pigna, who wrote his life, ſaith, that he delighted much in building, and that his moſt common employment was, continually to alter or improve ſomething or other in his houſe. Ma dilletando ſi molto d'edificare, &c. Intorno à queſta ſua caſa non ſi contentando mai d'una coſa fatta, facea ſpeſſo rifarla dicendo d'eſſere ancora tale nel far verſi, eſſendo che molto li mutava e rimutava. If you deſire another witneſs, Paulus Jovius ſays, in his Elogies, Receptus inde eſt ab Alfonſo Principe tanquam horarum omnium amicus & ſodalis, cujus benigna manu urbanam domum extruxit peramœnâ hortorum ubertate, frugi menſæ quotidianos ſumptus adæquantem. - - - - He was received by the Prince Alphonſus as a friend and companion at all hours, by whoſe liberality he built a city-houſe, and had a pleaſant fruitful garden to it, ſuited to his moderate circumſtances. But you are not much concerned for the truth of what you ſay; you are afraid that things would be ridiculous if too true. All is well, if the matter doth not fail you, and you can fill the page. You ſay every thing that occurs to your fancy (8).’ Coſtar was not ſo ſtuned with this heavy blow as not to think of ſome ſhifts; but indeed they are meer cavils. It is true, ſaith he (9), that Taſſo for a long time had an apartment in the ducal palace of Ferrara: but when he wrote his heroic poem Rinaldo, at Padua, or when he was employed in the diſpoſition of the deſign and matter of his Gieruſalemme liberata; did not he live in lodgings? and doth not he, in one of his letters, complain of their inconveniencies? As for Arioſto, we ſhall find him, in his ſatires, complaining of his extreme poverty (10.) . . . . . At laſt Alfonſo's liberalities enabled him to build a houſe. But Battiſta Pigna teſtifies, that it was at a very ſmall expence, poca ſpeſa. And a certain perſon telling him, that ſuch a ſmall building did not very well agree with ſo many towring and magnificent palaces, which he had erected in his writings; he anſwered, That building with words, and building with ſtones were not the ſame things: Egli dandogli queſta feſtevole riſpoſta, che porvi le pietre & porvi le parole non è il medeſimo. I would aſk Mr Girac, if it is not probable, that Arioſto lodged in a hired room, whilſt the builders were at work; and much more before he was able to employ them (11)? Coſtar ſubjoins ſeveral examples. He ſaith that Terence had not ſo much as one hired houſe; that Vitellius when he left Rome to go into Germany , where, ſoon after, the Roman legions created him Emperor, left his wife and children in a hired room; that Malherbe never lived otherwiſe; and that his excellent verſes did not bring him in enough to build even a poor cottage which he could call his own (12). Every one muſt needs ſee that this way of anſwering is but a wretched apology; for, not to inſiſt on every particular, could we not ſay that Arioſto, while the workmen were employed in building his houſe, rented another; a practice very common amongſt a vaſt number of very rich people? Are Terence, Vitellius, or Malherbe, concerned in this diſpute, or does the queſtion run upon this, viz. Whether it was ſhameful (13) for Taſſo and Arioſto to live in lodgings? The queſtion is only about the matter of fact itſelf. Coſtar could not maintain what he advanced; he is therefore conquered. The ſame fate would probably fall on thoſe who ſhould be obliged to bring proofs that Triſtan l'Hermite had not ſo much as a cloak.

Men are too much pleaſed with exaggerations in this ſort of rallery; they imagine that without exceeding the bounds of truth, they cannot give a ſufficient poignancy to their thoughts. I am going to cite a Rondeau, which ſuppoſes ſome Poets not able ſo much as to hire a lodging. This is a hint from the fable of Amphion's lyre, which had ſuch a virtue, that without the help of any other architect, it was able to build a city.

Le (14) beau ſecret pour elever le corps
D'un grand Logis! Tels Ouvriers ſont morts;
Il n'en eſt plus; à leur douce harmonie
Les gros moëlons venoient de compagnie,
Et s'arrangeoient comme par des reſſorts.
  A peu de frais, & ſans aucuns efforts,
Pareilles gens édifioient alors,
La ſeule voix au Luth eſtant unie;
    Le beau ſecret!
  Ah! pour baſtir, ſi les charmans accords,
Si les bons Vers, tenoient lieu de tréſors,
Que de Palais de ſplendeur infinie!
Nos Amphions ſont en chambre garnie;
S'ils n'y ſont pas, c'eſt qu'ils couchent dehors:
    Le beau ſecret (15)!

O happy art, a houſe to raiſe!
Such builders live not in our days,
At the ſweet muſic of whoſe ſong
Huge ſtones ſpontaneous mov'd along,
And form'd a habitable pile,
Without the maſter's charge or toil.
'Twas but to ſing and touch the lyre,
The houſe was built to their deſire.
    O happy art!
Ah! were it now, as erſt of old!
Wou'd verſes paſs inſtead of gold;
What ſplendid palaces wou'd riſe,
What domes poetic brave the ſkies!
But our Amphions live alone
In hired lodgings . . . or in none.
    O happy art!

You ſee Mr Benſerade thought it impoſſible to rally agreeably without taking his ſubject a note higher than thoſe who touched it before him. He believed it too vulgar to lodge the Poets in a hired room very near the garret. This is, doubtleſs, the deſtiny of ſome, as well as it was the hard fate of the Grammarian Orbilius, who, as Suetonius informs us, taught at Rome, with much more reputation than profit, and he himſelf complained, in one of his books, that the poverty which attended his old age, obliged him to lodge in a garret (16). This complaint ſeems better grounded than the confeſſion which Martial makes of being lodged in the third ſtory.

Et ſcalis habito tribus, ſed altis (17).

And in a room three ſtories high was lodg'd.

Mr Gombauld was rallied for having no better lodging. ‘ Mr Boitard, Preſident of the Chamber of Accounts at Montpelier, was very much pleaſed with jeſting upon Mr de Gombauld. Once in rallery he cauſed a bill to be clapped on his door, importing, That if any perſon had found a Bruges ſattin bag, in which are Mr de Gombaud's thoughts, if they will be pleaſed to bring them to the ſcutcheon of Ancezune, in the Ruë des Noyers, four pair of ſtairs, ubi ponunt ova columbæ (18), - - where the pigeons lay their eggs, they ſhall be very well re-warded (19).’ Some are of opinion, that Juvenal did not mean, that the beſt Roman Poets were juſt ready to turn Bakers, or Bagnio keepers, but that the true ſenſe of his words is, that they deſigned to lodge at ſome Bagnio-keeper's or

---

(7) Entretiens de Voiture & de Coſtar, p. 329.

(8) Girac, Remarques ſur les Entretiens de Coſtar, pag. 263, 264.

(9) Coſtar, Apologie pag. 330.

(10) Coſtar quotes in this place ſeveral verſes of Arioſto, that witneſs his poverty; but as has been ſeen above, in remark [E] of the article BENSERADE, the complaints of Poets are not always a proof of their being poor.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 331.

 Uxore & liberis quos Romæ relinquebat meritorio cœnaculo abditis, &c. Suet. in Vitell. cap. 7.

(12) Coſtar, Apol. pag. 332.

(13) Coſtar ſuppoſes without any reaſon for it, that people fancied he tarniſhed the reputation of Taſſo and Arioſto.

(14) Benſerade, Métamorph. d'Ovide miſes en Rondeaux.

(15) This puts me in mind of Father Garaſſe's words, in his Doctrine Curieuſe, p. 63: ‘ They are of the opinion of the paraſite mentioned by the old Comic Poet Cæcilius, that the greateſt torment a paraſite can be put to, is Affligere eum domicænio, - - to condemn him to ſup at home, ſi tamen lares habet.’

(16) Docuit majore fama quam emolumento. Namque jam perſenex pauperem ſe & habitare ſub tegulis quodam ſcripto fatetur. Sueton. de illuſtr. Grammat. cap. ix.

(17) Mart. Epigramm. cxviii, lib. i. See alſo Epigramm. cix. of the ſame book, where he ſays, At mea Vipſanas ſpectant cœnacula laurus.

(18) It is an alluſion to theſe words of Juven. Sat. iii, ver. 201.
Quem tegula ſola tuetur
A pluvia, molles ubi reddunt ova columbæ.

(19) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 176. Dutch Edit.

Muſes [C]. He had a brother who applied himſelf to the writing of genealogies, and who publiſhed an Hiſtory of Touraine (f), and is, if I am not miſtaken, the ſame John Baptiſt TRISTAN

Baker's, that they might warm themſelves for nothing. However it be, thoſe lines of Juvenal give a lively deſcription of their deplorable condition ?

> Cum jam celebres, notique poëtæ
> Balneolum Gabiis, Romæ conducere furnos
> Tentarent : nec fœdum alii, nec turpe putarent
> Præcones fieri, cum, deſertis Aganippes
> Vallibus, eſuriens migraret in atria Cleio (20).

> But now the celebrated wits for need
> Hire bagnios, to the crier's trade ſucceed,
> Or get their own by baking others bread !
> Or, by the porter's lodge, with beggars wait
> For greaſy fragments at the great man's gate.
> DRYDEN.

But Mr Benſerade goes yet much further ; he ſays, ſome Poets paſs the whole night in the ſtreet, and lie under no other canopy than that of Heaven, being more miſerable than foxes, who have holes, and the birds of the air who have neſts (21).

It is ſo true, that the thing aimed at by this ſort of rallery, is to ſhew, that Poets have no houſes of their own, that a certain ingenious man delighted in ſuppoſing, that a Poet having once bought a houſe, a poetical parliament was called to conſider of this great novelty, and the greateſt Poets urging, they never lived otherwiſe than in lodgings, he was immediately obliged to ſell his houſe. This ſtory in Latin runs thus : ' Memini me olim legiſſe elegantem ingenii luſum, ſuperiore ætate excuſum, cum inſcriptione : Poëta domum emit. Argumentum libelli eſt, neſcio quis poëta, qui cum propriam domum emiſſet, res ea tanquam novi & peſſimi Exempli, ad Poëtarum Senatum delata, acerbe judicata eſt. Præſes Senatûs Eobanus Heſſus conſtitutus, cui aſſederunt, Celtes, Huttenus, Bebelius, Braſſicanus, alii. Cum Sententias dicerent, nemo ex omnibus fuit, qui vel Mecœnatum gratia, vel ingenii felicitate tantum profecerit, ut ædes proprias vel hæreditate vel emptione poſſederit ; omnes rei familiaris incurii, in conducto ſe vixiſſe & faſſi ſunt & gloriati. Juſſus igitur eſt quàm primum ædes revendere, pecuniam vero in ſympoſium conferre quo immanem hanc culpam elueret, & ubique habitare ac ſine curis vivere poëtice diſceret. Hæc illi (22). - - - - I remember I read formerly an elegant piece of wit, printed in the laſt century, and intituled, A Poet bought a houſe. The ſubſtance of it is this ; A certain Poet having purchaſed an houſe of his own, the matter was laid before the parliament of Poets, as being an unheard of and very bad precedent, and a ſevere ſentence was pronounced upon it. Eobanus Heſſus was choſen ſpeaker, and Celtes, Huttenus, Bebelius, Braſſicanus, and others, were members. When they came to give their votes, it appeared there was not one ſingle perſon, who through the favour of patrons, or an happy wit, was worth ſo much as to be maſter of an houſe either by inheritance or purchaſe : all of them neglecting their private fortunes, owned, and bragged that they lived in lodgings. The Poet was therefore ordered forthwith to ſell his houſe, and to buy wine with the money for their entertainment, and that he ſhould learn to lodge and live always without care like a Poet.'

The jeſts made on our Triſtan l'Hermit were chiefly levelled at the meanneſs of his cloaths. It was he whom Mr Gueret choſe to be an apologiſt for ſhabby Poets : for ſomebody having ſaid, that their uncombed hair, their dirty linnen, and the ridiculous figure which their ragged cloaths made, would force a ſmile from the graveſt men (23) ; Triſtan bluntly replied (24), ' You trouble your head about a trifle . . . . let the Poets live as they pleaſe : do not you know they cannot abide conſtraint ? And what is it to you, that they are all ill cloathed, if their verſe be lofty and magnificent ? Do not deceive yourſelf, this great negligence is the ſource of their fineſt poems : they are thus unconcerned at worldly things, to make their court to the Muſes with the greateſt aſſiduity ; and when their eyes appear to you ſtaring or diſtracted, their imagination is buſied in queſt of thoſe ſurpriſing wonders which raviſh you. Would to God our dramatic Poets were only guilty of this fault, I could eaſily pardon them. But, contrary to thoſe you ſpeak of, they are magnificently dreſſed, they look great by their rich apparel, and their poems are languid, and without method.

[C] . . . . and would be no proof of the injuſtice of the age, nor any argument of the ſterility of the ſervices done to the Muſes.] If any one ſhould ever think of reducing all the liſts of poor learned men, which we find in ſeveral places (25), into an univerſal catalogue, it would ſwell to a very large book ; and the Poets would here take up more room than all other authors, if we either regard their accounts of themſelves, or the truth of the fact. I think I have already cited theſe verſes of Regnier :

> Or avecq' tout cecy le poinct qui me conſole,
> C'eſt que la pauvreté comme moi les affole,
> Et que la grace à Dieu, Phœbus & ſon troupeau
> Nous n'euſmes ſur le dos jamais un bon manteau,
> &c (26).

> This is my comfort with my ſcanty ſtore,
> They grow the fonder of me, 'cauſe I'm poor ;
> And, thanks to heav'n, to Phæbus and the Nine,
> I ne'er had a warm cloak, nor place to dine, &c.

A little lower he ſaith :

> Pour moy, ſi mon habit, par tout cicatricé
> Ne me rendoit du peuple & des grands meſpriſé
> Je prendrois patience, &c.

> As for my ſelf, if tatter'd coat and veſt,
> Of high and low did not make me the jeſt,
> I could be patient, &c.

The epitaph on Malherbe written by Gombauld, diſcovers the poverty of both of them :

> L'Apollon de nos jours, Malherbe, icy repoſe ;
> Il a vêcu long-temps ſans beaucoup de ſupport :
> En quel ſiecle ? paſſant ! je n'en dis autre choſe,
> Il eſt mort pauvre, & moy je vis comme il eſt mort (27).

> Here lies Malherbe, th' Apollo of our time,
> Long while he liv'd with little to ſupport him.
> In what age ? Paſſenger, I ſay no more,
> He died, I live, alike, both very poor.

It would be very eaſy to make a collection of pieces of Poetry of the like nature, which would fill ſeveral ſheets. The general concluſion is that the age is very ungrateful and unjuſt to ſuffer ſo many men to be afflicted with poverty, who deſerve ſo well to be rewarded, and to enjoy the conveniencies of life. But it is certain that thoſe who talk thus are very often in the wrong ; for there are ſeveral Poets, whoſe poverty is only to be aſcribed to their too great neglect of their domeſtic affairs, and not knowing how to huſband the favours which they receive. Thoſe who apply themſelves wholly to the Muſes, can ſcarce think of any thing elſe, and find ſo many charming engagements in the compoſition of a Poem, that they cannot take off their thoughts, even when their domeſtic intereſt requires them to be employed in ſomething elſe, than the compoſing an Ode. ' The pleaſure Poetry affords is very great, and . . . . . the hours paſs away very faſt which are employed that way. But does not this wonderful pleaſure which Poets take in their performances, divert them from their affairs, prejudice their fortune, and eſtrange them from the uſual conduct of other men ? For rather than not finiſh a ſonnet well begun, a Poet will ſuffer his friend to depart without bidding him adieu, abandon the ſollicitation of his law-ſuit, and neglect the care of his health : as it happened to the Cavalier Marino, who burnt his leg as he was writing ſome ſtanzas of his Adonis. This poetic

' abſence

(f) Marolles, Denombrement des Auteurs.

(20) Juven. Sat. vii, ver. 3.

(21) St Matthew viii. 20.

(22) Joh. Valentinus Andreas, Epiſt. ccii, pag. 242.

(23) Gueret, Parnaſſe Réformé, pag. 101.

(24) Ibid. pag. 102, 103.

(25) You will find one in Weitzius's notes upon theſe words of Petronius : Neſcio quo modo bonæ mentis ſoror eſt paupertas. Thoſe notes are to be found in the edition of Petronius, publiſhed by Lotichius, at Francfort, 1629, in 4*to*.

(26) Regnier, Sat. ii, fol. m. 5 verſo.

(27) See the Diverſitez Curieuſes, Part. x, pag. 35, Dutch Edit.

TRISTAN L'HERMITE de Soliers, who in the year 1661, publiſhed the Cabinet of Lewis XI, containing ſeveral fragments, letters, and ſecret intrigues concerning the reign of that monarch; and ſeveral other curious pieces, never before publiſhed. Collected from ſeveral archives and repoſitories (g).

(g) At Paris. It is a book in 12mo, of 122 pages.

'abſence is not hurtful when ſome misfortune has happened; for it does in ſome meaſure take off the ſenſe of it: but it is prejudicial, when it throws men into ſad accidents, like that of Marino. On indifferent ſubjects it is innocent and even diverting,

Si lors que tu luy parles,
Il te laiſſe au Roy Jehan, & s'en court au Roy Charles.

If when to him you talk,
He from one ſubject to another roves.

'The elevated imagination of a Poet is no diſagreeable object, when at leiſure hours we ſee it take its flight, and ſoar up towards every thing that can afford it ſome thoughts. And if ſometimes the beauty or the boldneſs of thoſe pictures which he draws, divert us; yet the Poet's ill fortune is always to be lamented, becauſe his moſt preſſing affairs ſcarce ever prevail over his abſence of mind (28).' There are ſeveral other cauſes of the ill poſture of their affairs, which are indeed ſhameful; ſome are poor notwithſtanding the liberalities of a Mæcenas, becauſe they are prodigal and voluptuous; others loſe at play all the money which their poetical productions bring in. Our Triſtan ruined himſelf by this. See what Mr Chevreau ſays of it. 'We may judge of his genius by his Mariamna. We were intimate friends; and when he deſired me to inform him of the fate of the laſt verſes which he made for the Queen (29). I anſwered him that the perſon who ſhewed them to her majeſty, did not chuſe a time when the Queen was in a gay humour. But if ſhe had made him a preſent, he would have made but a very indifferent uſe of it: gaming was his predominant paſſion; and he loſt all he could play for. At ſeveral times he received of the Duke of St Aignan a thouſand piſtoles, out of which he could not ſpare enough to buy a good ſuit of cloaths (30).' Could he then juſtly complain of the hardneſs of the age? If he was not rich in proportion to his condition, it was his own fault, and only to be charged on his ill conduct. He is reported to have written his own epitaph in theſe ſix verſes.

(28) Sorbiere, Letter lxxvii, pag. 559, 560.

(29) That is Chriſtina, Queen of Sweden.

(30) Chevræana, Tom. i, pag. 29. Dutch Edit.

Ebloüi de l'éclat de la ſplendeur mondaine,
Je me flatay tousjours de l'eſperance vaine;
Faiſant le chien couchant auprés d'un grand Seigneur,
Je me vis tousjours pauvre, & tâchay de paroiſtre;
Je veſcus dans la peine attendant le bonheur,
Et mourus ſur un coffre en attendant mon Maiſtre (31).

Smit with the dazling ſplendor of the world,
I fed my wiſhes with expectance vain,
Servilely crouching at a great lord's feet.
Still poor, I labour'd ſtill to ſeem in want;
I lived in pain, expecting happineſs,
And in the ſervice of my maſter died.

(31) See the Diverſitez Curieuſes, ubi ſupra, Tom. ii, pag. 341, Dutch Edit.

Mr Chevreau mentions another Poet, who ruined himſelf by his pleaſures, viz. Colletet. 'In his Poems we find this verſe.

J'ay des maiſons aux champs, j'ay des maiſons en ville.

City and country houſes I enjoy.

'But theſe houſes muſt have been in partibus infidelium, imaginary. He was naturally libidinous, and to tempt him, it was not neceſſary to be either fair or young. That he might not get a ſcandalous name among his neighbours, and not being able to live without a female ſervant, he married her, and ſhe was no ſooner dead than he got another, whom he alſo did not fail to make his wife (32)..... Thoſe who deſigned to take an inventory of his goods, aſſured me that he ſaved them that trouble, and left his ſon the name of Colletet only for an inheritance (33).'

It would be almoſt as difficult to enrich certain authors, as to fill the Danaides tub. They are with reſpect to their expences what others are with reſpect to ſecrets (34); money ſlips from them a thouſand ſeveral ways.

(32) Chevræana, ibid. pag. 30.

(33) Ibid. pag. 31.

(34) Plenus rimarum ſum, hac atque illac perfluo. Terent. Eunuch. Act. i, Sc. ii.

TRISTAN DE SAINT AMANT (JOHN) an Antiquary and Medalliſt in the XVIIth century, author of a work in three volumes in folio, intituled Commentaires Hiſtoriques (a), was the ſon of Charles Triſtan, auditor of accompts at Paris (b). Father Sirmond and he wrote againſt each other (c).

(a) See what judgment Mr de Spanheim gives of him, De uſu & præſt. Numiſm. p. 774, & Epiſt. iii, ad Morellium, p. 148.
(b) See the Journal des Sçavans, of the 22d of Auguſt, 1689, pag. 584. Dutch Edit. (c) See Baillet's Anti, Tom. ii, p. 264.

TRONCHIN (THEODORE) a Miniſter, and Profeſſor of Divinity, born April 17, 1582, at Geneva, where his father was a refugee on account of religion [A]. He was deſigned to be a ſcholar by the advice of his godfather Theodorus Beza, and he made an extraordinary progreſs in his ſtudies. The teſtimonials given him in the year 1600, when he went to viſit foreign univerſities, gave him the character of a young man of very great hopes. He confirmed this character among all the learned men to whom he was pupil, or with whom he contracted any acquaintance in his travels [B]. He returned to Geneva in 1606, and gave ſuch ſignal proofs of his learning, that he was [A] Geneva where his father was a refugee on account of religion.] He was of Troyes in Champagne, and quitted France in 1572, on account of the maſſacre, which he eſcaped by the kind offices of a Prieſt his friend and neighbour, who hid him in his houſe. He deſigned to retire into Germany, and to have only paſſed through Geneva, where he nevertheleſs ſtaid by the advice of a friend. He obtained the freedom of that city, and not long after was admitted into the council of two hundred, in acknowledgment of ſeveral ſervices done to the Republic, during the war it was then engaged in with the Duke of Savoy (1).

(1) Taken from an imparted Memoir.

[B] In his travels.] Leaving Geneva in 1600, he ſtudied at Baſil under John Nicolas Stupanus, Amandus Polanus, and Antony Walæus. He returned to Geneva in 1602, and departed thence in 1604, to go to Heidelberg, where he improved by the lectures of David Pareus Profeſſor of Divinity, and by thoſe of Æmilius Portus Greek Profeſſor. He ſpent ſome time at Francfort to ſee Gruterus, who had rendered himſelf famous by his collection of inſcriptions. In 1605, he went to the univerſity of Franeker, to hear Sibrand Lubbertus. He ſtaid a conſiderable time at Leyden, under the Profeſſors Gomarus, Trelcatius, Bertius, and Arminius:

was the ſame year made Hebrew profeſſor. In 1607, he married Theodora Rocca, a woman of an extraordinary merit in all reſpects, ſiſter to the firſt ſyndic of the Republic, and grand-daughter to the wife of Theodorus Beza, at whoſe houſe ſhe was brought up, and whoſe god-daughter ſhe was (a). He was choſen miniſter in December 1608, and created rector of the academy in 1610. He was deſired in 1614, beſides his Hebrew lectures to read in Divinity, one of the profeſſors being then ſick; and when a profeſſorſhip of Divinity became vacant in 1618, he ſucceeded to it, and was thereby diſcharged from his Hebrew profeſſorſhip. The ſame year he received orders from the paſtors and profeſſors of Geneva to anſwer the Jeſuit Coton, who had writ againſt the French verſion of the bible, a book intituled Geneve plagiaire. He acquitted himſelf of this commiſſion by a tract intituled Coton plagiaire, a work which was very much eſteemed by the public. At the ſame time he and Mr Diodati were deputed by the church of Geneva to the famous ſynod of Dort (b), where he diſcovered his profound knowledge in Theology, and a moderation which was very much praiſed. In this great conjuncture he acquired the reputation of an extraordinary prudence. He had leave to go to the Duke of Rohan for ſome months in 1632 [C], and perfectly anſwered that lord's expectation, who teſtified afterwards a very great eſteem and particular affection for him. He was very grateful, and honoured the memory of that duke by an oration which he pronounced a few days after the funeral of that great man in 1638. He continued to acquire great eſteem in the exerciſe of all his employments, and by a very extenſive correſpondence in the reformed countries, where he obtained the friendſhip of the moſt learned men, as well as of ſeveral great lords and princes. He compoſed orations and Latin poems with great facility (c): His converſation was very inſtructive and agreeable; for he had added to the ſtudy of Divinity, and of ſeveral languages, the knowledge of the Civil-Law, and of ſeveral other ſciences, and that of ſacred and profane hiſtory, eſpecially of the two laſt centuries, of which he knew an infinite number of particulars. He was one of thoſe men, who are more fond of deſerving reputation, than of hunting after it, and he might if he had pleaſed have publiſhed very excellent books, as Mr Meſtrezat (d) aſſured us. He was choſen by the paſtors in 1655, to confer with and aſſiſt John Dury, in the project of uniting the Lutherans and the Reformed, on which he wrote ſeveral tracts. He arrived to an happy old age free from diſeaſes, and died very eaſily, after a fever which had continued ſome days, on the 19th of November 1657. He had juſt before received the viſit of the paſtors and profeſſors in a body, who in their moving diſcourſe to him gave him all the marks of a tender affection. It was obſerved that he ſurvived all the foreign divines who aſſiſted at the ſynod of Dort. He was a frank ſincere man, zealous for religion, and the ſervice of the churches, a great enemy to the vices of men, tho' very tender of their perſons. His advice was greatly regarded both for the civil government, and in the two eccleſiaſtical bodies; and alſo by ſtrangers, a great number of whom conſulted him. Amongſt other children he left LEWIS TRONCHIN, who was miniſter (e) of the church of Lyons, and four years after was elected to ſucceed his father both as miniſter and profeſſor of Divinity (f). This worthy ſon ſtill enjoys (g) that poſt with the reputation of one of the ableſt Divines of this age. All thoſe who are acquainted with the juſtneſs and penetration of his genius paſſionately deſire that he would at laſt become an author, and are very ſorry that he puts ſo ſlight a value on that title*.

(a) It is therefore a thing ſomewhat ſingular, that both the huſband and the wife ſhould have had ſuch an illuſtrious godfather.

(b) The Republic of the United Provinces, had deſired of that of Geneva, two of their Divines.

(c) I have mentioned his funeral oration upon Simon Goulart, in the diſſertation concerning Junius Brutus.

(d) The Paris miniſter.

(e) He was admitted miniſter in 1651.

(f) Taken from a Memoir, ſent from Geneva.

(g) I write this in 1701.

* He died at Geneva, the eighth of September 1705, being 76 years old. See his Elogy in the inaugural ſpeech of Mr Turretin, his ſucceſſor in the profeſſorſhip of Divinity.

Arminius: under the laſt of which he publickly maintained a theſis in Divinity. He alſo frequented Merula and Baudius, and very often viſited Joſeph Scaliger and Heinſius, who ſhewed a great eſteem and affection for him. He was loved and praiſed by all for his virtue and learning. At the Hague he ſaw Hugo Grotius, who gave him ſixteen verſes which he had compoſed, and told him that he did it to put him in mind of his love for him, and of his eſteem for his learning. He ſaw at London Aaron Cappel; at Oxford Druſius (2), and John Reynolds; at Cambridge Richard Thompſon and ſeveral others. He was very much eſteemed at Paris by Montigni and Du Moulin miniſters, and by Caſaubon who beſtowed great elogies on his learning and piety. He afterwards made the tour of France, and viſited at Blois, Nicolas Vignier the great Hiſtorian; at Samur Philip Birgan, a Breton called thither by Du Pleſſis and the academical Senate to be Profeſſor of the Oriental tongues. He ſpent ſome months in 1606, at Montauban, where the Divinity Profeſſor Sonius ſhewed a particular eſteem for him, and at Montelimar where the famous Daniel Chamier diſcovered a tender affection for him (3).

[C] He had leave to go to the Duke of Rohan for ſome months in 1632.] This Duke was then Ambaſſador extraordinary from the King of France and General of his armies in the country of the Griſons. He ſent a gentleman to Geneva with letters to the government, and the Paſtors, to deſire them to ſend him a miniſter to reſide with him, with whom he might adviſe on thoſe things which might tend to the good of the Reformed Churches in that country, that were ill treated by the Spaniards. Theodorus Tronchin was ſent to him only for ſome months. The neceſſities of the Academy could not allow of his long ſtay. The term being expired, it was prolonged for two months at the inſtance of the Duke of Rohan. The churches of the Griſons preſerved a great veneration for his perſon, and very gratefully acknowledged the good offices he had done them (4).

(2) I keep to my Memoir, without inquiring who this Druſius was. Apply this throughout whenever there is occaſion.

(3) Taken from the ſame Memoir.

(4) Ibid.

TRUBERUS

TRUBERUS (PRIMUS) was born in Sclavonia in the year 1508 (a). He was the firſt who taught the art of writing in the Sclavonian tongue (b), and he tranſlated into that language the New Teſtament, the Catechiſm, the Augſburg confeſſion, and ſome tracts of Melanchthon : which was the cauſe that Lutheraniſm ſpread not only in Carniola and Carinthia, but alſo in the dominions of the great Turk (c). He died in the year 1586 (d), and left a ſon named FELICIAN TRUBERUS, who was miniſter at Laubach in Carniola, and had been educated at Tubingen in the college where the Duke of Wirtemberg maintained at his own charge a certain number of ſtudents (e).

(a) Konig. Bibl. pag. 810.

(e) Hailbrunnerus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Comment. in Jeremiam.

(b) Primus linguam Sclavonicam in literas referre docuit. Phil. Hailbrunnerus, Epiſt. Dedic. Comment. in Jeremiam. Primus excogitavit artem ſcribendi lingua Vandalica. Konig. Biblioth. pag. 810. (c) Konig. ibid. (d) Id. ibid.

TULENUS, a learned man in the reign of Henry II, had been preceptor to the Cardinal, and to the Admiral de Chatilion (a). He was affected with a ſort of folly which did not prejudice his reaſon and judgment in any thing elſe but his amorous paſſion for a certain princeſs, which miſerably diſtracted him. Of which Paſquier, an eye-witneſs, relates ſome circumſtances [A].

(a) Paſquier's Letters, book xix, pag. 541, 542, book xxii, pag. 791.

[A] Of which Paſquier, an eye-witneſs, relates ſome circumſtances.] Propoſing ſome objections againſt the common opinion of Phyſicians, that the judgment, imagination, and memory, are three faculties which are lodged in three ſeparate ventricles of the brain, he ſaith that the diſtinction of the three ventricles is inſufficient, and that the ventricle of judgment, and that of memory ought to be ſubdivided as often as either of them acts differently in us. And to prove theſe different operations, he obſerves that in the reign of Francis I, One Villemanoche reſided at court, whoſe judgment never appeared touched on any other account than his expecting to marry ladies of great quality (1) ; and after him, continues he, ‘ Tulenus a learned man . . . . . whoſe judgment was entire in every thing elſe but a paſſion, which he had ridiculouſly vowed to one of the firſt Princeſſes of France, who was dead. With this perſon I once diverted myſelf at my own table, when ſeveral men of honour, who were ſtrangers, and not in the leaſt acquainted with him were preſent. He entertained us till the middle of our dinner with an infinite variety of learned and judicious diſcourſe, to the admiration of all who heard him. At laſt believing I had ſufficiently prejudiced the company in his favour, and that it was now time to make the good old man play another part, I took occaſion ſeemingly by accident to ſpeak of this Princeſs ; after which quitting his amble he immediately began to trot, relating an incoherent crowd of follies, concerning the good and ill treatment he had met with from her. The company amazed from whence this ſudden change proceeded, could not tell what to think of him, he having before talked ſo wittily and learnedly. But after he was gone, I at large acquainted them with the reaſon of the alteration of his brain. Beſides what I have related, it was obſerved of him, that the judging part being wounded on this ſubject, had alſo affected the imaginative ſo much, that at the firſt ſight of any young lady whom he met with, he was perſuaded it was his Julia, (as he called his pretended miſtreſs in Latin, and Jolivette in French) and guided by this fooliſh imagination, he ſometimes walked in his gown and ſquare-cap as far as Fontaine-Bleau, perſuading himſelf that ſhe hid herſelf there. I relate nothing concerning him but what I have ſeen or heard of him (2).’ This example confirms what we have ſeen in another place (3), that ſome perſons loſe common ſenſe with regard to ſome things, who nevertheleſs by the reſt of their conduct plainly convince us that their ſenſe, knowledge, and reaſon are entire and in a flouriſhing condition (4).

(1) Paſquier's Letters, book, xix, pag. 541.

(2) Paſquier repeats the ſame thing much in the ſame words in the xxiid book, pag. 791. But he ſays there that Tulenus was crazy in two reſpects, in aiming at the biſhopric of Cambray, and in his love for that great Princeſs. See Sorel's remarks upon the Berger extravagant, pag. 176, 177.

(3) Above, towards the end of remark [E], of the article MARESTS (JOHN DES).

(4) See Fromond de Anima, lib. iv, cap. iv.

TULLIA, Cicero's daughter, is ſo often mentioned in that great man's epiſtles, that her hiſtory deſerves to be enquired into. She was born the 5th of Auguſt (a), but the year is unknown to us. Some very learned men believe that ſhe was married to her firſt huſband in the year 689 (b). His name was Caius Piſo [A]. He was a man of ſtrict honour, he intereſted himſelf with the utmoſt concern in the affairs of his father-in-law [B], and wanted neither capacity nor eloquence. It is thought he died during Cicero's exile, which was in 696. TULLIA was a ſecond time married to Furius Craſſipes the following year [C]. It is not known how ſhe was ſeparated from this huſband ; whether he died, or whether ſhe was divorced from him : we are only told that in 703 ſhe was married to Publius Cornelius Dolabella. This third marriage was contracted during Cicero's abſence, when he was governor of Cilicia. Thoſe friends whom (a) Cicero, Orat. pro Sextio, & Epiſt. i, lib. iv, ad Atticum.

(b) See the remark [A].

[A] His name was Caius Piſo.] This is not to be doubted of, if we conſider theſe words : ‘ Tulliolam C. Piſoni L. F. Frugi deſpondimus. - - - - I have given my daughter Tullia in marriage to Caius Piſo.’ So Tully concludes the third epiſtle of his firſt book to Atticus. It is thought to have been written in the conſulſhip of Lucius Julius Cæſar, and Caius Martius Figulus, in the year 689 (1) ; but no reaſon is alledged for that date, and I find no hint in the letter itſelf to countenance it. Caſaubon believes it was written before the year 686, and that Tullia was not above twelve years old at moſt when ſhe was married to Caius Piſo (2).

[B] He intereſted himſelf with the utmoſt concern in the affairs of his father-in-law.] Cicero could never ſufficiently praiſe him. ‘ Vexabatur, ſaith he (3), uxor mea : liberi ad necem quærebantur : gener, & Piſo gener à Piſonis Conſulis pedibus ſupplex rejiciebatur. - - - My wife was harraſſed, my children perſecuted to death, and the humble petitions of my dear ſon-in-law Piſo rejected by the conſul Piſo.’ In one of his Orations (4) he ſpeaks thus : ‘ Alter fuit propugnator mearum fortunarum & defenſor aſſiduus, ſumma virtute & pietate C. Piſo gener, qui minas inimicorum meorum, qui inimicitias affinis mei propinqui ſui Conſulis, qui Pontum & Bithyniam Quæſtor pro mea ſalute neglexit. - - - C. Piſo, my ſon-in-law, a man of great honour and probity, vigorouſly ſupported my intereſt ; he deſpiſed the threats of my enemies, and the hatred of the Conſul, who was allied to me and related to him : and when he was Quæſtor, he neglected Pontus and Bithynia upon my account.’ The like paſſages are to be found in his epiſtles. See the elogy which he beſtows on him with reſpect to his eloquence and virtue in his treatiſe de Claris Oratoribus (5).

[C] Tullia was a ſecond time married to Furius Craſſipes the following year.] See Cicero's epiſtles to his brother, book the ſecond, epiſtle 4 and 7. Ludovicus Vives hath (6) reduced theſe two ſons-in-law of Cicero to one : he ſuppoſes that Tullia was but twice married, the firſt time to Piſo Frugi Craſſipes, and the ſecond

(1) Corradus, in Quæſtura, pag. m. 83, and after him Sagittarius, in Vita Tulliæ, num. 5, & 11.

(2) See Cicero, Grevius's edition, Epiſt. ad Attic. Tom. i, pag. 33. And in Manutius's Commentary, pag. 18.

(3) Orat. pro Sextio, pag. m. 71.

(4) Poſt reditum in Senatu. See alſo his ſpeech Poſt reditum ad Quirites.

(5) Pag. m. 398.

(6) In Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. xix, cap. iv.

whom he deſired to inform him whether Dolabella was in good circumſtances [D], acquitted themſelves very ill of that commiſſion; and he afterwards repented that ever he had conſented to that match, before he could himſelf enquire into Dolabella's affairs, which were not in a very good poſture. He was a young man who lived irregularly [E]; but knew ſo well how to cajole the mother and the daughter (c) [F], that they winked at his debaucheries, and looked on him as a good match. He gave his father-in-law very ſecond to Cornelius Dolabella, and that ſhe died in child-bed in the houſe of the latter. We ſhall refute this below (7).

[D] To inform him whether Dolabella was in good circumſtances.] I only advance this as a conjecture which I borrow from the learned Manutius: it is very probable and founded on ſome expreſſions of Cicero. He tells Atticus: ‘Tullia mea venit ad me pridie Idus Jun. deque tua erga ſe obſervantia benevolentiaque mihi plurima expoſuit, literaſque reddidit trinas: ego autem ex ipſius virtute, humanitate, pietate non modò eam voluptatem non cepi, quam capere ex ſingulari filia debui; ſed etiam incredibili ſum dolore affectus, tale ingenium in tam miſera fortuna verſari, idque accidere nullo ipſius delicto, ſumma culpa mea (8). - - - My daughter Tullia came to me the 12th of June, and acquainted me with the reſpect and civility you had ſhewn her, and delivered to me three letters: but I am ſo far from conceiving pleaſure, as I ought, on account of her extraordinary virtue, good nature, and piety, that I am overwhelmed with ſorrow, becauſe thoſe excellent qualities are attended with unhappy circumſtances of life, and that through no fault of her own, but mine.’ Let us now ſee how the two laſt words are paraphraſed by Manutius. ‘Mea enim negligentia factum eſt, ut Dolabellæ nuberet: quem ego probare generum non debui, niſi prius omnia perſcrutatus, non ſolum quod ad mores, ſed etiam quod ad facultates attineret: quod ſi feciſſem, ejus ære alieno perſpecto, nunquam paſſus eſſem, ut homini in tanta rei domeſticæ difficultate conſtituto filia mea collocaretur; ſed commiſi, ut me abſente res per amicos ageretur, quibus in Ciliciam proficiſcens ita mandavi (9), ut, quoniam ego tam longe abſuturus eram, de Tulliæ meæ matrimonio agerent ipſi quod probaſſent. in quo meam negligentiam agnoſco, tantam enim rem aliis committere non debui, ſed in reditum meum integram reſervare. - - - For it was owing to my negligence that ſhe was married to Dolabella: whom I ſhould not have approved of for a ſon-in-law, until I had firſt enquired into every thing, not only with reſpect to his morals, but likewiſe with regard to his circumſtances: which had I done, and found that he was plunged in debt, I would never have ſuffered my daughter to be married to a man labouring under ſuch difficulties: but I agreed that the affair ſhould be managed by friends in my abſence; to whom I gave a power, as I was going into Cilicia, and was to be abſent ſo long, to do whatever they thought proper in the marriage of my daughter Tullia; wherein I acknowledge my fault, for I ought not to have truſted a matter of that importance to others, but to have deferred it entirely till my return.’ This author confirms his paraphraſe in the following manner: ‘Cur autem hoc à Cicerone putem ſignificari, facit Epiſtola ad Terentiam his verbis ſcripta: Tullia noſtra venit ad me pridie idus Jun. cujus ſumma virtute & ſingulari humanitate graviore etiam ſum dolore affectus, noſtra factum eſſe negligentia, ut longe alia in fortuna eſſet, atque ejus pietas ac dignitas poſtulabat. Dixit autem, Tale ingenium in tam miſera fortuna verſari, hoc ſenſu; quod Tullia virum haberet tam perditum, tam flagitioſum, tam multa in tribunatu nefarie molientem: ſiquidem in tribunatu iniquas leges ferre Dolabella conatus eſt, maxime debitorum cauſa, è quibus ipſe unus erat (10). - - - I am inclined to think that this is Cicero's meaning, from the following epiſtle to Terentia: My Tullia came to me the 12th of June, whoſe great virtue and ſingular good nature gives me the greater trouble, as it was through my negligence that ſhe did not meet with a fortune ſuitable to her piety and merit. The reaſon why he ſays, Thoſe excellent qualities were attended with unhappy circumſtances of life, was, becauſe Tullia had a debauched and profligate huſband, who excited tumults in Rome whilſt he was Tribune of the people: for Dolabella in his tribuneſhip endeavoured to enact unjuſt laws, eſpecially in behalf of debtors, whereof he himſelf was one.’

[E] He was a young man who lived irregularly.] Cœlius hinted it to Cicero, when he congratulated him on that marriage: I ſhall cite his own words becauſe they contain the very compliment we ſhould make at preſent in a like caſe. He excuſes what was paſt on account of his youth, and though he durſt not venture to aſſure him, that all the failings of that age were mended, yet he hoped the marrying ſuch an accompliſhed lady, the daughter of ſuch a father, would certainly compleat the cure. ‘Gratulor tibi affinitate viri medius fidius optimi. Nam hoc ego de illo exiſtimo. Cetera porro quibus adhuc ille ſibi parum utilis fuit, & ætate jam ſunt decurſa, & conſuetudine atque autoritate tua & pudore Tulliæ, ſi qua reſtabunt, confido celeriter ſublatum iri. Non eſt enim pugnax in vitiis, neque hebes ad id quod melius ſit intelligendum (11). - - - I congratulate you upon your affinity with a man, that is in truth an excellent perſon: for ſuch is my opinion of him. As to thoſe follies he may have been guilty of to his own prejudice, they are now cured with age; or if any ſtill remain, I dare ſay he will be reclaimed by your company and authority, and by the virtue of Tullia. For he is not obſtinate in his failings, and he has ſenſe enough to know how to behave better.’ Obſerve what Cœlius ſays, that age had already cured the vicious inclinations of Dolabella. This inclines me to believe that Appian was miſtaken when he affirmed (12) that Dolabella was not above twenty-five years of age when Cæſar was killed. He muſt then have been but eighteen or nineteen when he married Tullia. Was it then reaſonable to ſay that the vicious courſe of his youth was paſt? But here are yet other difficulties againſt Appian. The commentators on Cicero will have the following words to be meant of Dolabella: ‘Illud verò mihi permirum accidit, tantam temeritatem fuiſſe in eo adoleſcente, cujus ego ſalutem duobus capitis judiciis ſumma contentione defendi, ut tuis inimicitiis ſuſcipiendis oblivіſceretur patroni omnium fortunarum ac rationum ſuarum: præſertim cum tu omnibus vel ornamentis vel præſidiis redundares, illi (ut leviſſime dicam) multa deeſſent. cujus ſermo ſtultus & puerilis erat jam antea ad me a M. Cœlio, familiari noſtro, perſcriptus: de quo item ſermone multa ſcripta ſunt abs te. Ego autem citius cum eo qui tuas inimicitias ſuſcepiſſet, veterem conjunctionem diremiſſem quam novam conciliaſſem. - - - - I am very much ſurprized that that young man, whoſe life with great difficulty I ſaved, when he was twice indicted for capital crimes, ſhould be ſo indiſcreet as to become your enemy and forget the patron and guardian of all his fortune: eſpecially conſidering the vaſt honours and powerful intereſt you enjoy, whilſt he (to ſpeak moderately) is in great want. Our friend M. Cœlius had before informed me by a letter of his ſilly and childiſh diſcourſe, concerning which you have likewiſe writ much. I had rather break off an old acquaintance with one that is your avowed enemy than contract a new one.’ Cicero wrote this in 703, when he was in Cilicia, before Dolabella was his ſon-in-law. The epiſtle, of which theſe words are part, was written to a perſon whom Dolabella had accuſed (13). It ſeems therefore that they cannot be meant of any body elſe beſides Dolabella. But it would be very ſtrange, that before the age of eighteen a perſon ſhould be twice arraigned for capital crimes. Beſides I find that Tullia was not Dolabella's firſt wife. He had one who left him when he accuſed Appius (14).

[F] He knew ſo well how to cajole the mother and the daughter.] This we may infer from theſe words of Cicero to Atticus (15). ‘Ego, dum in provincia omnibus rebus Appium orno, ſubito ſum factus accuſatoris ejus ſocer. id quidem, inquis, dii approbent, ita velim: teque ita cupere certo ſcio. ſed

‘crede

(c) I mean Terentia, Cicero's wife, and Tullia their daughter.

(7) In the remark [N].

(8) Epiſt. xvii, lib. xi.

(9) This appears from theſe words of Cicero. In quo unum vereor ne tu parum perſpicias ea quæ geſta ſunt ab aliis eſſe geſta, quibus ego ita mandaram, ut cum tam longe abſuturus eſſem ad me ne referrent, agerent quod probaſſent. - - - - Wherein I am afraid you do not attend to one thing, viz. that what was done, was done by others, to whom I gave a commiſſion, as I was to be abſent a long time, to manage in that affair as they ſhould think fit, without referring it to me. Epiſt. xii, lib. iii, ad Familiares, wherein he excuſes himſelf for having married Tullia to Dolabella, the accuſer of Appius, to whom he writes.

(10) Manutius quotes Dion in this place.

(11) See Cicero's xiiith Epiſtle of the viiith book ad Familiares.

(12) Appian. lib. iv, de Bello Civili.

(13) To Appius Pulcher. That letter is the xth of the iiid book ad Familiares.

(14) Inter poſtulationem & nominis delationem uxor à Dolabella diſceſſit. Epiſt. vi, lib. viii, Cicer. ad Familiares.

(15) Epiſt. vi, lib. vi.

very great uneaſineſs [G], by the tumults which he excited in Rome when he was tribune of the people. He endeavoured to eſtabliſh a law very prejudicial to creditors; for he pretended that debtors ſhould not be forced to the payment of their debts, either by perſonal impriſonment or ſeizure of their effects. Mark Antony was obliged (d) to bring ſome troops into the city, who fell upon the favourers of Dolabella, of which they killed eight hundred [H]. Poor Tullia was unhappy in her laſt huſband; and it is not to be doubted that her journey to Brunduſium [I] to ſpeak with her father, proceeded amongſt other reaſons from the neceſſity of conſulting him how to behave her ſelf towards ſo troubleſome a huſband. She was divorced from him [K], and yet Cicero always treated Dolabella crede mihi, nihil minus putaram ego, qui de Ti. Nerone, qui mecum egerat, certos homines ad mulieres miſeram, qui Romam venerunt factis ſponſalibus. ſed hoc ſpero melius. mulieres quidem valde intelligo delectari OBSEQUIO ET COMITATE adoleſcentis, cætera non ἐξακανθίζειν. - - - Whilſt I am heaping favours on Appius in the province, I am on a ſudden become father-in-law to his accuſer: you wiſh it may prove fortunate, you ſay: I wiſh ſo too; and I am certain you heartily deſire it. But believe me, there is nothing I leſs expected; for I had ſent ſome perſons to my wife and daughter concerning Ti. Nero, who had made propoſals to me; but before they came to Rome, the match was concluded. I hope it will be for the better. I underſtand the women were wonderfully charmed WITH THE COMPLAISANCE AND CIVILITY of the young man, but did not examine into other matters.' Terentia and Tullia were ſo charmed with the complaiſance and civility of this young man that they pardoned his faults, and did not enquire into his life. The ſame thing frequently happens in our time. A young debauchee who renders himſelf agreeable by his deportment, and by acting the well-bred man, will ſo inſinuate himſelf into the favour of both mothers and daughters, that they will not conſider whether he has waſted his whole eſtate; he will exclude his rivals though more deſerving than he, if they are not of the ſame obliging and complaiſant behaviour. Let us have him, he pleaſes our eyes. This undoubtedly utterly ruined the affairs of the other ſuitor to Tullia, who was not Titus Nero, but Tiberius Nero: probably the ſame who married Livia, and was father to the Emperor Tiberius. Some authors believe that Dolabella by his flatteries and obliging civilities ſo touched Tullia's heart, that ſhe eaſily excuſed his almoſt dwarfiſh ſhape: for it is to him that Tully's jeſt is applied, Who has faſtned my ſon-in-law to his ſword (16)? Their conjecture may be a little helped by Macrobius, who calls Lentulus the ſon-in-law, whom Cicero rallied in that manner (17). This ſirname agrees better with Dolabella than with Piſo and Furius; for the Lentuli were a branch of the Cornelian family, and perhaps the Dolabella's were of the branch of the Lentuli. See below a paſſage of Aſconius Pedianus.

[G] He gave Cicero very great uneaſineſs.] Not to repeat what I have ſaid in the article of Dolabella concerning the new laws which he propoſed in favour of debtors, I ſhall content myſelf with citing one or two proofs of his father-in-law's uneaſineſs. ' O dii, ſaith he in a letter to Atticus (18), generum ne noſtrum potiſſimum, ut hoc, vel tabulas novas. Quod me audis, ſaith he in an another letter (19), fractiorem eſſe animo, quid putas, cum videas acceſſiſſe ad ſuperiores ægritudines præclaras generi actiones? - - - Can you wonder to hear I am dejected in mind, when you ſee the glorious actions of my ſon-in-law are added to my former troubles.'

[H] Of which they killed eight hundred.] We ſhould have had the particulars of this action, if Livy had come to us entire; for in the ſummary of his 113th book we find: ' Quum ſeditiones Romæ à P. Dolabella tribuno plebis legem ferente de novis tabulis excitatæ eſſent, & ex ea cauſſa plebs tumultuaretur, inductis à M. Antonio Magiſtro equitum in urbem militibus octingenti è plebe cæſi ſunt. - - - When ſeditions were excited at Rome by P. Dolabella, Tribune of the people, who enacted a new law concerning creditors, and on that account the people mutinied, Mark Anthony, Maſter of the Horſe, having brought ſome troops into the city, eight hundred of the people were ſlain.' All Hiſtorians repreſent the city at that time in a diſmal condition. It is true that the inhabitants of Rome were ſo accuſtomed to bloodſhed in their ſtreets, and in the aſſemblies of the people, by the animoſity of contrary factions, that they were leſs ſurprized than we at this time ſhould be, to ſee their city filled with guards continually ready to fall on one another.

[I] Her journey to Brunduſium.] Her miſerable condition which ſhe laid open to her father, overwhelmed him with grief; in ſo much, that this interview which on another occaſion would have afforded this tender father the greateſt pleaſure, turned into an inſupportable affliction: this appears from the words above cited in the remark [D], citation 8, and thoſe in a letter written to his wife Terentia. ' Tullia noſtra venit ad me pridie Idus Junii: cujus ſumma virtute, & ſingulari humanitate, graviore etiam ſum dolore affectus, noſtra factum eſſe negligentia, ut longe alia in fortuna eſſet, atque ejus pietas, ac dignitas poſtulabat (20). - - - My daughter Tullia came to me the 12th of June; whoſe great virtue and extraordinary good nature gives me the greater trouble, as it was through my negligence that ſhe did not meet with a fate ſuitable to her piety and merit.' Cicero did not detain his daughter long there, he ſent her home; her preſence not being able to leſſen their mutual affliction. ' Tulliam autem non videbam eſſe cauſam cur diutius mecum tanto in communi mœrore retinerem: itaque matri eam, cum primum per ipſam liceret, eram remiſſurus. - - - But I ſaw no reaſon to keep Tullia with me longer in our mutual great affliction: and therefore I ſent her back to her mother as ſoon as ſhe could go.' This he writes to his friend Atticus in the ſeventeenth epiſtle of his eleventh book.

[K] She was divorced from him.] This is not to be doubted of if we conſider Sulpicius's hint in his conſolatory letter on her death. Amongſt other reaſons he offers this, viz. that in the unhappy poſture of affairs, nothing could engage Tullia to deſire to live, ſeeing her father could not have found a good huſband for her. This ſuppoſes that ſhe was perfectly diſengaged from the conjugal bonds. ' Quoties in eam cogitationem neceſſe eſt & tu veneris, & nos ſæpe incidimus, hiſce temporibus non peſſime cum iis eſſe actum quibus ſine dolore licitum eſt mortem cum vita commutare? Quid autem fuit quod illam hoc tempore ad vivendum magnopere invitare poſſet? quæ res? quæ ſpes? quod animi ſolatium? Ut cum aliquo adoleſcente primario conjuncta ætatem gereret? Licitum eſt tibi (credo) pro tua dignitate ex hac juventute generum diligere, cujus fidei liberos tuos te tuto committere putares (21). - - - - How often muſt you have thought, as I have frequently done, that in ſuch a ſituation of affairs, thoſe had no reaſon to complain who were permitted without pain to exchange life for death? What was there that could much induce Tullia to deſire to live? What thing? What hope? What pleaſure of mind? Could ſhe have ſpent her days in marriage with any young man of the firſt rank? It was in your power (I believe) conſidering your dignity, to choſe a ſon-in-law from amongſt that youth, had you thought a good one could have been found.' If this proof was inſufficient I would offer thoſe places in Cicero's letters concerning the reſtitution of her portion. ' Teneor tamen dum à Dolabellæ procuratoribus exigam primam penſionem (22). - - - I am detained till I receive the firſt payment from Dolabella's agents.' Some think that Dolabella deſigning to divorce Tullia, preſſed the eſtabliſhment of the new law, that he might not be obliged to refund her fortune to Cicero (23). It is ſurprizing that Aſconius Pedianus was ſo ill informed of the fate of Tullia, as to affirm that after Piſo's death ſhe married Lentulus, and died in child-bed at his houſe (24). Which are two or three miſtakes.

[L] Cicero

(d) He was at that time General of the Horſe, under the ſecond dictatorſhip of Julius Cæſar, the year after the battle of Pharſalia.

(16) Adeo placuit Tulliæ novi ſponſi comitas, ut minori ejus ſtatura non offenderetur. Notus eſt Ciceronis jocus, Quis generum meum alligavit gladio? Caſpar Sagittarius, in Vita Tulliæ, num. 30.

(17) M. Cicero cum Lentulum generum ſuum exiguæ naturæ hominem longo gladio accinctum vidiſſet, Quis, inquit, generum meum ad gladium alligavit? Macrob. Saturnal. lib. ii, cap. iii.

(18) The xxiiid of the xith book.

(19) The xiith of the ſame book.

(20) Cicero, Epiſt. xi, lib. xiv, ad Familiar.

(21) Epiſt. v, lib. iv, Ciceron. ad Familiares, pag. m. 192.

(22) Epiſt. xviii, lib. vi, ad Familiares, written whilſt Cæſar was in Spain: againſt Pompey's ſons.

(23) See Cicero, Grævius's edition, Tom. ii, Epiſt. ad Attic. pag. 270.

(24) Cicero filiam poſt mortem Piſonis generi P. Lentulo collocavit apud quem illa ex partu deceſſit. Aſcon. Pedian. in Orat. Ciceron. contra L. Piſonem, pag. 157.

Dolabella as tenderly as poſſibly he could [L], till after the murder of Trebonius, he fell on

[L] Cicero always treated Dolabella as tenderly as poſſibly he could.] He doubtleſs had a greater ſhare of capacity than reſolution, and he ſaw Pompey's party running into ruin more and more by the continual victories of Julius Cæſar. He probably feared that the conqueror would at laſt ceaſe to ſhew his clemency, and would make away with ſuch as had a republican ſpirit, and were men endowed with parts ſufficient to oppoſe him. He knew that Dolabella was in very great credit with Cæſar: after which it is needleſs to aſk why Cicero diſſembled his reſentment againſt his ſon-in-law. His kind treatment of him kept him within the compaſs of friendſhip; for Dolabella ſtood Cicero's friend at Julius Cæſar's court, in oppoſition to thoſe who endeavoured to render him odious, and a little after the death of Tullia he deſired to be acquainted with the poſture of his affairs. ‘Quod ſcribis prælia te mea cauſſa ſuſtinere non tam id laboro, ut ſi qui mihi obtrectent à te refutentur, quam intelligi cupio quod certe intelligitur me à te amari (25).--As to what you write, that you ſtand ſevere brunts on my account; I am not ſo ſollicitous to have thoſe refuted by you who aſperſe me, as to have it known that you love me.’ For which reaſon Cicero wrote to him a very obliging letter (26) in the midſt of the affliction with which he was loaded. We have a convincing proof of their mutual intimacy, in Cicero's firſt Philippic, even when Julius Cæſar was killed, there he repreſents to Dolabella how glorious his action was of throwing down the column which the mutineers had erected, to animate the people againſt Cæſar's murtherers. All honeſt men complimented and thanked Cicero, they thinking him Dolabella's director in that affair. ‘Te intuens, Dolabella, qui es mihi cariſſimus, non poſſum de utriuſque veſtrum errore reticere . . . Dicerem Dolabella, qui recte factorum fructus eſſet, niſi te præter ceteros pauliſper eſſe expertum viderem. Quem potes recordari in vita tibi illuxiſſe diem lætiorem, quam cum expiato foro, diſſipato concurſu impiorum, principibus ſceleris pœna affectis, urbe incendio & cædis metu liberata te domum recepiſti? cujus ordinis, cujus generis, cujus denique fortunæ ſtudia tum laudi, & gratulationi tuæ ſe non obtulerunt? quin mihi etiam, quo auctore te in iis rebus uti arbitrabantur, & gratias boni viri agebant, & tuo nomine gratulabantur. Recordare, quæſo, Dolabella, conſenſum illum theatri, cum omnes, earum rerum obliti, propter quas tibi fuerant offenſi, ſignificarunt ſe novo beneficio memoriam veteris doloris abjeciſſe (27). - - - - My dear Dolabella, conſidering the great affection I have for you, I cannot forbear mentioning the fault of both of you . . . I would tell you, Dolabella, the benefit of good actions, if I did not ſee that you have a little experienced it above others. Do you remember a day in your whole life, wherein you had greater pleaſure, than when you retired home after you had purged the Forum, diſperſed the impious mob, puniſhed the ring-leaders, and freed the city from the fear of burning and maſſacre? Did not people of all ranks, degrees, and conditions come to applaud and congratulate you upon it? I myſelf, who was thought to have adviſed you in thoſe matters, received the thanks of honeſt men, and was complimented on your account. Pray, my dear Dolabella, think on that unanimous approbation of the theatre, when all of them, forgetting thoſe things which had incenſed them againſt you, declared that this new favour had quite extinguiſhed their former reſentment.’ This long paſſage doth not expreſsly tell what was done againſt the column; but Cicero a little before had given ſuch an exact account of it (28), that what I have ſaid hardly admits of a ſcruple. I ſhall take this occaſion to obſerve that this column is the ſame which Suetonius ſpeaks of. ‘Poſtea, ſaith he (29), ſolidam columnam prope 20 pedum lapidis Numidici in foro ſtatuit (plebs) ſcripſitque PARENTI PATRIÆ. Apud eandem longo tempore ſacrificare, vota ſuſcipere, controverſias quaſdam interpoſito per Cæſarem jurejurando diſtrahere perſeveravit. - - - - Afterwards the populace erected in the Forum a marble column almoſt twenty foot high, with this inſcription, TO THE FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY. They continued a long time to offer ſacrifices before it, to make vows, and determine differences, by adminiſtring an oath wherein they ſwore by Cæſar.’ This longo tempore, long time, is a miſtake, which clearly proves that Suetonius had not read the firſt Philippic, or at leaſt did not remember it; for that oration informs us, that the column was deſtroyed before the firſt of June. Cicero's letters tell us, that it was pulled down before the firſt of May (30). Now Cæſar was killed the fifteenth of the preceding March. But to return to the good correſpondence betwixt Cicero and Dolabella: nothing could be more endearing than the letter which Cicero wrote to him on account of that column. ‘Cum te ſemper tantum dilexerim quantum tu intelligere potuiſti, tum his tuis factis ſic incenſus ſum, ut nihil unquam in amore fuerit ardentius (31). As I always had a great affection for you, theſe your actions have ſo inflamed my love, that nothing ever exceeded it.’ He doth not forget to acquaint him that he himſelf paſſed for the author of this good advice; and the turn of his thought is admirable. ‘Etſi contentus eram, mi Dolabella, tua gloria, ſatiſque ex ea magnam lætitiam voluptatemque capiebam, tamen non poſſum non confiteri, cumulari me maximo gaudio, quod vulgo hominum opinio ſocium me adſcribat tuis laudibus. Neminem conveni, convenio autem quotidie plurimos . . . . . quin omnes, cum te ſummis laudibus ad cœlum extulerunt, mihi continuo maximas gratias agant. Negant enim ſe dubitare, quin tu meis præceptis & conſiliis abtemperans præſtantiſſimum te civem & ſingularem conſulem præbeas. Quibus ego quamquam veriſſime poſſum reſpondere te quæ facias tuo judicio & tua ſponte facere, nec cujuſquam egere conſilio: tamen neque plane aſſentior, ne imminuam tuam laudem, ſi omnis à meis conſiliis profecta videatur: neque valde nego, ſum enim avidior etiam quam ſatis eſt gloriæ. . . . A te autem peto, ut me hanc quaſi falſam hæreditatem alienæ gloriæ ſinas cernere, meque aliqua ex parte, in ſocietatem tuarum laudum venire patiare: quamquam, mi Dolabella, (hæc enim jocatus ſum) libentius omneis meas, ſi modo ſunt aliquæ meæ laudes, ad te transfuderim, quam aliquam partem exhauſerim ex tuis (32). - - - Tho' I was contented, my Dolabella, with your glory, and received ſufficient pleaſure and ſatisfaction from it; yet I muſt own it was a vaſt addition to my joy, that people generally thought me intitled to a ſhare in your honour. Every body I meet with, (and I daily meet with great numbers . . .) whenever they extol you to the ſkies, continually thank me at the ſame time. For they ſay, they do not queſtion, but that by following my directions and and counſels you ſhew yourſelf to be an excellent citizen, and an extraordinary Conſul. Tho' I might truly anſwer them, that what you do, proceeds entirely from your own judgment and inclination, and that you do not want the advice of any body: yet I neither concur with them altogether, leſt I ſhould leſſen your merit, if it were thought to flow entirely from my counſels: nor do I very much contradict them, for I am more covetous of glory than I ought to be. . . . . But I beg of you to allow me to uſurp another's glory: and ſuffer me, in ſome meaſure, to be a partner in your reputation: tho', my dear Dolabella, (for I ſpoke in jeſt) I had rather transfer to you all my fame, if I had any, than to diminiſh your's in the leaſt.’ He ſeems to be tranſported when he ſpeaks of this action to his friend Atticus. See Epiſt. xv and xvi of the xivth book, and the firſt letter of the xiith book ad Familiares. I have ſomewhere read that he deſigned to go to Syria Dolabella's lieutenant, if Hirtius and Panſa, who were to be Conſuls the next year, had not diſſuaded him. He let Dolabella go without him, and embarked for Athens, after having promiſed to return when Hirtius and Panſa ſhould enter on the conſulſhip. Contrary winds retarded his voyage, and he received ſome advices from his friends, which engaged him to return ſpeedily to Rome. The day after his arrival the ſenate was aſſembled, but he did not appear there, at which Mark Antony was offended. This is what we find in Amyot's tranſlation of Plutarch's life of Cicero. One might convict Plutarch of a miſtake, if the phraſe which he makes uſe of (33), and Amyot tranſlates, he let Dolabella go, was not equivocal: but as it may barely ſignify, he thought no more of Dorabella, he left him, this criticiſm only affects the tranſlator. He was in the wrong to think that Dolabella departed from Rome before Cicero; for the firſt Philippic was pronounced

(25) Epiſt. xi, lib. ix, ad Familiares.

(26) The xith of the ixth book, ad Familiares.

(27) Philipp. I, pag. m. 690, 691.

(28) Taliſque everſio illius exſecratæ columnæ. Ibid. pag. 674. I have cited the whole paſſage in the article DOLABELLA, citation (18).

(29) In Cæſar. cap. lxxxv.

(30) Epiſt. xv, lib. xiv, ad Atticum.

(31) Cicero, Epiſt. xiv, lib. ix, ad Famil. pag. m. 32.

(32) Id. ibid. pag. 30.

(33) Δολοβέλλαν μὲν εἴασε χαίρειν. Dolabellam miſſum fecit. Plutarch. in Cicer. p. 882, E.

on him with his whole ſtock of rhetorical figures (e) [M]. Tullia died in the year 708 [N]. Her father remained inconſolable for ſome time [O]: his friends uſed all their pronounced in Dolabella's preſence, after Cicero's return. This obliges me to repeat what I have ſeveral times ſaid, that it is extremely difficult to tranſlate well; for tho we may take the expreſſions of the original in the moſt probable ſenſe, that doth not always ſecure us againſt miſtakes; and the knowledge of a thouſand particular events is neceſſary to direct us to expreſs the true ſenſe. For inſtance, if Amyot had remembred that Dolabella was preſent in the ſenate as conſul, when Cicero ſpoke his firſt Philippic; if he had remembred that Cicero, in that oration, urged his reaſons for departing from Rome, and the motives of his return, he would not have tranſlated thoſe words of Plutarch, he let Dolabella go. After all, I do not diſpute the fact; I ſee no reaſon againſt my believing that Cicero deſigned to follow Dolabella into Syria. This is a freſh proof of the text of this remark.

[M] Till after the murther of Trebonius he fell on him with his whole ſtock of rhetorical of figures.] He had reaſon to cenſure very ſeverely ſuch enormous perfidy and cruelty; but he ſhould have taken care not to contradict himſelf, and expoſe his reputation too much. He had proteſted a great value for Dolabella in ſeveral letters, and afterwards in his Philippics he declared that he never had any merit, and had been always a wicked wretch. 'Dolabella quidem tam 'fuit immemor humanitatis, quamquam ejus NUNQUAM particeps fuerit, ut ſuam inſatiabilem cru'delitatem exercuerit non ſolum in vivo, ſed etiam in 'mortuo, ac in ejus corpore lacerando atque vexan'do cum animum ſatiare non poſſet oculos paverit 'ſuos (34). - - - Dolabella was ſo void of humanity, 'tho' indeed he never had any, that he not only exerciſed 'his exceſſive cruelty on him when alive, but likewiſe 'when dead, and when he could not ſatiate his mind, he 'fed his eyes in tearing and mangling his corpſe.' He makes him equal to Mark Antony in all ſorts of vice. 'Duo hæc capita nata ſunt poſt homines natos teter'rima & ſpurciſſima Dolabella & Antonius. . . . Ecce 'tibi geminum in ſcelere par, inuſitatum, inauditum, 'ferum, barbarum. Itaque, quorum ſummum quon'dam inter ipſos odium, bellumque meminiſtis, eoſ'dem poſtea ſingulari inter ſe conſenſu, & amore de'vinxit impuriſſimæ naturæ & turpiſſimæ vitæ ſimili'tudo (35). - - - - Dolabella and Antonius are two of 'the moſt cruel and infamous wretches that ever lived. '. . . They are a couple not to be parallelled in wicked'neſs, cruelty, and barbarity. And therefore the ſimilitude 'of their moſt impure natures and flagitious lives has 'united them in mind, and affection, tho' you remember 'they formerly were at great variance, and mortally hated 'one another.' What could he ſay more? And when he affirms, that to compare Trebonius with Dolabella were to treat the former very unjuſtly, he expreſſes himſelf thus, for the paſſage deſerves to be tranſcribed: 'Nam cæteris quidem vitæ partibus quis eſt qui poſſit 'ſine Trebonii maxima contumelia conferre vitam 'Trebonii cum Dolabellæ? alterius conſilium, in'genium, humanitatem, innocentiam, magnitudi'nem animi in patria liberanda quis ignorat? alteri à 'puero pro deliciis crudelitas fuit; deinde ea libidi'num turpitudo, ut in hoc ſit ſemper ipſe lætatus, 'quod ea faceret, quæ ſibi objici ne ab inimico qui'dem poſſent verecundo: & hic, dii immortales, ali'quando fuit meus, occulta enim erant vitia non in'quirenti. Neque nunc fortaſſe alienus ab eo eſſem, 'niſi ille vobis, niſi mœnibus patriæ, niſi huic urbi, 'niſi diis penatibus, niſi aris, & focis omnium noſtrum, 'niſi denique naturæ, & humanitati inventus eſſet ini'micus. - - - - For in other reſpects, who can compare 'Trebonius with Dolabella, without doing great injuſtice 'to Trebonius? Every body knows the wiſdom, the tem'per, the humanity, the innocence, and heroic ſpirit of 'the former in delivering his country: but the latter 'delighted in cruelty from his cradle; and is guilty of 'ſuch abominable luſt, that he was always pleaſed to 'think, that he could not be upbraided with it even 'by an enemy who was modeſt: and this very man, O 'heavens! was formerly my ſon-in-law; for as I did 'not enquire into his life, his vices were concealed from 'me. And, perhaps, I ſhould not appear againſt him 'now, were he not found to be an enemy to you, to his 'country, to his city, to his domeſtic gods, to the religion 'and liberty of us all, and laſtly, to nature and humanity.'

[N] Tullia died in the year 708.] Cæſar was then in Spain engaged againſt Pompey's ſons. The conſolatory letter which he wrote to Cicero on this occaſion was dated from Hiſpalis (36). Which is a ſtrong proof of my text: that which Plutarch furniſhes me with, is not ſatisfactory: it is not clear enough, nor free from ſome errors. This Hiſtorian having ſpoken of the divorce of Terentia, adds (37), that Cicero afterwards married a young woman, and that Tullia died in child-bed not long after this match. She died, continues he, at Lentulus's houſe, to whom ſhe was married after the death of Piſo, her firſt huſband. To prove from this, that Tullia died in 708, one thing ought to be ſuppoſed, which Plutarch doth not mention, viz. that Cicero married his ſecond wife in 708 (38). And as for the reſt, it plainly appears, that Plutarch did not well conſult Tully's Epiſtles, for he would there have been informed, that Tullia's ſecond huſband's name was Furius Craſſipes, and that ſhe died divorced from her third huſband who was Dolabella. A modern author (39), in order to prove that Tullia did not die in child-bed, and that ſhe was with child when divorced by Dolabella, alledges the following paſſage of Cicero; 'Tullia mea peperit XIV. 'Kal. Jun. puerum ἑπταμηνιαῖον, quod ηὐτόκησεν 'gaudebam; quod quidem eſt natum perimbecillum 'eſt (40). - - - On the 19*th of May my daughter Tullia 'was brought to bed of a boy in the ſeventh month: I 'was glad ſhe was ſafely delivered; but the child is 'very weak.*' He ought to have known that Cicero wrote this before the battle of Pharſalia, and that conſequently theſe words are of no uſe to prove that Tullia did not die in labour, and that ſhe was divorced when big with child. What he ſhould have alledged I find in another letter written during the laſt war which Cæſar made in Spain. The words are: 'Me 'Romæ tenuit omnino Tulliæ meæ partus; ſed cum 'ea, quemadmodum ſpero, ſatis firma ſit, teneor ta'men dum à Dolabellæ procuratoribus exigam pri'mam penſionem (41). - - - The lying-in of my daughter 'Tullia detained me at Rome; but tho' ſhe be now, as 'I hope, pretty well, yet I ſtay till I receive the firſt 'payment from Dolabella's agents.' Let us favour Plutarch and Aſconius Pedianus as much as we pleaſe, we ſhall yet be forced to accuſe them of having expreſſed themſelves ill. Cicero, whoſe credit in this caſe outweighs that of an hundred Hiſtorians, informs us, that Tullia was pretty well after her delivery: ſo that the beſt ſuppoſition we can make in favour of Plutarch and Aſconius Pedianus, is that Tullia, before ſhe was perfectly recovered, was ſurprized by ſome diſtemper incident to child-bed-women, of which ſhe died.

[O] Cicero was inconſolable for ſome time.] If we believe Plutarch (42), the Philoſophers flocked from all parts to Cicero's aſſiſtance. They doubtleſs brought him the choiceſt of their troops, I mean the moſt excellent moral reflexions which their topics, or common places, could furniſh. But it ſignified nothing, company was inſupportable to Cicero, he confined himſelf in a ſolitude, where he found more conſolation, than in the diſcourſes of his friends, or his books. 'Quod 'me ab hoc mœrore recreari vis, facis ut omnia: ſed 'me mihi non defuiſſe, tu teſtis es. Nihil enim 'de mœrore minuendo ſcriptum ab ullo eſt, quod ego 'non domi tuæ legerim. Sed omnem conſolationem 'vincit dolor (43). . . . . (44) Ne diſceſſiſſem qui'dem è conſpectu tuo niſi me plane nihil ulla res 'adjuvaret . . . . mihi adhuc nihil prius fuit hac 'ſolitudine . . . . me ſcriptio & litteræ non leniunt 'ſed obturbant (45). - - - The pains you take to divert 'me from this grief, is a new proof of your friendſhip: 'but you can bear me witneſs that I have not been want'ing to myſelf: for I read at your houſe whatever has 'been written to leſſen one's ſorrow; yet my grief exceeds 'all conſolation . . . . I would not have left you, if 'any thing could have given me eaſe . . . . this ſoli'tude was preferable to every thing elſe. . . . Reading 'and writing do not comfort, but diſturb me.' He proteſts, in another epiſtle (46), that ſolitude ſeemed to him the moſt ſupportable thing in the world. 'Nunc 'omnia reſpuo, nec quicquam habeo tolerabilius quam 'ſolitudinem. - - - Now I reject every thing, and find 'nothing ſo tolerable as ſolitude.' To be ſenſible of the diſorder their endeavours to comfort him: he himſelf wrote a book on that ſubject [P], and deſigned

---

(e) See the article DOLABELLA.

(34) Philippica XI, pag. 827, Edit. Græv.

(35) Idem, in eadem Oratione, init.

(36) Now called Seville. See the xxth letter of the xiiith book to Atticus.

(37) Plut. in Cicerone, p. 881, 882.

(38) Fabricius, ſuppoſes it in vita Ciceronis, pag. m. 193.

(39) Caſpar Sagittarius, in Vita Tulliæ, num. 54.

(40) Epiſt. xviii, lib. x, ad Attic.

(41) Epiſt. xviii, lib. vi, ad Famil.

(42) In Cicer. pag. 882, A.

(43) Cicero, Epiſt. xiv, ad Attic. lib. xii.

(44) Ibid. Epiſt. XVI.

(45) He ſays much the ſame thing in lett. xiv, lib. xii, Totos dies ſcribo, non quo proficiam quid, ſed tantiſper impedior, non equidem ſatis (vis enim urget) ſed relaxor tamen. He endeavoured to relieve his mind by reading and writing.

(46) The xviiith of the ſame book.

diſorder into which his affliction had plunged him, we need only conſider his frank confeſſion, that he ſunk under his grief, and at the ſame time reflect on the oſtentation with which he brags of his courage. He willingly boaſted that he was inconſolable, but would by no means endure the reproaches of too much weakneſs. Sentiments utterly incompatible. ‘Quod me ipſe per literas conſolatus ſum non pœnitet me quantum profecerim. Mœrorem minui, dolorem nec potui, nec ſi poſſem, vellem (47). - - - I do not repent my having endeavoured to comfort myſelf by reading. I have leſſened my affliction, but I neither could nor would get rid of my grief.’ Here is a man who neither could, nor would abate his grief. ‘In hac ſolitudine careo omnium colloquio; cumque mane me in ſilvam abſtruſi denſam & aſperam, non exeo inde ante veſperum, ſecundum te nil eſt mihi amicius ſolitudine, in ea mihi omnis ſermo eſt cum litteris, eum tamen interpellat fletus: cui repugno quoad poſſum, ſed adhuc pares non ſumus (48). - - - In this ſolitude I am without any company and converſation; in the morning I hide myſelf in the thickeſt and moſt obſcure part of the wood, and continue there till night: next to you there is nothing ſo agreeable to me as ſolitude: all my converſation in it is with books; but it is interrupted with tears, which I endeavour to refrain from as much as poſſible, but hitherto I have not been able to do it.’ He hid himſelf in the obſcureſt place of a wood from morning till night, and could not refrain from tears. Doth not he almoſt own that he had loſt his ſenſes? ‘In conſolationis libro quem in medio (NON ENIM SAPIENTES ERAMUS) mœrore & dolore conſcripſimus (49). - - - In the book on Conſolation which I wrote (FOR I WAS NOT IN MY SENSES) in the heighth of my grief and ſorrow.’ Doth not he confeſs that he had ſhamefully ſurrendered his arms to fortune (50)? But let us ſee, on the other ſide, how he glories in his courage (51). ‘Quod ſcribis te vereri, ne & gratia & auctoritas noſtra hoc meo mœrore minuatur: ego, quid homines aut reprehendant, aut poſtulent, neſcio; ne doleam? qui poteſt? ne jaceam? quis unquam minus? dum tua me domus levabat, quis à me excluſus? quis venit, qui offenderetur? Aſturam (52) ſum à te profectus, legere iſti læti, qui me reprehendunt, tam multa non poſſunt, quam ego ſcripſi, quam bene, nihil ad rem, ſed genus ſcribendi id fuit, quod nemo abjecto animo facere poſſet. - - - - You write to me, that you are afraid my intereſt and authority will ſuffer by my immoderate grief; for my part I know not what men find fault with, or what they would have: would they have me not to grieve? how is it poſſible? would they have me not to give way to grief? who ever gave way to it leſs than I? Whilſt I was at your houſe, did I not always ſee company? Did ever any come that was offended with me? From your houſe I went to Aſtura. Thoſe merry people, that find fault with me, are not able to read ſo much as I wrote there: how well I did it, is nothing to the purpoſe; but it was that ſort of writing which cannot come from a dejected mind.’ To thoſe at Rome who took it ill that he hid himſelf ſo long, he declared that his employments were not thoſe of a man quite overwhelmed with ſorrow. ‘Ne me quidem contemno: meoque judicio multo ſtare malo, quam omnium reliquorum, neque tamen progredior longius, quam mihi doctiſſimi homines concedunt: quorum ſcripta omnia, quæcumque ſunt in eam ſententiam, non legi ſolum, quod ipſum erat fortis ægroti, accipere medicinam; ſed in mea etiam ſcripta transtuli; quod certe afflicti, & fracti animi non fuit (53). - - - I do not think the worſe of myſelf for it; and, in this caſe, I had much rather acquieſce in my own judgment than that of all others; and yet I do not exceed the bounds that very learned men allow me: all whoſe writings on this ſubject I have not only read, like a ſtrong patient, by way of medicine, but alſo tranſcribed them in my own writings, which certainly is not a ſign of a dejected and broken ſpirit.’ See the marginal note (45) above, which makes it appear that writing of books afforded him ſcarce any relief againſt his grief, but only a little ſtupified the part affected. Is this an effect of fortitude?

It muſt be owned that his affliction is the moſt convincing proof which he gave of his tender affection for Tullia; but if he had died before her, we ſhould not have wanted proofs of his extraordinary affection to her. All his expreſſions, when he ſpeaks of her in his epiſtles, are ſo many evidences of it; ‘Deliciæ, deliciolæ, mea anima, lux, deſiderium. - - - My darling, my delight, my ſoul, my life, my love.’ It is very probable that Tullia was endowed with a thouſand good qualities, and was one of the moſt charming ladies of her time, ſince ſhe ſo deeply engaged the affection of ſuch a father. Mr Sagittarius (54) conjectures, that ſhe was inſtructed in polite learning. He had not advanced this as a bare conjecture only, if he had met with the paſſage hereafter cited of out Lactantius (55). If Plutarch is to be believed (56), one of the cauſes of Terentia's divorce was, that ſhe would not allow her daughter a ſufficient equipage to go to adviſe with her father at Brunduſium. He adds, that Cicero's ſecond wife was divorced, becauſe ſhe rejoiced at Tullia's death. There is no reaſon to diſpute the truth of this with Plutarch, under pretence that Cicero's epiſtles to Atticus inform us, that this ſecond wife lived a pretty long time with her huſband after Tullia's death (57). This objection, I ſay, would be ill grounded, becauſe it is certain the divorce had been effected the ſummer after Tullia's death (58).

Cicero's extraordinary affection for his daughter, inſpired his enemies with ſuch a boldneſs as to report that he loved her inceſtuouſly: So true it is, that there is nothing ſo pure from which a ſatirical genius cannot extract a filthy poiſon. Thoſe careſſes which proximity of blood authorizes amongſt relations of different ſexes, are expoſed to ſiniſter interpretations when they are more than ordinary. How doth calumny envenom things! See in the margin (59) what the declaimer, who aſſumed the name of Salluſt, ſaith, and remember that Donatus, an antient interpreter of Virgil, believed that this verſe of the Æneid, Hic thalamos invaſit natæ vetitoſque hymenæos (60).

He with his daughter inceſt did commit.

ought to be underſtood of Cicero. But Servius rejects this opinion (61).

[P] He himſelf wrote a book on that ſubject.] I have cited ſome paſſages in the preceding remark that hint at this tract. It is great pity that it is loſt. But it is not Sigonius's fault that the public doth not at preſent believe it is yet extant: he wrote a tract de Conſolatione, and endeavoured to make it paſs for Cicero's. The judicious Critics (62), prevented the deceit immediately. Sigonius, tho' he publiſhed ſome diſſertations againſt them, did not gain his point. Cicero, on this occaſion, ſeemed like thoſe who eat nothing with pleaſure, which they themſelves have not a hand in cooking of. All the conſolatory arguments which his friends offered either in converſation or by writing, were ineffectual. It was his book de Conſolatione only which in ſome meaſure abated his grief: ‘Quid ego de conſolatione dicam, quæ mihi quidem ipſi ſane aliquantum medetur; ceteris item multum illam profuturam puto (63). - - - What ſhall I ſay of my book de Conſolatione, which indeed gives ſome relief to myſelf, and I believe will be of great ſervice to others.’ He obſerves, that in the greateſt of his grief, he began the preparation of this antidote. ‘In conſolationis libro quem in medio (non enim ſapientes eramus) mœrore & dolore conſcripſimus, quodque vetat Chryſippus ad recentes quaſi tumores animi remedium adhibere, id nos fecimus, naturæque vim attulimus, ut magnitudini medicinæ doloris magnitudo concederet (64). - - - - In the book of Conſolation, which I wrote in the heighth of my grief and ſorrow, (for I was not in my right ſenſes) and becauſe Chryſippus forbids to apply a remedy to the freſh wounds of the mind, I have given ſuch ſtrength to nature, that the force of affliction yields to the force of the medicine.’ This tract abounded with hiſtorical paſſages and inſtances, as St Jerom (65), and St Auguſtin inform us. ‘Quis enim ſufficit quantovis eloquentiæ flumine vitæ hujus miſerias explicare, quam lamentatus eſt Cicero in conſolatione de morte filiæ, ſicut potuit (66)? - - - What man, with the greateſt eloquence, can diſplay the miſeries of this life, which Cicero bewailed as well as

‘ be

---

(47) Epiſt. xxviii, ejuſd. Libri.

(48) Epiſt. xv, ejuſd. Libri.

(49) Tuſcul. Queſt.

(50) Lactantio teſte affirmavit ſe tum a fortuna victum turpiter. Sagittar. ubi ſupra, num. 57, and before him Corradus, in Quæſtura, pag. m. 294.

(51) Epiſt. xl, lib. xii, ad Atticum.

(52) A country-houſe, whither he retired after he had left Atticus.

(53) Epiſt. xxi, lib. xii.

(54) Ubi ſupra, num. 10.

(55) In the remark [Q], citation (74).

(56) In Cicer. pag. 882.

(57) Sed etiamſi non negaverimus Ciceroni non admodum bene conveniſſe cum uxore nova, multo tamen poſt obitum Tulliæ cum Cicerone vixiſſe, ex Epiſtolis ad Atticum liquet. Sagittarius, in Vita Tulliæ, num. 70.

(58) See the xxxivth letter of the xiiith book to Atticus.

(59) Verum, ut opinor, ſplendor domeſticus tibi animos attollit, uxor ſacrilega, ac perjuriis delibuta, filia matris pellex, tibi jucundior atque obſequentior quam parenti par eſt. - - - But in my opinion you are puffed up with pride, on account of your domeſtic ſplendor, your ſacrilegious and perjured wife, and your daughter debauched by her mother, who is more agreeable and obſequious to you than ſhe ought to be to a father.

(60) Æn. lib. vi, ver. 623.

(61) Servius in hunc locum Æneïdos. See Schottus, in Cicerone vindicato, cap. xii, pag. m. 90.

(62) Lipſius, Guillielmus, &c.

(63) De Divinat. lib. ii, init.

(64) Cicero, in Tuſcul. apud Corradum, in Quæſtura, pag. 294.

(65) In Epitaphio Nepotiani.

(66) Auguſtin. de Civit. Dei, lib. xix, cap. iv.

deſigned to build a temple to the deceaſed, and even to make an apotheoſis for her [Q]. His enemies were ſo baſe as to accuſe him of loving Tullia inceſtuouſly (f). Plutarch is miſtaken in ſome parts of her ſtory. He did not know that ſhe had had three huſbands (g). Mr Moreri who had Gaſpar Sagittarius's diſſertation on the hiſtory of Tullia (b), did not know how to make the moſt advantageous uſe of it; he has ſcarce extracted any thing of conſequence; only a ſtory related by Cœlius Rhodiginus, which Mr Sagittarius has juſtly baniſhed to the fabulous lands. The project of a temple is by Mr Moreri converted into a real one, furniſhed with a magnificent Mauſoleum. See the (f) See the latter end of the remark [O].

(g) See the four firſt remarks.

(b) He quotes it; but the Printers have put a comma after Gaſpar, which made many readers believe that he had quoted two writers, Gaſpar and Sagittarius.

' he could in this book of Conſolation.' We ſhall produce below an obſervation of Lactantius.

[Q] And even to make an apotheoſis for her.] He ſeveral times communicated his deſign to Atticus: but we ſhall at preſent content ourſelves with two or three paſſages. ' Habeo nonnullos ex iis, quos nunc lectito, ' auctores, qui dicant, fieri id oportere, quod ſæpe ' tecum egi, & quod à te approbari volo. de fano illo ' dico; de quo tantum, quantum me amas, velim ' cogites; equidem neque de genere dubito; placet ' enim mihi Cluatii: neque de re; ſtatutum eſt enim; ' de loco nonnunquam. velim igitur cogites. ego, ' quantum his temporibus tam eruditis fieri poterit, ' profecto illam conſecrabo omni genere monumentorum, ab omnium ingeniis ſcriptorum, & Græcorum ' & Latinorum: quæ res forſitan ſit refricatura vulnus ' meum. ſed jam quaſi voto quodam, & promiſſo me ' teneri puto (67). - - - Some of thoſe authors, whom I ' am now reading, ſay that I ought to do what I have ' often conſulted you about, and which I ſhould be glad ' you approved of. I mean with regard to the temple: ' and I intreat you, as you love me, to conſider of it. Indeed I am in no manner of doubt concerning the kind of ' it, for that of Cluatius pleaſes me; nor as to the thing ' itſelf, for I am fully determined; but I am ſometimes ' in doubt with reſpect to the place. And therefore I ' beg you would think of it. I am reſolved to eternize ' her memory, as much as it is poſſible in an age ſo learned as this is, by monuments of all kinds from the ingenious writings of Greeks and Latins. Which perhaps ' will make my wounds to bleed afreſh, but now I think ' myſelf bound as it were by a vow and promiſe.' The following paſſage more clearly ſhews, that he was engaged by a vow to build a temple, and that he believed it was irreligious not to put that deſign in execution. Lactantius will inform us below concerning this engagement. ' Si iſta minus confici poſſunt, effice ' quidvis. Ego me majore religione quam quiſquam ' fuit ullius voti, obſtrictum puto (68). - - - If thoſe ' things cannot be effected, do any thing. For I think ' myſelf more ſtrictly bound than ever any one was by a ' vow.' A monument, a mauſoleum, or whatever had the name or likeneſs of a ſepulchre, could not ſatisfy him. ' Fanum fieri volo; neque hoc mihi erui ' poteſt: ſepulchri ſimilitudinem effugere non tam ' propter pœnam legis ſtudeo, quam ut maxime aſſequar ἀποθέωσιν: quod poteram, ſi in ipſa villa facerem. ſed, ut ſæpe locuti ſumus, commutationes ' dominorum reformido. in agro ubicumque fecero, ' mihi videor aſſequi poſſe, ut poſteritas habeat religionem (69). - - - I would by all means have a temple ' built; nothing can diſſuade me from it. I endeavour ' to avoid the likeneſs of a tomb, not ſo much becauſe of ' the penalty of the law, as that I may obtain an apotheoſis: which I might do, were it to be in the village itſelf; but as I have often ſaid, I fear the change ' of proprietors. Wherever I do it in the country, I think ' poſterity might be brought to reſpect it from a ſenſe of ' religion.' He gives his imaginations a very proper name. ' Hæ meæ tibi ineptiæ, fateor enim, ferendæ ' ſunt (70). - - - Theſe my follies, for I own they are ' ſuch, you muſt pardon.' If Mr Moreri had but given himſelf the trouble of conſidering with attention, what he pillaged from the moderns; would he have told us, That Cicero cauſed a temple to be built, in which he incloſed Tullia's aſhes, in a ſtately Mauſoleum? Might he not have ſeen in the author whom he cites in the laſt paſſage quoted by me, which ſays that Cicero deſigning an apotheoſis, avoided all that could be thought to look like a tomb? This was not on account of the expence, as he clearly explains himſelf: ' Ante quam a te proxime diſceſſi, numquam mihi ' venit in mentem, quo plus inſumtum in monumentum eſſet, quam neſcio quid, quod lege conceditur, ' tantundem populo dandum eſſe, quod non magnopere moveret, niſi neſcio quomodo, ἀλόγως fortaſſe, ' nollem illud ullo nomine, niſi fani, appellari. quod ' ſi volumus, vereor ne aſſequi non poſſimus, niſi mutato loco (71). - - - Before I parted with you lately, ' it never came into my thoughts that it would coſt ' more to build a monument, than what by law is to ' be given to the people, which would not trouble me ' much, were I not unwilling (perhaps without reaſon) ' that it ſhould be called by any other name than that of ' a temple; and I am afraid, it could not be effected ' but by changing the place.' According to Cicero's principles, nothing was more abſurd or impious, than to pay divine honours to thoſe perſons on whoſe tombs funeral rites were celebrated; and it was for this reaſon that he ſays he would not have given his ſuffrage to the decree of the Senate, which ordered ſupplications to be made to Julius Cæſar: ' An me ' cenſetis, patres conſcripti, quod vos inviti ſecuti ' eſtis decreturum fuiſſe ut parentalia cum ſupplicationibus miſcerentur? ut inexpiabiles religiones in ' Rempublicam? ut decernerentur ſupplicationes mortuo? . . . . Fuerit ille L. Brutus . . . . adduci tamen ' non poſſem ut quemquam mortuum conjungerem ' cum deorum immortalium religione, ut cujus ſepulchrum uſquam exſtet ubi parentetur, ei publicè ſupplicetur (72). - - - Do you think, illuſtrious ſenators, ' that I would have given my ſuffrage to a decree, ' which you have unwillingly obeyed, that funeral rites ' ſhould be mingled with ſupplications? that divine honours ſhould be paid to the dead perſon, which is an ' impiety not to be atoned for? . . . . Were it L. Brutus ' . . . . yet I could not be prevailed on to render to any ' dead perſon the honours due to the immortal gods, to ' make public ſupplications to him, upon whoſe tomb funeral obſequies are celebrated.' If Mr Moreri had written conſiderately, he had avoided another miſtake. He aſſures us that Cicero actually cauſed a temple to be built: of which there appears no footſteps in his letters. Cicero appears very earneſt and warm on this deſign, I own; we find him even threatning his good friend, for not being forward enough, and prefixing a ſet time when the work ſhould be finiſhed: but it doth not appear by any of his letters, that the building of that temple was ever perfected, or even begun. Is not this a proof that his project came to nothing, and that either time, which aſſwages grief, made him ſenſible that his deſign was ridiculous, or that unforeſeen accidents, or other affairs had diverted the execution of his Apotheoſis.

(67) Cicero, Ep. xviii, lib. xii, ad Attic.

(68) Ibid. Epiſt. xliii.

(69) Ibid. Epiſt. xxxvi.

(70) Id. ibid.

(71) Ibid. Epiſt. xxxv.

(72) Cicero, Philipp. I.

A PASSAGE of Lactantius.

Lactantius ſeveral times cites the book de Conſolatione: by which it appears that Tully did not in the leaſt ſcruple to ſacrifice the honour and glory of his gods to his ridiculous fancy of deifying his daughter: to juſtify which, he ſhewed that the gods publickly adored in Rome, were formerly men. This inſtance affords a natural image of the empire of the paſſions. They ſpare nothing in heaven or earth, when bent on their juſtification (73). Lactantius's expreſſions are very beautiful, and the more deſerve our tranſcribing, becauſe they contain a fragment of a book which is loſt, and the promiſe which Cicero publickly made his daughter, that he would place her among the gods. ' M. Tullius . . . . in eo libro quo ſeipſum de morte ' filiæ conſolatus eſt, non dubitavit dicere, Deos, qui ' publicè colerentur, homines fuiſſe. Quod ipſius teſtimonium eo debet graviſſimum judicari, quòd & ' augurale habuit Sacerdotium, & eoſdem ſe colere, ' venerarique teſtatur. Itaque intra paucos verſiculos ' duas res nobis dedit. Nam dum imaginem filiæ ' eodem ſe modo conſecraturum eſſe profiteretur, quo ' illi à veteribus ſunt conſecrati, & illos mortuos eſſe ' docuit, & originem vanæ ſuperſtitionis oſtendit. ' Cum verò (inquit) & mares, & feminas complures ' ex hominibus in Deorum numero eſſe videamus, & ' eorum in urbibus, atque agris auguſtiſſima delubra veneremur, aſſentiamur eorum ſapientiæ, quorum ' ingeniis, & inventis omnes vitam legibus, & inſtitutis

(73) We have ſeen of late a famous miniſter, who endeavoured to find in the Prophets of the Old Teſtament, all the faults that were objected againſt the falſe Prophets of Dauphiné, whom he obliged himſelf to defend as true Prophets.

the remark [Q]. Cicero's words in the exordium of his book de Conſolatione, where he advanced, that men come into the world only to ſuffer the puniſhment of their ſins [R], will ‘ tutis excultam, conſtitutamque habemus. Quod ſi ullum unquam animal conſecrandum fuit, illud profectò fuit. Si Cadmi, aut Amphitryonis progenies, aut Tyndari in cœlum tollenda fama fuit, huic idem honos certe dicandus eſt, quod quidem faciam, teque omnium optimam, doctiſſimamque approbantibus Diis immortalibus ipſis in eorum cœtu locatam ad opinionem omnium mortalium conſecrabo (74). - - - Cicero, in that book which he wrote to comfort himſelf for the loſs of his daughter, made no ſcruple to ſay, that the gods, who were publickly worſhipped, had been formerly men. Which teſtimony is of the greater weight, as he enjoyed the augural prieſthood, and declares that he himſelf worſhipped and adored thoſe gods. And therefore in a few words he informs us of two things. For when he tells us, that he will conſecrate the image of his daughter in the ſame manner, as thoſe were conſecrated by the antients, he ſhews that they are dead, and acquaints us with the origin of vain ſuperſtition. BUT, (ſays he) ſince we find a great many both men and women ranked amongſt the gods, and ſince we reverence their magnificent temples in cities and in the country, let us ſubmit to the wiſdom of thoſe, to whoſe abilities and inventions we owe a well regulated and civilized life. Now if ever any living creature deſerved to be deified, ſhe certainly did ſo. If the offſpring of Cadmus, or Amphitryon, or Tyndarus, deſerved to be tranſlated by Fame into heaven, the ſame honour ought ſurely to be paid to her; which indeed I ſhall do, and ſhall place thee, my moſt excellent and moſt learned daughter, in the number of the immortal gods, with their own approbation and that of all mankind.’ I might ſtop here, but the reſt of this paſſage affording a reflexion, I ſhall ſubjoin it: Fortaſſe dicat aliquis præ nimio luctu deliraſſe Ciceronem. Atqui omnis illa oratio & doctrina, & exemplis, & ipſo loquendi genere perfecta non ægri, ſed conſtantis animi ac judicii fuit. Et hæc ipſa ſententia nullum præfert indicium doloris. Neque enim puto, illum tam variè, tam copioſè, tam ornatè ſcribere potuiſſe, niſi luctum ejus & ratio ipſa, & conſolatio amicorum, & temporis longitudo mitigaſſet (75). Lactantius propoſes as an objection: that perhaps Cicero raved when he wrote that book, and the greatneſs of his affliction had affected his brain. But I maintain, replies Lactantius, that his book de Conſolatione is ſo fine, that it could only be compoſed by a perſon who was in his perfect ſenſes, and whoſe grief had been ſoftened by reaſon, the conſolation of his friends, or time. He was obliged to turn the argument upon this, in order to render Cicero an unqueſtionable evidence. But if he had deſigned to prove the inſufficiency of Philoſophy to comfort a man in affliction, he would then have alledged this very book of Cicero, as the performance of a man who confeſſed himſelf ſhamefully born down by grief for the loſs of his daughter (76). To what cauſe is this conduct to be aſcribed? Is it owing to inadvertence, or ſome rhetorical artifice, that things are thus made uſe of to contrary purpoſes.

[R] Cicero . . . . ſays that men come into the world only to ſuffer the puniſhment of their ſins.] He could not paint his grief by more ſignal characters, than by ſaying, that human life is a puniſhment, and cenſuring thoſe of a contrary opinion. ‘ Quid Ciceroni faciemus? qui cum in principio conſolationis ſuæ dixiſſet luendorum ſcelerum cauſa naſci homines, iteravit id ipſum poſtea, quaſi objurgans eum qui vitam pœnam non eſſe putet (77). - - - What ſhall we ſay of Cicero, who, tho' in the beginning of his book on Conſolation he had ſaid that men were born to ſuffer for their ſins, yet repeats it again, cenſuring thoſe who think life is not a puniſhment.’ Lactantius ought not to be blamed for cenſuring this aſſertion of Cicero (78); for it is certain that it betrays an ignorance of the reaſon why GOD placed us in the world: but as this reaſon was above the reach of natural light, and is only well known by the evangelical revelation, we ought not to be much ſurprized that Cicero, hurried on by grief, and oppreſſed by affliction, ſtretched the platonical hypotheſis. Plato's Philoſophy taught, That the ſoul of man did exiſt before it was incloſed in a human body, and that this anterior ſtate had been much more glorious and happy than that of man. Hence ſome pretended Philoſophers advanced, that the ſoul had never changed its condition, if it had not deſerved chaſtiſement; and they concluded, that it was confined to the body as its priſon, in order to inflict on it its deſerved puniſhment. ‘ Quæ ignorantia effecit ut quoſdam dicere non puderet, idcirco nos eſſe natos ut ſcelerum pœnas lueremus, quo quid delirius dici poſſit non invenio. Ubi enim, vel quæ ſcelera potuimus admittere, qui omnino non fuimus (79). - - - From this ignorance it came to paſs, that ſome were not aſhamed to affirm that we were born to ſuffer the puniſhment of our ſins, than which nothing can be more ridiculous. For where or what crimes could we commit, who had no manner of exiſtence.’ Cicero adopted this hypotheſis (80), but Lactantius looks upon it as the moſt ſenſeleſs of all extravagancies. And yet it is certain that this tenet differs from the doctrine of original ſin in its circumſtances only; for ſince the Chriſtian Faith inſtructs us, that Adam ſinned for himſelf and all his poſterity, it follows, 1. That all ſouls, in the eye of GOD, are involved in guilt even before they exiſt. 2. That they are united to the body only by an act of puniſhment, ſince by their being united to the body, they incur the penalty of eternal damnation, to which they are juſtly ſentenced, and it is by no other means than remiſſion and grace that ſome are ſaved; wherefore the ſcripture ſaith, that all men are born children of wrath (81). Lactantius ought therefore to have refuted Tully's hypotheſis more dexterouſly, and that by proofs which only affect thoſe particulars in which it differs from that of original ſin. If he had well conſidered Arnobius's ſecond book, he would have found it was no eaſy matter to refute Cicero by philoſophical arguments; for I do not ſee what reply the Platoniſts might offer to Arnobius's reaſons, I mean thoſe objections which he offered againſt the aſſertion, that immortal ſpirits in their own nature innocent, happy, abounding in knowledge, either voluntarily deſcended into human bodies, or were ſent thither by providence. He makes a long enumeration of the follies, crimes, and miſeries of mankind, and concludes that it was inconſiſtent with the goodneſs and juſtice of GOD, that ſuch ſpirits ſhould be united to human bodies. Into which he takes it to be exactly the ſame thing to command or ſuffer them to deſcend. ‘ Atque ita perficitur, ſays he (82), ut nihil interſit omnino voluntariè venerint, an illius obtemperaverint juſſioni: cùm non prohibendo quòd oportuerat prohiberi, ceſſatione crimen fecerit proprium, & retentionis diſſimulatione permiſerit prius. Sed procul hæc abeat ſceleratæ opinionis immanitas, ut Deus credatur omnipotens, magnarum & inviſibilium rerum ſator & conditor, procreator, tam mobiles animas genuiſſe gravitatis ac ponderis conſtantiæque nullius, in vitia labiles, in peccatorum genera univerſa declives: cumque eas tales atque hujuſmodi ſciret, in corpora ire juſſiſſe, quorum inductæ carceribus ſub procellis agerent tempeſtatibuſque quotidie fortunæ, & modo turpia facerent, modo paterentur obſcœna: naufragiis, ruinis, incendiorum conflagrationibus ut perirent. Pauperies alias, alias ut mendicitas premeret, ut ferarum paterentur aliæ laniatus, muſcularum aliæ ut interirent veneno, claudæ ut incederent aliæ, ut aliæ lumen amitterent, ut articulis ſederent aliæ colligatis, morbis denique objectarentur ut cunctis, quos infelix & miſeranda mortalitas diverſarum ſuſtinet dilaceratione pœnarum: tum deinde oblitæ unius eſſe ſe fontis, unius genitoris & capitis, germanitatis convellerent atque abrumperent jura: urbes ſuas everterent, popularentur hoſtiliter terras, ſervos de liberis facerent, inſultarent virginibus, & matrimoniis alienis, odiſſent invicem ſeſe, aliorum gaudiis & felicitatibus inviderent: tum deinde ſe omnes maledicerent, carperent, & ſævorum dentium mordacitate laniarent. Sed procul hæc abeat, ut eadem rurſus frequentiuſque dicamus, tam immanis, & ſcelerata perſuaſio, ut ille ſalus rerum Deus, omnium virtutum caput, benignitatis & columen; atque ut eum laudibus extollamus humanis, ſapientiſſimus, juſtus, perfecta omnia faciens, & integritatis ſuæ conſervantia manſiones, aut aliquid fecerit claudum, & quod minus eſſet à ‘ recto,

(74) Lactant. Divin. Inſtit. lib. i, cap. 15, pag. m. 48.

(75) Ibid.

(76) See, above, the remark [O], citat. (59).

(77) Lactant. Divin. Inſtit. lib. iii, cap. xviii, pag. m. 197.

(78) Recte ergo profatus eſt errore ac miſerabili veritatis ignorantia ſe teneri. - - - - And therefore he very rightly ſaid he was detained in error, and in miſerable ignorance of the truth. Id. ibid.

(79) Id. ibid. pag. 196.

(80) See, above, citation (80), of the article OVID.

(81) Eph. ii. 3.

(82) Arnobius, lib. ii, pag. m. 74, 75.

will admit of a good reflexion.

‘ recto, aut ulli rei fuerit miſeriarum aut diſcriminum cauſa, aut ipſos actus quibus vita tranſigitur & celebratur humana, ordinaverit, juſſerit, & à ſua fluere conſtitutione præceperit. Minora hæc illo ſunt, & magnitudinis ejus deſtruentia poteſtatem: tantumque eſt longè ut iſtarum auctor rerum eſſe credatur, ut in ſacrilegæ crimen impietatis occurrat quiſquis ab eo conceperit hominem eſſe prognatum, rem infelicem & miſeram, qui eſſe ſe doleat, qui conditionem ſuam deteſtetur & lugea: qui nulla alia de cauſa ſeſe intelligat procreatum, quàm ne materiam non haberent per quam diffunderent ſe mala, & eſſent miſeri ſemper, quorum cruciatibus paſceretur neſcio qua vis latens, & humanitati adverſa crudelitas. - - - And ſo it is the ſame thing whether the ſouls came into their bodies entirely of their own accord, or in obedience to GOD's command: ſince by not preventing what ought to have been prevented, he permitted and became the author of ſin. But far be it from us to entertain ſuch an impious thought, as if almighty GOD, the maker of all things viſible and inviſible, ſhould create ſouls ſo fickle and inconſtant, prone to vice and all manner of ſin: and that when he knew them to be ſuch, ſhould command them to enter into bodies, that being therein incloſed they might be continually toſſed up and down with the ſtorms and tempeſts of fortune, and ſometimes act and ſometimes ſuffer vile and abominable things: that they might periſh by ſhipwrecks, ruins, and fires: that ſome might be oppreſſed with poverty, and others reduced to beggary; ſome torn to pieces by wild beaſts, and others poiſoned by inſects; ſome lame, others blind, and others again not able to ſtir a joint; in fine, that they might be expoſed to all the diſeaſes and torments of wretched mortality. And then, forgetting that they all flow from the ſame fountain, and are all deſcended from the ſame father, ſhould diſſolve and break the ties of fleſh and blood, demoliſh cities, waſte lands, inſlave the free, raviſh virgins and matrons, hate one another, and envy one another's joy and felicity: that they ſhould cenſure, revile and maliciouſly ſlander one another. But as I ſaid before, far be it from us to entertain ſuch a monſtrous and wicked opinion, as if GOD, the Saviour of the world, the fountain of all virtue, the author of all good, and (that we may extol him as we are able) who is moſt wiſe and juſt, and makes all things perfect, and preſerves them in their integrity, I ſay, as if GOD ſhould make any thing defective or imperfect, or be the cauſe of miſery and danger, or decree, ordain, and appoint the actions of human life. Thoſe things are beneath him, and derogate from the power of his greatneſs: and it is ſo far from being right to believe him the author of thoſe things, that whoever imagines man was created by him miſerable and wretched; he who is ſorry that he exiſts, who deteſts and bewails his condition; who thinks he was made for no other purpoſe but to undergo a multitude of evils, and to be always miſerable, and by torments to feed the cruelty of ſome inviſible power, an enemy to mankind, I ſay, ſuch an one is guilty of the higheſt impiety.’ To cenſure this doctrine of Arnobius as an ill one, would be too great a piece of moderation, it ought to be called abominable; for it overthrows the foundations of Chriſtianity, and is not much better than the doctrine of the Manichees. Cicero might have found in it as lively a deſcription of human miſery as he could have made; but he might have anſwered that objection by his hypotheſis of the pre-exiſtence of ſin, which however falſe it was, might yet inſpire patience. For he might very well ſay to himſelf, My daughter's death hath overwhelmed me, and plunged me into deſpair; but about two hundred years ago or more, I committed ſome crimes which deſerve this puniſhment. I hereby expiate them. I ſuffer for them in this organized priſon, in which my ſoul was confined when I was born: It is juſt that I ſhould be unhappy, ſince I ſinned ſo long ago. If Pſyche's father had reaſoned in this manner, he would not have anſwered, as the author of that play, makes him anſwer to that common place of conſolation, that the gods have the right to take away thoſe children which they have given.

Ah, cherche un meilleur fondement
Aux conſolations que ton cœur me preſente,
Et de la fauſſeté de ce raiſonnement
Ne fais point un accablement
A cette douleur ſi cuiſante,
Dont je ſouffre ici le tourment.
Crois tu là me donner une raiſon puiſſante
Pour ne me plaindre point de cet arrêt des Cieux?
Et dans le procedé des Dieux,
Dont tu veux que je me contente,
Une rigueur aſſaſſinante
Ne paroît-elle pas aux yeux?
Voi l'état où ces Dieux me forcent à te (83) rendre,
Et l'autre où te receut mon cœur infortuné:
Tu connoitras par là qu'ils me viennent reprendre
Bien plus que ce qu'ils m'ont donné.
Je receus d'eux en toi, ma Fille,
Un preſent que mon cœur ne leur demandoit pas;
J'y trouvois alors peu d'appas,
Et leur en vis ſans joye accroître ma famille.
Mais mon cœur ainſi que mes yeux
S'eſt fait de ce preſent une douce habitude:
J'ai mis quinze ans de ſoins, de veilles, & d'étude,
A me le rendre precieux:
Je l'ay paré de l'aimable richeſſe
De mille brillantes vertus,
En lui j'ai renfermé par des ſoins aſſidus
Tous les plus beaux treſors que fournit la ſageſſe,
A lui j'ai de mon ame attaché la tendreſſe,
J'en ai fait de ce cœur le charme & l'allegreſſe,
La conſolation de mes ſens abbatus,
Le doux eſpoir de ma vieilleſſe.
Ils m'ôtent tout cela, ces Dieux,
Et tu veux que je n'aye acun ſujet de plainte
Sur cet affreux arrêt dont je ſouffre l'atteinte?
Ah! leur pouvoir ſe jouë avec trop de rigueur
Des tendreſſes de nôtre cœur:
Pour m'ôter leur preſent, leur falloit-il attendre
Que j'en euſſe fait tout mon bien?
Ou plûtôt, s'ils avoient deſſein de le reprendre,
N'eût-il pas été mieux de ne me donner rien (84)?

Oh! ſeek ſome better ground of conſolation.
Think you, this weakly-pleaded Sophiſtry
Ought to reſtrain my juſt complaint of Heav'n?
Let thy grown age be weigh'd againſt thy infancy,
And thou wilt ſee the gods take much more from me
Than what they gave. I, child, receiv'd in thee
A preſent which I did not aſk from Heav'n:
Then with a cold and unrejoicing heart
I ſaw my family's increaſe, but now
A fifteen years endearing habitude
Has made that preſent precious to my eyes,
The ſubject of my late and early care,
Now ornamented with the richeſt treaſures
Of wiſdom and a thouſand brillant virtues.
It mov'd my tender ſoul with fond delight,
The charm and entertainment of my heart,
Staff of my life, my age's ſoothing hope,
And my diminiſh'd ſenſes conſolation.
All this they take from me, theſe gods take from me.
And wouldſt thou have me unrepining ſit,
And bear this harſh decree without a murmur?
They too ſeverely ſport with our fond hearts.
If they were minded to reſume their gift,
Why ſtaid they till I ſet my ſoul upon't?
Or rather . . . . why beſtow'd their gifts upon me?

However, I think that Cicero would much better have reliſhed Arnobius's diſcourſe, which doth not extenuate the miſeries of life, than that of Lactantius, which doth extenuate them. ‘ Quid ego dicemus, niſi errare illos, qui aut mortem appetunt tanquam bonum, aut vitam fugiunt tanquam malum? Niſi quod ſunt iniquiſſimi, qui pauciora mala non penſant bonis pluribus? Nam cum omnem vitam per exquiſitas, & varias traducant voluptates, mori cupiunt,

(83) A father is brought in ſpeaking to his daughter, whom the gods deſigned ſhortly to take away from him

(84) Moliere, Tragedie de Pſiché, Act. ii, Scene i.

‘ ſi quid fortè his amaritudinis ſupervenerit: & ſic habent, tanquam illis numquam fuerit benè, ſi aliquando fuerit male. Damnant igitur vitam omnem, plenamque nihil aliud, quàm malis opinantur. Hinc nata eſt inepta illa ſententia, hanc eſſe mortem, quam nos vitam putemus, illam vitam, quam nos pro morte timeamus. Ita primum bonum eſſe non naſci, ſecundum, citius mori. Quæ ut majoris ſit authoritatis, Sileno attribuitur. Cicero in conſolatione: NON naſci (inquit) longe optimum nec in hos ſcopulos incidere vitæ: Proximum autem ſi natus ſis, quam primum mori, & tanquam ex incendio effugere fortunæ. Crediſiſſe illum vaniſſimo dicto exinde apparet, quòd adjecit aliquid de ſuo, ut ornaret (85). - - What ſhall we ſay then, but that thoſe err who either wiſh for death as a good, or decline life as an evil? But that they are moſt unjuſt, who do not weigh the greater good againſt the leſſer evil? For tho' they ſpend their whole life in variety of exquiſite pleaſures, yet if any thing diſagreeable happens to them, they deſire to die: and, they behave, as if it had never been well with them, when any thing happens to fall out ill. They therefore condemn all life, and think it only full of evil. Hence that fooliſh ſaying, that what we eſteem life is death, and what we dread as death is life. And alſo, that not to be born is the chief good, and the next to that is to die ſoon. Which ſaying, that it may be of greater weight, is aſcribed to Silenus. Cicero, in his book de Conſolatione, ſays, it is the greateſt degree of happineſs never to be born, nor to fall upon theſe rocks of life; and the next to that, if one is born, to die very ſoon, and to eſcape out of the fire of fortune. It is evident he believed that moſt ridiculous ſaying, becauſe he added ſomething of his own by way of embelliſhment.’ By this we ſee that Cicero, in his book de Conſolatione, put a great value on this ſentence of Silenus: The higheſt pitch of happineſs, is never to be born; and next to that, to eſcape very quickly out of this life as out of an houſe on fire.

He mentions this ſentence in one of his books which are ſtill extant, and adds ſome verſes, which import, that we ought to mourn at the birth, and rejoice at the death of men. ‘ Fertur etiam de Sileno fabella quædam: qui cùm à Mida captus eſſet, hoc ei muneris pro ſua miſſione dediſſe ſcribitur: Docuiſſe regem, NON NASCI HOMINI LONGE optimum eſſe: Proximum autem, quam primùm mori: Qua eſt ſententia in Creſphonte uſus Euripides.

Nam nos decebat cœtus celebrantis domum,
Lugere, ubi eſſet aliquis in lucem editus,
Humanæ vitæ varia reputantis mala:
At, qui labores morte finiſſet gravis,
Hunc omneis amicos laude & lætitia exequi (86).

‘ There goes a ſtory of Silenus, that when he was taken priſoner by King Midas, he gave him, by way of recompence for his liberty, the following ſentence, That it was the greateſt bleſſing NEVER TO BE BORN, and the next to that, to die ſoon. Which ſaying Euripides made uſe of in his Creſphontes.

We at the birth of man ſhould mourn,
For many woes his life attend;
But at his death we ſhould rejoice,
Becauſe to them it puts end.

Plutarch has the original Greek of theſe verſes (87).

Lactantius ſuppoſes one thing which Cicero would have denied him: That the good things of this life ſurpaſs the evil. I am ſure that the diſmal ſtate to which Cicero was reduced by the loſs of Tullia, appeared to him ſuch a weighty preſſure that he would very willingly have quitted all the luſtre of his glory, to be delivered from this inſupportable anxiety. I believe alſo that he would not have returned into the world, on condition of paſſing through the various ſtates that he had gone through (88). We have already ſeen (89) what he made Cato ſay: He thought as much of himſelf. He had nevertheleſs a large ſhare of fortune's favour; his eloquence was admired; he was raiſed to the firſt dignities of the Republic; he acquired a glorious reputation: but, if I am not miſtaken, he would have ſwore that all the pleaſures of his life, weighed againſt the pain and uneaſineſs which he had endured, or did then feel, would not have been as an ounce to a pound. I ſhall elſewhere (90) touch on this diſpute: whether the good things of this life ſurmount the evil. Authors are divided on this ſubject, ſome declare for the affirmative, others for the negative.

(85) Lactant. ubi ſupra, lib. iii, cap. xviii, pag. 198.

(86) Cicero, Tuſcul. I, ſub. fin. fol. m. 253, verſo. See the remark [D] of the article XENOPHANES, towards the end.

(87) Plut. de audiend. Poëtis, ſub fin. pag. 36.

(88) Compare with this what ſhall be ſaid in the remark [F], of the article VAYER.

(89) In the remark [R] of the article PORCIUS.

(90) In the article XENOPHANES, remark [D]. See the article PERICLES,

TUPPIUS (LAURENCE) a Civilian, was born in Pomerania, and lived in the XVIth century. He tranſlated into Latin a German book, which the princes of the Augſburg confeſſion cauſed to be written, to juſtify them for not ſubmitting to the council of Trent [A]. The epiſtle dedicatory to this Latin verſion is dated from Straſbourg the 31ſt

[A] A German book which the princes of the Augſbourg confeſſion cauſed to be written . . . . concerning the council of Trent.] They had at firſt preſented their grievances in the aſſembly of Naumbourg, when Pope Pius IV, and the Emperor Ferdinand exhorted them, either to come in perſon, or ſend their deputies to the council. They afterwards laid them before the Diet of Francfort, at the time of the coronation of the ſame Emperor. That memorial contained the reaſons, for which they rejected the deciſions of the council of Trent: but, the better to ſhew the equitableneſs of thoſe reaſons, they appointed a certain number of Divines and political Counſellors to compoſe a work, wherein thoſe ſame grievances were enlarged, illuſtrated, and juſtified. You need only read the advertiſement which is on the back of the title page of Tuppius's tranſlation. ‘ Hæc Gravamina PRO DEFENSIONE SINCERÆ ET ORTHODOXÆ RELIGIONIS, propoſita primùm in Naoburgico conventu Principum; deinde repetita, atque oblata Majeſtati Cæſareæ in Imperii conventu publico, qui ob Electionem & Coronationem Inclyti Regis Rom. habitus fuit Francofurti: tandem ſummorum quorundam Imperii Ordinum mandatu & voluntate, à delictis ad hoc Eccleſiarum ſuarum Doctoribus, & Conſiliariis politicis, uberiore explicatione ſingulorum Capitum, ex ſacrarum litterarum teſtimoniis, Patrum ſcriptis, Theologorum ſcholaſticorum Commentariis, ac Canonum interpretibus, aliiſque ſcriptoribus compluribus; ad eum uſum jampridem diligentia ſingulari collectis, illuſtrata ſunt: & hoc ſcripto, quod ad poſteritatem de horum Ordinum erga Religionem & Rempublicam ſtudio extet, comprehenſa. - - - - Theſe grievances, IN DEFENCE OF THE PURE AND ORTHODOX RELIGION, were firſt laid before the aſſembly of the Princes at Naumbourg, and afterwards preſented to his Imperial Majeſty by the Diet of the empire, held at Francfort for the election and coronation of the illuſtrious King of the Romans; and at laſt by the order and command of ſome of the chief Princes of the empire, are illuſtrated by certain Divines of their own churches, and by political counſellors, appointed for that purpoſe; each head being more fully explained from the teſtimonies of holy Scripture, the writings of the Fathers, the commentaries of ſchool Divines, and interpreters of the canons, and ſeveral other writers, which have been very carefully collected to that end: and contained in this work, to be a monument to poſterity, of the love thoſe Princes have to Religion and the Republic.’ The title of the book is this: ‘ Concilii Tridentini reſtitutioni ſeu continuationi à Pio IV Pontifice anno 1562, indictæ, decretiſque tunc editis, oppoſita Gravamina: quibus & cauſæ neceſſariæ & graviſſimæ exponuntur, quare Electores, Principes, Ordines Imperii, Auguſtanam Confeſſionem amplexi, Concilium illud neque agnoſcere neque adire voluerint. - - - Grievances oppoſed to the continuation of the council of Trent, appointed by Pope Pius IV in the year 1562, and to the decrees then paſſed: wherein are explained the neceſſary and important cauſes, why the Electors, Princes, and States of the empire, embracing the Auſbourg confeſſion, would neither acknowledge nor go to that council.’ We have ſeen above (1) a citation from this work: it relates

(1) In the paſſage of Mr Heidegger (who had, or might have, copied Berneggerus) recited in remark [H], of the article LEO X.

31ſt of March 1565. The work was reprinted in the year 1597 in 8vo.

lates to the Atheiſm of Leo X: but it is ſomewhat ſtrange that no authority is quoted on that head, and that in a book of this nature facts ſhould be advanced which are only known by uncertain reports. However, the work in general is not to be cenſured for want of quotations. It contains a great number of them, and they are very good in themſelves: tho' indeed they are to be found in a great many other books. The obſervations on the tax of the Apoſtolic Chancery have not been ſpared (2), which are concluded with a long detail of the articles of that tax. That detail might paſs for an edition of Taxa Sacræ Pœnitentiariæ: and Hunnius looked upon it as ſuch, when he inſerted it in the Preface to his book de Indulgentiis, printed at Francfort in the year 1599, in 8vo: but obſerve, that as to the form, and even as to divers points of the matter, this edition is different from ſeveral others I have ſeen, and which I have mentioned elſewhere (3). I had conjectured (4), that du Pinet had followed the edition inſerted in the book of the Proteſtant Princes of Germany; which conjecture is very well founded, as I have ſince verified.

(2) See pag. 79, and 89, of the edition of 1597.

(3) In the remark [B] of the article BANCK, and in the remark [B] of the article PINET.

(4) See remark [B], of the article BANCK.

TURLUPINS, A ſect of impudent and ſcandalous heretics of the XIVth century, who taught that when man was arrived at a certain degree of perfection, he was freed from the yoke of the divine law: and contrary to the doctrine of the Stoics, who made the liberty of their wiſe man conſiſt in being free from paſſions, they placed this liberty in being no longer ſubject to the precepts of eternal wiſdom. They did not believe they ought to pray to God any otherwiſe than mentally; but what was yet more ſhocking in their ſect, was that they went naked [A], and according to the example of the Cynics, or rather of brutes, they performed the work of the fleſh at noon-day, in view of all the world (a). They pretended that we ought not to be aſhamed of any part which nature has beſtowed on us. Notwithſtanding theſe profane extravagancies they affected a very ſpiritual and devout air, the better to inſinuate themſelves into the womens favour, and allure them into the ſnare of their unchaſte deſires (b). For this is the rock of all thoſe ſects who aim at diſtinguiſhing themſelves by paradoxes in morality: examine to the bottom the viſions of the pretenders to new light, and of the Quietiſts, &c, you will find if any thing can unmaſk them, it is ſomewhat relating to venereal pleaſure; this is the weak part of the place, where the enemy makes the aſſault; it is a worm which never dies, and a fire which never goes out. Theſe Heretics appeared in France, in the reign of Charles V (c). They chiefly appeared in Savoy and Dauphiné. Great care was taken to purge the world of them [B]. It is not eaſy to diſcover the true cauſe of their name. Vignier (d) derives it from their living in places expoſed to the wolves. They affected to call themſelves the FRATERNITY OF THE POOR, as du Tillet (e) and Gaguin (f) have obſerved.

(a) Cynicorum Philoſophorum more omnia verenda publicitus nudata geſtabant, & in publico velut jumenta coïbant, inſtar canum in nuditate & exercitio membrorum pudendorum degentes. Gerſon, apud Prateolum.

(b) Gerſon, apud eundem.

(c) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronologie, Tom. iii, pag. m. 227, Dutch Edit.

(d) Ad ann. 1159.

(e) Chronique des Rois de France, ſous Charles V.

(f) In the Life of Charles V.

[A] They went naked.] We cannot ſufficiently wonder that ſuch a whimſical fancy ſhould be ſo often renewed amongſt Chriſtians. Paganiſm affords us only the ſect of Cynics, who fell into this impudent practice; and it muſt alſo be obſerved that this ſect was not numerous, and that the greateſt part of the Cynics did not diſcover their nudity, or do what is conſequent upon it, as it was ſaid of Diogenes. The Indian Gymnoſophiſts were not naked in thoſe parts which the Adamites, Turlupins, Picards, and ſeveral Anabaptiſts diſcovered. We ought then to grant, that in that reſpect the Chriſtians have been more irregular than the Pagans. We ſhall not be ſurprized at this, when we obſerve that a goſpel principle, of which the Pagans were ignorant, is liable to this abuſe: I mean, that the ſecond Adam came to repair the evil which the firſt had introduced into the world. From hence a Fanatic ventures to conclude, that thoſe who are once partakers of the benefits of the covenant of grace, are perfectly reſtored to the ſtate of Adam and Eve. I own that Fanaticiſm muſt be carried to an high pitch, and the doſe muſt be very large, which is able to overcome the impreſſions of modeſty which nature and a Chriſtian education have ſtamped on us; but what is not the infinite combination of our paſſions, imaginations, animal ſpirits, &c. capable of doing? I have, in another place (1), ſpoken of ſome antient Anchorets, who ſcrupled to ſee their own nudity. The Pagans afford us no ſuch example that I know of; they were only very careful of hiding it from the eyes of others. This was obſerved not only amongſt the women (2), but alſo amongſt ſome very debauched men (3). And therefore Petronius did not ſtretch too far when he ſaid, 'Quam ne ad cognitionem quidem admittere ſeverioris notæ homines ſolent. - - - - 'To which knowledge they do not admit men even of a grave diſpoſition.'

[B] Great care was taken to purge the world of them.] The following words afford us a ſpecimen of that diligence (4): To Brother James de More, of the Preaching Order, Inquiſitor of the Sodomites in the province of France, as a gift beſtowed on him by the King's Letters-Patents, the ſecond of February 1373, for and in compenſation of ſeveral pains, miſſions, and expences which he had been at, ſuffered and ſuſtained in purſuit of the male and female Turlupins, whom he found and took in the ſaid province, and who, by his diligence, have been puniſhed for their errors and falſities, the ſum of fifty francs, which are worth ten Paris livres. Gaguin obſerves, in his Life of Charles V, that the books and cloaths of the Turlupins were burnt in the hog-market at Paris, without the gate of St Honoré; that Joan Dabentonne, and another perſon with her, being the chief preachers of that ſect, were alſo burnt; but the latter, ſays he, whom I do not name, dying in priſon, before ſentence, his corpſe was kept fifteen days in a heap of lime, to keep it from putrifying, after which it was burnt at the time appointed for execution. Du Tillet ſays alſo, that under Charles V, the ſuperſtitious religion of the Turlupins, who had called their ſect the Fraternity of the poor, was condemned and aboliſhed, and their ceremonies, books, and cloaths, condemned and burnt. But how do theſe cloaths which were burnt agree with the report of thoſe, who tell us that they went naked? We muſt ſuppoſe the nakedneſs of all theſe ſorts of Fanatics to have been limited with regard to times, or places, or with regard to certain members. We have ſeen that the Adamites did not ſtrip themſelves any where but in the ſtoves where they met, and that the Picards condemned above all, thoſe who did not ſhew their privy-parts. The cold and rain would not permit them to go always naked: it is not at all probable that they durſt regularly and continually appear naked in thoſe cities in which they were not the moſt powerful; and it ſeems that the Turlupins in particular diſcovered only the parts which diſtinguiſh the ſexes. 'Turelupini Cynicorum ſectam ſuſcitantes de nuditate 'PUDENDORUM, & publico coïtu (5). - - - 'The Turlupins revived the ſect of the Cynics as to the nakedneſs of the privy-parts, and coition in public.' My citations out of Gerſon amounts to the ſame thing. Therefore they had cloaths notwithſtanding their impudence; and probably before perſons not yet initiated, or thoſe godly women whom they intended to draw into their nets, they did not immediately ſhew their privy-parts.

(1) In the remark [F], of the article ADAMITES.

(2) See the article OLYMPIAS, remark [I].

(3) See the ſame article, ibid.

(4) Ex computo Nicolai Mauregart, Burgenſis Pariſienſis de Auxiliis Præpoſituræ Pariſienſ. an. 1374, apud Du Cange Gloſſar. voce Turlupini.

(5) Genebrard Chronic.

TURPIN, a fabulous Hiſtorian of the actions of Charlemagne and of Roland. No body at preſent takes him for Turpin, promoted to the archbiſhopric of Rheims by Charlemagne, nor gives any credit to his relations; but ſome believe him to be near as antient as that Archbiſhop [A]. Others rather incline to fix him in the XIIth century [B]. If it were true that ſome Popes or Councils declared his book authentic [C], it would be a clear proof of a groſs ignorance, or of an egregious impoſture.

Mr Allard

[A] Some believe him to be near as antient as that Archbiſhop.] Papyrius Maſſo places him a little after the reign of Charles the Bald; but ſpeaks of him as of a wretched author, who miſpent his leiſure hours in compoſing a romance for the uſe of children. See the following remark.

We find a curious obſervation in Mr Catel. This author having mentioned ſome lies of Tilpin or Turpin, Archbiſhop of Rheims, adds: ‘ Theſe fables written by Tilpin are very antient; for this book is to be ſeen in manuſcript in a very antique letter, and in old French, in ſeveral libraries: they are followed by many old authors, as by Matthew Paris, who wrote the Hiſtory of England; Dante, an antient Italian Poet; Chalcondylas, in his Hiſtory of the Turks; Petrus Venetus, in his catalogue of Saints, who wrote the life of Roland, and others, which he partly extracted from the ſaid Tilpin, and Godfrey of Viterbo, in his Hiſtory called Pantheon, who improving thoſe fables, relates how Charlemagne went to Jeruſalem to viſit the holy places, where the myſteries of our redemption were accompliſhed. But moſt of what theſe Hiſtorians have written is fabulous, for Tilpin himſelf, in the Preface of his Hiſtory inſcribed to Leopard, Dean of Aix-la-Chapelle, ſaith, 'that Charlemagne's Spaniſh wars are not mentioned in the antient chronicles of St Denys, of which he might be very well informed, being a Monk of the Order of St Denys. And beſides, it is very hard to believe that Archbiſhop Tilpin ſhould be the author of this romance, which contains the Hiſtory of Charlemagne, in which the death of that Prince is mentioned, which happened in the year 814, and yet Tilpin died in 813, as Trithemius with a great deal of probability obſerves; for Uvulpſarius, who ſucceeded him in his biſhopric, held a council in 814, as Flodoard in the third book of his Hiſtory of Rheims informs us (1).’

[B] Others rather incline to fix him in the XIIth century.] Oihenart wonders that Papyrius Maſſo ſhould place him much higher. ‘ Hanc (de rebus Caroli Magni prodigioſam Hiſtoriam) neſcio quo argumento, Papyrius Maſſonus (etſi authorem imperitiæ & mendacii damnet) è vetuſtate commendat. Dum, non multò poſt Caroli Calvi imperium, ab homine otioſo in juventutis gratiam ſcriptam fuiſſe videri pronunciat (2). - - - Papyrius Maſſo recommends this wonderful hiſtory of the actions of Charlemagne, on account of it's antiquity, but upon what authority I know not; tho' at the ſame time he accuſes the author of ignorance and lying. For, he ſays, it ſeems to have been written not long after the reign of Charles the Bald, by one that miſpent his time, for the uſe of children.’ Here is the reaſon which induced Ohienart to believe that Turpin lived in the XIIth century, and was a Spaniard. Mr des Cordes, Canon of Limoges, had lent him a manuſcript of this hiſtory, to which was prefixed a preface, written by a Prior a little before the year 1200 (3). This preface imports, that the Prior had lately recovered that manuſcript, which was brought him out of Spain, and which he took for Archbiſhop Turpin's hiſtory, to whoſe interceſſion he devoutly recommends himſelf. I believe his own words may not be unacceptable here: ‘ Gaufredus Prior Voſienſis, ſacro Martialis conventui & univerſo Clero Lemovicini climatis gaudiis ſempiternis perfuri. Egregios invicti Regis Caroli triumphos ac præcelſi Comitis Rotholandi prædicandos agones in Iſpania geſtos nuper ad nos ex Eſperiâ delatos gratanter excepi & ingenti ſtudio corrigens ſcribere feci, maximè quod apud nos iſta latuerant hactenus, niſi quæ joculatores in ſuis præferebant cantilenis. Quia verò ſcriptura ipſa Scriptorum vitio depravata ac pene deleta fuerat non ſine magno ſtudio decorando correxi, non ſuperflua ſubtrahens, ſed quæ neceſſaria aderant, addens, ne quis me putet reprehendere inclitæ laudis Turpinum qui ſe infraſcripta ſcripſiſſe fatetur. Ego tanti Pontificis oratibus mihi à judice pio dari veniam opto (4). - - - Gaufredus, Prior of Voville, to the convent of St Martial, and to all the Clergy of the country of Limouſin, wiſheth eternal happineſs. The glorious exploits of the invincible King Charles, and the noble feats of the excellent Count Roland, performed in Spain, were lately brought me out of that kingdom, which I received with joy, and cauſed to be tranſcribed, being firſt corrected with great care; eſpecially as thoſe things had been hitherto unknown to us, except what has been vented in ballads. But becauſe the writing was very incorrect and almoſt blotted out and defaced, through the fault of the tranſcribers, the correcting coſt me a great deal of trouble: I did not throw out ſuperfluities, but added what was neceſſary, leſt I ſhould be thought to find fault with the renowned Turpin, who confeſſes that he wrote the following hiſtory. To the interceſſion of ſo worthy a Prelate, I recommend myſelf.’

[C] That ſome Popes or Councils declared his book authentic.] Voſſius having obſerved that this hiſtory in the manuſcript of it in Bennet-college library at Cambridge, is intituled, Liber Turpini Archiepiſcopi Rhemenſis quomodo Carolus Rex Francorum adquiſivit Hiſpaniam, adds, that Pope Calixtus declared it authentic (5). He doth not ſay this on his own authority, but on the credit of Thomas James, which he ſuppoſes grounded on the title of the book, or ſome note written in the manuſcript. Hunc librum dicit Papa Calixtus eſſe authenticum, ut adjungit Thomas James: Ut puto ex MSi operis inſcriptione ſive nota ei addita (6). Voſſius did not know the foundation of James's aſſertion; he did not remember a certain place in the Faſciculus temporum. The thing is this: Mr du Pleſſis Mornai ſpeaking of ſome canons of a council held at Rheims in 1119, adds this reflexion; ‘ And obſerve by what ſpirit thoſe biſhops were influenced, who in the ſame council declared authentic the hiſtory of Charlemagne by Archbiſhop Turpin, which is moſt fabulous and ridiculous, and as ſuch condemned and exploded by Baronius himſelf (7).’ Coëffeteau anſwered him thus: He cites in the margin his trifling chronicler Faſciculus temporum, who doth not ſay one word of this ſynod; and the fraud proceeds from hence, that ſpeaking of Calixtus he ſaith, He wrote a little book of the miracles of St James: He alſo made a ſtatute concerning the hiſtory of Charles, compiled by bleſſed Turpin, Archbiſhop of Rheims. Well, reader, is it not a pretty concluſion? Calixtus made a ſtatute concerning the hiſtory of Charles, written by the Archbiſhop of Rheims; ergo the council of Rheims, where he preſided, declared this book authentic. Certainly they had ſomething elſe to do than amuſe themſelves with theſe fables. But after all where did his wretched chronicler find that Calixtus made this ſtatute? What likelihood is there that he ſhould ſo much as trouble himſelf with this Romance (8)? Gretſer the Jeſuit anſwering the ſame book of du Pleſſis, doth not know whether what is related concerning this authentickneſs of Turpin ought to be reckoned fabulous. Perhaps, ſaith he, we ſhould not be in the wrong to deny all this, for the acts of the council, nor the commentary of Heſſo the Scholaſtic do not mention it at all (9). The Faſciculus Temporum only hints it in an indefinite manner: ‘ Statuit etiam (Calixtus) Hiſtoriam Caroli deſcriptam à beato Turpino Remenſi Archiepiſcopo. - - - - He made a ſtatute concerning the Hiſtory of Charles, written by the bleſſed Turpin, Archbiſhop of Rheims.’ He doth not tell us the name of this ſtatute, where or when it was made: But let us grant, adds Gretſer, that Calixtus approved this book; what advantage accrues thereby to the myſtery of iniquity? This Hiſtory of Turpin is not ſo full of lies, but that the Proteſtants have publiſhed it amongſt the antient Hiſtories: ‘ At demus Calixtum Hiſtoriam Turpini ſtatuiſſe, hoc eſt, confirmaſſe, quid utilitatis inde ad Myſterium Pleſſæum redit? Quæ tam fabuloſa non eſt, ut abſterreat ipſos etiam

‘ Sectarios,

---

(1) Catel, Mémoires de l'Hiſtoire du Languedoc pag. 545.

(2) Arnoldus Oihenartus, Notitia utriuſque Vaſconiæ, pag. 397.

(3) Mihi præfatio hiſtoriæ illi, à Gaufredo Priore Voſienſi, qui paulo ante annum 1200 ſcribebat, in exemplari manuſcripto, cujus copiam fecit Joannes Cordeſius Canonicus Lemovic. præfixa, plane perſuadet hoc opus, recens tempore Gaufredi vulgatum, Hiſpani hominis illo ipſo ſæculo xii viventis, abortum eſſe. Id. ib.

(4) Apud Oihenartum, ibid.

(5) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latinis, lib. ii, cap. xxxii, pag. m. 299.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 279. He quotes Faſciculus temporum an. 1119.

(8) Coëffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 754.

(9) Neque enim in Actis quidquam hujus apparet, ut nec in Commentario Heſſonis Scholaſtici, qui res geſtas hujus Concilii ex profeſſo literis mandavit. Gretſer. in Examine Myſterii Pleſſæani. pag. 375.

Mr Allard affirms that the romance of the Archbiſhop Turpin of the year 1092, was compoſed at Vienna by a Monk of St Andrew (a).

(a) Allard, Bibl. de Dauphiné, at the end.

‘ Sectarios, quò minus eam cum aliis veterùm monumentis publicent. Teſtis Juſtus Reuberus, qui à ſuo Tomo Antiquorum Scriptorum Turpinum excludere, turpe duxit (10). - - - - But ſuppoſe Calixtus made a ſtatute, that is, confirmed the Hiſtory of Turpin, what advantage accrues from thence to the myſtery of du Pleſſis? That hiſtory is not ſo fabulous but the Sectaries publiſh it with other antient Hiſtories. Witneſs Juſtus Reuberus, who would not exclude Tupin from his volume of ancient writers’ This laſt part of the Jeſuit's anſwer is pitiful; for if it be a ſhameful thing, as it is no doubt, for a council to approve a book ſtuffed with impertinent fables, du Pleſſis's reflexion is very judicious. Beſides, is it to prove ſtrongly that a hiſtory is good, to ſay that a Huguenot or Lutheran compiler hath publiſhed it amongſt other books? Is it not ſometimes a ſufficient Reaſon for the inſerting a book in a collection that it hath ſome antiquity? And after all becauſe a man is orthodox, is he neceſſarily happy in the choice of authors, who beſt deſerve to be placed in a collection of Hiſtorians? Gretſer had done very well to have kept to his firſt anſwer: He ought to have been ſatisfied that the words of the Faſciculus temporum prove nothing. Mr Rivet is of the ſame opinion; he replies for M. du Pleſſis in the following manner (11). It is of no importance whether Calixtus confirmed this hiſtory of Turpin in a Council, or whether he did it alone by virtue of his authority. It is undeniable that the Carthuſian, who collected the Faſciculus, expreſſed himſelf thus, ſtatuit hiſtoriam Caroli, deſcriptam a B. Turpino, Rhemenſi Archiepiſcopo. Here Coëffeteau inſults du Pleſſis, after having falſely tranſlated; he made a ſtatute concerning the Hiſtory of Charles inſtead of he decreed, that is, eſtabliſhed or confirmed the Hiſtory of Charles. He may learn at his leiſure from any little Grammarian the difference betwixt Statuere Hiſtoriam and Statuere de Hiſtoria. If this Chronicler is miſtaken, if he ſaith this without mentioning any author, we are not to blame. We return to the Papiſts what they give us. For my part I am inclined to believe that he is miſtaken, and that inſtead of Calixtus's ſtatutes for the eſtabliſhment of Archbiſhop Turpin, he miſtook and thought it concerned the confirmation of Archbiſhop Turpin's hiſtory.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Réponſe au Myſtere d'iniquite, Tom. ii, pag. 238.

TURREL or TURREAU, (Peter) in Latin Turellus, a Philoſopher and Aſtrologer (a), and rector of the college of Dijon his native place (b), lived in the reigns of Lewis XII and Francis I. See what I have ſaid of him in the remarks [B] and [C] of the article CASTELLAN. I add that he is author of a ſmall book intituled The Period, that is, the end of the world, containing the diſpoſition of terreſtrial things, by the virtue and influence of the celeſtial bodies. This piece was printed at Lyons in the year 1531. There is likewiſe another book written by him, which was printed at the ſame place, and is intituled, Fatal preciſion by the ſtars and diſpoſition of the ſame on the region of Jupiter now called Burgundy for the year 1529, and for ſeveral years following (c). James Tahureau in his dialogues very much ridicules this Period or end of the world. Longolius exceedingly commends Peter Turrellus in his oration pronounced and printed at Poictiers in the year 1510, touching the praiſe of the French compared with the Romans. Peter de Saint Julien, fol. 13 and 14 of his Hiſtory of the Burgundians, ſpeaks of a Chorographical table of Burgundy, and of an Hiſtory of Burgundy written by this Turrel (d). If we will believe Paradin, this Aſtrologer had foretold to the Queen-regent the misfortune of the battle of Pavia a little before it happened (e). We muſt not miſtake him for that Turrel who wrote againſt the Franco-Gallia of Francis Hotman [A].

(a) Du Verdier Vau Privas, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 1065.

(b) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 417.

(c) Extracted from Du Verdier Vau Privas, ubi ſupra.

(d) Extracted from La Croix du Maine, ubi ſupra, pag. 515.

(e) Paradin, Hiſt. de noſtre temps, pag. m. 132.

[A] We muſt not miſtake him for that Turrel who wrote againſt the Franco-Gallia of Francis Hotman.] We have named two authors (1), who refuted this piece. Here is a third. Petri Turelli, Campani, & in ſupremo Galliarum Senatu Advocati, contra Othomanni Franco-Galliam Libellus, Pariſiis apud Michael de Roigny 1576, in 8vo. This treatiſe was dedicated to Chriſtopher Thuanus, firſt Preſident in the Parliament of Paris, and is dated the 12th of September 1575. ‘ The author proves in it, that as to kingdoms, hereditary governments are preferable to elective ones. He touches a little on the deſign of the Salique law, and the famous queſtion whether women may be called to ſucceed to the crown of France (2) ’

(1) Papyrius Maſſon, and Anthony Matharellus. See, remark [I] of the article HOTMAN.

(2) Taken from a manuſcript Memoir, communicated by Mr Lancelot.

TURRETIN (Francis), a Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Geneva his native country [A], was born on the 17th of October 1623. Having ſtudied at Geneva, Leyden, Paris, Saumur, Montauban, and Nimes with great ſucceſs, he was admitted to the holy miniſtry in 1648, and officiated at the ſame time in the French and Italian churches at Geneva. Two years after he was offered the Philoſophy profeſſorſhip, which he refuſed; but he complied with a call to the church of Lyons (a). He was recalled to Geneva at a year's end, that city wanting him for their Theological lectures, on which he entred in the year 1653. He was deputed to Holland in 1661, to requeſt a pecuniary aſſiſtance which the city of Geneva then wanted. In that journey he met with all the ſucceſs which he could promiſe himſelf, and got ſo great a reputation, that the Walloon churches of the Hague and Leyden earneſtly invited him to their miniſtry, and the univerſity at the latter of theſe places earneſtly intreated his ſtay. After his return, he re-aſſumed the exerciſe of his office, in which he continued till his death with very great application. He died the 28th of September 1687, with the moſt edifying marks of an ardent love for God (b). He was a man of a great deal of merit; he was

(a) To ſucceed Aaron Morus, brother to Mr Morus.

(b) Taken from his Funeral Oration pronounced at Geneva by Mr Pictet, the third of November 1687.

[A] At Geneva his native country.] Francis Turretin his grandfather, of an antient and noble family of Lucca, having left Italy on account of his religion, reſided ſome years at Antwerp, and had a great intimacy with the famous St Aldegonde. He afterwards went to Zurich, and at laſt fixed at Geneva, where he had a ſon named Benedict Turretin, who was an illuſtrious Profeſſor of Divinity in that city, and very well known by his writings (1): This was the father of our Francis Turretin. All which the reader may find in the funeral oration of the latter pronounced by Mr Pictet, his nephew, a very eloquent piece and worthy of its author, who is a Miniſter and Profeſſor at Geneva, and author, beſides other works, of a book intituled, Morale Chretienne, in ſeveral volumes in 12mo, and of a Theologia Chriſtiana in 8vo.

(1) He wrote among other books, Défenſe des Verſions de Geneve contre le Pere Coton. That work contains two volumes in 4to. He publiſhed alſo ſome French ſermons, intituled, Profit des chatimens. He had been miniſter of the church of Nimes, was eloquent, judicious, laborious, learned, and zealous for orthodoxy. All which appears by the books he hath publiſhed [B]. He left a ſon endowed with extraordinary parts [C].

[B] By the books he hath publiſhed.] Beſides his ſermons dedicated to the Ducheſs of Scomberg, he wrote an anſwer to a tract publiſhed by a Canon of Aneci, to expoſe the Proteſtants amongſt other topics, on that of the obedience of ſubjects to lawful princes. He alſo anſwered the Biſhop of Lucca's letter to the families of Geneva, originally deſcended from his dioceſe, to exhort them to the profeſſion of the Catholic faith which their anceſtors had abandoned. But what will chiefly immortalize him is his Inſtitutio Theologiæ Elencticæ in three volumes in 4to (2), and his theſes de Satisfactione Chriſti againſt the Socinians, and de neceſſaria ſeceſſione ab Eccleſia Romana.

[C] He left a ſon endowed with extraordinary parts.] I have cited ſomewhere (3) the learned theſes which he maintained at Leyden in 1692. The Carteſian Philoſophy, in which he was ſo perfectly inſtructed by Mr Chouët (4), does very much ſet off his great knowledge of Divinity. A Profeſſorſhip of Sacred Hiſtory in the academy of Geneva was erected on his account, which he very worthily diſcharges, as well as the office of miniſter.

(2) See the encomium beſtowed upon it in the Dutch edition, 1696. It has been abridged for the uſe of ſtudents. The name of the author of that abridgment, which was printed the ſecond time at Amſterdam, 1695, is Leonard Rijſſenius.

(3) In the article NICOLLE, citation (13).

(4) This illuſtrious profeſſor, the ornament of Geneva, his country, has been long ſince taken from his profeſſorſhip, and admitted into the government of the Republic.

TUSCUS (BALERUS) paſſed (as we are told) for the author of a book condemned by the Inquiſition in 1622, and intituled Tela Catholica contra judicia erronea, he paſſed, I ſay, for the author of this treatiſe, becauſe it was thought that the ſtile diſcovered it to be written by him (a). Friar Angel of the Purification, Hiſtoriographer of the order of the barefooted Carmelites, made uſe of this inſtance to authorize his ſuſpicion that Conrad Janningus, the Jeſuit, was the author of a letter from the Emperor to his Catholic Majeſty diſperſed in the year 1696, and alledged alſo that by this conformity of ſtile St Jerom found that John of Jeruſalem was the author of a certain letter (b). We ſhall ſee, below, his miſtake [A]. It is certain that the letter diſperſed under the Emperor's name was really written by his Imperial Majeſty.

(a) Lambert. Batavus, in Arte nautica Catholica, lib. ii, cap. ix, apud Papebroch. Elucidat. Hiſt. pag. 149.

(b) Hieron. Epiſt. xv, apud eund. ibid.

[A] We ſhall ſee, below, his miſtake.] Father Papebroch, who hath inſerted in one of his books, the complaint this Carmelite Hiſtoriographer brought before the Tribunal of the Inquiſition, ſays, that the Imperial Ambaſſador at Madrid, demanded that the author of this injurious complaint againſt the Emperor ſhould be puniſhed, and that it was reported that this Carmelite eſcaped the puniſhment only by diſowning the accuſation. Obſerve, that this accuſer attempting to prove that the letter, which he pretended to be ſuppoſititious, was Janningus's ſtile, cited, as the works of that Jeſuit, two tracts which were written by Sebaſtian de Sancto Paulo a Carmelite Monk (1). Was not this effectually to prove the conformity of ſtile? Father Papebroch adds (2) that he has not found the name of Balerus Tuſcus in any catalogue of books condemned by the Inquiſition, and ſuſpects that this Balerus having prefixed his name to a book, wherein the private regulations of the Eaſt-India company were blamed, the Dutch Miniſters cenſured him, and that the author, without naming himſelf, oppoſed that cenſure by his Tela Catholica, which were alſo condemned. He alſo conjectures that Lambertus Batavus was captain of a ſhip in the Dutch ſervice, and conſequently a Proteſtant, and that his book taught the art of ſailing in all parts of the world. At laſt he ſaith, that the moſt expert in affairs of this nature, could not hitherto diſcover any thing concerning this book at Amſterdam. Ipſo (libro) necdum reperto, licet ab ejuſdem rerum peritiſſimis Amſtelodami quæſitus ſit (3). I never met with any perſon who had heard of this book, nor have I found the title of it in any catalogue.

(1) Daniel Papebrochius, Elucidat. Hiſtorica actorum in Controverſia Carmelitica, pag. 150. See alſo the firſt part of his anſwer, Art. xi, num. 240, 241.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 153.

(3) Id. ibid.

V.

VAYER (Francis de la Mothe le) a Pariſian, Counſellor of State in ordinary, and Preceptor to the Duke of Anjou, only brother of King Lewis XIV, was a very learned man. He was admitted into the French Academy on the 14th of February 1639 [A]. He had more reading and learning than the greateſt part of that ſociety, but moſt of them wrote more elegantly than he: for his ſtile was not very polite; and though he had made leſs uſe of his memory and of his reading of the Latin authors than he did, he would yet have come far ſhort of perfection in language. He was a man of a regular conduct, very like that of the antient ſages: a true philoſopher in his manners, who deſpiſed even lawful pleaſures, and was paſſionately fond of a ſtudious life, and of reading and compoſing of books. This regularity, auſterity, and wiſdom, did not prevent his being ſuſpected of having no religion [B]. It is likely that this ſuſpicion was grounded on ſome dialogues which he wrote, and which appeared under the name of Oraſius Tubero (a), and on his diſcovering generally in his works too great a prepoſſeſſion in favour of Scepticiſm or the Pyrrhonian principles. It is certain there is a great deal of looſeneſs in the dialogues of Oraſius Tubero; but he that ſhould conclude from thence that the author had no religion, would render himſelf guilty of a very raſh judgment: for there is a vaſt difference betwixt writing freely what may be objected againſt faith, and believing it to be really true. Several people believe that theſe dialogues hindered his preferment to the place (deſigned for him) of preceptor to his majeſty [C]. This is not very probable, ſince if the Queen or Cardinal Mazarin had been affected by this reaſon, they would not have intruſted the king's

(a) Thoſe names, and thoſe of Tubertus Ocella, under which he diſguiſed himſelf upon ſome occaſions, allude to the ſignification of la Mothe le Vayer, or Voyer.

[A] He was admitted into the French Academy the 14th of February 1639.] Mr Eſprit and he were admitted into it on the ſame day (1). Mr Balzac writ on this ſubject to his friend Mr Chapelain thus: *I rejoice at the Academy's new acquiſition of the Philoſopher * * * , who indeed is a fine gentleman, and doth not want wit, tho' he for the moſt part makes uſe of that of others (2). I obſerve here by the way, that Moreri, when he ſaith that la Mothe le Vayer was one of the firſt admitted into the French Academy, is miſtaken. For that cannot be ſaid of a man elected in the place of a dead Academic (3).

[B] He was ſuſpected of having no religion.] Patin ſhall be my voucher. 'Mr de la Mothe le Vayer was lately called to court, and made Preceptor to the Duke of Anjou, the King's brother. He is about ſixty years old, of a middle ſtature, as much a Stoic as any man in world; he is one who would be praiſed himſelf but never praiſes any body, fantaſtical and capricious, ſuſpected to be guilty of that ſort of wit with which Diagoras and Protagoras were tainted (4).' Patin wrote this letter the 13th of July 1649.

[C] Several people believe that theſe dialogues hindered his preferment to the place (deſigned for him) of preceptor to his majeſty.] The learned Naudé informs me of ſome things which contradict that opinion. He tells us: 'I have alſo been always perſwaded, that the choice of men was one of the moſt difficult things at court. But I was throughly convinced of it when the queſtion was put who ſhould be preceptor to the king; for the intention of the queen and the miniſters being to commit that charge to one of the ableſt, moſt famous, and eſteemed, perſons in France, they firſt caſt their eyes on Mr de la Motte le Vayer, as on him whom Cardinal Richelieu had deſigned for that poſt, induced thereto, as well by the excellent book which he had written concerning the education of the Dauphin, as on account of the reputation he had acquired by his many other writings of being the French Plutarch. But the queen having reſolved not to beſtow that place on a married man, they were neceſſarily obliged to think of another; who was Mr Aubert, Abbot of St Remy, principal of the College of Laon, Canon of that city, and Regius Profeſſor of the Greek tongue, of whoſe polite manners, probity, learning, and facility of expreſſing himſelf with accuracy in Latin and French, no man can doubt modo caput habeat extra cucurbitum, who is not a blockhead. But neither he, nor Mr Gaſſendi, the only oracle in our age of Philoſophy, Mathematics, and Aſtronomy, and of whatever is excellent in the moſt ſublime ſciences; nor alſo Mr Rigaud, tho' the Coriphæus of our Humaniſts, and of a capacity univerſally known to extend to all other ſciences, after having been put to the trial without knowing any thing of it, did ſtand it ſo well as the Abbot de Beaumont, Doctor of Divinity, and at preſent the worthy Biſhop of Rodez, who was alſo preferred to another of the brighteſt ornaments of the Clergy, becauſe not being inferior to any of the preceding, he had ſome other qualities, which turned the balance on his ſide (5).' The reaſon which I have advanced (6) againſt thoſe who pretend that the dialogues of Oraſius Tubero were the occaſion of our le Vayer's being excluded from this charge, ſeems to me demonſtrative; for tho' it is uſual to take a greater care of a young king's education, than of his brother's, yet they would never give a preceptor to a king's brother, whom they would not have intruſted with the king's education, for fear the preceptor ſhould infect him with impious principles. If there had been no other reaſon, la Mothe le Vayer had been choſen preceptor to Lewis XIV, notwithſtanding his dialogues, as well as to the Duke of Anjou: For ſince it was judged that ſo wiſe a man would carefully avoid inſtilling the Libertiniſm of Oraſius Tubero into the young duke, it was more reaſonable to conclude that he never durſt preſume to inſpire it into the young monarch. Cardinal Mazarin was too well acquainted with mankind not to know that a Philoſopher, who, by I know not what train of arguments, is led to Pyrrhoniſm in religion, is a man of a quite different character from a man who becomes impious out of brutality and debauchery. Such a Philoſopher, in all particulars like la Mothe le Vayer, would be very uneaſy, that perſons liable to make an ill uſe of his opinions ſhould ever imbibe them (7).

(1) Pelliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Acad. Françoiſe, pag. m. 228.

(2) Balzac's firſt letter of the ivth book to Chapelain, pag. 149, 150, Dutch Edit, 1661. That letter is dated the fourth of January 1639.

(3) See Pelliſſon, ubi ſupra.

(4) Patin, Letter xxii, pag. 97, 98, of Vol. i.

(5) Naudé Dialogue de Maſcurat, pag. 375.

(6) In the text of this article.

(7) Compare with this the remark [F] of the article DES BARREAUX.

king's only brother to his care. The world was ſurpriſed that ſo wiſe a man ſhould write ſo very freely on obſcene ſubjects [D], but they were equitable enough at the ſame time not to draw any concluſion from thence to the prejudice of his morals: ſo true it is that

He would always be ſo diſcreet as to keep them from youth, and much more from a prince whoſe ſolid piety may extremely contribute to the public happineſs.

What Moreri ſays that la Mothe le Vayer was Preceptor to his majeſty for the ſpace of one year, is affirmed by Mr Pelliſſon (7*). And we find in another writer (7) that la Mothe le Vayer began to exerciſe that function in May 1652, and that he was choſen by the Queen-mother herſelf being already Preceptor to the King's brother. Though Mr Pelliſſon mentions only one year, it cannot be inferred from thence, that this function laſted no longer. We can only infer from it that it had laſted but one year, when he ſpoke of it, that is, when he publiſhed his Hiſtory of the French Academy in 1653. However it be, this confirms what I have ſaid againſt thoſe, who believed that la Mothe le Vayer was excluded from that place on account of the dialogues of Oraſius Tubero.

[D] He wrote very freely on obſcene ſubjects.] There are ſome very wanton thoughts, and very ſmutty expreſſions in the dialogues of Oraſius Tubero: but perhaps they are nothing if compared with the third (8) and fourth (9) days of the Hexameron ruſtique. His other books contain nothing like this, though in certain places by way of quotation or otherwiſe he expreſſes himſelf ſomewhat cynically. He ſeems to have apologized for himſelf two ways. I. By making it appear (10) that Seneca, Dion Chryſoſtome, and St Auguſtin have inſerted in their works ſome things ſo obſcene and ſo filthy, that there is ſcarce any body but is offended at it; and yet the firſt is acknowledged the moſt auſtere moraliſt of the Romans, the ſecond . . . . the wonder of his age, and the third for one of the chief Doctors of the Church (11). II. By eſtabliſhing as a maxim (12), That a man's books are no evidence of his inclinations, and that it is impoſſible to form a right judgment of the morals of any man by his writings. Let us ſee what he offers in confirmation of this maxim (13), If we are obliged to condemn all thoſe authors who have choſen very obſcene ſubjects for their theme, not only Auſonius's Cento, and the Hendecaſyllabic verſes of Pliny the younger, would defame them to perpetuity; but Plato himſelf and Xenophon, would be put to a great deal of trouble to excuſe the liberty which they have allowed themſelves in their compoſitions. We might further add, that generally this would occaſion the moſt extravagant judgments in the world on all authors.

Accius eſſet atrox, conviva Terentius eſſet,
Eſſent pugnaces, qui fera bella canunt †.

Terence a glutton, Accius would be fierce,
And ſoldiers thoſe, who bloody wars rehearſe.

The falſhood of this way of arguing formerly influenced Timæus to aſſert ‡ that Homer and Ariſtotle were great gluttons, the laſt having frequently treated of the ſeaſoning of eatables, and the firſt frequently uſed the word διαιτρεύειν, which implies to diſtribute meats. And if ſuch conſequences are juſt, as Virgil muſt of neceſſity paſs for a ſoldier, and Dioſcorides for an infamous poiſoner; ſo the pious meditations of Aretin will prove his ſanctity, and the fine ſentences of Seneca concerning poverty will make us believe him neceſſitous, notwithſtanding the ſeven millions of gold in caſh, and the eight hundred thouſand livres annual eſtate which he is ſaid to have enjoyed (14).

Reflexions on the conſequences that may be drawn from a man's writings to his morals.

La Mothe le Vayer's maxim generally conſidered is very true: the judgment to be paſſed on a man's morals from his writings would be falſe on a thouſand occaſions. Salluſt is an example which may be added to the former. What he ſays, 'againſt the corruption and diſorders of his age could not be better expreſſed by any other; but he ſhould have left that to Cato, or to ſome other perſons of a rigid virtue, who were zealous for the antient diſcipline: and in my opinion a declamation againſt luxury and leudneſs is not leſs incongruous in the Hiſtory of Salluſt, who was reprimanded for debauchery by the Cenſor in a full ſenate, and twice accuſed of adultery before the Prætor (15), than an invective againſt the ambition of ruling would be in Cæſar's Commentaries (16).' See how Cicero rallies Clodius's oration againſt the negligence of the Romans in their divine ſervice (17). The world hath always been, and is at preſent full of perſons who declaim againſt vice, and are themſelves very immoral; who are grave and ſevere in their books, and very looſe in their conduct. We ſhould therefore be finely deceived, if we judged of their morals by their writings. But may we juſtly ſay by the rule of contraries, that there are ſome perſons whoſe morals are ſtricter than their writings? Yes, I believe we may: but it more rarely happens that an author allows himſelf a large liberty in his writings, and but a little in his manners, than that he indulges himſelf with a large ſcope in his manners, and takes but a very little freedom in his books. The reaſon of this difference is very obvious; for he that can perform the moſt, can alſo perform the leaſt, but he who is capable of performing the leaſt cannot perform the moſt. What is more eaſy than to declaim in verſe or proſe againſt the irregularities of the age, and what is more difficult than to avoid ſharing ſome part of them? A wiſe man therefore doth the hardeſt taſk; it is not then very difficult for him to inſtruct by the productions of his pen, for this is infinitely eaſier than that. But it doth not follow that a man who can write very edifying and religious books, clean and free from all immorality, can live as regular. This is infinitely harder than the other.

To come more directly to the point. Catullus and Ovid, whoſe verſes were ſo impure, lived as they wrote. Their debaucheries with women were exceſſive. The ſame may be affirmed of the French Poets who compoſed the Parnaſſe Satyrique, and of ſeveral Italian Poets whoſe Poems are very filthy. And this ſentence is very true.

Raro moribus exprimit Catonem
Quiſquis verſibus exprimit Catullum.

Cato's life he rarely follows,
Who in verſe writes like Catullus.

But by allowing all this we do not thereby ruin la Mothe le Vayer's apology; for there is a vaſt difference betwixt theſe two things: 1. The relating debaucheries committed by ones ſelf, praiſing, and applauding them, and exhorting the readers to an imitation: and, 2. the relating gallant adventures in terms a little too briſk and natural, enlivening the recital, though one condemns or diſapproves thoſe actions; and diſcuſſing a point of doctrine (18), or a mythological reflexion by phraſes which repreſent impurities. The firſt of theſe is utterly inexcuſable, and infamous, and ought to be ſeverely puniſhed. But the ſecond is perhaps only a piece of wit, and naturally affords no reaſon to make any inferences prejudicial to the author's morals. It is this that ſaves le Vayer.

I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that we ought not univerſally to condemn all thoſe Poets as unchaſte in their lives whoſe verſes are immodeſt. Catullus doth not deſerve to be comprehended in the apology which he made for them: he too much exceeds all bounds in moſt of his Poems, and even in the very epigram in which he pretends to juſtify himſelf. There is enough in it to condemn him.

Pædicabo ego vos, & inrumabo
Aureli pathice, & cinæde Furi;
Qui me ex verſiculis meis putatis
Quod ſint molliculi, parum pudicum,
Nam caſtum eſſe decet pium poëtam
Ipſum. Verſiculos nihil neceſſe eſt:
Qui tum denique habent ſalem, ac leporem,
Si ſunt molliculi, ac parum pudici,
Et quod pruriat incitare poſſunt.
Non dico pueris, ſed his piloſis,
Qui duros nequeunt movere lumbos (19).

(7*) Pelliſſon, Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. m. 352.

(7) Pierre de Saint Romuald, in Continuatione Chronici Ademari, pag. 534, 535.

(8) Wherein he treats of the privy-parts of men and women.

(9) He tells us there, that by the Nymphs cave, Homer meant the privy-parts of Penelope.

(10) Hexameron Ruſtique, pag. 43, & ſeq. Compare with this, what is ſaid in the article SANCHEZ, (THOMAS), remark [C].

(11) Ibid. pag. 42.

(12) Ibid. pag. 41.

(13) Ibid. pag. 99.

† Ovid. 1 Triſt.

‡ Ex Pol. in Exc. Conſt.

(14) See in Meibomius, in Vita Mæcenatis, cap. xxii, pag. 132, 133, a collection of ſeveral paſſages relating to the oppoſition between Seneca's morals and his writings.

(15) Compare with this, citation (13) of the article METELLA.

(16) Father le Moine, Diſcours de l'Hiſtoire, pag. 185.

(17) Cicero, in Orat. de Haruſpicum reſponſis.

(18) See in the article LUCRETIUS, remark [G], what has been ſaid in his vindication.

(19) Catullus, Epig. xvi.

that the publick is not always raſh, blind, and unjuſt in their judgments! this ſubject affords a favourable opportunity of anſwering a queſtion, lately propoſed to a learned Journaliſt,

Aurelius, thou Catamite
And Furius, thou Sodomite,
I'll —— you, for that you ſay
I am immodeſt and too gay,
Becauſe my verſe is delicate,
Soft, tender, and effeminate.
The Poet ſhould himſelf be pure,
Not ſo his verſes, to be ſure.
Thoſe only pleaſant are and witty
Which are ſoft and ſomewhat ſmutty,
And into people can inſpire
A ſtrong libidinous deſire.
Not boys but men I write to pleaſe
Who cannot move their loins with eaſe.

Ovid, Martial, and ſeveral others ought likewiſe to be excluded the benefit of this juſtification, though they proteſt their innocence, and the purity of their lives in the midſt of all the impurities of their Muſe (20). Beroaldus hath in vain endeavoured to excuſe them, and made himſelf ridiculous when he ſaid that if thoſe books ought to be condemned which contain criminal gallantries; the canonical ſcriptures ought to be treated in like manner: ‘ Si ſcripta omnia quibus amores, ‘ res amatoriæ continentur ſunt cum ſuis ſcriptoribus ‘ repudienda, repudientur Canonicæ ſcripturæ, hoc ‘ eſt inſtrumenti veteris luculenta illa volumina, quibus nihil ſacratius, nihil religioſius, nihil myſticum ‘ magis æſtimatur (21). - - - - If all writings wherein ‘ amours and gallantries are contained, ought to be condemned, then the holy ſcriptures ſhould alſo be rejected, ‘ that is thoſe writings of the Old Teſtament, than which ‘ nothing is reckoned more ſacred, religious, or myſtical.’ This is wretched arguing, and doth not at all affect the reaſon for which theſe Poets are condemned (22). But if the aforementioned do not deſerve the benefit I ſpeak of, there are yet ſeveral who deſerve to be included in it. Their laſcivious Poems were only flights of wit: the contagion of theſe impure ideas did not infect their minds: they made thoſe verſes to diſplay their ingenious thoughts; they could not reſiſt the temptation of expreſſing themſelves in ſuch a manner as would make their genius applauded: they were willing to accommodate themſelves to the taſte of a vaſt number of readers, who find in it an agreeable tartneſs, and charms with which they are raviſhed. They had indeed done very well to have reſiſted this temptation, ‘ Tanti non erat eſſe te diſertum. - - - It was not of ſo great concern to be ‘ thought witty.’ But they were only words; their morals preſerved their integrity, and what an emperor ſaid of Voconius is applicable to them,

Laſcivus verſu, mente pudicus erat (23).

In verſe laſcivious, but in heart was chaſt.

This he would never have ventured to ſay, adds Apuleius, if too licentious verſes were a proof of laſciviouſneſs (24). Auſonius having occaſion to prevent the ſuſpicions which might be formed againſt his wiſdom on account of his cento nuptialis, alledges ſeveral perſons irreproachable in their conduct, who had taken great liberties in their verſe (25): ‘ Sed quum legeris, ‘ adeſto mihi, adverſum eos, qui ut Juvenalis ait, Curios ſimulant, & Bacchanalia vivunt, ne forte mores ‘ meos ſpectent, de carmine.

Laſciva eſt nobis pagina, vita proba:

‘ Ut Plinius dicit. Meminerint autem, quippe eruditi, probatiſſimo viro Plinio in poëmatis laſciviam, ‘ in moribus conſtitiſſe cenſuram: prurire opuſculum ‘ Sulpicii, nec frontem caperare: eſſe Apulejum in ‘ vita Philoſophum, in epigrammatis amatorem, in ‘ præceptis omnibus extare ſeveritatem, in epiſtolis ad ‘ Cærelliam ſubeſſe petulantiam (26). - - - But when ‘ you read, defend me againſt thoſe, who, as Juvenal ‘ ſays, Like ſaints do look and like the devils live, ‘ leſt they judge of my practice by my verſe,

My page laſcivious but my life is chaſt,

‘ As Pliny ſays. Learned men will remember, that ‘ Pliny a virtuous perſon was wanton in his Poems and ‘ rigid in his Morals: that Sulpicius wrote laſciviouſly ‘ and was not aſhamed of it: that Apuleius was in life ‘ a Philoſopher, in epigrams amorous, in all his precepts ſevere, and in his epiſtles to Cærelia wanton.’ He beſides mentions Plato, Annianus, Lævius, Evenus, Menander (27), and Virgil. Note, that a reader ought not to judge of Poets by himſelf; I mean that he ought not to think that that piece of Poetry which in reading hath an ill effect upon his mind, made the like impreſſion on the Poet who wrote it. Some of them accuſtom themſelves to theſe thoughts, and are touched with nothing but the poetical beauties with which they are cloathed. Conſtitution and habit have created in them the ſame inſenſibility, which Marigni aſcribes to a Governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands with regard to the fine ladies of the court of Bruſſels. The Arch-duke, ſaith he (28), ſeconded by his ſole virtue reſiſts the powerful charms of all the beauties of which I ſpeak. . . . . He looks on them as fires which dart refulgent light, but do not inflame him.

Comme dans un jardin rempli de fleurs nouvelles,
Dont l'éclat fait des yeux le plus noble plaiſir,
Un Sage curieux regarde les plus belles;
 Mais ſans ſonger à les cueillir.

As in a garden of new flowers
 Whoſe beauty ſtrikes the eye,
A vertuoſo does not gather,
 But only them ſurvey.

This Prince looks on all theſe miracles juſt as he does on the pictures of his gallery, and though the Queen of the North (29) lay ſix weeks not above four ſteps from his apartment, as if he had drank of Merlin's enchanted fountain, the paſſion which often diſturbs the reaſon of the braveſt heroes, does not at all affect his (30).

Dorme vicina à lui la donna bella,
Fuſſe altro, fuſſe l'acqua di Merlino
Non e quel ch'eſſer ſuole il Paladino.

You ſee ſome Poets make amorous verſes, in which they expreſs themſelves wantonly, though age hath rendered them as cold as ice. Ought not what they ſay to paſs for a flight of wit? Read Pontanus's hendecaſyllabic verſes, written to a lady who ſhewed her breaſt, and ſelected from ſeveral other verſes leſs modeſt.

Prædico tege candidas papillas,
Nec quæras rabiem ciere amantum,
Me quem frigida congelat ſenecta,
Irritas male, calfaciſque, quare
Prædico tege candidas papillas,
Et pectus ſtrophio tegente vela.
Nam quid lacteolos ſinus, & ipſas
Præ te fers ſine linteo papillas?
An vis dicere baſia papillas?
Et pectus nitidum ſuaviare?
Vis num dicere, tange, tange, tracta?
Te ne incedere nudulis papillis?
Nudo pectore te ne deambulare?
Hoc eſt ad Venerem vocare amantes.
Quare contege candidas papillas,
Et pectus ſtrophio decente veſti,
Aut, ſenex licet, involabo in illas,
Ut poſſim juvenis tibi videri (31).

Thy fair neck hide, take my advice,
 Seek not to blow a lover's fire,
For tho' with age I'm cold as ice,
 You make me burn with fierce deſire.

(20) Crede mihi mores diſtant à carmine noſtro: Vita verecunda eſt, muſa jocoſa mihi. Ovidius. lib. ii, Triſtium, ver. 353. Innocuos cenſura poteſt permittere luſus: Laſciva eſt nobis pagina, vita proba. Martialis, Epig. v, lib. i.

(21) Philippus Beroaldus, Orat. habita in principio Enarrationis Propertii, continente laudes Amoris.

(22) Conſult Raderus upon Martial, Epig. v, lib. i.

(23) Hadrianus, apud Apulejum Apolog. pag. m. 281.

(24) Quod nunquam ita dixiſſet, ſi forent lepidiora carmina argumentum impudicitiæ habenda. Apul. ibid.

(25) Auſon. in Centone nuptiali, ſub fin. pag. m. 515, 516. See the article AUSONIUS, remark [F].

(26) See the article APULEIUS, citation (64).

(27) Quid ipſum Menandrum? quid Comicos omnes; quibus ſevera vita eſt, & læta materia. Auſon. ibid.

(28) Marigny, in his letters printed in the year 1658.

(29) That is, Chriſtina Queen of Sweden.

(30) See concerning the devotion of that Archduke, a book intituled, Mémoires de Hollande, printed at Paris in 1678.

(31) Jovianus Pontanus, Hendecaſyll. lib. i, fol. 187, verſo, Edit. Venet. 1513.

Journaliſt, concerning John della Caſa, and his deteſtable Capitolo del Forno [E]. La Mothe le Vayer is a great inſtance of the ſmall portion of happineſs we taſte in this life; for

With handkerchief I beg you'd hide
Your pretty bubbies ſoft and fair,
Wherefore, pray, ſhould you take a pride
In going with them wholly bare.
Do you by that intend to ſay,
My naked breaſt come feel and kiſs,
And with my milk white boſom play,
For nothing I will take amiſs.
To walk out with uncover'd breaſt,
A powerful motive prove it muſt,
For lovers, wanton and unchaſt,
To come and gratify their luſt.
A gorget then do you apply,
Therewith thy ſnowy bubbies cover,
Or elſe, tho' old, on them I'll fly,
Like any youthful eager lover.

There are ſome authors who are more ſcrupulous in the choice of modeſt expreſſions, for fear that any licentious expreſſions ſhould confirm the bad report which runs concerning their morals. Others on the contrary emboldened by their virtuous life and the good opinion which the world hath entertained of their wiſdom, morum fiducia, are not ſo ſollicitous in this particular, and allow themſelves too large a ſcope in order to divert their readers. Probably Mr de la Mothe le Vayer was of this number: he very well knew that he could alledge for his excuſe in caſe of neceſſity (32), ‘ Verba mea arguuntur, adeo factorum ‘ innocens ſum (33).--- They find fault with my words, ‘ becauſe they have nothing to ſay to my actions.’ Let us conclude with conſidering the ſtupendious diverſity of tempers and characters obſervable amongſt men. There are ſome who ſcruple to ſay, what they make no ſcruple to do: others dare not do what they freely venture to ſay. ‘ (34) A certain writer obſerves that ‘ thoſe who diſcover ſo much zeal in leaving out ſuch ‘ places in the Claſſics as offend chaſtity, are not al‘ways ſo ſober as thoſe antient authors.

Nimirum Criticus facere id quàm ſcribere mavult,
Quod mavult vates ſcribere quàm facere (35).

For Critics would much rather act than write,
What Poets would much rather write than act.

[E] Concerning John della Caſa, and his deteſtable Capitolo del Forno.] I have already ſaid that ſeveral Italian Poets ought not to be admitted to juſtify the obſcenities of their Poems by this rule,

Laſciva eſt nobis pagina, vita proba.

Tho' my page laſcivious be,
I lead a life of probity.

I ſhall ſay nothing in particular againſt Calcagnini (36), but Molza, Mauro, John della Caſa, &c. deſerve a ſentence of condemnation. Not but that the judgment paſſed on the laſt by incompetent judges, who have not read him, is too ſevere; and as we ought to do juſtice to every body, I am obliged to declare that they have wronged him in imputing to him a book de Laudibus Sodomiæ. This pretended Poem is nothing but the Capitolo del Forno, where, under the allegory of an oven, John della Caſa deſcribes the leud intercourſe betwixt men and women. Allegories of this ſort were then in faſhion; one borrowed the metaphor of a fig, another of a bean (37). What is moſt horrible in John della Caſa is that having obſerved that certain leud youths began to deſpiſe the common oven, he adds that for his part he was not ſo nice, and that he ſeldom baked any where elſe. Which was to own that ſometimes at leaſt he committed the unnatural ſin.

Tennero il Forno già le Donne ſole.
Oggi mi par che certi Garzonacci
L'abbian mandato poco men ch' al Sole.
Spazzinlo a poſta lor, neſſun non vacci.
Dicon pur ch' egli è umido e mal netto.
E ſono ben cagion quelle ſue ſtracci.
Io per me rade volte altrove il metto:
Con tutto che'l mio pan ſia piccolino,
E'l forno delle Donne un po grandetto.
Benche chi ſa queſto meſtier divino,
Sà ben trovar dove l'anno naſcoſto
Colà dirieto un certo fornellino (38).

Mr Menage cites this paſſage of the Capitolo del Forno in a French book which he publiſhed at the Hague in 1688. This ought to be obſerved, to prevent ſome cavillers ſaying, that I alledge things which no body before knew, and which ought to be kept unknown. Let us now come to the queſtion which occaſions this remark.

A certain perſon wrote from Utrecht to Mr Baſnage de Beauval (39), that he had read in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for the month of July 1685, That John della Caſa being reflected upon in a ſatire, made an anſwer in Latin verſes, where he denied the fact, affirming, That he never pretended to praiſe any thing beſides the enjoyment of women. But I would fain ſee thoſe Latin verſes, adds that anonymous perſon of Utrecht, not being able to imagine that the Archbiſhop of Benevento was capable of denying the fact with ſo much impudence; for it is not long ſince I ſaw and read this infamous Italian piece, intituled, Capitolo di M. Giovanni della Caſa ſopra del Forno: and moſt certainly it is not concerning the uſe of women as women, that he intended to ſpeak. Since Daniel Francus's book, where the Latin verſes of that Archbiſhop are recited, is ſo hard to be met with (40), I here inform the reader, that he may read them in Mr Menage's Anti-Baillet (41). It is beyond diſpute that Caſa denied he had ever praiſed the ſin againſt nature.

. . . . . Obſcœni nihil
Scripſiſſe me ſcitote: namque tunc quoque
Feſtiva nos à turpibus ſecrevimus,
A mollibuſque impura. Cumque verſibus
Laudavimus Furnum, haud mares laudavimus:
Quod ille ait per maximam calumniam:
Sed feminas plane: ut videre Carmine
Ex ipſo adhuc poteſtis.

. . . . . Nothing obſcene
Dropt from my pen, from ſmutty what is gay
I ſeparated, and from ſoft impure.
And when in verſe an oven I extoll'd,
Not men, as he moſt ſlanderouſly aſſerts,
But women I extoll'd, as you may ſee
By the poem itſelf.

You ſee he appeals to the poem itſelf for which he was accuſed. Moſt certainly, are we told in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, it is not concerning the uſe of women as women that he ſpeaks. But we may anſwer, that moſt certainly his Capitolo concerns only that uſe. It is true, that he inſerted in his poem the obſervation which I have cited, that certain leud youths were diſguſted at that uſe, and hunted after the other, in which he very ſeldom imitated them. He doth not praiſe thoſe leud youths, nor himſelf for ſometimes imitating them; wherefore he cannot be juſtly accuſed of praiſing that abominable crime. But the Poem and it's author are nevertheleſs execrable; for tho' the epithet of Meſtier divino, divine practice, falls on the venereal exerciſe in general (42), and not on ſodomy in particular, the libertiniſm and profanation is ſuch as cannot be ſufficiently deteſted. ‘ Some (43) excuſe him by

Laſciva eſt nobis pagina, vita proba eſt,

Tho' my page laſcivious be,
I lead a life of probity. And by
Laſcivus verſu, mente pudicus erat.
In verſe laſcivious, but in heart was chaſt.

‘ And

(32) Except his younger years. See the remark [F], citat. (53).

(33) Cremutius Cordus, apud Tacitum Ann. lib. iv, cap. xxxiv.

(34) Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, October 1686, Art. iii, of the Catalogue of new books, pag. 1222.

(35) In the remark [A], of the article VIRGIL, I ſhall quote Pliny the younger, who alledged many examples, &c. in his vindication.

(36) Among his Latin Poems, printed with thoſe of John Baptiſt Pigna and Lewis Arioſto, at Venice 1553, in 8vo, there are ſome very obſcene.

(37) See the article MOLZA, remark [D].

(38) John de la Caſa, apud Menage, Anti-Baillet, cap. cxix.

(39) See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, May 1696, pag. 427.

(40) Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Sçavans. ibid.

(41) Anti-Baillet, ubi ſupra.

(42) Mr Menage, ubi ſupra, pag. 105, has theſe words: ‘ Benche chi ſa queſto meſtier divino, ought to be underſtood, according to ſound Grammar, of the love of women, and not of boys. See what goes before and what follows.’

(43) Menage, ibid.

for whatever reaſon he might ſeem to have to be contented with his ſtate, he would not have returned into the world [F], on condition of being obliged to act the ſame part which

‘ And indeed it is very probable that Caſa here calumniates himſelf, in imitation of ſeveral other Poets (44) .... But of all the excuſes alledged for Caſa, on account of this Capitolo del Forno, the beſt, in my opinion is, that he ſaith he repaired this fault by a virtuous life.’

. . . . Moribus,
Induſtriâ, pudore, continentiâ,
Laſciviam nos Carminis correximus
Illius: emendavimuſque ſeriis
Jocos.

My wanton verſe which gave offence,
And all thoſe jokes which I have vended,
Now by a life of innocence
And ſerious thoughts I have amended.

Theſe verſes are part of the Latin poem which that curious perſon of Utrecht deſired to ſee. There are alſo others in it wherein John della Caſa confeſſes his fault, but too faintly, and endeavours to excuſe himſelf on account of his youth, and by the cuſtom of good Poets, though on all other accounts, virtuous men.

Annis ab hinc triginta, & amplius, ſcio
Nonnulla me, fortaſſe non caſtiſſimis
Luſiſſe verſibus: quod ætas tunc mea
Rerum me adegit inſcia, & ſemper jocis
Licentiùs gaviſa, conceſſu omnium,
Juventa: quod fecere & alii item boni.

'Tis thirty years ago, and more
Since I ſome verſes did compoſe
Perhaps obſcene; good men before
Have done the like; my youth jocoſe
Impell'd me, which, as all agree,
Is thoughtleſs, and loves liberty.

The only excuſe is that which Menage likes beſt. Let us obſerve by the by, that there are few ſubjects, where the boldneſs of authors in copying one another, without ever conſulting the original, is more viſible, than in this. Mr Menage hath cited ſeveral who accuſed Caſa, but he hath forgotten a very great number; and I wonder he did not know this place of a book which has been read by every body. John de la Caſa, Archbiſhop of Benevento, wrote a book in praiſe of Sodomy, calling it a divine work, and ſaying that he found a great deal of pleaſure in it, and uſed no other ſort of venery (45). Obſerve, that the famous Mr Magliabechi having deteſted the infamous paſſages of the Capitolo del Forno, points out ſeveral other Italian Poets whoſe works are equally horrible, or even more execrable than this; of which the Proteſtants have nevertheleſs taken no notice: whence he concludes, that Vergerio's perſonal hatred againſt Caſa, was the ſource of their complaints ſo often copied. ‘ Io non intendo di far qui l'Apologiſta del Caſa: troppo chiare ſono l'infamità che ſi leggono in quel ſuo ſporco Capitolo, &c. Contuttocio, come ò detto, fu ſua gran diſgrazzia l'aver per nemico il Vergerio. Ognun vede le orribili infamita nel medeſimo genere che ſi trovano nel Berni nel Capitolo a M. Antonio da Bibbiena, e nell' altro Capitolo ſopra un Garzone, ed in mille altri luoghi: in Curzio da Marignolle: nel Ruſſoli; in Marco Lamberti: nel Perſiani: ed in cento e mille altri noſtri Poëti Fiorentini; per tralaſciare altri quaſi infiniti di altre patrie (46). --- I do not intend here to vindicate Caſa; the infamous things we find in his abominable Capitolo, &c. are but too evident. However, as I ſaid before, it was his great misfortune to have Vergerio for his enemy. Every body ſees the horrible obſcenities of the ſame kind in the Berni, in the Capitolo of M. Antonio da Bibbiena, and in the other Capitolo Sopra un Garzone, and in a thouſand other pieces: in Curzio da Marignolle; in Ruſſoli; in Marco Lamberti; in Perſiani; and in a world of other Florentine Poets, not to mention almoſt infinite numbers of Poets of other places.’ The Poets were not the only perſons who let looſe at this rate; but proſe was alſo made uſe of by ſome leud authors of that country: witneſs the oration of Heliogabalus, compoſed by Leonard Aretinus (47). All theſe authors are very much to blame, and ſo much the more inexcuſable, becauſe they knew the weakneſs of their readers. They were not of a country where nature is proof againſt temptations, but where it is eaſily heated; for which reaſon Poggius envied the Swiſs, the honeſty and ſincerity which he obſerved amongſt them. He could not ſufficiently admire the Baths at Baden, where men and women, boys and girls, were bathing promiſcuouſly, without raiſing any ill ſuſpicions. ‘ Poggius Florentinus de Thermis Badenſibus Helveticorum admirabundus ſcripſit ad Leonh. Aretinum (48), in iis pueros puellaſque viros & fœminas ſimul conſpici: ſæpe fœminas nudas nudo viro obviam ire, nulla inhoneſti ſuſpicione: maſculos campeſtribus ſeu femoralibus, fœminas linteis indui veſtibus, crurum tenus à latere ſciſſis: neque collum, neque brachia, neque lacertos tegere, &c. Et addit poſtea: Cernunt viri uxores tractari, cernunt alteri colloqui. Eſt quidem illis ſolatium, nihil his commoventur, nihil admirantur: omnia BONA MENTE fieri putant, neque eſt ex iis, qui Zelotypus eſſet, ô mores noſtris (Italicis) diſſimiles, qui ſemper res in deteriorem partem excipimus; qui uſque adeo calumniis delectamur & obtrectationibus, ut, ſi quid videmus per ullam conjecturam, ſtatim pro manifeſto crimine atteſtemur. Invideo, imo noſtras execror animi perverſitates, &c (49). --- Poggius, the Florentine, admired the Baths at Baden in Switzerland, and wrote to Leonard Aretin, that boys and girls, men and women, bathed promiſcuouſly in them: that men and women often met one another naked, without raiſing ill ſuſpicions. That the men wore drawers, and the women linnen ſhifts, open in the ſides as far as the knees; that they went with their necks, ſhoulders and arms bare, &c. And afterwards he adds: The huſbands behold their wives handed by, and holding diſcourſe with other men. They are not at all moved, nor ſurprized at ſuch things, but are even pleaſed with them. They think every thing is done with an HONEST INTENTION, and there is not a jealous perſon amongſt them. O how unlike are thoſe manners to ours in Italy, who always take things in the worſt ſenſe, and who are ſo pleaſed with calumny and ſlander, that if we imagine or conjecture any thing, we immediately atteſt it as a manifeſt crime. I envy the Swiſs, but I abhor the perverſe turn of our minds, &c.’ [F] He would not have returned into the world.] His words are (50); ‘ Life alone ſeems to me ſo indifferent, to ſay nothing farther to it's diſadvantage, that far from ever deſiring to renew the race, if put to my choice, I would not change the few remaining calamitous days in an age ſo far advanced as mine is, for the numerous years, expected by an infinite number of young perſons, all whoſe pleaſures I well know. I could really ſwear to this as well as Cardan, if I did not think it more to the purpoſe to cite his own expreſſions, to which I ſubſcribe, tho', according to his manner of writing, they are more judicious than elegant: ‘ Nos, per Deum, fortunam noſtram exiguam, atque in ætate ſenili, cum ditiſſimo juvene, ſed imperito, non commutaremus. --- By G --- I would not exchange my ſmall fortune, even in my old age, for the largeſt poſſeſſions of an unexperienced youth.’ I ſuppoſe, with great probability, a thing, which he hath not exactly expreſſed; which is, that the race of life which he would not begin again, would be the ſame which he had almoſt finiſhed. From whence I conclude, that there is ſcarce any part which to a man of judgment ſeems worth repeating on the ſtage of the world; for that which was allotted to la Mothe le Vayer, was the moſt deſirable that could be imagined in his rank. He wanted nothing that was agreeable, if we may judge of it by the out-which providence had impoſed on him. He was extreamly afflicted at the loſs of his only ſon (b), his grief diſordered him ſo much that he married again [G], tho' he was above ſeventy-five years of age, and had no reaſon to deplore the loſs of his firſt wife. The paſſage where he acquaints us with this laſt particular, is very favourable to thoſe who aſſert, that the conjugal vow of fidelity is not

---

(44) Mr Menage quotes here the verſes of Catullus, which you have ſeen above, in the remark [D], citation (19).

(45) Sainte Aldegonde, Tableau des Differens, Part. v, Tom. ii, ch. vi.

(46) Magliabechi, letter to Mr Bigot, in the Anti-Baillet, at the end of chap. cxx.

(47) Exſtat in monumentis Deſiderii Eraſmi Roterodami ex recenſione editis, oratio invitatoria Heliogabali Romanorum Imperatoris, habita in concione ad meretrices, quam à Leonhardo Aretino compoſitam plerique credunt. Sacra Eleuſinia, patefacta, pag. 21. See the article PINEAU, citation (3), touching theſe Sacra Eleuſinia.

(48) That letter is the ccccxxvth, among thoſe of Æneas Silvius.

(49) Matthias Berneggerus, Quæſtion. Miſcellan. xc, ex Taciti Germania.

(50) La Mothe le Vayer, Letter cxxxiv, p. 204. of Vol. xii.

(b) He died in 1664.

ſide. La Mothe le Vayer was born in the metropolis of his country, an advantage which all learned men, and ſeveral others, would beſtow on themſelves, if in their gift. He was very well educated by a learned Father (51), whoſe merit and employments (52) rendered him conſiderable. He was loved and conſidered by the two Cardinals, who governed France ſucceſſively : ſplendid titles and honourable poſts he did not want ; for he was Counſellor of ſtate in ordinary, and Preceptor to the King's only brother. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf gloriouſly amongſt the authors, and deſerved a place in the French academy. The great number of books which he publiſhed, met with a very great demand. They were ſeveral times reprinted ſeparately, and afterwards collected together. He was as rich as his condition required. He was a little inclined to forbidden pleaſures during the heat of the beginning of his youth (53), but he ſoon extricated himſelf, and afterwards conſtantly led a pure life, which made him be looked on as a rigid follower of the moſt perfect morality (54), inſomuch that he acquired a very particular eſteem on that account. It is a greater perfection to be always wiſe than to become ſo by way of amendment; but the converſion to wiſdom is more difficult than the keeping in her paths without ever turning out of the way. There was therefore in this particular of la Mothe le Vayer's life ſomething very agreeable. This made him remember the violence which he made uſe of to renounce the pleaſures which he was very well acquainted with : a violence greater, might he ſay to himſelf, than to abſtain from thoſe pleaſures which one hath never taſted. Beſides, was it not agreeable to find in his lot the ſucceſſive enjoyment of the pleaſures of the body and ſoul ? This was more likely to tempt him to accept of the repetition of his condition, than if he had been deprived of the pleaſures of youth. Yet neither this, nor all the other allurements of this author's life, tho' ſo charming, could engage him to deſire the repetition of it. This is a proof that it was intermixed with croſſes, of which we were ignorant, which turned the ſcale on the ſide of evil. But if misfortune fell in upon ſo many advantages ; if it poiſoned them with a loathſome bitterneſs, ſo as to make him deſpiſe life as a burthenſome honour, which he would not accept, if he had the power of refuſal : What can we think of the condition of ſo many perſons, who ſeem to us to be deſtitute of almoſt all the cauſes of human happineſs, and expoſed to a thouſand misfortunes ? A great many aſſert, that except ſome brutal wretches, no old man would return into the world on condition to be obliged to act the ſame part over again. We are, indeed, unwilling to die, we would always live, we flatter ourſelves that things will mend ; but the remembrance of what is paſt, the good and evil things of this world being duly balanced together, does not permit us to deſire to run again in the ſame career. The Antients feigned, that the ſouls that were to return into the world, paſſed through the river of oblivion, as if without that there were reaſon to fear they ſhould grow reſtive. On this head, ſee the New Letters againſt Maimbourg (55).

[G] He afflicted himſelf extremely at the loſs of his only ſon, his grief diſordered him ſo much that he married again.] To this purpoſe, Guy Patin furniſhes me with two neceſſary paſſages. 'We have here an honeſt gentleman under very great affliction. It is Mr de la Mothe le Vayer, a celebrated author, and formerly preceptor to the Duke of Orleans, aged ſeventy-eight years. He had an only ſon about thirty-five years old, who fell ill of a continual fever, to whom Dr Eſprit, Dr Brayer, and Dr Bodineau, have given emetic wine three times, and ſent him to the place from whence there is no return (56).' This is extracted from a letter, dated the 26th of September 1664. Three months after Patin wrote another letter, in which are the following words : Mr de la Mothe le Vayer, to comfort himſelf for the death of his only ſon, is this day married, being ſeventy-eight years old, to the daughter of M. de la Haye, formerly ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, who is at leaſt forty. She ſtaid long enough to be a Sibyl. 'Non invenit vatem, ſed virum, ſed vetulum (57). - - - She found not a prophet, but an huſband, and that an old one.' Obſerve, that Patin makes him ſeventy-eight years old in the year 1664. This doth not agree with what he ſays in another letter (58), that in 1649, he was aged about ſixty years. Mr de Vize's Noveliſts makes it a round number ; they aſſure us that he married when eighty years of age. The death of Mr Godeau gave occaſion to ſpeak of that of Mr de la Mothe le Vayer, who hath thereby left a ſecond vacancy in the French academy. He was a very learned man, richly ſtored with polite learning, and hath left the public fifteen or ſixteen volumes of his works, by which he acquired a vaſt reputation. He had been preceptor to the King's only brother, and at the age of fourſcore, married Madam de la Haye. After which he lived ſeveral years. Thus the Noveliſts diſcourſed about it, and as they ſaid nothing but what is true, I have nothing farther to add on this ſubject (59). The author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres ſticks at ſeventy-eight years. I ſhall cite what he ſays ſomewhat at large, becauſe, beſides other particulars, we are thereby informed, that this marriage was a weakneſs which the Philoſophers will never forgive him. Mr Petit diſcharges his indignation on ſome learned men, who imagine that the deſcription of the Nymphs cave, denotes the characteriſtic part of women (60). He ſaith, that after the war which they have declared againſt the ſciences, and human reaſon, nothing could ſtop their fury from atttempting the ruin of polite learning by beſpattering Homer. It is eaſy to perceive that this is levelled at the fourth day of the Hexameron ruſtique of la Mothe le Vayer, a famous Pyrrhoniſt. Indeed it had been better if, in his old age, he had not printed ſuch a book as this, in which, notwithſtanding his caution in ſeveral places, it cannot be denied that there are too many impure thoughts. But this is not the only thing which is cenſured in the laſt years of this venerable old man, whoſe virtue had ſo ſucceſsfully conducted him in the paths of the antient ſages : he married again at ſeventy-eight years of age ; a weakneſs which the Philoſophers will never forgive him (61). Becauſe all learned readers will deſire to ſee this indignation of Mr Petit, as it is vented in the original, and perhaps may not have his work de Sibylla, I ſhall here cite his words : 'Sed & propudioſa quorumdam interpretamenta exploduntur, qui iſta imagine antri Nympharum uterum & pudendum muliebre ænigmatice ab Homero deſignatum cenſent : quibus cum opponitur duarum ejus antri portarum deſcriptio, eo amentiæ & furoris procedunt, ut ad adverſæ & averſæ ſeu poſticæ veneris flagitioſa divortia confugere non erubeſcant. Adeo impudentes ut non vereantur poëtarum omnium principem, literarum parentem, ingeniorum fontem, ad hæc transferre nefanda. Nempe hoc illis ad extremam vecordiam reſtabat, ut qui rationi humanæ & ſcientiis bellum indixiſſent, literas quoque omnes, infamato earum principe, quantum in ipſis eſſet, perderent (62). - - - But likewiſe the ſhameful interpretations of ſome are exploded, who, by the image of the Nymphs Cave, fancy that Homer figuratively meant the womb and privy-parts of women. And when the deſcription of the two gates of the cave is objected to them, ſo great is their folly and madneſs, that they are not aſhamed to recur to the flagitious diſtinction of natural and unnatural venery. They are ſo impudent, that they are not afraid to lay thoſe impious things upon the prince of Poets, the parent of learning, and the fountain of wit. For after they had declared war againſt human reaſon and the ſciences, nothing remained for their fury to do, but to attempt the ruin of all learning, by defaming the prince of it.' For the reſt, la Mothe le Vayer's ſon was reckoned amongſt the learned Abbots ; it is to him that it is thought Mr Boileau inſcribed his 4th ſatire. In the year 1656 he publiſhed a French tranſlation of Florus, and dedicated it to the Duke of Anjou, the King's only brother. He ſaith, that not much better obſerved than that of Celibacy [H]. The reflexions he made in an

---

(51) See La Croix du Maine, pag. 84, who calls him Felix de la Mothe le Vayer.

(52) Moreri ſays he was Counſellor to the King, and Subſtitute to the Attorney-General in the Parliament of Paris.

(53) See the Hexameron Ruſtique, pag. 97, 98.

(54) Virtutis veræ cuſtos rigiduſque ſatelles. Horatius, Epiſt. i, lib. i, ver. 17. We have ſeen that Patin calls him a Soic.

(55) New Letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm. pag. 722, 719 bis, & 768.

(56) Patin's Letter cccxxvi, pag. 656, of Vol. ii.

(57) Idem, Letter cccxli, pag. 10, of Tom. iii. It is dated the 30th of December, 1664.

(58) See the paſſage of Patin, cited in the remark [B].

(59) Mercure Galant, for the year 1672, Tom. ii, pag. 38, 39. Dutch Edit.

(60) The author of a treatiſe of Anatomy, intituled, Sacra Eleuſinia patefacta, explains in the ſame manner the cave of Atalanta. See Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. xiii, cap. i.

(61) Nouv. de la République des Lettres, October, 1686, pag. 1118, 1119.

(62) Petrus Petitus, de Sibylla, lib. ii, cap. x, in fine, pag. 234.

another

that he publiſhed this Florus from the tranſlations which the young prince had made. This verſion is accompanied with a learned and curious commentary, where Coëffeteau's tranſlation is very much cenſured. See the elogies which the Abbot of Villeloin beſtows on the father and the ſon (63).

[H] The paſſage . . . . where he acquaints us that he had no reaſon to deplore the loſs of his firſt wife (64), is very favourable to thoſe who aſſert, &c. . . .] Firſt of all I ought to acquaint the reader that he never charges his wife with any amours: He only owns that he was perhaps as ſenſible of the incommodities of marriage as any body. In a letter to a friend who had informed him that a certain perſon was ſeparated from his wife, on account of adultery, he expreſſes himſelf thus. ‘ Do not expect that I ſhould offer you a panegyric on a condition of life, whoſe inconveniencies I am perhaps not leſs acquainted with than thoſe who are moſt weary of them. I have always taken that ſleep into which God caſt our firſt father before he preſented him with a wife, not only for a caution to diſtruſt our own ſight, as a very bad counſellor in this affair; but for a moral inſtruction, that no man would probably take upon himſelf that incumbrance, if the eyes of his mind were open enough to foreſee the inconveniencies to which he ſubjects himſelf, who engages in ſo dangerous a ſociety. And I never read the firſt verſe of the tenth book of Ovid's Metamorphoſis, where he arrays the god Hymen in a ſaffron coloured robe,

. . . . Croceo velatus amictu,

‘ without fancying that the Poet thereby deſigned to expreſs what is ſo eſſential in marriage. The cares of a family which you take upon yourſelf, the ſeveral blows of fortune which you render yourſelf liable to, the inevitable jealouſy which you will have of your wife, on account of the charms you find in her, and the fear of being touched in your honour, are they not ſufficient cauſes of jaundice? And is it not a miraculous thing, if a conſtitution, even the moſt ſanguine or gay, be not by this means icterical? But after all we ought to acquieſce in our deſtiny, and ſubmit to what the wiſeſt legiſlators have on this occaſion ordered for the beſt. We cannot change their decrees, and we may render ourſelves yet more miſerable, by taking a courſe much more dangerous than that already preſcribed to us (65). By theſe laſt words he gives us to underſtand that the inconveniencies of marriage do not render that ſtate the moſt miſerable of all conditions of life; this he had plainly told us in the foregoing pages. I am very much miſtaken, if this man doth not find the remedy which he deſigns to apply to his misfortune, worſe than the evil which he believes to be inſupportable; and if at length he doth not find that in ſeveral reſpects concubinage is ſomething more intolerable than marriage itſelf. For it does not ſeem ſufficient to ſay only with the antients,

Tam malum eſt foris amica, quàm malum eſt uxor domi *.

A miſtreſs abroad is as great an evil as a wife at home.

. . . . He is ridiculous, if he expects a greater intimacy in libertiniſm, and imagines that he ſhall be more ardently and ſincerely loved in a ſtate where the fires are barely artificial. You, as well as I, have known ſeveral men more haraſſed in extricating themſelves from ſuch a licentious life as he deſigns, than they could be by all the diſgraces of an unfortunate marriage (66). All this is worthy of the wiſdom and genius of this great author. But I proceed to what he ſays more eſſentially proper for the commentary on my text.

‘ I will not penetrate ſo far as you into the ſecrets of this marriage. It is enough that I tell you that without being a very great prophet, one might long ſince have foretold this adventure. No man ever diſcovered a more fooliſh paſſion for his wife, he made love to her with all the extravagancies of a lecher. But this is a great defect in a wiſe man, who ought to avoid all ſuch behaviour; Adulter eſt uxoris amator acrior. - - - - He is an adulterer that too violently loves his wife, and this is, according to Laberius, to make a cocquet of one's own wife. And truly it cannot be denied, that the wife I ſpeak of has hitherto behaved herſelf in ſuch a manner, that one may very well believe part of the coquetries her huſband accuſes her of, without doing her much wrong, or without being too credulous. And yet what does he charge her with beſides living according to the mode? Indeed our manners in that reſpect are at preſent arrived at a very ſtrange period; and the proſtitution of the ſex, even by thoſe whoſe honour ſo abſolutely depends on their conduct, is what is not to be accounted for by reaſon, nor could any thing but ſeeing it every day make us believe it poſſible . Eo prolapſi mores jam ſunt, ut nemo ad ſuſpicanda adulteria nimium credulus videri poſſit. - - - - The age is now ſo corrupt, that none can be thought too credulous in ſuſpecting adulteries. And the Latin grammar by its rules never rendered (Cornu) Horn ſo indeclinable, as our ſenſeleſs deportment in this reſpect hath at preſent rendered it inevitable by a pleaſant ſynonymy (67).’ Do not believe that la Mothe le Vayer is the only author who thunders out ſuch terrible and ſatirical ſentences: A vaſt number of other writers pronounce the ſame judgment. It would be too tedious to enumerate them, ſee only ſome of the neweſt books, thoſe which terminate in ana (68), and thoſe that go by the name of ſtories, letters, memoirs, comedies, novels, &c. They repreſent leudneſs like Deucalion's deluge which overſpread the whole earth, and as a diſtemper which marriage rather heightens than reſtrains.

They induce us to conclude that the time which Seneca mentions is returned upon us, the time I ſay when the multitude of adultreſſes took off the ſhamefulneſs of that crime, when conjugal fidelity was a proof of uglineſs, and an huſband was taken for no other uſe than to excite the love of a gallant. Seneca's deſcription is ſo nervous, that I chooſe rather to tranſcribe it than tranſlate it faintly. ‘ Non expedit notum omnibus fieri, quàm multi ingrati ſint, pudorem enim rei tollet multitudo peccantium: & deſinet probri loco, commune maledictum. Numquid jam ulla repudio erubeſcit, poſtquam illuſtres quædam ac nobiles fœminæ non conſulum numero, ſed maritorum annos ſuos computant? & exeunt matrimonii cauſſa, nubunt repudii? Tam diu iſtud timebatur, quamdiu rarum erat, quia verò nulla ſine divortio acta ſunt; quod ſæpe audiebant, facere didicerunt. Numquid jam ullus adulterii pudor eſt, poſtquam eò ventum eſt, ut nulla virum habeat, niſi ut adulterum irritet? argumentum eſt deformitatis, pudicitia. Quam invenies tam miſeram, tam ſordidam, ut illi ſatis ſit unum adulterorum par? niſi ſingulis diviſit horas, & non ſufficit dies omnibus? niſi ad alium geſtata eſt, apud alium manſit? Infrunita & antiqua eſt, quæ neſciat, matrimonium vocari unius adulterium . . . . horum delictorum jam evanuit pudor, poſtquam res latius evagata eſt (69). - - - - It is not fit that the world ſhould know, how many ungrateful perſons there are: For the multitude of offenders would take away the ſhame of the offence, and a common reproach would ceaſe to be a diſgrace. Is there any woman now a-days that bluſhes at a divorce, ſince ſome illuſtrious and noble ladies, compute their years not by the number of the conſuls but of their huſbands, from whom they depart in order to be married, and are married in order to be divorced? A divorce was ſo long dreaded as it was uncommon; but ſince there are now few or no marriages without it, people learn to practiſe what they often hear. Is any one now aſhamed of adultery, ſince the age is become ſo corrupt, that no woman takes an huſband but to be a cloak for adultery? Chaſtity is an argument of uglineſs. What woman is ſo wretched, ſo ſordid, as to be contented with one couple of adulterers? Unleſs ſhe has one for every hour of the day, and the day is not ſufficient for all? Unleſs ſhe viſits at one place and dines at another? She muſt be a doating old woman that does not know, that the keeping company with one man only is called marriage. . . . The ſhame of thoſe crimes is now vaniſhed, ſince they are become univerſally known.’

The champions of monaſtical vows boaſt of no ſmall advantage to their cauſe by this; as if they could

(63) Marolles, Memoires, pag. 394.

(64) You will ſee in the remark [B], of the article CRITO (JAMES) who ſhe was.

(65) La Mothe le Vayer, letter lxxxvi, pag. 224, & ſeq. of Vol. xi.

* Laberius.

(66) Id. ibid. pag. 223, 224.

 Sen. Cont.

(67) Id. ibid. pag. 222, 223.

(68) As Menagiana, Harliquiniana, Furetieriana, Saintevremoniana.

(69) Seneca, de Benefic. lib. iii, cap. xvi, pag. m. 53. Vide etiam, ibid. lib. i, cap. ix.

another place of his books give us room to imagine that he was experimentally acquainted with the ill ſide of marriage, the broils of the day, and the manner of compoſing them at could not be confuted by this reaſon, viz. that incontinency, which naturally prompts to marriage, and is generally the cauſe of it, ought to be left at full liberty to take its courſe. It is not at all tamed by it, ſay they; and it may as effectually be reſtrained by the vow of celibacy, as by the ſolemn one of conjugal fidelity. Theſe are two ſorts of vows, one of which ought to be obſerved as inviolably as the other; and if one is not better kept than the other, as practice plainly ſhews, of what advantage would the abrogation of monaſtical rules be? The Monks and Nuns are charged with thouſands and thouſands of leud actions. Terrible liſts are made of baſtards and abortions, and ſuch other diſorders proceeding from the celibacy of Eccleſiaſtics (70). But if thoſe perſons obliged to continency by their vow of a ſingle life, were at their liberty in the world, would not they fall into worſe uncleanneſs? Turn your eyes to what authors relate of the abortive births at Paris (71). Under the covert of marriage, exempt from the fear of conſequences, to what leudneſs do not they abandon themſelves? And if thoſe who have reaſon to fear the anxiety which the fox was reduced to, I mean the neceſſity of being confined, till their bellies grow as flat as they were before, will notwithſtanding venture it; can we expect any better from thoſe who on the like occaſion lie under no neceſſity to hide themſelves, marriage veiling their fault from the eyes of the world? But you may ſay what you pleaſe, you champions of monaſtical vows, you will never be able to convince me, with all the proofs which you are pleaſed to cite out of la Mothe le Vayer and an hundred other authors, that the conjugal vow of fidelity is not better obſerved than that of celibacy, and that marriage is not an effectual remedy againſt the incontinence of a very great number of perſons. We ought not to ſtretch too far what was ſaid by a very good man, equally recommendable for his father's glory, and his own virtue. In one of the beſt pieces of Chriſtian morality that we have, intituled, Of the Peace and Contentment of the Mind, a ſerious, grave, and religious book, he ſaith, that the huſband whoſe wife is falſe ought to practiſe the great remedy againſt irremediable evils, which is patience, and that the good company of ſo many honeſt men, who are in the ſame condition, helps to bear it, and he needs not think it more ſtrange than to wear a faſhionable hat (72). Once more, this expreſſion ought not to be urged too far; for the number of thoſe, who follow the mode in their dreſs, ſurpaſſes the number of thoſe whom this wiſe Divine endeavours to comfort.

What I have ſaid above concerning the fox will be more intelligible, when I have related to thoſe gentlemen what I have read concerning the pernicious effects of thoſe vows, which they would juſtify. It is a ſtory, the ground of which I could never yet meet with in the eccleſiaſtical annals: I have engaged ſome people in queſt of it. In the mean while all that hath yet reached my knowledge is, that about the year 1537, the Counteſs of Guaſtala, by the advice of Baptiſt de Crema, a Jacobin Monk, founded a fraternity of the Victory over one's ſelf againſt the fleſh . . . . To gain this victory, a certain lady named Julia, put a young fellow into bed with a young girl, and laid a crucifix as a barrier betwixt them, to the end that they ſhould not kick one another, as we generally clap bars or poles between horſes: And this was the trial (73). This fraternity multiplied prodigiouſly. Such ladies, ſays my author (74), go very often to ſeveral of the neighbouring towns, to viſit their Prieſts and ſpiritual Fathers, for they have their neſts in ſeveral towns. But it often happens to them as to a certain famiſhed fox, who entering into a chamber by a little hole, eat ſo greedily, and ſtuffed his belly ſo full, that he became ſo ſwolen that he could not get out again: So it happens frequently to theſe good ladies, when they enter the chambers of their fathers confeſſors, their bellies begin to ſwell to that degree that they are obliged to ſtay there, and not ſtir a foot till the fruit is ripe, becauſe their repaſt proved too large: Which proceeds from their gormandizing, becauſe their hunger is as great as that of the fox. See what Horace ſays,

Forte per anguſtam tenuis vulpecula rimam
Repſerat in cameram frumenti, paſtaque rurſus
Ire foras pleno tendebat corpore fruſtra.
Cui muſtela procul, ſi vis (ait) effugere iſtinc,
Macra cavum repetes arctum, quem macra ſubiſti (75).

A hungry fox, when pinch'd for want of meat,
Crept thro' a little hole to heaps of wheat,
And there well fill'd he would return again
Thro' the ſame chink; he ſtrove, but ſtrove in vain:
When lo the weeſel cry'd abſurd deſign,
Fox, you were thin and lean when you got in,
And if you would get out be quite as thin.

CREECH.

He aſſures us, that at Venice, and in ſeveral other places, theſe libertine Guaſtalians were expelled (76).

Let us return to la Mothe le Vayer. He judiciouſly obſerves, that this divorced woman was ruined by her huſband's fault; who loved her too laſciviouſly. Brantome for the ſame reaſon charges the ill lives of ſeveral wives to their huſband's account (77). Generally ſpeaking we may affirm, that the mens part in all theſe diſorders is infinitely greater than the womens. They are the inſtigators, ſollicitors and ſeducers. This an author of the XVIth century hath very handſomely ſhewn in juſtification of the fair ſex. We very ſeldom ſee, ſaith he (78), women guilty of pride, cruelty, murder, drunkenneſs, gluttony, ſacrilege, robbery, or generally tainted with all ſorts of vices as men are: But, on the contrary, they are for the moſt part humble, civil, ſober, chaſte, diſcreet, and charitable; their hearts are tender and humane; and if there are any, as it may be alledged againſt me, who are vicious, I aver and maintain, that they are moſt commonly induced and inticed to it by men, without whoſe inticements few or none of this ſort would be found. And to ſpeak plainer, for a ſmall number of ill women the greateſt part of the men are ſtark naught. And if any perſon is pleaſed to contradict me, I aſk him what the men would be, if they were continually enticed, excited and ſollicited to evil, vice and ſin, by the women, as the women are by them, conſidering that of their own accord without any inſtigation they are ſo corrupt and vicious? Who ought to be eſteemed moſt excuſable, ſhe who at the inticement of another loſes her virtue, or he that uſes his utmoſt endeavours to extinguiſh it, which we ſee confirmed by daily experience? And therefore I am not a little ſurprized at the thoughtleſs ſparks, who inceſſantly cenſure the women for the very vice which is not near ſo common amongſt that ſex as amongſt their own. And if the women (as they ſay) were ſubject to luxury and incontinence, (which I utterly deny) ought they not to think full as abominable and deteſtable, or rather more, the infinite load of other vices and imperfections which they may find amongſt themſelves, the leaſt of which deſerves as much to be blamed as that? I cannot imagine whence ſuch an error ſhould proceed, unleſs from a deſire of contemning others to juſtify themſelves; which will not avail them with regard to me; for I know that they are almoſt all ſo generally addicted to the ſame vice (beſides others) that there is not a wretch though ever ſo mean amongſt them that doth not deſire to gratify his luſt with all, or as many women as pleaſe him: So that if their modeſty and chaſtity did not ſtop the torrent of vice, there would be no more continence amongſt mankind than amongſt brutes (79). But we ſee they are ſollicited without intermiſſion, and with much leſs trouble than men they might enjoy their fill of pleaſure, notwithſtanding which they very ſeldom fall into this fault, which though ſo much blamed in them, is become almoſt a virtue in the men. Is it then leſs diſpleaſing to God in one ſex than in the other? It is indeed very ſtrange that they ſhould be ſo ſeverely cenſured, for what theſe fools glory in, conſidering alſo that the ſin is commmitted on the female ſide with ſome colour of excuſe, whilſt the other have really none. What hath been lately ſaid concerning the weakneſs of men, and the ſtrength of women, in a book intituled, Moliere Comedien aux champs Eliſées (80), is the beſt thing in that book; and doubtleſs he that wrote the ſatire againſt huſbands, at night, &c. [I]. He lived ſeveral years after his ſecond marriage, and died in the year 1672 (c) I ſhall ſpeak of the editions of his works [K].

---

(70) See the book intituled, Le Cabinet du Roi de France, dans lequel il y a trois perles precieuſes d'ineſtimable valeur. It was inſcribed to Henry III, the firſt of November 1581. The reader is there frequently referred to another book intituled, La Polygamie ſacrée. Theſe two books are full of horrid things; but there ſeems to be ſome exaggeration in them.

(71) See the article PATIN, remarks [C], and [F].

(72) Peter du Moulin, the ſon, Traité de la Paix de l'Ame, livr. iii, ch. xiv, pag. 382, Paris 1673.

(73) Hiſtoire de la Mappemonde Papiſtique, pag. 81, Edit. 1567, in 4to.

(74) Ibid. pag. 82.

(75) Horace, Epiſt. vii, lib. i, ver. 29.

(76) I cannot tell whether the following paſſage of a letter of Lucretia Gonzaga, pag. 134, may be applied to the members of that fraternity. Havete ridette tutte quelle pia cevolezze che io vi narrai occorſe tra le Guaſtalline, & lui. - - - You laughed at thoſe comical things which I told you happened between the Guaſtalians and him. Hortenſio Lando is meant by the word him.

(77) Brantome, Mémoires des Dames Galantes, Tom. i, pag. 54, 55.

(78) Claudius de Taillemont, Lyonnois, in his Diſcours des Champs Faez, à l'honneur & exaltation des Dames, printed at Lyons 1553, in 8vo.

(79) Compare this with what is ſaid in the article LAMPONIANO, citation (18).

(80) Printed in 1696. See Scene vi, of Act iii, pag. 157, & ſeq. of the Amſterſtam edition. You will find the ſame things in the ivth part of the Diverſitez Curieuſes, pag. 68, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

The

(c) Morcri ſays in 1671. Mr Witte is very much miſtaken in his Diarium Biographicum, where he places the death of this author, in the year 1664.

bands, in anſwer to Mr Boileau's ſatire againſt women, had a more fruitful ſubject than Mr Boileau.

[I] We have room to imagine that he was experimentally acquainted with the ill ſide of marriage, the broils of the day, and manner of compoſing them at night, &c.] See a letter which he wrote to a perſon who deſired his advice concerning marriage. He firſt of all makes an enumeration of ſome imperfections which the antients attributed to women, after which he adds (81). ' But the want of capacity, and a ' ſufficient number of other defects, with which thoſe ' of our days abound more than ever, would not per- ' haps be ſo conſiderable, if we had the remedies ' which the antients practiſed againſt the moſt incor- ' rigible. For beſides divorces, which were allowed ' them if they found their wives but in a ſmall fault, ' on four occaſions they had a right to take away ' their lives, and the women ran as great a riſk by ' drinking of wine, or uſing of falſe keys, as by im- ' poſing of children on the huſband, or committing ' adultery . . . . (82). But as our laws are very far ' from any ſuch ſtrict ſeverity, we find that their in- ' dulgence favours the debauchery and depravation of ' women to that degree, that being at preſent reſtrain- ' ed by no ſort of fear, I ſee nothing which we ' ought reaſonably to hope for from the moſt pru- ' dent of them,

(81) La Mothe le Vayer, letter xlv, pag. 357. of Vol. x.

(82) Id. ibid. pag. 358, 359.

Paucæ adeò Cereris vittas contingere dignæ †.

On Ceres' feaſt reſtrain'd from their delight,
Few matrons there but curſe the tedious night.

DRYDEN.

† Juven. Sat. vi, ver. 50.

' And if we ought to except ſome few who are ' touched with a ſenſe of honour, how can you be ' free from the reſt of their infirmities, which the ' greateſt Philoſophers, nor the moſt potent Emperors ' have not been able to correct? Philip of Macedon ǂ ' proteſted, that he did not know a humour ſo mar- ' tial as that of his wife Olympias, who inceſſantly ' made war againſt him. Their gaming, the exceſſes ' in their feaſting, and the reſt of their profuſions, at ' preſent exceed thoſe of the moſt debauched of our ' ſex, and quickly make an huſband ſenſible of the ' truth of the Italian proverb, ſpoſa di ſpeſa, noce che ' nuoce. Nor are you yet to expect that the noiſy ' uneaſineſs of the day will exempt you from the du- ' ties of the night. There is no peace or reſt to be ' hoped for, if it doth not proceed from that ſide, ǂ Dio. Chryſ. or. 2.

Sed lateri ne parce tuo, pax omnis in illo eſt ‡.

But no endearments no careſſes ſpare,
Enjoyment pacifies the angry fair.

‡ Ovid. l. 2. ver. 413, de art. am.

' And you will find the greateſt part of them like ' the fountain of Hammon  extremely cold by day, ' but very hot by night.' When a married man talks at this rate, he gives very good reaſon to believe, 1. That he has often undergone ſuch a trial. 2. That this made him ſo well acquainted with the ſeal, which ought to be affixed to thoſe reconciliations. 3. That he was very well verſed in the diſtinction betwixt the groundleſs quarrels, which are like the ill humour of a creditor ill paid, and thoſe which reſult from a peeviſh temper.

 Diod. Sic. l. 17.

[K] I ſhall ſpeak of the editions of his works.] His ſon collected them into a body in 1653, and dedicated them to Cardinal Mazarin. This edition in folio being followed by a ſecond, he publiſhed a third, larger and more correct than the two former (83), and dedicated it to the king in 1662. After this edition another came out in fifteen volumes in 12mo, which comprehends more tracts than the laſt in folio, which was in three volumes. Thoſe three volumes in folio contain but the twelve firſt tomes of that in 12mo. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth, being the tracts which the author publiſhed in the year 1667, 1668, and 1669. There is no ſmall advantage to be made of reading this writer, and we have no French author who approaches nearer to Plutarch than he. We find beautiful thoughts, and ſolid arguments interwoven and diſperſed through his works. Wit and learning go hand in hand. His wit would doubtleſs appear more conſpicuouſly if it went alone; for the authorities and citations very often obſcure it: but in ſome places it ſhines moſt by the happy application of a foreign thought. This author, amongſt his other various ſorts of reading, applied himſelf to that of voyages. In which each perſon hath generally his particular end. Mr Daillé (84) read them only to diſcover the difference betwixt the Apoſtles converting the antient Pagans, and the Popiſh Miſſionaries converting the new ones. Our Vayer had another aim, he only looked for arguments for Pyrrhoniſm. The prodigious diverſity which he met with betwixt the manners and cuſtoms of different nations charmed him: he could not conceal the ſatisfaction with which he digeſted theſe materials, nor did he hide the conſequences which he would have us to draw from thence, viz. that we ought not to be ſo deciſive as to condemn as ill and unreaſonable, whatever we do not find agreeable to our opinions and cuſtoms. I cannot tell whether he believed with Cardan, that Opinion is the queen of mankind (85), but I believe that he might have made as good an oration about the empire of Opinion as that of Schuppius, (86) and an excellent commentary on theſe three verſes of Sophocles.

(83) Epiſtle Dedicatory of the third edition.

(84) See his life, written by his ſon.

(85) Æſtimatio & Opinio rerum humanarum Reginæ ſunt. Cardanus, lib. iii, de Utilit. apud Naudæum, Coups d'Etat, pag. m. 92.

(86) Chriſtopher Pellerus quotes it ſometimes in his Politicus ſceleratus impugnatus. See there pag. 55, 56, & 219.

Παῦσαι, καταρκεῖ τοῦ δὲ κεκλῆσθαι πατρὸς
Εἴπερ πέφυκά γ' εἰδὲ μὴ, μείων βλάβη.
Τὸ γὰρ νομισθὲν τῆς ἀληθείας κρατεῖ.

Pauſa: ſat eſt me hoc patre natum dicier,
Natus tamen ſi ſum: ſin autem, obeſt parum.
Nam veritate potentior eſt opinio

Pauſa, it is ſufficient that I am ſaid to be deſcended of this Father; it is no matter whether I really am ſo or not: for opinion prevails over truth.

His treatiſe concerning the Education of the Dauphin (87) and that of the Pagan Philoſophy, are the beſt which he hath written. That of the Hiſtorians is good: but as Mr Baillet very judiciouſly obſerves, it did not coſt him much pains (88). I have obſerved in it ſeveral other faults beſides thoſe which I have mentioned in the articles of Suetonius and Tacitus. No body is ignorant that his laſt works are much inferior to thoſe compoſed in the flower and vigour of his age. Theſe are the words of Mr Baillet (89).

(87) See Sorberiana, pag. 223, Dutch Edit.

(88) Baillet, Jugemens des Sçavans, Tom. ii, ch. v, Art. 186.

(89) Id. ibid. Tom. i, Part. ii, ch. ix.

Mr de Vigneul Marville pretends that la Mothe le Vayer's works are only a collection of what he liked beſt in the courſe of his reading; that formerly ſuch ſort of rhapſodies were read, but are not reliſhed at preſent (90). There is too much harſhneſs and ſeverity in this ſentence: all unbyaſſed perſons have always made a vaſt difference betwixt la Mothe le Vayer's writings, and rhapſodies. He was not an author who heaped up paſſages like the compilers of a Florilegium or a Polyanthea. He contented himſelf to confirm his thoughts by thoſe of the moſt excellent authors of Antiquity, or to uſe his learning in order to give new hints by the applications he made, or the conſequences he drew. This is not what is called a rhapſody. He ſays an infinite number of things which were purely his own, and which he intermixed with a great deal of ſpirit and wit; and tho' he hath interſperſed ſeveral borrowed thoughts, which are not choſen with ſufficient diſcernment, it is nevertheleſs true that from thence ariſes a work, the reading of which is highly advantageous, and which continues to pleaſe ſome very good judges. Mr de Vigneul Marville believes that he hath done a great honour to France by ſaying that la Mothe le Vayer's rhapſodies are not adapted to our preſent taſte, and that the readers no longer loſe their time in reading them; but it is to be feared that he will hereby confirm

(90) Vigneul Marville, Mêlanges d'Hiſt. & de Littér. Tom. ii, pag. 300, Dutch Edit.

‘The French Academy considered him as one of their beſt members; but the world looked on him as a capricious humouriſt, who lived according to his fancy, and as a Sceptic Philoſopher. His phyſiognomy and dreſs made every body that ſaw him judge him an extraordinary man. He walked always with his head erect, and his eyes fixed on the ſigns of the ſtreet.’ Before I was told who he was, continues the writer from whom I have extracted this paſſage, I took him for an Aſtrologer, or a ſearcher after ſecrets and the philoſophers ſtone (d). This ſerves only to confirm what we have ſeen above (e).

He had ſome couſins, whoſe deſcendants make a very good figure in the Law (f).

(d) Vigneul Marville, Mêlanges d'Hiſt. & de Litterat. Tom. ii, pag. 301, Dutch Edit.

(e) That is, that he was a Philoſopher, who minded only the inward part, and deſpiſed the vanities of human life.

(f) See the Mercure Galant, for March 1682, pag. 166, & ſeq.

confirm ſeveral foreigners in the judgment which they make, that France, too much diſguſted with all that ſavours of learning, only employs herſelf in refining her language, and in giving a happy turn to the deſcriptions and characters of men. The beſt writings of the firſt Academiſts are not leſs ſlighted than thoſe of la Mothe la Vayer (91); and yet it is agreed on all hands that the French Academy was never better filled than in it's beginning.

(91) I made this obſervation to ſhew that if la Mothe le Vayer is not read as he was formerly, it proceeds from a general diſguſt at moſt things that have loſt the grace of novelty.

VAL (GEFFREY DU) See VALLEE.

VAL (JOHN DU) a Phyſician at Iſſoudun, his native place, tranſlated into French the Antidotary or Diſpenſary of John-James Wecker, Phyſician at Baſil, and added to it ſeveral things of his own. This book was printed at Geneva in 4to in 1609. The new edition of Vander-Linden, de Scriptoribus Medicis, doth not mention him, any more than it doth JAMES DU VAL, a Phyſician of Evreux, who publiſhed (a) a book in French, treating of hermaphrodites and the delivery of women in 1612 (b). He had before printed (c) a book concerning the medicinal ſpring about Rouën, and (d) a new method of curing Catarrhs (e).

(a) At Roüen, in 8vo.

(b) I have this from Mr Drelincourt.

(c) At Roüen, 1603, in 12mo.

(d) Ibid. 1611, in 8vo.

(e) I have this from Mr Bourdelot.

VALDES (JOHN) in Latin Valdeſius, flouriſhed at Rome under Pope Julius II. He was a young well proportioned handſome polite Spaniard. His learning, induſtry, and the friendſhip of ſeveral great perſons procured him very great riches. He fell in love with a Senator's daughter, not leſs virtuous than beautiful; and finding that the only way to gratify his paſſion was honourable love, he courted her for marriage, and carried the matter even to the ſigning of the contract. A little after which it was diſcovered that it was not poſſible to advance ſo far as the nuptial ſolemnity, by reaſon of his engagement in the eccleſiaſtical life. This very much angred the father of the betrothed lady, and obliged him to complain to Cardinal Leonard de la Rovere, who commanded in Rome in the abſence of Julius II. That Cardinal cauſed Valdes to be impriſoned in the caſtle of St Angelo. The priſoner ſeeing himſelf charged with a crime, promiſed to renounce his prieſthood if the Pope would permit him, and marry the betrothed lady, even tho' ſhe had no fortune. Upon which he was diſcharged under bail; but whilſt they were endeavouring to obtain the diſpenſation, he was ſo embarraſſed betwixt the deſire of keeping his benefices, and that of enjoying a wife, that he could not diſengage himſelf from this labyrinth, otherwiſe than by throwing himſelf headlong from the top of his houſe [A]. By which he broke all his bones, and died immediately very much lamented by the whole city. His miſtreſs being informed of this deſperate act, would

[A] He could not diſengage himſelf from this labyrinth otherwiſe than by throwing himſelf from the top of his houſe.] His ſtruggles with two different paſſions, was very fierce: on the one ſide he found himſelf unable to quit the charms reſulting from the large revenue of his benefices, and on the other he deſpaired of reſiſting the violence of his love, if he could find means to annul his contract. If I keep my benefices, ſaid he to himſelf, I ſhall never enjoy the perſon I love, and I do not find myſelf able to endure that privation. If I enjoy this perſon, I ſhall loſe my preferments, and I do not believe I can any more bear this loſs than the other. This plunged him into a deep melancholy, which was aggravated by his reflecting on the prejudice he did his miſtreſs. He knew that by breaking off the promiſed marriage, he at once ruined the reputation and fortune of a very virtuous lady. For he doubtleſs imagined that ſhe would find no more a ſuitable match. The ſcrupulous niceneſs of the Italians is ſuch that they cannot eaſily digeſt the privacies which they ſuppoſe one after a contract of marriage may have and actually has taken. Nay, in the very countries, where people are not ſo nice, ſome men would never marry a lady who hath ſeveral times hearkened to the declarations of love from a young ſpark admitted by her relations; for they ſuppoſe that the more ſhe became ſenſible of her parents conſent, the leſſer bounds ſhe ſet to the careſſes of the young man, and that ſhe abandoned the out-ſide of the place. What would they not think if the matter broke off betwixt the contract and the wedding-day? However it was, our Valdes thought he ſhould ruin the reputation of this fair one, if he ſhould annul the marriage-contract; he was touched with a compaſſion for her; he was aſhamed to uſe her ſo ill; and theſe two paſſions joining with others ſo cruelly tormented him, that to free himſelf from this ſlavery he reſolved to end his life. Early in the morning then he went to the turret on the top of his houſe, and threw himſelf into the ſtreet. ‘Valdeſius neque libenter ſacerdotiis, quæ opulenta erant, abdicare cogitat, neque perferre ſe amorem, etiam ſi impunè liceat, ulterius ſperat. Igitur cum id conſilii ſe cepiſſe videret, quod non facilè poterat explicare, graviore ob id dolore affectus, quòd pudiciſſimæ feminæ famam, & fortunam omnem everterat, ſi repudii nuntium remiſiſſet, magnis excruciatus ſollicitudinibus, miſericordiaque & pudore confectus, ut erat æſtivus dies, turriculam quandam ad proſpectum ſuper ædium culmen excitatam diſcinctus adhuc aſcendit, quaſi matutinalem auram ſtrictiorem animi gratia capturus, ſervuloque mox negotii certi nomine ablegato nullam aliam rationem nactus, qua ſe turbulentiſſimis miſeriis explicaret, & dulciſſimæ ſponſæ famæ nominique proſpiceret, would have killed her ſelf; wherefore they were obliged to keep a watchful eye over her to prevent any attempts of that nature. You expect to hear that time and another ſighing lover comforted her, but you are miſtaken; for as ſoon as her grief admitted of a little ſolace, ſhe turned nun (a).

(a) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, in Litteratorum Infelicitate, lib. i, pag. 44, 45.

‘ſpiceret, ex editiſſimo eo loco in viam mediam ſeſe præcipitem dedit, quo ita totis oſſibus colliſo, & ſtatim exanimato, Alterii filia re percepta, ipſa quoque ſponſi deſiderio ſibimet manum inferre tentavit, ſed diligenti familiarium obſervatione prohibita, cuſtoditaque, poſteaquam tempore dolor aliquantulum mitigatus eſt, maritalem peroſa vitam perpetuo victura cœlibatu veſtalem induit (1). - - - Valdes could not think of reſigning his rich benefices, nor did he believe he could be able to reſiſt the violence of his love, even tho' the contract were annulled. Therefore, when he ſaw he was involved in difficulties, from which he could not extricate himſelf, being the more concerned becauſe he ſhould ruin the character and fortune of a very virtuous lady by breaking off the match, and being agitated between compaſſion and ſhame, and cruelly tormented with anxious thoughts, he went up one ſummer's morning, before he was dreſſed, to the turret on the top of his houſe, as if to take a little freſh air, having ſent out his ſervant under pretence of ſome buſineſs; and finding no other way to free himſelf from this inſuportable miſery, and to ſave the reputation of his dear miſtreſs, he threw himſelf headlong from that high place into the middle of the way, whereby he broke all his bones, and died upon the ſpot. The daughter of Altieri hearing of it, attempted to kill herſelf for the loſs of her lover, but was prevented, and carefully watched by her friends. Afterwards, when her grief was a little aſſwaged by time, ſhe conceived an averſion to a married ſtate, and reſolving to lead always a ſingle life, went into a convent.’ The author does not mention whether this unhappy man was interred in a church, or whether the judges exerciſed the rigour of the law on his corpſe. He only tells us that the whole city deplored his death (2).

(1) Pierius Valerianus, de Literat. Infelicit. lib. i, pag. 45.

(2) Valdeſius totius Romæ luctu deploratus eſt. Id. ibid.

VALDES (John) one of the firſt founders of Lutheraniſm in the kingdom of Naples, was a Civilian (a), and a Spaniſh gentleman, on whom Charles the Vth conferred the honour of knighthood (b). It is believed (c) that in his travels to Germany he was tinctured with the opinions which were preached there againſt the Church of Rome; and that having carried to Naples the books of Luther, Bucer, and the Anabaptiſts, he made uſe of them to get proſelytes. It is certain that he communicated his opinions to ſeveral perſons, who privately aſſembled to ſerve God according to theſe new inſtructions. Some women of quality frequented theſe aſſemblies [A]. Some Monks of extraordinary merit, and among others Peter Martyr Vermilius (d), and Bernardinus Ochinus (e) reſorted alſo thither. The Inquiſition diſcovered it, and by the application of their uſual violent remedies ſuppreſſed this beginning of reformation. Valdes's diſciples were not all equally ſtedfaſt: ſome ſtuck to the new doctrines and retired into Proteſtant countries; but the greateſt part yielded and betrayed their conſciences [B]. He lived unmarried and very chaſtly, and died at Naples, about 1540 (f). He attacked the Church of Rome on ſome points only [C], and it is pretended that on the doctrine of the Trinity, he neither agreed with the Proteſtants, nor the Roman Catholics. The Unitarians have placed

(a) See the Bibliotheca Anti-trinitariorum, p. 2.

(b) Nobili genere natus in Hiſpania & dignitate equeſtri ornatus à Carolo Cæſare. Melchior Adam in Vita Petri Martyris, pag. 31.

(c) See the Bibl. Anti-trinitariorum, pag. 2; & Spondanus ad ann. 1547, num. 21, 22.

(d) See the remark [A].

(e) Spondanus, ubi ſupra, num. 22.

(f) Celius Secundus Curio, preface to Valdes's Conſiderations.

[A] He communicated his opinions to ſeveral perſons, who privately aſſembled to ſerve GOD . . . . ſome women of quality frequented theſe aſſemblies.] A paſſage in Peter Martyr's life informs us of this more particularly. We have there a very fine elogy on our Valdes, the founder of this dawning Church. ‘Qui (Joannes Valdeſius) poſteaquam à Deo veræ religionis agnitione donatus eſt, vitam ſuam in Italia, & præcipuè Neapoli egit, quo loco doctrina & ſanctiſſimo vitæ exemplo, quamplurimos, præſertim nobiles, Chriſto lucrifecit, ac fuit eo tempore non ſpernenda Eccleſia piorum hominum in urbe Neapolitana. Nam in illo cœtu multi viri erant nobiles & docti; multæ etiam excellenti virtute fœminæ: inter quas ut alias illuſtres & vere heroinas omittamus, ſilentio tamen præterire non debemus nobiliſſimam heroinam Izabellam Manricham, quæ poſtea Christi nomine à patria exulavit. In hoc cœtu piorum fuit ibidem Christi nomine exul Galeazzius Caracciolus Marchio Vici, & alii magni viri poſt exules, quos omnes nominare non neceſſe eſt. Quamvis autem hujus Eccleſiæ prima laus debeatur Valdeſio: nihilominus tamen Martyris quoque virtus commemoranda eſt (1). - - - John Valdes, after GOD had beſtowed on him the knowledge of the true religion, ſpent his days in Italy, and chiefly in Naples, where, by his doctrine and holineſs of life, he gained many to CHRIST, eſpecially ſeveral of the nobility, and at that time there was a conſiderable church of pious men in the city of Naples. For in that aſſembly there were many noble and learned men, and likewiſe many women of extraordinary virtue; amongſt whom, not to mention other illuſtrious and truly great ladies, I muſt not paſs over in ſilence the moſt excellent Lady Iſabella Manriguez, who afterwards was baniſhed her country for the name of CHRIST. Among thoſe pious men, Galeazzo Caracciolo, Marquis of Vico, was alſo baniſhed for the ſake of CHRIST; and after that, other great men, all whom it is needleſs to mention. Tho' the chief honour of this Church be due to Valdes: yet we ought not to forget the great merit of Martyr.’ See the remark [F].

(1) Melch. Adam. in Vita Theolog. Exter. pag. 31.

[B] The greateſt part yielded, and betrayed their conſciences.] Nicolas Balbani, miniſter of the Italian Church at Geneva, informs us of this: his words, according to Mr Minutoli's verſion, are: ‘The greateſt danger that threatened him (2) proceeded from the ſame perſon from whom he had received the beginning of his knowledge; for the number of the diſciples of this Valdes, of whom we have already ſpoken, and who were the only company that Galeazzo frequented after he became acquainted with them, being extreamly increaſed in Naples, moſt of them not advancing farther in point of religion than to eſtabliſh the means of Juſtification by Jesus Christ, and to condemn ſome of the groſſeſt Popiſh ſuperſtitions, without abſtaining, on that account, from frequenting the churches, and aſſiſting at the Maſs, and partaking with the reſt of the Papiſts in ſeveral idolatries; it was to be feared that Galeazzo would make no greater progreſs than thoſe gentlemen, whoſe good intentions miſcarried when they came to be perſecuted and impriſoned, and they were conſtrained to abjure their principles, after which ſome were put to death on pretence of relapſing to their former errors, and amongſt them was Caſerta himſelf, who had been the inſtrument of Galeazzo's converſion (3).

(2) That is, Galeazzo Caracciolo Marquis of Vico.

(3) Vie de Galeace Caracciolo, pag. 47, 48.

[C] He attacked the Church of Rome on ſome points only] Add to the paſſage I have juſt now cited the following words of the ſame book: ‘There was then at Naples . . . . a certain Spaniſh gentleman whoſe name was John Valdes, who having ſome knowledge of, and being even ſenſibly touched with the truth of the goſpel, eſpecially in the point of Juſtification, had the happineſs to ſow ſome ſeeds thereof amongſt the nobility he converſed with, and began in that manner to draw ſome gentlemen out of their ignorance, undeceiving them concerning the merit of good works, and the righteouſneſs of men, as well as concerning ſeveral ſuperſtitions (4).’ Compare this with what I have cited from Thuanus, in the

(4) Ibid. pag. 10, 11.

placed him in the number of their authors [D]. He wrote ſome books [E], of which the the article Flaminius, and obſerve, that Flaminius was one of thoſe who with Valdes confirmed Peter Martyr Vermilius in his new opinions (5).

[D] On the doctrine of the Trinity he did not agree . . . The Unitarians have placed him in the number of their authors.] See the following paſſage of the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum: ‘ Ab eo (Johanne Valdeſio) Bernardinus Ochinus ſententiam ſuam contra receptam de Trinitate opinionem imbibiſſe perhibetur. Floruit a. 1542 De eo miniſtri eccleſiarum conſentientium in Sarmatia & Tranſylvania lib. 1. cap. 3. de falſa & vera unius Dei Patris, Filii, & Spiritus Sancti cognitione, hæc ſcribunt: De Joanne etiam Valdeſio, genere & pietate clariſſimo, quid dicendum? Qui ſcriptis publicis ſuæ eruditionis ſpecimina nobis relinquens, ſcribit, ſe de Deo ejuſque Filio nihil aliud ſcire, quam quod unus ſit Deus altiſſimus Chriſti Pater: & unicus Dominus noſter Jeſus Chriſtus ejus filius, qui conceptus eſt de Spiritu Sancto in utero virginis, unus & amborum Spiritus (6). - - - - Bernardinus Ochinus, is ſaid to have taken from John Valdes his ſentiments againſt the received opinion concerning the Trinity. He flouriſhed in the year 1542. The miniſters of the united churches in Poland and Tranſylvania, in the book concerning the falſe and true knowledge of one GOD, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, write thus concerning him: As to John Valdes, a man eminent for his birth and piety, what ſhall we ſay? In the books he publiſhed he gives evident proofs of his learning, and writes that he knows no more concerning GOD and his Son, than that there is one Almighty GOD the Father of CHRIST, and our only Lord JESUS CHRIST his Son, who was conceived of the Holy Ghoſt in the womb of the Virgin, and one Spirit of both.’ This may perphaps be confirmed by Balbani's words: The Devil ſtill continued to forge ſhackles for Galeazzo Caracciolo; for fear he ſhould eſcape, he again endeavoured to pervert his mind, by the efforts which he obliged certain perſons to make, to draw him over to a pernicious party. Theſe were a band of Anabaptiſts and abominable Arians, who were unhappily ſpread in Naples and other parts of the kingdom; they promiſed themſelves to find in Galeazzo (thinking the ſtarting of a new opinion enough to gain a novice) the man whom they wanted to be their powerful ſupport and defence, and the patron of their cabal: Wherefore they left no means which they thought proper unattempted to engage him on their ſide, and taint him with their hereſy (7). The author further adds, that this gentleman vigorouſly repulſed their efforts. Obſerve that he makes a diſtinction betwixt theſe Perſons, and Valdes's diſciples (8): But we may venture to ſay, that his acknowledging that a party of Antitrinitarians appeared in the kingdom of Naples, renders more probable what Sandius (9) affirms concerning Valdes's hereſy. I have read a thing in Beza's letters which deſerves a place here. A Miniſter of the French church at Embden, was accuſed amongſt other things of having got tranſlated and printed in the Dutch language, without the knowledge of his colleagues, Valdes's Conſiderations, full of blaſphemies againſt the word of God (10), and of having left out the notes which were added to the Lyons edition. Beſides other reaſons in his defence, he urged the two following; that the book was not full of blaſphemies, and that it ought not to be leſs permitted at Embden, to praiſe the piety of Valdes than at Baſil, Zurich, and Geneva. He was anſwered, that book had done a great deal of miſchief to the flock of Chriſt at Naples, and that Ochinus had there imbibed the errors which had ruined him; and that if any good men had beſtowed elogies on thoſe Conſiderations of Valdes, they would change their opinion as ſoon as they had examined them. It was added, that the Bookſeller at Lyons, who printed them, was very ſorry and aſked pardon for it, after Calvin and ſome others had informed him of his fault. Read all theſe particulars in the following Latin words of Beza: ‘ Scimus ex idoneorum hominum teſtimonio, quantum naſcenti Neapolitanæ Eccleſiæ liber ille detrimenti attulerit: Scimus etiam quod fuerit de illo judicium D. Joannis Calvini: Scimus & illud, Ochinum infelicis memoriæ virum ex illis lacunis ſuas illas prophanas ſpeculationes hauſiſſe, & ita tandem ſenſim à verbo Dei abductum in ultimum illum exitium ſeſe præcipitaſſe, in quo miſer interiit: ac proinde librum illum a ſpiritu Anabaptiſtico multis locis non multùm diſſidentem, id eſt, à verbo Dei ad inanes quaſdam ſpeculationes, quas falſo Spiritum appellant, homines abducentem, vel nunquam editum, vel ſtatim ſepultum fuiſſe magnopere cuperemus. . . . . Cæterum quinam illi ſint probati judicii homines qui ſcriptum illud (perſonam enim ipſam Valdeſii non attingimus) ut pium & religioſum libris etiam editis commendarint, nos quidem ignoramus, neque dubitamus quin ſi boni viri ſunt, re diligentiùs perſpecta ſententiam mutent, quod & Lugdunenſi Typographo viro bono evenit, ut qui, quamvis additis illis notis meritò ſe poſſet excuſare, admonitus tamen à fratribus, & nominatim quidem à D. Calvino, culpam deprecari quàm excuſare maluit (11). - - - - - We know from unqueſtionable evidence, what miſchief that book has done to the infant church of Naples: What opinion Mr John Calvin entertained of it: and that Ochinus, of unhappy memory, drew his groſs errors from that corrupt fountain, and ſo by degrees forſaking the word of GOD, he run into that pernicious hereſy wherein he died: for which reaſons we heartily wiſh, that book which differs not much from the Anabaptiſtical ſpirit, that is, it leads men from the word of GOD to vain ſpeculations which they falſely call the ſpirit, had never been publiſhed, or immediately buried in oblivion. . . . . But who thoſe judicious men are, who in printed books have commended that piece (for as to the perſon of Valdes I ſay nothing) as pious and religious, I confeſs I do not know, and I do not queſtion but if they are good men, they will change their opinion as ſoon as they have carefully examined the matter; which the Printer at Lyons, a man of probity did; for though he might have juſtly excuſed himſelf on account of the notes that were added, yet being admoniſhed by the brethren, and particularly by Mr Calvin, he choſe rather to deprecate than to vindicate his fault.’

[E] He wrote ſeveral books.] Of which Sandius gives us the following catalogue. Dialogi Charon & Mercurius impreſſi Italicè. Conſiderationes piæ & doctæ. In Pſalmos aliquot. In Evangelium Matthæi. In Evangelium Johannis. Commentarius in epiſtolam Pauli ad Romanos. a. 1556. Commentario breve, ò declaracion compendioſa, y familiar, ſobre la primera epiſtola de ſan Pablo à los Corinthios, muy util para todos los amadores de la piedad Chriſtiana (12). He obſerves that the Spaniſh Inquiſition hath inſerted Valdes's commentary on the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians, in their index of prohibited books, both with and without the author's name. He was in the right to make this obſervation, for that it is ſo expreſſed in the index is very true (13). Don Nicholas Antonio obſerves the ſame thing (14); but he doth not ſeem to know who Valdes was. Joannes de Valdes quidam, ſaith he, ſcripſit commentario breve ò declaracion, &c. - - - - One John de Valdes wrote Commentario breve ò declaracion, &c. He adds that du Verdier Vau-Privas ſays, that Claudius de Kerquiſinen a Pariſian, tranſlated the hundred and ten divine Conſiderations Johannis Valdeſii out of Spaniſh into French. Du Verdier calls this author Jean de Valdeſſo, and ſaith, that the French tranſlation of theſe divine Conſiderations was printed at Lyons in 8vo. by Charles Peſnot, and at Paris in 16mo, by Mathurin Prevoſt 1565 (15). So he ſays under the word Claudius de Kequiſinen. But under the word Jean de Valdeſſo, Secretary to the King of Naples (16), he only ſpeaks of one hundred Conſiderations, and refers us to Claudius de Kerquiſine. By which we may obſerve that he had no regard to uniformity, either in proper names or the titles of books. He adds that Charon and Mercury, dialogues of the ſame Valdeſſo, were tranſlated into French by an unknown author. This confirms the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum, and the epitome of that of Geſner, where our John Valdes is called Secretarius Regis Neapolitani, Secretary to the King of Naples, and declared to be the author of the dialogues Charon and Mercurius. Let us ſay, by the by, that they deceive us, when they make uſe of the plural number with reſpect to the book wherein Charon and Mercury are the interlocutors. It is but one dialogue; which I own is followed by another, but in this the perſons are Lactantius and an Archdeacon. The whole title of the book runs thus.

Due

---

(5) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra.

(6) Biblioth. Antitrinit. p. 2.

(7) Balbani, Vie de Galeace Caracciolo, pag. 45, 46.

(8) Ibid. p. 47.

(9) He is the author of the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum.

(10) Multis erroribus atque etiam blaſphemiis adverſus ſacrum Dei verbum ſcatentes. Beza, Epiſt. IV, pag. 200, Tom. iii, Operum.

(11) Theod. Beza, ibid.

(12) Biblioth. Antitrinit. pag. ii, See alſo the Epitome of Geſnerus's Bibliotheca, pag. m. 506.

(13) See the Index Librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum, pag. 736, of the edition of 1667, at the word Juan Valdeſio.

(14) Nicol. Antonio, Biblioth. Scriptorum Hiſpaniæ, Tom. i, pag. 606.

(15) Du Verdier, Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 182.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 759.

the moſt eſteemed is intituled one hundred and ten Conſiderations. I ſhall mention below by whoſe care it was printed [F].

Due Dialoghi, l'uno di Mercurio & Caronte: nel quale, oltre molte coſe belle, gratioſe, & di buona dottrina, ſi raconta quel che accade nella guerra dopò l'anno MDXXI. L'altro di Lactantio & di uno Archidiacono, nel quale puntalmente ſi trattano le coſe avenute in Roma nell' anno MDXXVII. Di Spagnuolo in Italiano con molta accuratezza & tradotti & reviſti. In Vinegia con gratia & privilegio per anni Dieci. The date of the impreſſion is not ſpecified; The book contains 148 leaves in octavo. As for the reſt Mr Konig miſleads us (17), when he refers us to Pierius Valerianus with reſpect to John Valdes, who wrote a commentary on the epiſtle of St Paul to the Romans, printed in 1556. For Pierius's Valdes is another man. I find nothing concerning our Valdes in the Oxford catalogue; but under the name of John de VAL D'ESSO, or Valdeſſo, you find one hundred and ten divine Conſiderations, printed at Lyons in 8vo, 1563. You will alſo find there the ſame book printed in Italian at Baſil in 1550 in 8vo, and in Engliſh at Oxford, in 1638, in 4to.

(17) Konig. Bibl. vet. & nova, pag. 826.

[F] By whoſe care it was printed.] The French edition which I here make uſe of, is that of Paris 1565, in 16mo, intituled Dent & dix Conſideracions divines de Jan de Val d'Eſſo. Traduites premierement, d'Eſpaignol en langue Italienne, & de nouveau miſes en François, par C. K. P. The Preface is written by Celius Secundus Curio, who was the editor of the Italian edition at Baſil in 1550. He repreſents it as an excellent work, and after a great many elogies, goes on in the following words. 'But we are obliged for 'this great and heavenly treaſure, to Mr Peter Paul 'Vergerius, as the inſtrument of divine providence 'to occaſion the printing and the publiſhing of it, 'that it may be ſeen and poſſeſſed by every perſon. 'For leaving Italy, and quitting a falſe and pretended 'biſhopric to join and apply himſelf to the true apoſtleſhip, to which he was called by Chriſt, he brought with 'him ſeveral excellent compoſitions. He did as every 'body uſes do, when, by ſome ſad diſaſter, his houſe 'is on fire, or the town where he lives in danger 'of being plundered by ſoldiers; for in ſuch a diſtreſs 'he endeavours to ſave himſelf with the moſt valuable things he has. In like manner our Vergier '(18), having nothing dearer to him in this world 'than the glory of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, he carried 'off with him thoſe compoſitions which tended to 'illuſtrate and enlarge it. He neglected the earthly 'riches, and carefully preſerved the heavenly and divine treaſures: Amongſt which this little piece was 'one of the moſt valuable which could be imagined 'or coveted. After which, very well knowing that all 'things in their own nature excellent, raiſe their value and eſteem, by being communicated and diſtributed to ſeveral perſons, he left me theſe hundred 'and ten Conſiderations that I ſhould publiſh them: 'which I have done, as you ſee with the utmoſt diligence that I have been capable of. Theſe Conſiderations, as ſeveral can teſtify, were originally written by the author in Spaniſh, but afterwards tranſlated into Italian, by a perſon of great piety and 'virtue; though through inadvertence, ſeveral Spaniſh idioms, have ſlipt into the verſion. And beſides he has purpoſely retained ſome few words of 'the author's mother tongue, becauſe John de Val 'd'Eſſo the author, was a Spaniard, of a noble and 'antient family, raiſed to an honourable ſtate, being 'at firſt a gentleman, knighted by Charles V, but 'after that a more honourable and magnificent Knight 'of JESUS CHRIST. After CHRIST was revealed to him, he did not long follow the court, 'but lived in Italy, and reſided at Naples. Where 'by the engaging charms of his doctrine, and the 'holineſs of his life, he gained many diſciples to 'CHRIST, eſpecially a good number of gentlemen 'and knights, and women of quality who deſerved 'all ſorts of praiſe. He was ſo mild and charitable, 'that he made himſelf debtor to every perſon for 'the great talents with which he was entruſted, and 'accommodated himſelf to perſons of the meaneſt 'condition, and became all things to all men, in 'order to gain them to CHRIST. Not only this, 'but he ſerved as an inſtrument to convey the light 'of the goſpel to ſome of the moſt famous preachers 'in Italy. This is what I know, by having particularly converſed with them..... And beſides he 'left ſeveral other excellent pieces behind him, which 'by means of the above mentioned Vergerius, we hope 'in time will be communicated to us.

(18) His article will be ſeen hereafter under the word VERGERIUS.

VALDES (JAMES) (a) author of a book, in which he endeavours to prove that the kings of Spain ought to have the precedency of all Chriſtian princes [A]. He was born in Aſturia in the XVIth century, and run through the courſe of his ſtudies at Valladolid, where he exerciſed the profeſſion of an Advocate, and taught the Canon-Law for (a) Nicolas Antonio, Biblioth. Scriptorum Hiſpaniæ, Tom. i, pag. 247, calls him Didacus.

[A] He is author of a book in which he endeavours to prove, that the kings of Spain ought to have the precedency of all Chriſtian princes.] This was publiſhed at Granada in 1602, in folio, and dedicated to Philip III King of Spain, and it was reprinted at Francfort in 4to, in 1626. The title is Prærogativa Hiſpaniæ, hoc eſt, de dignitate & præeminentia regum regnorumque Hiſpaniæ, & honoratiori loco ac titulo eis eorumque legatis à Conciliis, nec non Romana ſede jure debito, tractatus eximius, Reges Catholicos Chriſtianiſſimis aliiſque jure, regnis, ſede ac titulo potiores extitiſſe adhuc (1) liquido demonſtrans (§ α). The author had choſen this for the ſubject of an oration, which he pronounced in the Univerſity of Valladolid, in the preſence of King Philip II. Which was ſo applauded, and that monarch was ſo well pleaſed with it, that he ordered him to write a tract on that ſubject. This occaſioned the book (2), wherein Valdes pretends to the ſame fate with Ægidius Romanus, who having argued on the queſtion de Regno in the ſchools, in the preſence of Philip IV, King of France, received orders from that prince to prepare an entire treatiſe de Regimine Principis. Mihi evenit id, quod olim Ægidio Romano accidiſſe Paulus Æmilius in Philippo IV auctor eſt, quod cum in Scholis publicam de regno coram Philippo Pulchro queſtionem habuiſſet, tandem ejus regis imperio, opus de regimine principis edidit (3). If Valdes hath not more faithfully cited other authors, I look upon his book to be one of the worſt in the world; for it is falſe that Ægidius Romanus diſputed on the theſis de Regno, in preſence of Philip IV. It is falſe that he received any order to write a book on that ſubject after the pretended diſputation. But the thing is this. That prince engaged him to publiſh a tract de Regimine Principum, and afterwards commanded him to make a ſpeech to him in the name of the whole univerſity, at his return from his coronation. Paulus Æmilius's words are: 'Philippus pulcher 'jam inde à prima adoleſcentia Ægidium Romanum 'theologum obſervarat, authorque fuerat ut de regimine principum monumenta quæ extant conſcriberet, ederetque. Eundem Lutetiam à Rhemenſibus 'ſacris regreſſus, quod Sacræ Scholæ univerſique Muſæi oratione novos excipi Reges ſolemne ſit, dicere 'juſſit (4). - - - - Philip the Fair had from his very 'youth an eſteem for Ægidius Romanus, a Divine, 'and made him write and publiſh a book which is 'now extant de Regimine Principum. When he 'returned to Paris, from his coronation at Rheims, 'he ordered him to make a ſpeech, as is uſual on 'that occaſion, in the name of the whole univerſity.' It is true that the ſubject of this oration was de Regno: Paulus Æmilius recites it, but it is of his own compoſure. Ægidius Romanus could not expreſs himſelf otherwiſe than in the crabbed ſcholaſtic ſtile; he could not uſe the ſelected words and neat Latin which that Hiſtorian lends him. As for the reſt, the French authors have not been ſilent concerning this Spaniard's pretenſions: They have publiſhed books to convince him of his miſtake. See the Memoirs concerning the precedence of the Kings of France before the Kings of Spain, by T. Godefroy, Advocate in Parliament,

(1) I tranſcribe this from the Francfort edition, where the word extare or eſſe ſeems to be wanting.

(2) Jacobus Valdeſius, in Epiſt. Dedicat.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Paulus Æmylius, lib. viii, initio pag. m. 162, ad ann. 1286.

for twenty years. After which he was promoted to the office of counſellor in the council of Granada. His Additiones ad Roderici Suarez lecturas variorum Jurium were printed at Valladolid in 1590 (b).

Parliament, printed in 1612, but above all, the book of Mr Bulteau (5) printed at Paris 1679. The Journal des Sçavans of Feb. 11, in the ſame year, gave an extract of it.

[(§ a) That book was probably an anſwer for the King of Spain to the pretenſions of France, maintained in France by two pieces publiſhed about the year 1577, a little before the ſitting of the firſt Eſtates at Blois. They are both to be found in the Memoires de la Ligue. Tom. IV. pag. 709. & ſeq. of the edition of 1598. REM. CRIT.]

(b) Taken from Nicolas Antonio, Biblioth. Scrip. Hiſp. Tom. i, pag. 247.

(5) Secretary to the King. He is very well verſed in Hiſtory, and has a very fine library.

VALERIA,

VALERIA, Siſter to the Orator Hortenſius [A], by a very curious way came to be Sylla's wife. She was a woman of great beauty and quality, but lived in a kind of celibacy, for ſhe had lately been divorced from her huſband. Sylla having juſt loſt his wife, was preſent at a great combat of gladiators: the women ſat then promiſcuouſly with the men. Valeria going to ſit next to Sylla, ſoftly put her hand to his robe when ſhe was behind him, and pinched off a little of the wool. He looking on her with ſurprize; It is nothing, my Lord, ſaid ſhe, I would only enjoy a little of your good fortune as well as others. Theſe expreſſions, very far from diſpleaſing Sylla, inſpired him with ſome agreeable emotions. He preſently diſcovered that he was touched; he ſent to inform himſelf of the name, quality, and reputation, of the lady. After which nothing but glances [B] and mutual ſmiles paſſed between them, which at laſt ended in a promiſe of marriage [C]. The Hiſtorian (a), from whom we have this adventure, blames Sylla only; others think, that without wronging his judgment, he might alſo have cenſured Valeria [D]. Which he doth not in the leaſt; but he obſerves that her huſband was ſo far from regarding her alone, that he kept actreſſes and women-dancers in his houſe. He left her pregnant of a daughter, called Poſthumia, from her being born after the death of her father.

(a) Plutarchus, in Sylla, pag. 474.

[A] Siſter to the Orator Hortenſius.] Doubtleſs ſhe was only his ſiſter by the mother's ſide, and we ſhould ſay that Hortenſius's mother was married to a man of the antient family Valeria. But on the other ſide, we know that Hortenſius had a ſiſter, who was the mother of Valerius Meſſala (1), Conſul in the year of Rome 701. It muſt therefore be ſaid, that his mother and ſiſter married into the ſame family. I have not found any author, who hath informed me whether Valerius Meſſala's mother had the ſame father with Hortenſius, or whether ſhe was the ſame who married Sylla.

[B] Nothing but glances.] If any one is ignorant that the Greek language abounds with very ſignificant terms to expreſs the mute language of love, let him only conſider the words which I cite. Ἐκ δὲ τούτων, ῥίψεις ὀμμάτων ὑπ᾽ ἀλλήλους ἐγένοντο, καὶ παρεπιστροφαὶ συνηχεῖς προσώπων καὶ μειδιαμάτων διαδόσεις. Hinc oculorum invicem annictus, aſſiduæ ac leves in ſe mutuo vultus converſiones, riſus adjectiones (2). - - - Hereupon followed glances, ſmiles, and continual turnings of their heads to one another.

[C] Which at laſt ended in a promiſe of marriage.] Plutarch hath not exactly ſpecified whether the propoſals of marriage, and the acceptation of it, happened the ſame day at their going from the Shew. It is probable that that affair was not long a doing, and that after they had tired their eyes with making love by ſigns, while the gladiators were engaged, they broke ſilence as they were leaving the Amphitheatre. Sylla quickly took fire, and the lady was not coy: it is therefore very likely that ſhe did not put him to the trouble of aſking twice, and that as ſoon as ſhe had a glimpſe of hopes to participate of Sylla's fortunate ſtar, not by barely touching of his robe, or keeping a little of the wool of it, but by a conjugal union, ſhe abandoned herſelf to that good fortune. This was to take opportunity by the fore-lock. From glances they proceeded to converſation, and from converſation to conjugal enjoyments; all this within a day, though Plutarch doth not tell us ſo in expreſs terms.

[D] He might alſo have cenſured Valeria.] She perhaps, ſaith he, according to Amyot's verſion, does not deſerve any cenſure for her carriage on this occaſion; but tho' ſhe was the moſt honeſt and virtuous woman in the world, the occaſion of Sylla's marrying her, was neither honourable nor proper, becauſe he was ſtruck on a ſudden by an affected look and expreſſion, as if he had been a young boy, and thoſe paſſions which are moved by theſe trifles, are commonly the groſſeſt and moſt ſcandalous. Methinks I hear Brantome relate the adventures of his gallant women, after having given them the elogies of good and virtuous ladies. If a tranſlator ſhould give himſelf never ſo little liberty, he might make Plutarch ſpeak more reaſonably than he doth in Amyot's tranſlation: he might make him ſay, that tho' Sylla ſhould have met with a virtuous woman, yet he would be to blame to marry her from ſuch a principle of love as this which determined him.

(1) Valer. Maximus, lib. v, cap. ix.

(2) Plutarchus, in Vita Syllæ, pag. 474.

VALERIUS (AUGUSTIN)

VALERIUS (AUGUSTIN) Biſhop of Verona, and a Cardinal, flouriſhed towards the end of the XVIth century. He was born at Venice, and there he taught Moral Philoſophy. He perfectly underſtood the Latin tongue, which he ſpoke readily and elegantly; but could not without difficulty expreſs himſelf in his native language. His morals were very edifying, and he diſcharged the duties of a Biſhop like a good paſtor. He was created Cardinal by Gregory the XIIIth. His grief to ſee his country lie under the excommunication of Paul V, threw him into a diſtemper, of which he died (a). Beſides ſeveral other books, he compoſed an holy Rhetoric, where he informs us of a very curious particular relating to the Martyrologies [A].

(a) Taken from Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. I, pag. 170, 171.

[A] He informs us of a very curious particular relating to the Martyrologies.] In the Mercure Galant of December 1695, there is a letter inſerted, which to me ſeems excellent (1). I cannot tell how the public judges of it; but I imagine that I am not the only perſon who reliſhes it. There is in it a judicious and modeſt cenſure on a piece of Loredano (2), which had then been juſt tranſlated into French. The author ſeems to me to treat him too gently, contenting himſelf with ſaying, That he hath apparently trifled with his ſubject, and without any reſpect to the holy ſource from whence he drew it, has only painted it in the gayeſt colours of his eloquence, and adorned it with the moſt agreeable incidents which his imagination could ſuggeſt. He adds, that Lope de Vega uſed the ſame liberty in his paſtoral, where he treats of the ſhepherds coming to the manger at Bethlehem, and that he has ſeen a manuſcript in folio, written by a poor young man on the dialogue betwixt our Lord and his diſciples, as they were going to Emmaus. After this he relates, That Cardinal Valerio, Biſhop of Verona, in his book, intituled, de Rhetorica Chriſtiana, informs us, that one of the cauſes of the falſe legends of the martyrs was the cuſtom formerly obſerved in ſeveral monaſteries, to exerciſe the young Monks, by Latin exerciſes propoſed to them on the martyrdom of ſome ſaint, which giving them the liberty of introducing the tyrants and the perſecuted ſaints, as acting and ſpeaking, in ſuch a manner as appeared to them the moſt probable, at the ſame time gave them room to compoſe on theſe ſubjects a ſort of hiſtories, rather filled with ornaments and inventions than truth; but tho' they did not deſerve much regard, yet thoſe which ſeemed moſt ingenious and beſt compoſed, were laid up. So that after a long ſeries of years, they, together with other manuſcripts (3), being found in the libraries of the monaſteries, it was very difficult to diſtinguiſh theſe exerciſes of wit from the genuine hiſtories of the ſaints there alſo preſerved. It is to be confeſſed that thoſe pious writers are very excuſable, they having no other deſign than to exerciſe themſelves on holy ſubjects, could not foreſee the erroneous conſequences, which, in proceſs of time, proceeded from thence; ſo that if poſterity is thereby deceived, it is rather owing to their own want of diſcernment than a proof of the ill intention of thoſe writers. It would be hard to have the ſame regard for the famous Simeon Metaphraſtes, a Greek author, of the IXth century, who firſt gave us the lives of the ſaints for every day of the month through the whole year; ſince it is viſible they were not written for that purpoſe, but in a very ſerious manner, tho' at the ſame time amplified and ſtuffed with ſeveral imaginary events, as Bellarmin himſelf teſtifies, who plainly tells us, that Metaphraſtes writ ſeveral of the lives, as they might be, and not as they really were (4). But it is no wonder that ſuch a thing ſhould have been done by ſome Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians, through a pious zeal to honour the ſaints, and to render their lives agreeable to the people, commonly more inclined to admire thoſe they reverence than to imitate them; ſeeing this liberty crept into the very tranſlation of ſome books of the Bible; as we are informed by St Jerome, in his Preface to that of Eſther, that the Vulgar edition of that book of Holy Writ, commonly read in his time, was ſtuffed with ſeveral additions, which I cannot better expreſs than in the words of that Father. 'Quem librum, ſaith he, ſpeaking of the book of Eſther, Editio vulgata lacinoſis hinc inde verborum finibus trahit, addens ea quæ ex tempore dici potuerant, & audiri, ſicut ſolitum eſt ſcholaribus diſciplinis ſumpto themate, excogitare quibus verbis uti potuit qui injuriam paſſus, vel qui injuriam fecit. - - - Which book in the vulgar edition here and there is patched with forgeries, ſuch things being inſerted in it as might have been ſaid and heard extempore, as it is uſual when a theme is given in ſchools, to invent what might have been ſpoken by one that ſuffered or committed an injury.'

(1) You will find it in the Recueil de Pieces curieuſes, printed at the Hague for Moetjens. See Tom. v, p. 14.

(2) The life of Adam. See the remark [L], of the article EVE.

Thoſe who would ſee a vaſt number of curious and judicious obſervations on this head, need only read Mr Baillet's diſcourſe of the lives of the ſaints. Of which Mr de Beauval has given us a very good extract in his Journal for January 1701, from page 37, to 56.

(3) See the article TANAQUIL, at the end of the remark [B].

(4) Compare this with the article LAMBERT, citation (10).

VALLA (LAWRENCE) One of the moſt learned men of the XVth century, was born at Rome in 1415 [A]. He very vigorouſly attacked the barbarity under which the Latin tongue had groaned for ſeveral ages, and wrote ſome books in which he collected the elegancies of that language ſo little in uſe in the works of the ſchool-men and Civilians. But when he came to write an hiſtory, he ſhewed that he was more capable of pointing out how others ought to write, than of practiſing his own rules [B]. He was a great lover of criticiſm and contradiction, in both which he allowed himſelf a liberty which drew on him a great many enemies [C]. He had the courage to confute a falſe tradition

[A] He was born . . . . in 1415.] The proof of this I draw from his epitaph, where we find he died the firſt of Auguſt 1465, and that he lived fifty years. The words of this inſcription in the church of St John of Lateran are: 'Laurentio Vallæ harum ædium ſacrarum Canonico, Alphonſi Regis & Pontificis maximi Secretario, Apoſtolicoque ſcriptori, qui ſua ætate omnes eloquentia ſuperavit, Catharina mater filio pientiſſimo poſuit. Vixit annos L. obiit anno Domini MCCCC.LXV. Calendis Auguſti. - - - This monument was erected by Catherine, in memory of her moſt pious ſon Laurence Valla, who was canon of this church, ſecretary to King Alphonſus and the Pope, and an apoſtolic writer, who excelled all of his time in eloquence. He died on the firſt of Auguſt 1465, aged fifty years.' According to Voſſius (1), this diſtich follows the epitaph.

Laurens Valla jacet, Romanæ gloria linguæ,
Primus enim docuit qua decet arte loqui.

Here Laurence Valla lies within this tomb,
Who was the glory of the Latin tongue;
For, he it's beauties firſt made us to know,
And th' art of ſpeaking well he firſt did ſhow.

I believe he is miſtaken; theſe verſes were indeed written as a ſort of epitaph, by Franchinus of Coſenza (2), but it is no proof that they were engraved upon the tomb of the deceaſed. Paul Jovius does not ſay they were. Several perſons are miſtaken concerning the age of Laurentius Valla, and the year of his death. Some aſſure us that he ſignalized himſelf in the council of Conſtance, in 1420. 'Claruit in Concilio Conſtantienſi perſonaliter ſub Sigiſmundo Imperatore anno Domini 1420 (3). - - He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the council of Conſtance under the Emperor Sigiſmund, in the year 1420.' Here are two errors, for that council began in 1414, and ended in 1418. And we have ſeen that Laurence Valla was fifty years of age in 1465. So that he was but three years old when that council ended. Geſner hath committed the ſame fault (4); he hath made him flouriſh in 1410 (5). The learned Huetius hath alſo adopted this opinion; for when he introduces Caſaubon ſpeaking towards the latter end of the reign of Henry IV, he makes him ſay (6), that two hundred years before Laurentius Valla tranſlated Herodotus. His death is placed in 1457, by Paul Jovius (7), in 1467 by Spondanus (8), and in 1495 by Moreri.

[B] He very vigorouſly attacked the barbarity . . . . But . . . - he ſhewed that he was more capable of directing others than practiſing his own rules.] Paul Jovius furniſheth me with a proof of theſe two things. 'Indignatus tandiu corrumpi ſeculum leguleorum & ſophiſtarum immani conſpiratione, optimaſque artes inculta ſermonis barbarie defœdari, Elegantiarum libros edidit, traditis Romanæ elocutionis præceptis ex accurata veterum ſcriptorum obſervatione, quibus juventus æmulandi ſtudio ad detergendas corruptarum literarum ſordes accenderetur . . . . . apud Alphonſum regem de avitis bellis in Hiſpania, atque Sicilia geſtis hiſtoria perſcripta eſt, ſed eo ſtyli charactere, ut ejus minime videri poſſit, qui cæteris elegantiarum præcepta tradiderit (9). - - - Being much concerned that the age ſhould be ſo long corrupted thro' the vile conſpiracy of pettifoggers and ſchool-men, and that the beſt arts ſhould be defiled with groſs barbariſms, he publiſhed ſome books containing the elegancies of the Latin tongue, and laid down ſome rules for ſpeaking that language, from an accurate obſervation of antient writers; that thereby he might excite the emulation of youth to purify learning from it's droſs . . . . . Whilſt he was at the court of King Alphonſus, he wrote an hiſtory of the wars, carried on by that prince's anceſtors in Spain and Sicily, but in ſuch a ſtile, that no body would think it done by one, who had given rules for writing elegantly.'

[C] Which drew on him a great many enemies] Here is another paſſage of Paul Jovius: 'Fuit Valla ingenio maxime libero, ob idque mordaci, contentioſoque,

(1) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latinis, lib. iii, cap. vii, pag. 580. Moreri has tranſcribed this fault.

(2) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. xiii, p. 37.

(3) Trithemius, de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt.

(4) Geſner. in Bibl. fol. 477.

(5) And not in the year 1510, as Hankius, de Scriptor. Rerum Romanarum, Tom. ii, Part. i, cap. xi, pag. 118, ſays he did.

(6) I have ſet down his words, in the remark [K].

(7) Jovius, in Elog. cap. xiii, pag. 37; Boiſſard. in Iconibus, num. xiii, apud Hankium, ubi ſupra, pag. 117; Aub. le Mire, in Auctario de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. p. 275; Zeillerus, in Hiſt. Part. ii, pag. 154, agree with Paul Jovius.

(8) Spondan. in Annal. ad ann. 1467, num 13, which he grounds upon Paul Jovius, who only mentions the year 1457.

(9) Paul. Jovius, ubi ſupra, p. 36.

tradition, which greatly pleaſed the court of Rome; it was the pretended donation of Conſtantine. He left his country either by the Pope's orders, or becauſe he had rendred himſelf the object of the hatred of too many perſons (a), and retired to the court of Alphonſus King of Naples, that great protector of learned men, who deſired to learn Latin of him at 50 years of age (b). If he had confined himſelf to criticiſe on the Humaniſts, he had eſcaped ſeveral reflexions publiſhed againſt him with a great deal of animoſity, which he returned in the ſame ſtile; but he did not ſtop here, he carried his cenſures yet higher, he fell on the eccleſiaſtics, and ſpoke very boldly of certain things which they approved, and he diſliked [D]. Theſe adverſaries were much more formidable than thoſe who diſputed with him on points of literature only; they were not leſs able to revile, and beſides could dart upon him the thunders of the Inquiſition, and deliver him up to

(a) Ex civitate patria ſeu juſſu Pontificis .... ſeu ſponte migrabat. Hankius de Romanarum Rerum Scriptor. lib. ii, Part i, pag. 116. Orthuinus Gratius, in Faſciculo Rerum expetendarum, ſays, he was expelled from Rome.

(b) Cui jam quinquagenario Latinas literas anno Chriſtiano circiter 1443 tradebat. Hank. ibid.

‘ſoque, utpote qui aliena ſatirico dente facilè perſtringeret, & lites in literis, quaſi id opus eſſet, adverſus ignorantes acerrimas ſereret. Extant enim Invectivarum, & recriminationum aliquot libri, eruditè falſeque perſcripti; quibus dum læſi nominis famam tueretur, Facium Ligurem, Panhormitam, Pogium, & Raudenſem jugulaſſe videri poteſt (10). - - - Valla allowed himſelf great liberties, and was of a ſatirical and contentious diſpoſition; for he would bitterly inveigh againſt the writings of others, and maintain violent diſputes in learning againſt the ignorant, as if it were a matter of great importance. Several books of invectives and recriminations, containing much learning and wit, are extant, wherein, whilſt he endeavours to defend his wounded reputation, he ſeems to murder that of Facius, Panhormita, Pogius, and Raudenſis.’ I ſhall ſpecify the titles of ſome of his works, which will be ſufficient to prove him one of the greateſt dueliſts of the Republic of Letters, and that we may juſtly compare his life to that of a gladiator. Antidoti in Pogium Florentinum libri 4. in quibus promiſcue & mores ac vitam hominis & impuram dictionem notat. Apologus & actus Scenicus in eundem. Adverſus eundem libellus ſive dialogus ſecundus. In Antonium Raudenſem annotationum libellus. In Benedictum Morandum Bononienſem libri duo ſive confutatio prior & poſterior. In Bartolemæum Facium Ligurem & Anton. Panhormitam recriminationum libri 4. He never forgave his adverſaries one word or phraſe that ſavoured of barbariſm; which gave occaſion to the fiction after his death, that he rendered himſelf ſo formidable in Hell, that Pluto dared not preſume to ſpeak Latin. To which it was added, that Jupiter would have given him a place in Heaven, if he had not been afraid of introducing a Critic of his words. Spondanus cites the four verſes, which contain this ill-natured jeſt: ‘Acerrimâ mordacitate ſuâ & aliorum doctorum virorum veterum recentiorumque ſatyricâ perſtrictione infamis. Ut non illepidè quidam in illum mortuum, apud Trithemium * ſic luſerit.

(10) Id. ibid.

* Trith. de Script. Eccl.

Nunc poſtquam manes defunctus Valla petivit,
Non audet Pluto verba Latina loqui.
Jupiter hunc cœli dignatus parte fuiſſet,
Cenſorem linguæ ſed timet eſſe ſuæ (11) (§ α)

‘He became infamous by his bitter invectives and ſatirical reflexions on learned men, both antient and modern: ſo that it was wittily ſaid of him after his death, as we find it in Trithemius:

Since Valla's dead, and into Hell convey'd,
To ſpeak in Latin Pluto is afraid;
Jove dreads a Critic of his words in Heav'n,
Or elſe to him a place he would have giv'n.

(11) Spondanus, ad ann. 1467, num. 13, p. 114.

Cato, the cenſor, was rallied almoſt in the ſame manner.

Πυῤῥὸν, πανδακέτην, γλαυκόμματον, οὐδὲ θανόντα
Πόρκιον εἰς ἀΐδην Φερσεφόνη δέχεται.

Ruffum, mordacem, glaucum, ne quidem exanimatum
Porcium in infernum Perſephone recipit (12).

Red-hair'd Portias, and gray-ey'd,
'Gainſt every body who inveigh'd,
Tho' dead, from hell Pluto drives back,
Fearing the thunder of his clack.

(12) Plut. in Catone majore, init. pag. 336.

Another epitaph on our Valla was,

Ohe ut Valla ſilet ſolitus qui parcere nulli eſt!
Si quæris quid agat, nunc quoque mordet humum (13).

Tho' Valla, who us'd none to ſpare,
Mute in his grave is found,
If you ſhou'd aſk what he does there,
Ev'n now he bites the ground.

(13) Volaterranus, Comm. Urban. lib. xxi, pag. m. 774.

Several have believed that in writing of books, his end was not the inſtruction of his readers, but to cenſure both the living and the dead. He fell upon Ariſtotle, Cicero, Virgil, and paid no reſpects to any beſides Epicurus (14). The latter was a fit man at that time to be praiſed by thoſe, who loved to be ſingular. All the world cried out againſt him, and abhorred him; which perhaps was the reaſon that rendered him admirable to Valla's eyes. This thought is not in Pontanus, whom I here cite: ‘Qui cum Laurentio familiarius vixerunt, affirmant illum eo nequaquam conſilio in Grammaticis ſcripſiſſe, ac dialecticis, quo doceret, diſciplinaſque ab ignoratione vindicaret, atque à ſorde, verùm ut malediceret, obloquendoque detraheret de fama atque autoritate rerum ſcriptoribus; tum illis qui exemplo ſunt ad ſcribendum aliis propter antiquitatem majeſtatemque dicendi, ac præcipiendi, tum illis ipſis, qui tunc viverent, qui ne dubitaverit ipſe quidem dicere, profiterique palàm, habere ſe quoque in Chriſtum ſpicula (15). Thoſe who were intimate with Valla, ſay, that he did not write Grammar or Logic to inſtruct his readers, or reſcue learning from ignorance and error, but to cenſure and leſſen the reputation of other writers, both ſuch as deſerve to be imitated for antiquity and majeſty of ſtile, and thoſe who were cotemporary with himſelf: and that he did not ſcruple to declare openly, that he had arrows in his quiver againſt Chriſt himſelf.’ This learned man, notwithſtanding, did not want defenders: read the writings of Floridus Sabinus, and Eraſmus's Epiſtle to Chriſtopher Fiſher in 1505 (16), occaſioned by Valla's Notes on the New Teſtament, which he found in a library, and which he publiſhed. See alſo the third letter of the ſeventh book of Eraſmus's Epiſtles.

(14) Ciceronem vellicabat, Ariſtotelem carpebat, Virgilio ſubſannabat... maximis quibuſque ringeret autoribus uni tantum Epicuro aſſurgeret. Jovianus Pontanus, de Sermone, lib. i, pag. m. 1572.

(15) Id. ibid.

(16) It is the viith of book iv.

[(§ α) This epigram, which we find likewiſe in a letter of Goudanus to Eraſmus, is there aſcribed to Pogius. See the Memoires de Litterature, Tom. ii. pag. 50. Part i. REM. CRIT.]

[D] He fell on the Eccleſiaſtics, and ſpoke very boldly of certain things ... which he diſliked] It is agreed that his cenſure was not only perſonal, but alſo real in ſome reſpects; for he cenſured the faults of the Eccleſiaſtics, and ſome of their opinions. ‘Ipſos etiam ſui ſæculi Theologos ſeu ignorantia ſupina ſeu inveterata perſuaſione vanis opinionibus indormientes, ad veri ſenſum acutiore ſtilo excitare nihil veritus eſt ... quod in publicis Scriptis quaſdam Eccleſiæ Romanæ traditiones erroris damnaviſſet, aliis ipſe gravis cenſor, hæreticæ pravitatis cenſores ſibi graviſſimos ſentiebat (17). - - - He was not afraid to uſe a ſharpe ſtile to excite the Clergy of his own time to a ſenſe of the truth, who, through groſs ignorance, or inveterate prejudice, entertained ridiculous opinions .... As he was a ſevere Critic on others, ſo he found others ſevere on him, as being an Heretic, becauſe he had condemned ſome traditions of the Roman Church as erroneous.’ He was told, that unleſs he was weary of his life, he ought to refrain from cenſuring the Eccleſiaſtics, and writing ſuch tracts as his refutation of Conſtantine's donation. Two to the penal laws of the ſecular power. They proſecuted him ſo violently that he had been burnt alive, if King Alfonſus had not moderated their rigour (c). They were then obliged to content themſelves with whipping him round the Jacobins cloiſter. He returned to Rome, where he found ſo good patrons that they obtained for him the Pope's favour, and leave to teach, beſides a penſion (d). He died there on the 1ſt of Auguſt 1465, as appears by the epitaph (e) which his mother cauſed to be engraven in the church of St John de Lateran of which he had been canon. I ſhall give you the ſubſtance of a long relation which I have met with of his quarrels with the inquiſitors [E]. We find beſides that he had drawn on himſelf the violent enmity of a Civilian, whom he had gravelled in a diſputation. He was provoked to this diſpute by an air of contempt, which doubtleſs increaſed the rage of the aggreſſor. He is blamed for being a little too vain; for he things raiſed him enemies, he had galled the ſacred heads by cenſuring both their morals and opinions. ‘Et ſanè à Franciſco Philelpho etiam commonitus eſt ſatyra luculenta, ut niſi vitæ ſuæ fatur ſit, abſtinere velit à perſtringendis ſacri ordinis viris, ac ſimilibus ſcribendis, uti illa adverſus donationem Conſtantinam. Satyra ea exſtat Hecatoſtichorum lib. ii. ſat. iv (18). And, indeed, he was admoniſhed by Francis Philelphus in a fine ſatire, to forbear cenſuring the Clergy, as he valued his life, and writing ſuch tracts as his refutation of Conſtantine's donation. That ſatire is in Hecatoſtichorum, lib. ii. ſat. iv.’ Several people take one of theſe two things for the true cauſe of the perſecution which he ſuffered, and the other for the pretence. His perſonal ſatires irritated the inquiſitors, who, in order to be revenged on him, endeavoured to convict him of Hereſy. The better to ſatisfy their reſentment they accuſed Laurentius Valla of Hereſy in ſeveral points of great conſequence, ſuch as the Myſtery of the Trinity, the Doctrine of Free-will, and Vows of Celibacy, &c. It is affirmed, that he was condemned to be burnt, the execution of which ſentence he eſcaped only by the favour of the King of Naples; that he was obliged publickly to abjure the aſſertions for which he had been condemned, and beſides, to ſuffer the chaſtiſement of the laſh in the Jacobins monaſtery. Spondanus's words, in the year 1447, are: ‘Eodem tempore Laurentius Valla Romanus, elegantis quidem pro ſæculo, ſed pro quolibet tempore virulentiſſimæ linguæ homo; Neapoli exiſtens, cùm quaſdam propoſitiones hæreticas aſſeruiſſet, delatus ad Inquiſitores, & in carcerem truſus, damnatuſque pro hæretico, beneficio Alfonſi Regis pœnam ignis evaſit; propoſitionibus tamen publicè ejuratis, virgis, privatim per clauſtra monaſterii Prædicatorum manibus revinctis cæſus (19). - - - At the ſame time Laurentius Valla, a man learned indeed for that age, but of a moſt virulent tongue, for any age whatſoever, having advanced ſome heretical propoſitions, was brought before the Inquiſitors, thrown into priſon, and condemned to be burnt as an Heretic, but by favour of King Alphonſus he eſcaped the execution of that ſentence: however, having publickly abjured thoſe propoſitions, he was privately whipped round the cloiſters of the Jacobine monaſtery, with his hands tied behind him.’ He adds, that Poggius inſinuates that Laurentius Valla had erred on thoſe articles, which I have mentioned above (20). This is very remarkable. Spondanus doth not cite the propoſitions which Laurentius Valla was obliged to retract; he doth not even ſay that they contained Hereſies relating to the Trinity, Free-will, &c. he ſaith only that one of Laurentius Valla's enemies inſinuates it. This may make us think that Valla's doctrine was miſrepreſented by captious and malicious extracts, that it was charged as erroneous, tho' not really ſo. Obſerve, that notwithſtanding all the miſchievous efforts of the Neapolitan Inquiſitors, he lived honourably at Rome; he there obtained permiſſion to teach; he enjoyed a penſion, and the Pope's eſteem. This confirms the opinion of thoſe who conjecture he was no Heretic, but that it was reſolved he ſhould be chaſtiſed for having cenſured the Clergy. See the following remark.

(17) Hankius, ubi ſupra.

things

[E] I ſhall give the ſubſtance of a . . . relation which I have met with of his quarrels with the Inquiſitors.] The author whom I cite mentions theſe quarrels, after having related a diſpute which Laurentius Valla had on a point of law. A Civilian cenſured him very ſeverely: You are, ſaid he, a Shoemaker, you go beyond your laſt, you do not content yourſelf with the ſtudy of Philology, you thruſt your ſickle into other peoples harveſt, and pretend to underſtand the Roman Law (21). Explain me then that place of the Code, ſhewing him the famous puzzling Law, Quinque pedum Præſcriptione (22). Valla replied, that nothing could be more unjuſt than to pretend that he was abſolutely ignorant of the Roman Law, if he did not explain a paſſage which ſcarce any perſon had yet underſtood; that he ought not to propoſe this difficulty to thoſe who only believe they have ſome knowledge of the antient Law, but unto ſuch as pretend to underſtand every part of it. Quid improbius quam velle damnare me, ut nihil juris intelligentem, quia locum aut nulli, aut vix ulli intellectum non expoſuerim? Debuiſſe illum proponi non ei qui aliquid juris ſe intelligere diceret, ſed ei qui omnia (23). He nevertheleſs, by the explication of the queſtion, diſcovered that he very well underſtood the Roman Law; after which, in his turn, he propoſed a queſtion to the Civilian, and ſilenced him. This aggreſſor finding himſelf gravelled by the queſtions put to him concerning the right of preſcriptions eſtabliſhed in the XII tables, withdrew in a rage, and from that time conceived ſuch a mortal hatred againſt Valla that he attempted his life. Aliâ è Jure quæſtione petita adverſarium ad ſilentium adegit. Nam cum de Jure Uſucapionum ex duodecim tabulis nonnihil rogaret, in eas anguſtias eundem illum ſuum adverſarium adduxit, ut hic in conclave, velut furens ſe receperit, atque ex eo tempore homo vindictæ cupidiſſimus, odio pluſquam Vatiniano Vallam fuerit proſequutus, vitæque ejus inſidiatus (24). This is the firſt part of Boxhornius's relation, the ſecond follows.

As the ſcience of the Divines is more holy and more neceſſary, continues he, and their authority greater, Valla could not attack their follies without expoſing himſelf to the greateſt dangers. Ut Theologorum & ſanctior magiſque neceſſaria diſciplina eſt, & auctoritas major, ita cum eorum quoque ignorantia & putidiſſimis ineptiis commiſſus, vitam ac omnes fortunas ſuas in ultimum pene diſcrimen adduxit (25). He was preſent at a Lent ſermon, preached by a Franciſcan (26) at Naples, he was one of the auditory, I ſay, when the Monk took for his text the Apoſtles Creed. And having obſerved the preacher to affirm that St Peter ſaid, I believe in God the Father Almighty, that St Andrew added, Creator of Heaven and Earth, and that the other Apoſtles furniſhed the reſt of the articles in their turn; after the ſermon was ended, he aſked Angelillus Campanus (27), whether there were any authors who related that the Creed was compoſed in this manner? Campanus anſwered, that he had never met with it in any book, and that this Monk was the only perſon whom he ever heard aver that St Jerom was born at Rome. They made him a viſit, and aſked him where he had read that this holy Father was a Roman. Several affirm it, replied he, but who denies it? Valla laughed at this incongruity (28), for it is he that affirms, who ought to produce his evidence, and eſpecially when required; and others are not to name thoſe who deny it. Yet he did not fail to obſerve to the preacher, that St Jerom makes himſelf a native of a town in Dalmatia. ‘Hieronymus ipſe non ſe Romanum dicit, ſed Pannonium aut Dalmatam ex oppido Stridone (29). - - - Jerom himſelf does not ſay he was born at Rome, but at Stridon in Pannonia, or Dalmatia.’ Some, anſwered the Monk, ſay he was a Roman, and others, that he was a Dalmatian. There were two faults in this anſwer. Could any witneſs worth hearing be oppoſed to St Jerom himſelf? And after all, ought he not to have named his evidence? Valla finding the ignorance and obſtinacy of the man left that ſubject (30), and proceeded to the queſtion concerning the Creed. What ground

---

(c) See the remark [D].

(d) Ibi quorundam patronorum ope ſic faventem ſibi reddebat Pontificem ut ab eo non tantum docendi poteſtatem ſed ſtipendium quoque conſequeretur. Id. ibid.

(e) See the remark [A].

(18) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 580.

(19) Spondan. ad. ann. 1447, num. 10, pag. m. 3.

(20) Quod prolixiùs narrant Poggius ſecundâ in eum invectivâ, errâſſe innuit in articulis Perſonæ in Deo, Trinitatis, Liberi Arbitrii, & Virginitatis ſanctimonialium. Id. ib.

(21) Vallam aliquando acerbe increpuit quod, ut ſutor ultra crepidam, humaniorum literarum cultu haud contentus falcem mitteret in meſſem alienam, & Juris Romani peritiam aliquam ſibi arrogaret. Boxhornius, Hiſtor. Univerſ. pag. 953, Edit. 1652.

(22) Quem (locum) obſcuriſſimum, & à nemine ejus ætatis Juriſconſultorum intellectum, imo depoſitum eſſe conſtabat. Id. ib. pag. 954. See the article ABELARD, remark [AA].

(23) Boxhorn. Hiſt. Univerſ. pag. 953.

(24) Id. ibid.

(25) Id. ibid.

(26) His name was Antonius Betontinus.

(27) He was Secretary to the King.

(28) Primum hominis ſtultitiam riſu Valla excepit quaſi alius deberet oſtendere qui negaret, & non ipſe qui hoc affirmaverat, & quis traderet rogabatur. Id. ib.

(29) Id. ibid.

(30) Cognitæ hominis imperitia & improbitate, ultra noluit inſtare. Id. ib. pag. 955.

he made too great a ſhew of his wit and learning, which he diſplayed with more pride and oſtentation in the converſation of learned men, than in his works [F]. This is the character of thoſe who aim at being paid on the ſpot, and are willing to be the witneſſes of the admiration they aſpire after. He embraced Epicurus's opinion with reſpect to the ſovereign good [G], but ſo rectified as to render it agreeable to the principles of Chriſtianity. He was an exceſſive admirer of Quintilian, and affected to deſpiſe Ariſtotle [H]. It is ſaid that at table he once let fall this expreſſion, that he had arrows in his quiver againſt ground have you, ſaid he, to aſſert that the Apoſtles formed it by pieces ? The Doctors of the Church, anſwered the Monk, have informed me ſo. Name them, replied he, cite them. I have already anſwered you, ſaid he, and then growing very angry, he ſaid, that Valla was an impious man, and an enemy to the Chriſtian religion (31). Some days after he defamed him in a ſermon, and continued to inveigh againſt him ſo outrageouſly, that King Alphonſus was obliged to ſtop the torrent of his calumnies. Valla thinking he was challenged to diſpute with him, affixed to the great church all the propoſitions which he found cenſured, and offered to maintain them againſt all opponents. To this ſight he invited ſeveral ſpectators, and even the king's ſon. He prepared a very ſpacious hall : every body was very attentive on the iſſue of this affair, but Valla's enemies would hazard nothing : in order to ſtrengthen themſelves, they made intereſt at court that Valla might be forbidden to proceed any farther. He obeyed, but inſulted his adverſaries by a Latin diſtich, which he affixed to the door of the hall.

Rex pacis, miſerans ſternendas Marte phalanges
 Victoris cupidum continuit gladium.

The king foreſeeing, what ſlaughter would be made,
The victor's eager ſword in pity ſtaid.

After this they became ſo incenſed that they uſed their utmoſt endeavours either to have him condemned to death, or a perpetual impriſonment. They cited him before the Archbiſhop's Vicar-general. He appeared, and was ſurprized to ſee a numerous croud of Monks ; for he never once ſuſpected that this intrigue was of that importance. He was aſked whether he did not believe that the Creed was compiled by the Apoſtles ? No, ſaid he, but by the Council of Nice, I ground myſelf on very ſtrong reaſons. The Inquiſitor, who interrogated him, declared, that the anſwer was heretical. Some letters were produced, in which Valla corrected ſome errors, which by the negligence of the copiers had crept into the Pope's decrees, and it was urged againſt him, that this inſolence deſerved burning. He perceived the danger, and proteſted that on all theſe heads he believed as the Church believed. They preſſed him to condemn and retract his writings ; but he deſired that firſt they would pleaſe to ſhew wherein he was miſtaken, otherwiſe they would plainly make it appear that they did not aim at the correction of his heart, but only at that of his tongue. ‘ Cur non potius vos docetis eſſe revocanda ? an mavultis oris mei quam animi emendationem ? quo enim pacto ego emendor, niſi id quod ore fateor, animo etiam ſentiam ? Et quomodo ex animo ſentiam niſi ſententiam, quam ut veriſſimam hactenus tueor, vos falſi convincatis (32) ? - - - Why do not you rather ſhew me what ought to be retracted ? Do you deſire the correction of my tongue more than of my heart ? For how can I amend, unleſs I believe in my heart what I profeſs with my mouth ? And how can I believe in my heart, unleſs you prove to be falſe what I have hitherto maintained to be true ? ’ A Biſhop then laid hold on him, and cried out, Wicked wretch that thou art, thy pride muſt be immediately abated (33). Valla repeated as before, I believe all that the Church believes. He was afterwards aſked what he thought of the ten Categories. What, replied he, do they belong to matters of Faith as the ten Commandments of the Divine Law ? Why, replied they, ſhould they not belong to Religion ? Are you ignorant that the Logical Doctrine, ſenſus diviſus, ſenſus compoſitus, ſerves to explain the moſt important controverſies in Theology (34) ? To ſhorten the diſpute, anſwered Valla, I declare, that though our holy Mother the Church knows nothing of the matter, yet I believe all that ſhe believes concerning it. Age, inquit Valla, rem compendii faciamus : etſi iſta mater Eccleſia ignoret, tamen idem de illis credo quod mater Eccleſia. They would have proceeded ; but the king having ſent people to protect Valla, they ſtopped there.

I find two faults in this long relation of Boxhornius : one is, that he refers all theſe things to the year 1411, which is before the birth of Valla ; the other, that he cites no author.

[F] He diſplayed with more pride . . . in the converſation . . . . than in his works.] Jovianus Pontanus makes this obſervation after having very much praiſed the modeſty of Pomponius Lætus. ‘ Contra vero, continues he (35), Laurentius Vallenſis, multæ vir doctrinæ, ingeniique in primis acuti, popularibus in congreſſibus, ac literatorum circulis oſtentandæ diſciplinæ judicatus eſt fuiſſe ſtudioſior, ne dicam parum modeſtus, ut in iis circulis multo appareret diligentior, quam in libris ipſis, quos ſcriptos reliquit. Cumque non pauca in Dialecticis adinveniſſet adverſus horum temporum artis ejus magiſtros, eo ſeſe efferebat, palàm ut diceret, nullam eſſe Logicam præter Laurentianam. - - - On the other hand, Laurentius Valla, a man of great learning and penetration, when he was in public aſſemblies, and in company with learned men, was thought to be too forward, not to ſay that he wanted modeſty, in ſhewing his learning, ſo that in thoſe companies he diſplayed it more than in his books. And when he had found out ſeveral things in Logic againſt the maſters of that art in thoſe times, he was ſo vain as to ſay in public, that there was no Logic but the Laurentian.’

[G] He embraced Epicurus's opinion, with reſpect to the ſovereign good.] See his book de voluptate & vero bono, which was put into the Index as a book the reading of which is prohibited. See alſo the book, which he calls Apologia pro ſe & contra calumniatores ad Eugenium quartum Pont. Maximum. You will there find that he chiefly juſtifies what he had taught, that pleaſure is the ſovereign good. ‘ Defendit ſe ſuaque ſcripta, & PRÆCIPUE quod voluptatem ſtatuerit ſummum bonum, Virtutes ancillas eſſe voluptatis, Prudentiam non à malitia, Nihil amari propter aliud, nec etiam propter ſe, Præſcientiam Dei non obſtare arbitrii libertati : Symbolum non factum eſſe ab apoſtolis per particulas (36). - - He defended himſelf and his writings, and PARTICULARLY what he had taught, that pleaſure is the chief good, that the virtues were the handmaids of pleaſure, that prudence differed not from malice, that nothing was loved either for it's own ſake, or that of another, that GOD's preſcience was no obſtacle to free-will, and that the Apoſtles did not compoſe the Creed by pieces.’

[H] He was an exceſſive admirer of Quintilian, and affected to deſpiſe Ariſtotle.] Voſſius furniſhes me with the comment I want on this head. I borrow it from that place where he attemps to prove that Ariſtotle is the greateſt maſter of Rhetoric that we can imitate. ‘ Neque nos, adds he (37) aut Auſonii judicium movet, qui Latinorum tantùm rationem habuit : aut Vallenſis (quamvis viri non minùs de Rep. literariâ meriti, quàm Camillus olim de Romanâ) elogium terret : quia ille, nec in Fabio laudando modum invênit, nec in Ariſtotele, Tullio, Priſciano, (& quo non, ſi unum Fabium demas) ? inſectando, ſæpe habeat cauſſam. - - - I am not moved at the judgment of Auſonius, which only regards the Latins : nor does the encomiums of Valla (tho' a man who deſerved no leſs of the Republic of Letters, than Camillus formerly did that of Rome) terrify me ; becauſe he obſerved no bounds in extolling Quintilian, and frequently, without cauſe, cenſured Ariſtotle, Cicero, Priſcian, and every body elſe except Quintilian.’ The following words are remarkable : ‘ Videtur autem vir ille nimis quantum liberaliter Quinctilianum ſuſtuliſſe laudibus, quod videret Georgium Trapezuntium perpetuum eſſe in hoc inceſſendo. Nam & lib. iv. Antidoti ſcribit, (31) Vehementer in Vallam velut impium hominem & Chriſtianæ rei Eccleſiæque hoſtem exorſus eſt ſtomachari. Id. ibid.

(32) Id. ibid.

(33) Tum Aleſanus Epiſcopus ejuſdem Ordinis (Prædicatorum) manus ei injecit & tibi, inquit, homo ſceleſtiſſime ſuperbia hic deponenda eſt. Id. ib.

(34) Quidni, inquit, Aleſanus, ad fidem iſta pertineant ? An ignoras ex illo dogmate Dialecticorum de ſenſu diviſo & compoſito graviſſimas in Theologia controverſias explicari, Id. ibid.

(35) Jov. Pontanus, de Sermone, lib. vi, cap. iv, pag. 1737.

(36) Geſner. in Bibl. fol. 478.

(37) Voſſius, de Rhetoricæ natura ac conſtitutione, pag. 48.

againſt the Meſſiah himſelf [I]. He did not underſtand Greek well enough to undertake, as he did, the tranſlation of Thucydides, Herodotus, and Homer's Iliad: theſe verſions are not good [K], but his notes on the New Teſtament are not amiſs. See what Mr Simon ſaith of them (f). He was much more learned in Latin than in Greek, as his book of Elegancies compared with his verſions of Thucydides, &c. proves: He is falſely accuſed of having ſtolen it [L]. Ludovicus Vives praiſes him for a thing which deſerves to be known [M]. Mr Varillas hath committed ſeveral errors [N].

ſcribit, ea de cauſsâ ſibi ſemeſtri integro cum Trapezuntio fuiſſe contentionem; neque in gratiam cum eo rediiſſe, niſi cùm is publicè docendi provinciam deſineret. - - - But he ſeems to have loaded Quintilian with ſuch immoderate praiſes, becauſe he found Georgius Trapezuntius continually attacked him. For in the fourth book of his Preſervative he writes, that upon that account he maintained a diſpute with Trapezuntius for ſix months together: and was never reconciled to him, till he laid down his office of teaching in public.' I believe, with Voſſius, that the ſpirit of contradiction hurried Laurentius Valla to this exceſs of admiration of Quintilian: he had an adverſary who continually declaimed againſt this Rhetorician, he wanted no other reaſon to eſpouſe the contrary party. In his Logic he depreſſes as much as he could the authority of Ariſtotle.

[I] It is ſaid that he once let fall this expreſſion; that he had arrows in his quiver againſt the Meſſiah himſelf.] We are told that he uttered this blaſphemy to Antonius Panormita. This was doubtleſs whiſpered in his ear (38), and not ſpoke ſo loud that all at the table could hear it. Panormita trembled with horror, and would no more ſpeak to him. ‘Taceo, ſaith Voſſius (39), quòd neque in Chriſtum (horrendum!) ſpicula ſibi deeſſe dicebat; ut quidem ſcripſit Jovianus Pontanus †: & ante eum Poggius ſecundâ in Vallam Invectivâ ‡, ubi exprobrat, quod hoc in convivio dixerit Antonio Panormitæ: qui propterea exhorruerit, & alloquio ulteriùs dignum negarit. - - - I paſs by his expreſſion, that he had arrows (O horrible!) againſt CHRIST himſelf: as Jovianus Pontanus writes, and before him Poggius, in his ſecond Invective againſt Valla, where he upbraids him with having ſaid this to Antonius Panormita, who trembled with horror, and would talk no more to him.' Spondanus (40) has not forgot this, after having told us that this Critic ſpared neither St Auguſtin, St Jerom, nor Boëtius. We may add, that he had no mercy on Thomas Aquinas. ‘His ſtile is too free, cenſuring too ſeverely the faults of Remigius, Thomas Aquinas, and ſome other writers, who preſumed to comment on St Paul (according to him) without any knowledge of the Greek tongue. He rejects as an idle tale what is commonly ſaid of that Apoſtle appearing to Thomas Aquinas, and aſſuring him that no man ſo well underſtood his Epiſtles as himſelf. If this had been true, ſaith he, he had not failed to give him notice of his faults,' ‡ Peream niſi id commentitium: Nam cur eum Paulus non admonuit erratorum ſuorum (41)? He ſeveral times injudiciouſly reprehended the Popes, as when he accuſed Celeſtin IV of being a Neſtorian. Father Theophilus Raynaud loads him with invectives on this account (42).

[K] Theſe verſions are not good.] Let us ſee what Huetius ſuppoſes that Caſaubon thought of them. ‘Annis ab hinc ducentis Herodotum & Thucydidem Latinis literis exponebat Laurentius Valla, in eâ bene & eleganter dicendi copiâ, quam totis voluminibus explicavit, inelegans tamen, & pene barbarus; Græcis ad hoc literis leviter tinctus, ad auctorum ſententias parùm attentus, oſcitans ſæpe, & alias res agens, fidem apud eruditos decoxit (43). - - - About two hundred years ago, Laurentius Valla tranſlated Herodotus and Thucydides into Latin: but tho' the originals are writ ſo elegantly, yet his verſion is inelegant and almoſt barbarous. He was little acquainted with the Greek, unattentive to the ſenſe of his authors, often negligent and careleſs, and thereby loſt his credit with the learned.'

[L] As his book of Elegancies .... proves: He is falſely accuſed of having ſtolen it.] This book hath been printed a great many times. He ſays in the epiſtle dedicatory that it was publiſhed, without his order or conſent. This epiſtle dedicatory was inſcribed to Tortellius, Chamberlain to Nicolas V. It is without any date, notwithſtanding which one may ſee that it was written in that Pope's time. In thoſe days it was very difficult to collect ſo many obſervations: It required a vaſt ſtudy, and a ſtrong genius. The great ſucceſs of this book vexed the author's enemies, and moved them to ſay that he appeared in borrowed feathers, and that the piece was really a production of Aſconius Pedianus. This calumny, which at the bottom very much redounded to Valla's glory, met with no credit. Voſſius was very much in the right to call it impudent: ‘Admodum perfrictæ frontis fuiſſe neceſſe eſt, qui, cùm Laurentii Vallenſis Elegantiarum libros in honore eſſe dolerent, in vulgus ſparſere, eos jam olim in Germania fuiſſe repertos, quodque ſcripti eſſent literis fugientibus ac fatiſcentibus vix certis cognitum indiciis tandem fuiſſe, Aſconii Pediani eſſe opus: cujus calumniæ meminit Mariangelus Accurſius in diatribarum ſuarum defenſione, cui Teſtudo nomen fecit (44). - - - - Thoſe men muſt have been very impudent, who, being vexed that Valla's book of Elegancies was eſteemed, gave out, that it had been found long before in Germany, and that becauſe it was not writ in a fair hand, it was at laſt with difficulty diſcovered to be the performance of Aſconius Pedianus; which calumny is mentioned by Mariangelus Accurſius in the defence of his diſſertations intituled Teſtudo.

[M] Ludovicus Vives praiſes him for a thing, which deſerves to be known.] Notwithſtanding Valla's great diligence in diſcovering the propriety of terms, and teaching it his readers, yet he ſpared his pains when he met with an obſcene word, and ſeemed rather to deſire that its meaning ſhould remain unknown. This Vives with a great deal of reaſon approves. ‘Bene Laurentius Valla de verbo quodam obſcœno, ignorari malo quam me docente ſciri (45). - - - - Laurentius Valla ſaid well concerning an obſcene word, I had rather it ſhould remain unknown than be made known by my means.'

[N] Mr Varillas hath committed ſeveral errors.] I. He ſaith (46) that Laurence Valla, finding no longer any body to cenſure in the court of Rome, went to that of Naples. This is a double miſtake, he hath ill tranſlated his original, and advanced a thing, that has but little truth in it. The Latin which Varillas tranſlates, ſignifies that Laurentius Valla finding nothing at the Pope's court which pleaſed him, went to that of Alphonſus King of Naples (47). Is this to ſay, that he found no longer any body to cenſure in the court of Rome? Doth not this rather inſinuate the contrary, that there remained yet a great many to cenſure? For when every thing in a court diſpleaſes, the ſubject of cenſure is not exhauſted. We may take it for granted that a perſon of Valla's humour could never leave Rome for want of objects on which to employ his cenſure, becauſe all that could be ſaid againſt that court had already been ſaid. II. Valla did not offer to write the hiſtory of the moſt illuſtrious events of Naples: But he wrote the Hiſtory of Ferdinand King of Caſtile and Arragon, the Father of Alphonſus King of Naples. Here are two faults more; Paul Jovius's Latin ill tranſlated (48), and a falſity in the fact itſelf. III. There is a great deal of exceſs in the judgment Varillas paſſes againſt that book of Valla. He wrote it .... with ſo little ſucceſs, they are his own words, that his adverſaries had room enough to reproach his falling into all the faults which he had cenſured in others. He commits a third time the two errors, which I have mentioned. Paul Jovius's Latin (49) ſaith no ſuch thing, and it is utterly falſe that Laurentius Valla in writing this book, was guilty of all the barbariſms with which he charges other authors. IV. No body believes, though Mr Varillas's aſſures it, that Laurentius Valla exiled himſelf from the court of Naples, becauſe this work was ſlighted. He had other and more ſevere diſgraces (50), which forced him to leave that court. V. It is very ridiculous to imagine that this learned man's mother made his epitaph. It is true we find theſe words in the inſcription on his tomb, Catharina mater filio pientiſſimo

(f) In chap. xxxiv, of the Critical Hiſtory of the Commentators on the New Teſtament.

(38) Yet Pontanus ſays, as we have already ſeen, profiterique PALAM habere ſe quoque in Chriſtum ſpicula.

(39) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

† Lib. I. de ſermone.

‡ Fol. 87. edit. anni 1513.

(40) Spondanus, ad ann. 1447, num. 10.

‡ Laur. Vall. Not. in Epiſt. I. ad Cor. cap. ix, ver. 13.

(41) Simon, Hiſtoire Critique des Commentateurs du Nouveau Teſtament. chap. xxxiv, pag. 485.

(42) Theophil. Raynaudus, in Hoploth. §. ii, Serie i, cap. v, pag. m. 16, 17.

(43) Huetius, de claris Interpretibus, pag. m. 218.

(44) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latinis, lib. i, cap. xxvii, pag. 144. He quotes the Teſtudo of Mariangelus Accurſius.

(45) Lud. Vives de tradendis Diſciplinis, lib. iii, pag. m. 287.

(46) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 166.

(47) Quod nihil in aula Pontificis ſibi placeret Neapolim ad Alfonſum regem ſe contulit. Jovius, ubi ſupra, p. 36.

(48) Apud quem (Alfonſum regem) de avitis bellis in Hiſpania atque Sicilia geſtis hiſtoria perſcripta eſt. Id. ib.

(49) Eo ſtyli charactere ut ejus minime videri poſſit qui cæteris elegantiarum præcepta tradiderit. Id. ibid.

(50) See, above, the remark [D].

poſuit; but according to the ſtyle of epitaphs, this imports no more, than that his mother cauſed his tomb to be erected. And allowing this falſe principle of Varillas, we may eaſily believe that ſeveral perſons who never underſtood one Latin word; have written very fine epitaphs in that language; for we find a great many under which we read mæſtiſſima conjux or mater, or filia poſuit, or mæſtiſſimi filii poſuerunt. VI. As one fault often introduces another, Mr Varillas falls into a freſh miſtake; for believing that Laurentius Valla's mother made her ſon's epitaph, he avers that no body would ſave her that trouble. VII. As to what he ſaith of Valla, that he gave an ill example in the commonwealth of learning, by publiſhing firſt (51) intire books of invectives and recriminations, I refer him to Mr de Larroque, who hath ſhewed him (52) that St Gregory Nazianzen, and St Hilary publiſhed invectives, the one againſt the Emperor Julian, and the other againſt the Emperor Conſtantius. We may yet go higher, for though there is room to doubt whether Salluſt's invective againſt Cicero, and that of Cicero againſt Salluſt, are really the performance of thoſe authors whoſe names they bear, yet it is certain that they are older than Conſtantine's time. It cannot be ſaid that Varillas intended only to ſpeak of Chriſtian writers; for the republic of letters of which he is ſpeaking doth not exclude Pagan authors. But if we ſhould have the complaiſance to confine ourſelves to the limits of Chriſtianity, we ſhould yet find other examples beſides thoſe mentioned by Mr Larroque. Have we not two works full of invectives, written by Ruffinus againſt St Jerom (53)? I elſewhere (54) mention an invective written in the very age of Laurentius Valla, but before he thought of writing his. And Petrarch who preceded him one hundred years, did not he write invectives againſt a Phyſician? VIII. It is not true that Laurentius Valla praiſed no Grammarian of his time beſides Candidus December (55). This is to be guilty of the ſame fault a fourth time; for the fact is utterly falſe, and he hath very ill tranſlated his original (56). Paul Jovius's words tend to the praiſe of December without excluding any other Grammarian.

(51) A groſs fault in diction; for thoſe words may be taken in this ſenſe, amongſt the intire books of Invectives, the firſt in rank was publiſhed by Laurentius Valla.

(52) Larroque, preface to the Nouvelles Accuſations contre Mr Varillas.

(53) They are commonly printed in the ninth volume of St Jerom's works.

(54) In the remark [B], of the article VERGERIUS.

(55) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 167.

(56) Candidus December . . . Laurentii Vallæ teſtimonio exactiſſimæ cenſuræ Grammaticus. Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. xv, pag. 39.

VALLA (GEORGE) a native of Piacenza. He was a phyſician and profeſſor of polite learning at Venice, and flouriſhed after the middle of the XVth century (a). He was very well acquainted with the Greek and Latin tongues, and wrote ſeveral books of Phyſic and Literature [A]. He ſo irritated the Duke of Milan by his too impetuous zeal for the Trivulcian faction that the Duke perſecuted him, even to that degree as to cauſe him to be impriſoned at Venice (b). He endured the moſt grievous hardſhips in this confinement; but being tried was acquitted, and his poſt reſtored to him. He did not long enjoy it, a ſudden death hurrying him out of the world ſoon after. He was juſt going out of his apartment in order to read his lecture; nothing ſtopped him but a natural neceſſity to go to the neceſſary houſe, where he expired in the ſame manner as Arius the Hereſiarch. His ſcholars waited a long while in the auditory, and were ſeized with great ſorrow [B], when acquainted with the reaſon why he did not come. He was that day to continue his explication of a paſſage in Cicero's Tuſculanæ Quæſtiones, which concerns the immortality of the ſoul (c). Pierius Valerianus, who informs me of this particular,

(a) Claruit ſub Friderico III. juxta Trittemium verò ſub Maximiliano Venetiis A.C. 1494. Juſtus in Chronol. Medic. Merklinus, in Lindenio renovato, pag. 342. Konig places him in the year 1528. Mr Baillet, Jugemens des Sçavans, num. 909, ſuppoſes that he was alive in 1541.

(b) Pierius Valerianus, de Literatorum Infelicitate, lib. i, pag. m. 27.

(c) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, ibid.

[A] He wrote ſeveral books of Phyſic and Literature.] The titles of ſome of them are: De tuenda ſanitate per victum, & quæ ſecundum cujuſque naturam in victu ſequenda aut fugienda ſunt. De humani corporis partibus. De differentiis pulſuum. De corporis commodis & incommodis. Univerſæ medicinæ ex Græcis potiſſimum contractæ libri ſeptem. It is obſerved in Lindenius renovatus, that the laſt tract is a part of that intituled expetenda & fugienda (1). We may add that our Valla tranſlated out of Greek Rhazis de Peſtilentia, Pſellus de victus ratione, Alexander Aphrodiſienſis de febrium cauſis & differentiis, Nemeſius de Natura hominis (2), and ſome others (3). It is to be obſerved that Huetius calls him a very bad tranſlator (4). The books of Literature compoſed by Valla, are either treatiſes of Grammar and Rhetoric, or commentaries on ſome books of Tully, on Horace's Art of Poetry, on Juvenal, &c. He alſo commented on the ſecond book of Pliny: That work was printed at Venice in 1502, in 4to (§ α) and muſt needs be very ſcarce ſince Father Hardouin could not meet with it (5). But we muſt not forget his book de expetendis & fugiendis rebus: It is a ſort of Encyclopedia or body of all ſciences, of which Paul Jovius ſpeaks ſomewhat contemptibly; for doubtleſs the words which I am going to cite relate to this collection. 'Diſciplinas, literaſque omnes, uno ingenti volumine 'complexus, multa potius didiciſſe, quàm in eo celeri 'tranſcurſu perdiſcenda poſteris reliquiſſe videtur. 'Quandoquidem coacervantis omnia, indefeſſeque ſcribentis, requiſitus ille Romanæ elocutionis ſpiritus 'omnino defuerit, quo uno voluminum vita præclarè 'alitur, longiſſiméque producitur (6). - - - - By comprizing all arts and ſciences in one large volume, he 'ſeems rather to have learned much himſelf, than to 'have left much to be learned by poſterity, in ſuch an 'haſty and precipitate manner. For whilſt he was collecting and writing every thing with indefatigable pains, 'he wanted that neceſſary ſpirit of Roman elocution, by 'which alone the life of books is ſuſtained and prolonged.' John Peter Valla, the author's ſon, cauſed it to be printed, and very humbly acknowledged that the work was not perfect: he makes ſeveral excuſes to the reader (7) that death had prevented his father's putting his laſt hand to it. This work is divided into forty-nine books or ſeven weeks. It was very much criticized by Sorel (8). Geſner obſerves that George Valla borrowed ſeveral things from the Greeks without owning it. 'Nos ſane obſervavimus Georgium Vallam à 'Græcis permulta diſſimulanter eſſe mutuatum, & non 'pauca perperam in Latinum ſermonem tranſtuliſſe (9). '- - - I have obſerved that George Valla borrowed very 'much from the Greeks without owning it, and tranſlated 'ſeveral things into Latin very wretchedly.' He then deſerves to be put into the liſt of Plagiaries.

[(§ α) A copy of this edition paſſed through my hands at an auction, a little above a year ago: and John Peter Valla, the ſon of George, cauſed the ſame book to be reprinted in Folio, likewiſe at Venice, and alſo in 1502 by Simon Bevilaqua, with other works of his father, and particularly his Commentationes in Ptolomæi Quadripartitum, not mentioned by Mr Bayle. As for the reſt, two copies of this edition are in the King's library at Berlin. REM. CRIT.]

[B] His ſcholars . . . . . were ſeized with great ſorrow.] The following citation is longer than the text requires, but I ſhall ſtill venture to inſert it to ſhew what eſteem Valla's ſcholars had for him. 'Haud ita 'multo poſt cùm mane ſummo paratus eſſet conferre 'ſe ad auditorium, ubi tunc Tuſculanas Ciceronis 'quæſtiones prælegebat, deque animæ immortalitate 'vehementiſſimè, doctiſſimèque quotidie diſſerebat, 'dum interim corpori vacaturus excrementa cibi dejecit, animam etiam morte ſubitaria exhalavit. Nos 'qui quotidie ad admirandam hominis doctrinam ſub 'matutinum crepuſculum conveniebamus, non prius 'tali nos doctore defraudatos intelleximus, quam hora 'profitendi fruſtra elapſa certos, qui moræ cauſam 'ſciſcitarentur, domum ejus delegavimus, qui redeuntes gymnaſium noſtrum præter omnium ſpem, 'quia, nullum malæ valetudinis incommodum præceſſerat voce illa erudita ſpoliatum, atque orbatum 'renunciaverunt (10). - - - Not long after, as he was 'ready to go one morning early to his auditory, where 'he then explained Cicero's Tuſculan queſtions, and with 'great learning and force of argument read lectures every 'day on the immortality of the ſoul, he went aſide to 'eaſe nature, and in the mean time died ſuddenly. We 'who came every morning betimes to attend his admirable leſſons knew nothing of our great loſs, till the 'hour

(1) Extant operis ſui expetendorum & fugiendorum libri 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. Mercklinus, in Lindenio renovato, pag. 342.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) See Geſnerus's Bibliotheca, fol. 273.

(4) Nec felicius Georgio Vallæ labor ille ſucceſſit, nam & à Græcis diſſentit ſæpe, & quæ aſſequitur non raro pervertit. Huetius, de claris Interpretibus, pag. m. 221. See, below, Geſnerus's words.

(5) Vide Harduini Præfation. in Plinium.

(6) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. cxiii, p. 256.

(7) In Epiſtola nuncupatoria. See Geſner, in Biblioth. fol, 273.

(8) Sorel, de la Perfection de l'Homme, pag. 289, 290.

(9) Geſn. ubi ſupra.

(10) Pierius Valerianus, de Literator. Infelicit. lib. i, p. 27, 28.

cular, makes very judicious reflections on this kind of death [C].

‘ hour of teaching being elapſed, we ſent ſome perſons to ‘ his houſe to inquire the reaſon of his not coming; and ‘ upon their return they acquainted us with the melancholy news of his death, which was a great ſurprize ‘ to us all, becauſe he had had no manner of illneſs ‘ before.’

[C] Pierius Valerianus . . . . . makes very judicious reflexions on this kind of death.] He firſt obſerves that ſome may think George Valla's dying without any ſickneſs to be a great happineſs. He afterwards ſaith that according to the Chriſtian doctrine, ſudden death ought to be looked on as a misfortune. He then obſerves that according to Philoſophy this accident and all others, which do not depend on us, ought not to paſs for evils. Finally, he would have us believe that Valla's manner of death was a happineſs, ſince it was not preceded by pains and uneaſineſs. Erunt qui genus hoc mortis inter mortalium felicitates enumerabunt, quippe nullo dolore prævio, nulloque mortis metu ſtatim exanimari. Nos tamen ex Chriſtianæ pietatis inſtitutis miſerrimum hoc exiſtimamus, ex Philoſophiæ verò præceptis, neque quidem calamitates alias, quæ alterius, non noſtri juris ſunt, mala exiſtimo; ſed erit ſuper hoc alias diſſerendi locus. At fuerit felix Valla, quia cruciatu nullo, nulliuſque rei anxius è vita migravit: nobis certè ejus diſcipulis calamitoſa fuit hominis mors, quibus eruditionis ſuæ tam triſte deſiderium reliquit (11). All this is very juſt; for the tormenting pains of a diſeaſe of fifteen days, and the languiſhing weakneſs of a long diſtemper, reduce a man to a miſerable ſtate naturally ſpeaking. He is incapable of enjoying either forbidden or lawful pleaſures; he ſuffers in body and mind; his members render him ſenſible of ſeveral uneaſineſſes; his reaſon is enfeebled; he is peeviſh, he is afraid of death, and cannot think of the approach of this King of terrors without horror. A ſudden death ſpares all this, and ought therefore to paſs for a great happineſs, unleſs we reflect on the goſpel-principles. Wherefore Pierius Valerianus very judiciouſly inſerted this exception. Chriſtianity teaches us that a ſinner ſhall not enter into the kingdom of heaven without repentance: and experience convinces us that all men are ſinners. According to theſe principles we ought to look upon ſudden death as a very great evil, ſeeing the dead perſon hath not had ſufficient time to humble himſelf before GOD, and implore his mercy through the merits of JESUS CHRIST. Now a man, who preſents himſelf an impenitent ſinner before the throne of GOD, can expect nothing but eternal damnation. This is the Chriſtian doctrine. It is in vain to alledge that a man predeſtinated to ſalvation, cannot die impenitent, ſuppoſe his death never ſo ſudden; and that a reprobate cannot die penitent though his death is preceded by a tedious ſickneſs: it is in vain, I ſay, to alledge this; for this reflexion will not ſatisfy the ſcruples of thoſe who reaſon in this manner, viz. a man predeſtinated to ſalvation always reconciles himſelf to GOD before his death; thoſe who die ſuddenly have no time to reconcile themſelves to GOD; they are not therefore predeſtinated to ſalvation. I own it would be raſh to aſſert the minor of this ſyllogiſm as a certain truth; but after all it is the moſt ſpecious argument againſt the advantage which ſeveral pretend to find in a ſudden death. They do not fail to obſerve that diſeaſes are very often great obſtacles to repentance, either becauſe they deprive us of our ſenſes and judgment, or becauſe they ſo much enfeeble our reaſon, and memory, that we are not very well qualified to reflect on the goſpel truths, or to make a good uſe of the exhortations of a Divine, or in fine, becauſe when they prove long and lingering they occaſion complaints and murmurs. This diſpoſition leads directly to impenitence, and hardneſs of heart, and ſometimes to impiety itſelf. Though we ſhould agree to all this, yet we may very juſtly aſſert that diſeaſes moſt commonly produce a better effect. So that to pronounce George Valla's death happy, it ought not to be conſidered according to the Chriſtian principles, but looked on with the eyes of Auguſtus. In the judgment of that Emperor, that was the happy death which was preceded by no pain; he deſired ſuch a death for himſelf and his friends. He found herein what good men find in the death of the juſt, that is, the object of his wiſhes. He obtained almoſt what he deſired. ‘ Sortitus exitum facilem & qualem ſemper optaverat. Nam fere quoties audiſſet cito ac nullo cruciatu defunctum quempiam ſibi & ſuis ἐυθανασίαν ſimilem (hoc enim & verbo uti ſolebat) precabatur (12). - - - He obtained an eaſy death, and ſuch as he had always wiſhed for. For whenever he heard that any one died ſuddenly, and without pain, he prayed that ſuch a good and eaſy death (which was the expreſſion he commonly uſed) might happen to himſelf and his friends.’ Cæſar, whoſe ſon he was by adoption, was of the ſame opinion. He deſpiſed the lazy death of Cyrus mentioned by Xenophon, and nothing ſeemed to him preferable to leaving the world unexpectedly. ‘ Illud plane inter omnes fere conſtitit, talem ei mortem pene ex ſententia obtigiſſe. Nam & quondam cum apud Xenophontem legiſſet, Cyrum ultima valetudine mandaſſe quædam de funere ſuo, aſpernatus tam lentum mortis genus, ſubitam ſibi celeremque optaverat. Et pridie quam occideretur in ſermone nato ſuper cœnam, apud M. Lepidum, quiſnam eſſet finis vitæ commodiſſimus, repentinum inopinatumque prætulerat (13). - - - All agree, that his death was ſuch as he had deſired. For when he read in Xenophon that Cyrus, in his laſt illneſs, gave directions concerning his funeral, he deſpiſed ſuch a lingering death, and wiſhed for a quick and ſudden one. And the day before he was killed, as he was at dinner with M. Lepidus, a queſtion being ſtarted, what ſort of death is moſt eligible, he declared that he preferred that which is ſudden and unexpected.’ Heſiod reckons it amongſt the prerogatives of the golden age that men then died in the arms of ſleep. One of our Critics has blamed Ovid for omitting this privilege in his deſcription of the felicities of that age. Mr Menage remembered this cenſure, when he ſaid that his father died in that manner. His words are: ‘ At verò cum dormiturus caput in cervical inclinaſſet, ecce tibi confeſtim exanimatus eſt. Dictum eſt ſenis Aſcræi, aurea ætate mortales quaſi domitos ſomno interiiſſe: quam rem optimam, ut hoc te obiter doceam; neque enim te docendi occaſionem ullam prætermittere debere mihi videor; in optimi illius ſæculi deſcriptione omittere Pelignum Vatem non debuiſſe, rectè à Julio Scaligero animadverſum. Eo igitur modo placido & quieto parens meus fato functus eſt (14). - - - But as he laid his head upon the pillow in order to ſleep, he immediately expired. Heſiod ſays, that in the golden age men died as if overwhelmed with ſleep: which happineſs, by the way, for I ought to omit no opportunity of inſtructing you, is not mentioned by Ovid in the deſcription of that golden age, as Julius Scaliger rightly obſerves. It was in that calm and quiet manner my father died.’ You ſee plainly that his taſte and that of Scaliger the father (15) were agreeable to that of Auguſtus. They would willingly have applied to them who died thus, the proverb, Le bien leur vient en dormant, - - - Happineſs comes to them in their ſleep. See the remark [F] of the article REGIUS.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 28.

(12) Sueton. in Auguſto, cap. c.

(13) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. lxxxvii.

(14) Ægidius Menagius, in Vita Guillelmi Menagii, pag. 76, 77.

(15) In his remark upon the paſſage quoted by me, Menage ſpeaks thus: Theſe are the words of Julius Scaliger, in the eighth chapter of the fifth book de Poetica. Omiſit autem illud Heſiodi, longè optimum in hac ætate, Θνῇσκον δ' ὡς ὕπνῳ δεδμημένοι. The paſſage of Heſiod is in his Ἔργα καὶ Ἡμέραι.

VALLA (NICOLAS) Doctor of the Civil-Law, and Canon of St Peter's Church at Rome, lived in the XVth century. He undertook to tranſlate Homer's Iliad into Latin verſe, but death prevented his compleating that work (a). What he had already tranſlated was printed after his death in the year 1474, and reprinted in 1541 [A]. We

(a) See Voſſius, de Poët. Lat. pag. 80.

[A] What he had already tranſlated was printed in the year 1474, and reprinted in 1541.] The firſt of theſe editions was made at Rome, and was neither known to Geſner or his abridgers, it contains the iiid, ivth, vth, xiiith (1), xviiith, xxth, xxiid, xxiiid and xxivth books of the Iliad, and a ſmall portion of the xixth. To the ſecond edition were added Joſeph Iſcan's ſix books de Bello Trojano, and the tranſlation of four books of Homer (2) in Latin verſe by Opſopœus (3).

(1) Except above two hundred verſes at the end. See Voſſius, de Poët. Lat. pag. 80.

(2) Viz. the 1ſt, 2d, 9th, and 10th, of the Iliad. Voſſius, ibid.

(3) Taken from Voſſius, ibid.

We have alſo his Latin verſion of a poem of Heſiod (b), and two letters in Elegiac verſe. He died very young [B] in 1473 (c). His father LÆLIUS VALLA (d), Doctor of Law, was Conſiſtorial Advocate (e).

(b) That which is intituled Ἔργα καὶ Ἡμέραι, Opera & Dies. This tranſlation is in Epic verſe, and was dedicated to Pius II. See Geſnerus, in Biblioth. fol. 524. (c) Konig, Biblioth. pag. 828, where he obſerves that his epitaph is to be found at pag. 117, of Fabricius's Roma. (d) Or de Valle. (e) Voſſius, ibid.

[B] He died very young.] This Voſſius doth not mention, but we find it in Pierius Valerianus. ‘Inter Romanos autem, ſaith he (4), paucis antè annis non ignobilis fuit Nicolaus Valla, ſummæ juvenis eruditionis, Græcis, Latiniſque literis apprimè doctus, qui quidem adoleſcens admodum ad Homeri ſublimitatem eleganti Latini carminis facilitate cæperat aſpirare. Is tamen nondum alterum à vigeſimo egreſſus annum fati quadam inclementia eruditorum omnium ſpei ſurreptus eſt. - - - A few years ago Nicolas Valla was in great reputation at Rome, being a young man of great learning, and perfectly ſkilled in Greek and Latin. When he was but a lad, he attempted to imitate Homer's ſublimity in elegant and fluent Latin verſe. Before he was quite twenty-one years of age he was ſnatched away by cruel fate to the ſorrow of all learned men.’ What occaſions ſome difficulty is that Valerianus, who wrote in Clement the ſeventh's time (5), ſaith, that a few years before Valla died at the age of twenty-one. If we go to the rigour of exactneſs, this doth not very well ſuit a perſon, who dedicated a Poem to Pius II. Obſerve that I here conſider the particular ways, by which Valerianus commonly expreſſes himſelf in the tract which I cite.

(4) Pierius Valer. de Litterat. Infel. lib. ii, pag. 55.

(5) See his Tract de Litterat. Infelicitate, init. & pag. 11.

VALLA (NICOLAS) in French du Val, Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris (a), and afterwards in the Parliament of Rennes, is the author of a Civil-Law book [A] which is pretty much eſteemed. He flouriſhed in the XVth century. He mentions his ſon-in-law James Capel, who was Counſellor in the parliament of Bretagne (b). Konig, confounds him with Nicholas Valla, who is the ſubject of the preceding article (c). It is not improbable that our du Val was the Counſellor of the parliament of Paris, who was ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm in the famous Mercuriale of 1559, and by flight avoided the danger which threatned him (d). Thuanus calls him Nicolaus Valla (e).

(a) See Paſquier, Recherch. de la France, livr. ix, ch. xxxix, pag. m. 902.

(b) Nicolaus Valla, de Rebus dubiis, Tract. viii, circa fin. pag. m. 136. (c) Konig. Biblioth. pag. 828, where he aſcribes to Nicolas Valla, the tranſlator of Heſiod, who died at Rome in 1473, the treatiſe de Rebus dubiis. (d) Thuan. lib. xxii, pag. m. 453. (e) Id. ibid. pag. 452.

[A] He is author of a Civil Law-book.] The title of it is: De Rebus dubiis & quæſtionibus in jure controverſis Tractatus XX. I make uſe of the fifth edition at Arnheim, 1638, in 4to.

VALLE (ROLANDUS à) an Italian Civilian, lived in the XVIth century. He was not born at Caſalmaggiore in the Milaneze, as ſome have believed, but at Caſal in Montferrat [A]. He wrote many books, whereof ſeveral editions have been printed in Italy, France, and Germany [B]. His Latin ſtile is very mean, and has nothing of that politeneſs which was already introduced among the Civilians.

[A] He was not born at Caſalmaggiore in the Milaneze, as ſome have believed, but at Caſal in Montferrat.] Quenſtedt, who is not ignorant that he was Patritius Caſalenſis, Eques & Primarius Montisferrati Senator, - - - A nobleman of Caſal, knight, and chief ſenator of Montferrat; (theſe are the titles he takes at the beginning of his works) imagines falſely that he was of Caſalmaggiore, and places him amongſt thoſe illuſtrious men whom the Milaneze has produced (1). I ſhall here give a convincing proof of his error, and which, by the way, will inform us of the miſerable condition that Montferrat was reduced to by the war in 1551. ‘Practicus Papien . . . . dicit ſe hanc quæſtionem habuiſſe IN PATRIA MEA MONTISFERRATI, (quæ hodierna die, quæ eſt dies 27 Septemb. Anni 1551, eſt multùm infœliciſſima propter bellorum tumultus, tot tantaſque hoſpitationes militum, quæ adeo intolerabiles ſunt quod coguntur nedum pauperes, verum etiam & nobiles & divites omnem ſubſtantiam viliſſimo pretio vendere, ac derelinquere patriam, & in externas Provincias ſe conferre) qui movetur (2). - - - Practicus Papien . . . . ſays that he treated this queſtion, IN MY COUNTRY OF MONTFERRAT, which at this day, that is the 27th of September 1551, is by far the moſt miſerable of all countries, becauſe of the confuſion of war, and the frequent and heavy quartering of ſoldiers, which is ſo intolerable, that not only the poor, but the noble and rich are forced to ſell all their ſubſtance for a meer trifle, and to leave their native country, and go into foreign parts.’

(1) Quenſtedt, de Patriis Viror. illuſtrium, pag. 295.

(2) Roland, à Valle, in Tractatu de lucro dotis, Quæſt. xxvi, pag. 96, Edit. Colon. 1599.

[B] He wrote many books, whereof ſeveral editions had been printed, in Italy . . . . and Germany.] His treatiſe De lucro dotis, printed at Venice, in the year 1567, and 1584, was reprinted at Cologn, in 1559, in 8vo; as alſo his treatiſe de Inventarii Confectione, which had been publiſhed at Venice in 8vo, in the year 1573, and 1584. His Counſels quibus graves præcipuæ Juris Controverſiæ, de Jure in Regnis, Principatibus, Ducatibus, Comitatibus, Marchionatibus, & Feudis acquirendo vel amittendo deciduntur, &c. contain four volumes in folio in the Venice edition, 1592. They have been already printed in the ſame city ſeparately, and the two firſt had been reprinted at Lyons in the year 1566, and with the third, in the year 1580 (3).

(3) See the Epitome de la Bibl. de Geſn. pag. m. 736, and the Oxford Catalogue, pag. 220.

VALLÉE (GODFREY DE LA) a native of Orleans publiſhed a book at Paris intituled Erre Geru, le fleau de la Foy bigarrée. It is full of blaſphemies and impieties againſt JESUS CHRIST. This author was burnt at Paris for his hereſy in the year 1574. He was commonly called handſome Vallée (a). This is what we find in la Croix du Maine's Bibliotheque Françoiſe. Others ſay he was burnt for atheiſm at Paris in 1571, and that he wrote a book intituled The art of believing nothing (b). Maldonatus made a falſe reflexion on a paſſage which he pretends to be in that book [A]. I wonder that (a) Taken from La Croix du Maine, pag. 125. Renatus de la Barre, at the beginning of his Notes upon Novatianus de Trinitate, ſays that man was called Bellum Vallenſem. That is, handſome Vallée.

(b) Maldonatus in Matth. cap. xxvi, pag. m. 572, in the margin. Others ſay it was in the year 1572.

[A] Maldonatus made a falſe reflexion on a paſſage which he pretends to be in that book.] This Jeſuit's words are: ‘Nonnulli progreſſi ſunt longius, ut nihil crederent, quorum unus cum libellum quendam his annis de arte nihil credendi compoſuiſſet, nihil in eo niſi hoc unum verum dixit, oportere prius Calviniſtam fieri qui atheus eſſe volet. Fuerat ille antea Calviniſta, fuit poſtea atheus, & unicuique in ſua arte credendum eſt. Veriſſima ſententia: nam quiſquis Calviniſta eſt, ſi ea quam ingreſſus eſt incredulitatis that ſo few authors have mentioned that Atheiſt, and that moſt of thoſe who have taken notice of him have grounded what they ſay on the evidence of this Spaniſh Jeſuit.

‘ dulitatis via ire pergat, ad nihil credendum perve‘ niat neceſſe eſt (1). - - - Some have proceeded ſo far ‘ as to believe nothing, one of whom having within ‘ theſe few years written a ſmall book concerning the ‘ Art of believing nothing, has not ſaid one word of ‘ truth in it except this, that whoever would be an ‘ Atheiſt, ought firſt to be a Calviniſt. He had before ‘ been a Calviniſt, and afterwards turned Atheiſt, and ‘ every one is to be believed in his own profeſſion. It is ‘ a very true ſaying : for whoever is a Calviniſt, if he ‘ goes on in the ſame way of incredulity which he has be‘ gun, muſt at laſt come to believe nothing.’ It is incredible how many Jeſuits and other controverſial writers amongſt the Romaniſts, have copied this paſſage of Maldonatus. Several of them have at the ſame time corrupted it ; for they ſuppoſe that Godfrey de la Vallée in his book endeavoured to prove at large, that whoſoever would be an Atheiſt ought firſt to be a Calviniſt (2). Maldonatus never ſaid that this aſſertion was amply handled in the little book de Arte nihil credendi. His copiers have not trodden in his footſteps in reaſoning on that head. They ſuppoſe this Atheiſt to have ſaid ſo becauſe he believed the Calviniſtical ſect to be ſo abominable, that all thoſe who took a near view of it would rather chuſe to profeſs no religion than that. Cur autem dixit eum, qui atheus eſſe volet, oportere prius Calviniſtam fieri ; niſi quod putaret, tam fœdam ac profligatam eſſe Calvini ſectam, ut qui eam prope aſpexiſſet, mallet nullam, quàm talem ſectam profiteri (3) ? Theſe are the words of the Jeſuit Becanus. He adds, that the fruits of Calviniſm are more pernicious than thoſe of Atheiſm, and that tho' the Atheiſts do not believe a Providence, yet they in many particulars obſerve the rules of virtue. They are not guilty either of robbery or murder ; they abhor a lie, they keep their word, they abominate unjuſt wars, and love peace : but, on the contrary, Calvin's diſciples are inſtructed not to regard lying, perjury, adultery, and ſacrilege ; for they believe that GOD hath impoſed on them a neceſſity of committing them, and that the Elect cannot periſh whatever they are guilty of. Si ex fructu doctrina cognoſcenda eſt ; pejores fructus Calvini, quàm Atheorum Doctrina parit. Hi tametſi negent Deum aliquem orbi præſidere, honeſtatem tamen, & rectæ rationis ductum ac directionem in multis ſequuntur, & multa rectè agunt, quæ laudari poſſunt. Cavent furta, homicidia, rapinas, à mendacio abhorrent ; juramenti religionem colunt ; ſervant fidem alteri promiſſam ; bellum injuſtum deteſtantur ; pacem ac tranquillitatem amant. At contra docentur à Calvino diſcipuli, parvi pendere mendacia, perjuria, adulteria, rapinas, libidines, ſacrilegia. Unde hoc ? Quia Deus, inquiunt, æterna ſua prædeſtinatione neceſſitatem, &c (4). This objection of Becanus is too ridiculous to ſtand in need of any caution againſt it. For which reaſon I ſhall content myſelf with barely ſaying that he had appeared leſs ridiculous, if he had exactly followed his original. I do not pretend that in arguing as Maldonatus hath done, he would have reaſoned juſtly ; I only ſay his objection had been leſs abſurd. Maldonatus's reflexion runs thus : that Calviniſm having once ſhook off the yoke of tradition with regard to the Real Preſence, under pretence that it is an opinion clogged with a thouſand difficulties contrary to ſenſe and reaſon, hath put all ſorts of Heretics in the way of rejecting all myſteries ; and that ſome of the moſt ſubtle and incredulous Calviniſts have made uſe of the ſame arguments to deny the Trinity, which they had formerly uſed againſt Tranſubſtantiation (5). Some, adds he, advance farther, even ſo far as to believe nothing, and the road they have got into muſt neceſſarily lead them ſo far. He goes on thus : what I have obſerved is not deſigned to injure the Calviniſts, but to ſhew them the precipice that is at their journey's end, that a view of this imminent danger may divert them from the way of perdition. Two things in this common-place of Maldonatus deſerve to be cenſured ; for, in the firſt place, to grant that preferring the light of reaſon to the authority of thoſe councils, which have determined the Real Preſence, leads to Atheiſm, is giving too great an advantage to Libertines and Free-thinkers. Is it not avowing that the doctrine of the exiſtence of GOD is not leſs contrary to common ſenſe than that of Tranſubſtantiation ? Is it not aſſerting that to believe this exiſtence, we ought blindly to ſacrifice the cleareſt light of Philoſophy to the authority of tradition ; as we ought to ſacrifice it to the ſame authority, in order to believe the Romiſh opinion concerning the Euchariſt ? But what can be more pernicious to religion than ſuch an avowal ? It is therefore very neceſſary to limit this objection. He ought only to have ſaid that ſuch a breach being made in the deciſions of the councils by denying the Real Preſence, may grow ſo wide, as to extend to other incomprehenſible opinions of the Church of Rome. 2. Maldonatus was ignorant of the principles of thoſe whom he calls Calviniſts. They are ſo far from teaching, that we ought to reject a doctrine becauſe our reaſon cannot comprehend it, or is capable of offering almoſt invincible arguments againſt it, that they are the firſt who aſſert, and are always ready to maintain, that nothing can be more pernicious, than to regulate ourſelves by reaſon in the choice of ſome particular doctrines. This is what they inceſſantly alledge againſt the Socinians, always urging the neceſſity of ſubjecting our underſtanding to the obedience of faith. So that tho' the opinion which this Spaniſh Jeſuit attacks, was as dangerous as he repreſents it : yet what he advances againſt the Calviniſts by endeavouring to take an advantage of la Vallée's book againſt them, would be abſolutely unjuſt. In ſuch a critical work as this, it is neceſſary that not only errors in fact, but alſo the ill uſe of true facts ſhould be handled in this manner.

(1) Maldonat. in Evangel. Matthæi, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 572.

(2) In ſuo libro de Arte nihil credendi, fuſe contendit eum qui Atheus futurus eſt, Calviniſtam prius eſſe debere. Henricus Fitz Simon, Brittanom. pag. 107.

(3) Martinus Becanus, Opuſculorum Theologicorum, Tom. i, pag. m. 175.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Multos jam Calviniſtas videmus qui ingenioſiores & magis increduli, id eſt magis Calviniſtæ cæteris erant, eò jam perveniſſe, ut qua ratione hoc prius myſterium (Euchariſtiæ) non credebant, nunc Trinitatis myſterium non credant, cæteroſque Calviniſtas ſicut Calviniſtæ nos tanquam nimis ſimplices & credulos rideant. Maldonatus, ibid.

VANDER-LINDEN (JOHN ANTONIDES) Profeſſor of Phyſic at Leyden, was not the firſt learned man of his family. Some of his anceſtors diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the republic of letters, as we are informed by his funeral oration, where we find a very exact genealogy of his family [A]. He was born at Enckhuyſen (a) on the 13th of January, 1609. He was ſent to the univerſity of Leyden in the year 1625, to ſtudy Philoſophy ; and afterwards wholly applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Phyſic. From Leyden,

(a) It is a town in North-Holland.

[A] We find a very exact genealogy of his family] It reaches as high as his abavus, or his great-grandfather's father, who was Hen. REGNIER, a burgher of Harderwick, whoſe houſe being burnt in the conflagration which conſumed that town, he removed to Naerden (1). There his ſon ANTONY was preferred to be maſter of a claſs, chanter in the choir, and ſecretary to that city : he was a ſtrict Papiſt, but orthodox in a point which, according to Cocceius, is of the higheſt importance to Chriſtianity (2), I mean the right which the children of GOD obtain in JESUS CHRIST by faith, as being made one body with him by his Spirit. Antony left a ſon named Henry, born in 1546, who acquainted himſelf throughly with the learned languages, and with a Chriſtian conſtancy ſuffered a great many afflictions for the Reformed religion. He was very young when he firſt approved of the Reformation, and applied himſelf to the inſtruction of the perſecuted Proteſtants, and even of little children. Being in a boat where the paſſengers refuſed to make room for a young gentlewoman of Guelderland, each urging they could not croud themſelves any cloſer ; he, notwithſtanding, by preſſing, made room for her to ſit (3). He diſcovered ſuch a ſolid piety in this lady, that he fell in love with her, and, with the conſent of her relations, married her. She was the faithful companion of his travels

(1) It is the chief town of Goyland, on the borders of the provinces of Guelderland, and Utrecht.

(2) Sacris Papiſticis diu immixtus, niſi quod de juſtitia Dei, h. e. jure filiorum Dei, quod in Chriſto per fidem, per Spiritum ipſius unum corpus cum ſemper habuerit ipſo facti obtinemus (qui religionis Chriſtianæ apex eſt) integram ſententiam. Cocceius, in Orat. funebri.

(3) Eam Virginem primum in navi cum eam recepiſſet in multitudine, ut ſolet arctius ſedere renuente, ob pietatem amavit & conjugem optavit, ac deinde à parentibus impetravit. Ibid.

Leyden he went to Franeker, in order to continue his ſtudies there in the year 1629, where he took his degree of Doctor of Phyſic ſome months after. His father, who had practiſed Phyſic at Amſterdam ever ſince the year 1625, called him home in order to inſtruct him in the method of practice, and died in 1633. Our Vander-linden continued in the exerciſe of that Faculty, of which he acquitted himſelf with ſo much reputation, that in the year 1639 he was invited to be profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Franeker. He very worthily filled that place for almoſt twelve years. He read lectures on the theorical and practical parts, on Anatomy and Botanics, and it was to his care that the enlargement of the univerſity garden, and the building of an houſe there were owing. The library was not leſs indebted to him; for whilſt he had the direction of it, he ſupplied it with a great many books, by an addreſs which engaged the nobility to that good work. The univerſity of Utrecht offered him a profeſſor's place in 1649, which he refuſed; but two years after he accepted of that which was offered him by the curators of the univerſity of Leyden. He worthily diſcharged all theſe functions till his death, which happened on the 5th of March 1664 (b). He was author of ſeveral books [B], and editor of others [C]. His employment remained vacant till May 1668, when Mr Drelincourt was called to ſucceed him. See Guy Patin's 501ſt letter, in the 464th page travels and dangers. He loſt his father, father-in-law, his relations and friends at the Spaniſh maſſacre at Naerden in 1572. After this fatal accident, he exerciſed the miniſterial function at Enckhuyſen, till the year 1585, when he was invited to be profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker. He was the firſt who read lectures in that univerſity, and it was he who pronounced that inaugural oration of the univerſity, Quam Academiam ipſe initiavit oratione prima & lectione (4). Hence, by the way, we are informed, when that univerſity was founded. He continued in this profeſſorſhip till he died, which was in 1614. He left ſeveral children. Antony, the eldeſt, was a learned man; whoſe great knowledge of claſſic learning engaged the magiſtrates of Enckhuyſen to make him rector of their college. He was beſides, a good Muſician, and a good Organiſt; he was no novice in Theology; but what he excelled in was Phyſic, of which he commenced Doctor at Franeker in the year 1608, and practiſed it with great ſucceſs and reputation, firſt at Enckhuyſen, and afterwards at Amſterdam (5). I have already ſaid (6) that he died in 1633, and that the Leyden profeſſor, John Antonides Vander-Linden was his ſon. Cocceius enlarges very much on the maternal relations of the deceaſed: herein doubtleſs he is too particular; but in general the funeral orations in the northern univerſities art of this ſort. I believe the word Antonides was formed in imitation of the patronymical names of the antient Poets. Tho' I own that there are ſome families in Holland of the name of Antonides. Yet probably it was at firſt no more than a patronymical name.

(b) Taken from his funeral Oration, pronounced by John Cocceius, profeſſor of Divinity.

[B] He wrote ſeveral books.] The titles of them are: Univerſæ Medicinæ Compendium, quinque centuriis ſub Clypeo Clariſſ. viri D. Menelai Winſhemii Med. Doct. & in illuſtri Friſiorum Academia ejuſdem Facultatis & Anatomes Profeſſoris, publico examini decem Diſputationibus propoſitum. Addita eſt centuria inauguralis poſitionum Medico-practicarum de virulentia venerea, ibidem propoſita & defenſa ad diem 18 Octobris 1630. Theſe are properly the Theſes on Phyſic which he maintained in order to be admitted Doctor in 1630. Medulla Medicinæ partibus quatuor comprehenſa. Printed at Franeker 1642, in 8vo. Medicina Phyſiologica novâ curatâque methodo ex optimis quibuſque Auctoribus contracta, & propriis obſervationibus locupletata. At Amſterdam 1653, in 4to. Selecta Medica & ad ea exercitationes Batavicæ. At Leyden in 1656, in 4to. But this book more properly falls under the following remark than under this, it being a collection of ſeveral pieces of Hippocrates, and other antient authors. Diſſertatio de Lacte, this is amongſt Deuſingius's diſſertations, publiſhed at Groningen 1655, in 12mo. De Hemicrania menſtrua, hiſtoria & conſilium. Printed at Leyden 1660, and 1668, in 4to. Meletemata Medicinæ Hippocraticæ. At Leyden 1660, and at Francfort 1672, in 4to. Hippocrates de circuitu ſanguinis. At Leyden 1661, in 4to. De Scriptis Medicis Libri duo, quibus præmittitur Manuductio ad Medicinam. This piece was three times printed at Amſterdam by John Blaeu, in 1637, 1651, and 1662, in 8vo. It is a catalogue of books written on Phyſic. The author improved it at every edition; and after his death Merklinus, a German, very conſiderably enlarged it, and publiſhed it in a large volume in 4to, intituled Lindenius renovatus. It is printed at Nuremberg 1686. It is from this edition that I have taken the catalogue of Vander-Linden's books, which I have inſerted in this remark.

This book of Vander-Linden, de Scriptis Medicis, hath had the fate of all works of this nature; tho' they be very much corrected, and enlarged in every new edition, yet they remain imperfect ſtill. See Voglerus's cenſure on this book of Vander-Linden (7). How large ſo ever the additions of Merklinus are, we are yet far from finding in his edition all thoſe authors who have writ books on Phyſic. This I will prove by an example: there are in it five authors named MARTIN, and yet BERNARDIN MARTIN, born at Paris on the 8th of January 1629, is omitted. He was the ſon of Samuel Martin, Apothecary to Mary de Medicis, Queen of France, and publiſhed a treatiſe of the uſe of Milk, and another upon the breeding of Teeth, both which were very well received and approved by the Faculty of Paris (8). He alſo wrote a relation of his travels in Spain, Portugal, Holland, and Germany, &c. which contains ſome very remarkable things. The late Prince of Condé deſired his attendance on his perſon in 1669. Martin, from that time to the death of that great prince, diſcharged his function very well, and received ſeveral marks of his highneſs's affection. The preſent Prince of Condé (9), only ſon of the late Prince, had him always in his houſe (10). Since Merklinus's edition often contains an abridgment of the lives of the writers on Phyſic, this may, on ſeveral accounts, be ſerviceable to thoſe who ſhall make additions to the Lindenius Renovatus.

[C] He was editor of others.] Let us continue our extracts from the book juſt now cited (11). Adriani Spigelii Opera quæ extant omnia, recenſuit & cum addita præfatione edidit, at Amſterdam 1645, in folio. Hier. Cardani, de utilitate ex adverſis capienda libros iv. ſerio emendatos edidit, at Franeker, 1648, in 8vo. Cornel. Celſi de Medicina libros octo recognovit & edidit, at Leyden, 1657, and 1665, in 12mo. Hippocratis Coi Opera omnia Græcè & Latinèduobus voluminibus comprehenſa, & ad omnes alias editiones accommodata, edidit, at Leyden 1665, in 8vo. This edition of Hippocrates was not entirely finiſhed when Vander-Linden died. He beſtowed a great deal of care on it. The Journal des Sçavans ſpoke of it thus: 'This 'new edition . . . . hath the advantage of anſwering 'all the former, by the help of the figures in the 'margin, which ſhew in what page and place every 'thing is to be found. So that it is preferable to all 'other editions, and remedies the confuſion intro'duced by their diverſity, when a paſſage was to be 'looked for. It is alſo the moſt correct of them all, 'for Mr Vander-Linden having carefully compared 'all the old editions with ſeveral manuſcripts, hath 'reſtored a great number of places, not before cor'rected even Foëſius's edition. The Latin verſion he 'hath choſen is that of Cornarius, becauſe it is the 'oldeſt, and that which is commonly uſed. Death 'ſurprized him a little before this edition was finiſhed, 'which prevented his publiſhing the remarks he de'ſigned to make on Hippocrates (12).' Cocceius touches on this laſt particular: 'Scio τὸν μακαρίτην

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) He wrote ſeveral books about Phyſic, and other ſciences. His ſon has given a catalogue of the books of Phyſic, in his tract de Scriptis Medicis: I do not think that they have been printed. He left ſeveral others imperfect.

(6) In the text of this article.

(7) Voglerus Introduct. in Notitiam bonorum Scriptorum, pag. m. 48.

(8) They have been printed at Paris for Denys Thierry.

(9) I w[illegible] this in the year 1696.

(10) Taken from a Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller.

(11) Lindenius renovatus.

(12) Journal des Sçavans, of the 22*d of February* 1666.

page of the third tome; and obſerve that Guy Patin who was a friend to Vander-Linden, hath frequently mentioned him in his letters [D].

‘multa de variis locis Medicorum principis eſſe meditatum, & magnam ſibi ſupellectilem collegiſſe obſervationum ad hunc auctorem illuſtrandum utilium, quas non potuiſſe ab ipſo edi dolendum eſt (13). - - - I know he deſigned to write notes on ſeveral places of Hippocrates the prince of Phyſicians, and had collected great ſtore of materials for that purpoſe, but death prevented him from publiſhing them.’

[D] Guy Patin . . . . hath frequently mentioned him in his letters.] I ſhall only cite one paſſage (14). ‘I know nothing new concerning Vander-Linden's Hippocrates. This author died at Leyden, aged fifty-three years (15) of a fever and defluxion on his lungs, after having taken antimony, and without having been blooded. What pity it is, he ſhould write ſo many books, underſtand ſo much Latin and Greek, and die of a fever and ſuffocating catarrh without being blooded.

VAQUERIE (JOHN DE LA) Firſt Preſident in the Parliament of Paris, in the reign of Lewis XI, had been Penſionary of the city of Arras (a). He was deputed by that city in 1476, when they were obliged to anſwer the deputies of that prince, who demanded the ſubmiſſion of the inhabitants to him, as their lawful ſovereign, after the death of the Duke of Burgundy. The king's deputies declared that his majeſty pretended to have Arras and Artois by way of confiſcation, and that if the citizens did not open the gates, it would be in danger of being taken by force. La Vaquerie replied, that the county of Artois belonged to the Princeſs of Burgundy, daughter of Duke Charles, on whom it devolved in a direct line, from Margaret, Counteſs of Flanders, the conſort of Philip the firſt Duke of Burgundy; and he ſupplicated his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to obſerve the truce betwixt him and the late Duke Charles (b). This anſwer was to no purpoſe, Arras was obliged to ſubmit to the yoke of France. There has been much talk of a remonſtrance made by La Vaquerie to the ſame king [A]. Nor is the anſwer much leſs talked of which he made when they endeavoured to engage the parliament to interpoſe their authority in the choice of a regent of the realm [B]. Chancellor de l'Hoſpital ſaid one

[A] There has been much talk of a remonſtrance made by la Vaquerie to the ſame king.] I ſhall here make uſe of John Bodin's words. ‘Lewis XI had terribly threatened the court of parliament, for refuſing to publiſh, ratify, and regiſter, ſeveral juſt edicts: the preſident Lavacrie, accompanied with a great number of counſellors, in ſcarlet robes, went to offer their complaints and remonſtrances on account of thoſe menaces. The king obſerving the gravity, ſtatelineſs, and dignity, of thoſe gentlemen, who were reſolved to quit their poſts rather than ratify the edicts ſent to them; was ſurprized, and dreading the authority of the parliament, cauſed the ſaid edicts to be annulled in their preſence, deſiring them to continue in the adminiſtration of juſtice, and ſwore to them that he would never ſend any edict to them which was not juſt and reaſonable. This action was of very great importance in order to keep that king within the juſt bounds of reaſon, who had always exerciſed an abſolute power; and when he was only Dauphin, he ſent for the preſidents of that court, and told them that they ſhould raze out the clauſe DE EXPRESSO MANDATO, BY EXPRESS ORDER, which the court had inſerted into the ratification of the privileges granted to the count du Maine, otherwiſe he would not leave Paris till it was done, and that he would ſurrender the commiſſion which the king had given him. The court ordered that thoſe words ſhould be blotted out, but that what was blotted out might plainly appear, the regiſter was ordered to be kept, as it is at preſent, in purſuance of that order, with the date of the xxviiith of July MCCCCXLII (1).’ The Latin edition of this book of Bodin contains a circumſtance which I muſt not omit. It is, that the king commanded the parliament to ratify his edicts on pain of death, and that the firſt preſident at the head of that ſenate declared to the king, that they had rather die than obey. ‘Rex ſua juſſa ingeminans minas adjecit, capitis etiam indicta pœna niſi curia paruiſſet. Lanacrius (2) præſes re intellecta regem adiit corona judicum purpuratorum ſtipatus, non ut culpam deprecaretur, ſed ut mortem precaretur, cum diceret ſe ſuoſque collegas mortem malle quam legis propoſitæ promulgationem pati (3). - - - The king reiterated his orders, and even threatned the parliament with death if they did not obey. Upon which the preſident Lavacrie, accompanied with a great number of counſellors, in their ſcarlet robes, went to the king, not to excuſe their fault, but to deſire to be put to death, for he ſaid, that he and his colleagues choſe rather to ſuffer death than ratify the propoſed edicts.’

It was not a needleſs thing to relate in this place what was done by that prince in the year 1442 (4). This enhanceth the merit of la Vaquerie; for it is much more glorious to ſhew one's courage in reſiſting an imperious perſon, than to make uſe of it in oppoſition to thoſe who have never diſcovered any obſtinate reſoluteneſs in the maintenance of arbitrary power. Tho' Bodin forgot to mention the year when this firſt preſident made this reſolute and undaunted declaration, it is certain that we are informed, by another proof, how abſolutely this monarch reſolved to be obeyed. Paſquier relates (5), That in the year one thouſand four hundred ſixty five, the ſame Lewis being king, cauſed his grant to the Count de Charolois, to be forcibly publiſhed by his Chancellor in full court; and notwithſtanding the Proteſtations made againſt it by the greateſt part of the counſellors, he would have endorſed on the inſtrument, ‘Regiſtrata, Audito Procuratore Regis, & non contradicente. - - Regiſtered, the King's Attorney-General being firſt heard, and not oppoſing it.’ La Vaquerie was ſtill Penſionary of the city of Arras, in the year 1476. And therefore he was not firſt preſident of the parliament of Paris, till long after Lewis XI had exacted this form of regiſtring. Obſerve carefully Paſquier's words (6): ‘Such proteſtations have been very frequent in this court; and ſeveral edicts have this clauſe, De expreſſo & expreſſiſſimo mandato Regis, pluribus vicibus reiterato. -- By the expreſs and moſt expreſs order of the king, ſeveral times reiterated. Which clauſe, as it is added for a good end, ſo ſeveral people could wiſh (perhaps not without cauſe) that this honourable ſociety would ſometimes be more flexible, according as the public neceſſity requires.’ This confirms what I have ſaid above (7) concerning the evils which the parliaments have frequently occaſioned by their refuſing to regiſter edicts, or by the clauſes which they added to the ratification of them. Paſquier had not talked in this manner, if he had not known that the ſtiffneſs of thoſe ſovereign courts had been ſometimes prejudicial to the ſtate. Let us alſo confirm, by an obſervation of Bodin, a particular which I have mentioned in another place (8). ‘Now the words DE EXPRESSO MANDATO, & expreſſiſſimo mandato, and ſometimes multis vicibus iterato, which are frequently found in the regiſters of ſovereign courts, about the publication of edicts, occaſion ſuch edicts to be neglected, or ſoon after forgotten and ſlighted by the connivance of magiſtrates (9).’ There is no greater encouragement to diſobedience, than to ſuffer the tranſgreſſors of an edict to hope for impunity: but this is in effect what the parliaments did, when they diſgraced the princes edicts in ſuch manner.

[B] The anſwer . . . . which he offered when the attempt was made to engage the parliament . . . . In the choice one day in a ſpeech, ‘ That the poverty of the Preſident de la Vaquerie was much more ‘ commendable than the riches of a Chancellor of Burgundy, to whom his maſter ſaid, ‘ Rolin, ’tis too much (c).’

---

(13) Cocceius, ubi ſupra.

(14) Patin, Lett. cccx, pag. m. 610, of vol. ii.

(15) It ſhould be 55.

(a) That office is much the ſame with that of Syndic. See the ſecond edition of Furetiere's Dictionary, at the word Penſionaire.

(b) Taken from Philip de Comines, book v, chap. xi, pag. m. 298.

(1) Bodin, de la République, livr. iii, chap. iv, pag. m. 417. See alſo Matthieu, Hiſtoir. de Louïs XI, livr. xi, pag. m. 668.

(2) It ſhould be Lavaquerius.

(3) Bodinus, ubi ſupra, pag. 454. Edit. 1601.

(4) Paſquier, Recherches, livr. ii, chap. iv, pag. m. 61, gives a larger account of it than Bodin.

(5) Paſquier, ib.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 62.

(7) See the remark [K], of the article of Chancellor de l'HOSPITAL.

(8) Above, in the ſame remark.

(9) Bodin, ubi ſupra, p. 418.

(c) Le Bret, de la Souveraineté du Roi, livr. ii, ch. v, pag. 182, 183.

choice of a regent of the realm.] After the death of Lewis XI, the Counteſs de Beaujeu, his eldeſt daughter, had the adminiſtration of the government, during the minority of Charles VIII. The Duke of Orleans, who deſired to diſpoſſeſs her of the regency, applied to the parliament of Paris; but Mr de la Vaquerie, firſt Preſident, declared to him, that affairs of that nature did not fall under their cognizance (10). The author of the book, intituled, The Miniſtry of Cardinal de Richelieu relates it thus: ‘ The parliaments are ‘ not leſs obliged by the laws of juſtice than by thoſe ‘ of prudence, never to differ from the king in affairs ‘ of ſtate: I ſay they are obliged to it by juſtice, be‘ cauſe it is to uſurp a power which doth not belong ‘ to them, to attempt to judge of ſuch things, they ‘ being only created by the king, to adminiſter juſtice ‘ to the people; as the Preſident de la Vaquerie told ‘ the Chancellor of the Duke of Orleans, who for‘ merly deſired the parliament, on the part of his ‘ maſter, to preſs the king to come to Paris and make ‘ uſe of their counſel in the moſt important af‘ fairs (11).’

(10) Le Grain, Hiſt. de Louïs XIII, pag. 4.

(11) Hiſtoire du Miniſtere du Cardinal de Richelieu, Part. ii, pag. 219, Dutch Edit. ann 1631.

VAUBRUN (THE MARQUIS OF). See BAUTRU (NICOLAS).

VAUMORIERE (PETER DORTIGUE SIEUR DE) of noble extraction in the city of Apt in Provence (a), lived in the XVIIth century. He ſettled at Paris, and there publiſhed ſome Romances which did him honour [A]. He wrote politely in verſe and proſe (b). He was Sub-director to the Academy of the Abbot d'Aubignac [B], compoſed of perſons of merit and learning. He collected a great number of harangues on all kinds of ſubjects, and publiſhed them at Paris in 1688 in 4to, with a treatiſe on the Art of writing ſuch Pieces. The Journaliſts ſpoke advantageouſly of it (c). He was at variance with Fortune [C], if we may believe Richelet. The letters he publiſhed on all kind of ſubjects, with directions on the manner of writing them, were well received by the public. The firſt edition was finiſhed on the 12th of November 1689, and the ſecond on the laſt of September 1694. I have ſeen a third in two volumes in 12mo, to which are added ſeveral precepts and ſome letters, it bears the date of the year 1695. The Elogy of Mr de Vaumoriere is prefixed to it, and contains a very particular account of the good qualities of his mind and ſoul; but nothing is ſaid either of his country, or fortune, or time of his birth, &c. He was dead when that elogy was made.

(a) Rocolles, Introduction à l'Hiſtoire, Tom. ii, pag. 339, Paris Edit. 1664.

(b) The abbot de Marolles, Denombrement des Auteurs, pag. 441.

(c) See the Journal des Sçavans, of the ſecond of February 1688, pag. 268, Dutch Edit. and l'Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, March 1688, pag. 388.

[A] He publiſhed ſome Romances which did him honour.] He wrote the great Scipio, and finiſhed the laſt work of Mr de la Calprenede, I mean the Pharamond. The author being prevented by death had only carried it to the ſeventh tome: Mr de Vaumoriere continued it to the end. He declared in the preface to the twelfth volume, which is the laſt, that ſome had wronged him in ſaying that he had made uſe of Mr de la Calprenede's memoirs, who, added he, never made any for himſelf. The Journal des Savans was at that time pretty ſparing in the commendation of authors, and criticiſed them freely: but, however, it ſpoke of the firſt tome of the continuation of Pharamond in advantageous terms. There is reaſon to hope from what appears of the eighth volume which Mr de Vaumoriere has compoſed, that the death of him whoſe footſteps he follows will not be long regretted. He has throughly entered into the ſpirit of that author. He preſerves to the heroes and heroines the ſame ſentiments, and the ſame characters, which he had given them: and in his ſtile he has aſſumed that grand and lofty air which was peculiar to him. It may even be ſaid without wounding the memory of that illuſtrious deceaſed perſon, that the diſcourſe of Mr de Vaumoriere is ſmoother and more correct than his: and that he knows better how to check the ſallies of the ſublime (1). Mr Gueret does not judge of this firſt tome of the continuation with the ſame indulgence: but as for the reſt he is liberal of his encomiums on the ſubſtitute of la Calprenede. I am not diſſatisfied with his labour, he makes Pharamond ſay: I wiſh only he had not made an entire volume of the hiſtory of Conſtantine; it languiſhes a little too much: and were it not for the beauty of his language which keeps up the attention of his reader, it would be tedious. He was well appriſed of it himſelf; for he has corrected that fault in the following tomes: and what I reckon a good omen for all the reſt, he ſtill gathers ſtrength as he goes forward, and now treads firm and ſure in the ſteps of his illuſtrious predeceſſor (2). When ſmall Romances were in vogue, Mr de Vaumoriere conformed to that taſte; he wrote ſome which might be read from beginning to end in leſs than two hours. Such was that which he intituled, Diane de France, and which was printed in the year 1674, if I remember right. He wrote alſo La Galanterie des Anciens; Adelaïde de Champagne: Agiatis: L'Art de plaire dans la converſation.

[B] He was ſub-director to the Academy of the Abbot d'Aubignac.] You will ſee it by the liſt, which the Mercure Galant has given of thoſe who compoſed it (3). You will alſo find there ſome circumſtances concerning this Academy, and amongſt others that it had been broke after the nomination of the Abbot de Villeſerain to the biſhopric of Senés. Another book informs me that they met at the houſe of that Abbot. I ſhall recite the paſſage, becauſe it is curious. It is Henrietta Silvia de Moliere who ſpeaks: ‘ Every ‘ thing I heard ſeemed to me to be a coach that came ‘ to carry me away: and I was in an houſe where I ‘ frequently had ſuch kind of frights; it was the Ho‘ tel de Hollande. The Abbot de Villeſerain lived over ‘ againſt it, and the aſſembly of Wits, which after‘ wards met at his houſe, was projected at that time. ‘ I ſaw nothing but people of a ſtern countenance ‘ ſtopping at his gate, and paſſing along my ſtreet, ‘ and I took them for ſo many people ſent from the ‘ devout ladies (4).’

[C] He was at variance with Fortune.] Thoſe are the words of the Sieur Richelet in the index of one of his books (5). The words he uſes in the body of the book at the place to which the index refers, are ſtill more emphatical. Mr Conrart was exceedingly pleaſed that people ſaid he underſtood perſons of merit, and that he did them good offices like a gentleman. If in this age the favourites of fortune were of that temper, Caſſandra, Vaumoriere, and many other unhappy wretches would not run poſt to beggary (6). I believe he had a grudge againſt him; for in another book he ſpeaks thus: ‘ The Continuator of Pharamond who has ‘ been in priſon theſe three weeks is juſt ſet at li‘ berty (7).’

(1) Journal des Sçavans, of the 23*d of February*, 1665, pag. 156, 157, Dutch Edit.

(2) Gueret, Parnaſſe Réformé, pag. 174, 175.

(3) Mercure Galant, of the year 1672, Tom. i, pag. 81, Dutch Edit.

(4) Vie de Henriette Sylvie de Moliere, Part. iv, pag. 99, Dutch Edit. 1674.

(5) Intituled, Les plus belles Lettres des meilleurs Auteurs François.

(6) Richelet, Lettres, &c. pag. xiv, Dutch Edit. 1694.

(7) Idem, Remarques ſur ſon Dictionaire, pag. 33, at the word Elargir, Geneva edition 1680.

VEDELIUS (Nicolas) a noted reformed Divine, who lived in the XVIIth century. He was born in the Palatinate, and was profeſſor of Philoſophy for twelve years at Geneva, and miniſter of the church in the ſame city for ten years (a). He was invited to Deventer in 1630, in order to be Divinity and Hebrew Profeſſor; having accepted the invitation, he commenced Doctor of Divinity at Baſil, in his journey from Geneva to Deventer, on the 24th of June the ſame year (b). He acquitted himſelf very well of his duty, and diſcovered a great zeal againſt the Arminians [A]. He exerciſed proviſionally the function of Profeſſor of Philoſophy in 1634 (c). He removed from Deventer, and became Divinity Profeſſor at Franeker, about the year 1638 (d). This was his laſt ſtation; for he died at Franeker in 1642. He was ſorry that death did not permit him to publiſh the anſwer, which he had prepared to his adverſaries [B], concerning the power of the magiſtrate in Eccleſiaſtical affairs [C]. I ſhall give a catalogue of his works [D]. I have in another place (e) ſpoken of his quarrel with Barleus.

The Programma, which I have quoted, ſuppoſes he was only twelve years profeſſor at Geneva; and yet he himſelf in the inaugural oration, which he pronounced at Franeker on the 25th of November 1639, ſays he had been profeſſor at Geneva and Deventer twenty-three years. Therefore as he had been at Deventer only ſince the year 1630, he muſt have been at Geneva fourteen years. His ſon NICOLAS VEDELIUS died miniſter of the French church at Heuſden towards the beginning of the year 1705.

[A] He diſcovered a great zeal againſt the Arminians.] He publiſhed a book in 1631, intituled De Arcanis Arminianiſmi, in which he maintains that explicitly and profeſſedly, they endeavour to introduce a ſubtile ſort of Atheiſm into the Church; and that though they do not premeditately attempt to bring in a groſs Atheiſm, they open a great and wide gate for its admittance. The beginning of one of his chapters runs thus: ‘ Propoſuimus hactenus doctrinam Remonſtrantium, qua omnis generis hæreſes & ſectas in Eccleſiam Dei, adeoque Libertiniſmum hoc eſt Atheiſmum ſubtilem EX PROFESSO introducere conantur (1). - - - - I have hitherto laid open the doctrine of the Remonſtrants, whereby they profeſſedly attempt to introduce ſects and hereſies of all kinds, and conſequently Libertiniſm, that is ſubtile Atheiſm, into the church of GOD.’ A little after he hath theſe words: ‘ Scopus meus non eſt gravare Remonſtrantes accuſatione ea, ac ſi Atheiſmum craſſum introducere data opera ſeu ex profeſſo molirentur. Nequaquam vero, prout eodem cap. primo monui. Sed tantum oſtenſurus ſum, præter alia effecta peſtilentiſſima quæ nova ipſorum Theologia & Religio producit; etiam feneſtram & portam aperiri ea Atheiſmo craſſo patentiſſimam atque ampliſſimam (2). - - - It is not my deſign, as I have already ſaid, to load the Remonſtrants with this accuſation, as if they induſtriouſly or profeſſedly attempted to introduce groſs Atheiſm. But I was only to ſhew, that beſides other moſt pernicious effects which their new Theology or Religion produces, a very large window or gate was thereby opened to groſs Atheiſm.’ He adds that he has no other deſign than to convert the Remonſtrants by ſhewing them the danger which attends their doctrine. Quo nimirum unuſquiſque eo magis ab ea ſibi caveat: & ipſi Theologi Remonſt. lucri fiant, qui etiam noſter in hoc labore ſcopus eſt (3). We have ſeen ſomething like this in Maldonatus's Commentaries (4). The Arminians furiouſly inveighed againſt him in a book intituled Vedelius Rhapſodus. He replied in the fourth part of his work printed in 1634. The ſecond and third part were publiſhed in the year 1633.

[B] He was concerned that death did not permit him to publiſh the anſwer which he had prepared to his adverſaries.] This circumſtance you will find in one of Voſſius's letters. You will there ſee alſo that in caſe this reply of Vedelius had been printed, they would have left out all the violent and injurious expreſſions diſperſed in that book by way of return to his antagoniſt. ‘ Vedelius Theologiæ apud Franekeranos Profeſſor, dum in Friſia ſum, fatis conceſſit. Moribundum cruciabat, quod terris eriperetur, priuſquam potuiſſet Revio & Triglandio reſpondere. Horum uterque acerbe ſatis ſcripſit adverſus ſcriptum ejus de Conſtantini Epiſcopatu; quo Magiſtratus jura circa res Eccleſiæ defendit. Collegæ defuncti mihi Franekeræ ajebant, fortaſſe reſponſum ſic etiam edendum; ſed deletis, quæ ut par pari redderet hoſtimentum, virulentius chartis illeviſſet adverſus Revium (5). - - - - Vedelius, Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker, died whilſt I was in Frieſland. He was extremely concerned that death prevented him from anſwering Revius and Triglandius. Both of them wrote very ſharply againſt his treatiſe of Conſtantine's Epiſcopacy; wherein he maintains the power of the civil magiſtrate in eccleſiaſtical affairs. The colleagues of the deceaſed told me at Franeker, that the anſwer would perhaps be publiſhed, but that thoſe virulent things he had ſaid in it againſt Revius would be left out.’

[C] Concerning the power of the magiſtrate in Eccleſiaſtical affairs.] Several diſputes aroſe concerning this queſtion in Holland after the ſynod of Dort; for ſome Divines endeavoured to withdraw the eccleſiaſtical authority from the ſovereign, and others would confer on the magiſtrate all eccleſiaſtical authority. At leaſt thus each party interpreted the other's intention and doctrine. Vedelius engaged in this diſpute, and in the beginning of the year 1638, publiſhed a Diſputatio Theologica de Magiſtratu adverſus Bellarmini librum de Laicis, where he extended the magiſtrates power much farther than others would have it. Some time after knowing that they were preparing to refute him, he publiſhed (6) a ſecond edition of his diſputation, to which he added ſeveral explanations. The whole title of this piece is, De Epiſcopatu Conſtantini magni, ſeu de poteſtate Magiſtratuum Reformatorum circa res Eccleſiaſticas, diſſertatio repetita cum reſponſione ad interrogata quædam. He foreſaw that he ſhould irritate his adverſaries, and draw on himſelf a great deal of abuſive language (7); but for all this he had courage enough to enter the liſts. His foreſight was juſt, and it was not neceſſary to be a great prophet in order to predict an event of that nature. He was attacked in his life-time and after his death. Several Zealand miniſters cauſed him to be refuted, when he was dead, making uſe of the pen of a miniſter of Middleburg (8). His friends in Frieſland defended him, and treated the Zealand miniſters with the utmoſt contempt. See the book intituled, Grallæ ſeu vere puerilis cothurnus ſapientiæ, quo ſe jactat apud imperitos Guillelmus Apollonii, &c (9). Apollonius anſwered: they replied by a book whoſe title is comical enough (10).

[D] A catalogue of his works.] I have already mentioned three: the reſt are, Notæ in Epiſtolas Ignatii. Thoſe notes are partly critical and partly controverſial, and are joined with the epiſtles of S. Ignatius which he cauſed to be printed at Geneva in the year 1623 in 4to. Commentarius de tempore utriuſque Epiſcopatus, S. Petri, Antiocheni & Romani, at Geneva 1624. Rationale Theologicum, ſeu de neceſſitate & vero uſu principiorum rationis ac Philoſophiæ in Controverſiis Theologicis; at the ſame place 1628. A Remedy againſt Apoſtacy in French, printed alſo there in the ſame year. Panacea Apoſtaſiæ, at the ſame place 1628. This is a tranſlation of the former. S. Hilary, or an antidote againſt ſorrow, in French, at Geneva 1630. S. Hilarius, ſeu Antidotum contra triſtitiam pro ſancta Hilaritate, at Leyden 1632, it is a tranſlation of the former. De prudentia veteris Eccleſiæ, at Amſterdam 1633. De Deo Synagogæ contra Caſp. Barlæum at Harderwick 1632. Opuſcula Theologica at Franeker 1641 in 12mo.

(a) See the Programma mention'd by Revius, in his Hiſtory of Deventer, pag. 686.

(b) Revius, in Hiſtoria Daventrienſi, ibid.

(c) Id. ibid. pag. 694.

(d) Id. ibid. pag. 713.

(e) In the remark [D], of the article BARLEUS.

(1) Vedelius, de Arcanis Arminianiſmi, lib. ii, cap. x, pag. m. 242. Edit. 1631, in 8*vo, and pag.* 86, Edit. 1632, in 4*to.*

(2) Ibid. pag. 243.

(3) Ibid.

(4) See the article VALLE'E, remark [A], about the middle.

(5) Voſſius, Epiſt. ccccclxiii, pag. m. 409. col. 2. It is dated the 24*th of October* 1642. It is among thoſe of the Arminians, pag. 821, of the edition in folio.

(6) In the year 1641.

(7) Jam prævideo temerariis & ſuperbis ingeniis nihil magis in votis fore, quam ut ſpretis ſalutaribus pacis & concordiæ conſiliis ac monitis in me involent, & virus ſuum contra me evomant. Nicol. Vedeli, Præf. de Epiſcopatu Conſtantini.

(8) Called Gulielmus Apollonius.

(9) It was printed at Franeker, in the year 1646.

(10) Grallator furens de novo in ſcenam productus, cum pantomimo ſuo bombomachide Vliſſingano. At Franeker 1647.

VEGIUS (MAPHÆUS) Born at Lodi in the Milaneſe in 1407, was a famous Orator, and the greateſt Latin Poet that had been ſeen for ſeveral ages (a). He went through his claſſical learning at Milan, from whence he removed to Pavia to ſtudy the Civil Law ; but the plague ſoon obliged him to return to Lodi, where he applied himſelf entirely to polite learning, and particularly to poetry, and began to write books very early [A]. Going to Rome he made himſelf beloved and eſteemed by Pope Martin the Vth, who made him Secretary of the Briefs. He diſcharged that office ſo faithfully that he was raiſed to a more conſiderable poſt by the ſame Pope ; which was that of Datary. At the ſame time he beſtowed on him a canonry in the church of St Peter (b). He was ſo throughly contented with theſe preferments that he refuſed a rich biſhopric. The reſpect which Eugenius IV, and Nicholas V, had for him, obliged them to continue him in the poſt of Datary. He was very much eſteemed by Panormitanus, and Æneas Sylvius, and ſhewed a great devotion for St Auguſtin [B]. His morals were very exemplary. He died at Rome in 1459 (c). Among thoſe authors who mention him, I find ſcarce any, who do not paſs over in ſilence the fineſt paſſage of his life ; for they do not tell us any thing of the alteration of his taſte. The poetical fictions were at firſt his greateſt delight (d) ; he thought of nothing but of making of verſes, and placing the Pagan divinities in them. Virgil was one of his great gods. David's Pſalms ſeemed to him but old womens ſongs, and he mortally hated the profeſſion of a prieſt. But at laſt he was diſguſted at the profane beauties of poetry ; the pſalms of David appeared to him admirable, and he was touched with an extream pleaſure in the ſacerdotal functions, and employed himſelf in the inſtruction of the nuns [C]. I ſhall ſpeak of his books [D].

I could

(a) Jovius Elog. cap. cvii, pag. m. 250.

(b) Moreri ſays he was canon of Lateran.

(c) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro d'Huomini Letterati, Part. ii, pag. 188.

(d) See the remark [C].

[A] He began to write books very early.] At the age of ſixteen, if we believe Ghilini ; and we muſt believe him (1) though his authority in this caſe ought to be of little weight ; for it is certain that he is tainted with the Enthuſiaſm of a Panegyriſt, and that he has not well adjuſted the parts of his narrative. Doth he write judiciouſly when he relates, 1. That Vegius being arrived at the higheſt perfection in all ſorts of human literature, went to Pavia in order to ſtudy the Civil and Canon Law (2) ? 2. That having ſcarce began to ſtudy there, he was obliged to leave the town on account of the Plague ? 3. That he returned into his own country, where he applied himſelf again to the ſtudy of polite learning, and to writing, being ſcarce yet ſixteen years old (3) ? Doth not this relation imply that Vegius underſtood perfectly all the parts of literature before he was ſixteen ? This hyperbole is abſurd. He died before he nearly approached that perfection ; how then was he arrived at it in his younger years ?

[B] He ſhewed a great devotion for St Auguſtin.] He built a chapel in the church dedicated to that Saint at Rome on the right hand of the great altar, and having cauſed the bones of St Auguſtin to be put into a very fine ſhrine with thoſe of his mother Monica, he removed them from Oſtia to this chapel. He wrote Poems in honour of thoſe two ſaints, which he alſo very much praiſed in the preface of his book, de educatione puerorum & claris eorum moribus. In that work he confirms his precepts concerning the education of children by as many proper inſtances as he could poſſibly find in the life of St Auguſtin and his mother Monica. ‘ In præfatione poſtquam D. Auguſtini & matris ipſius Monicæ laudes pluribus prædicavit, ſubjungit : Enitemur oſtendere omnem bene educandorum filiorum rationem, & convenientiſſimis ſubinde etiam ſanctiſſimiſque tam parentis Monicæ quam filii Auguſtini exemplis, ſingula quibus idoneè ea applicari potuerint confirmare ſtudebimus (4). - - - In the preface, after he had much commended St Auguſtin and his mother Monica, he adds, We will endeavour to ſhew the whole method of educating children well, and confirm every thing by applying moſt ſuitable and holy examples in the life of Monica and her ſon Auguſtin.’

[C] But at laſt he was diſguſted at the profane beauties of Poetry ; the pſalms of David appeared to him admirable, &c.] Such excellent converſions, ſuch holy metamorphoſes, are ſo rare that they ſhould not have been forgotten by thoſe who mention this writer. Moſt Poets retain till death their paſſion for the beauties of profane Poetry. Vegius is an exception to this general rule, his confeſſion runs thus. ‘ Priora recolens tempora, ſaith he, quibus inhiabam quotidiè condendis carminibus, nihil præter Muſas & Poetarum luſus pulchrum ducens, mirari non ſatis poſſum, adeo IMMUTARI affectus meos, adeò vim animo meo [ut ita dixerim] fieri potuiſſe, ut à dulcibus prurientibuſque fabulis, ad ſtudia ſeveriora converſus ſim, & qui decantandis ingentibus rerum geſtis, confictiſque tot incertorum Deorum numinibus, ardentius inſtabam, nunc ad exhortandas ſorores, ad docendas virgunculas deſcenderim, ut pro Ovidiis & Flaccis, nunc Auguſtinos & Hieronymos, pro Virgilio, quem alterum in terris Deum eſſe arbitrabar, nunc David fideliorem Vatem colam, ſuſcipiam amplectarque, & ejus mihi carmina, quæ tanquam anilia deliramenta ſordebant, nunc mira adſpergant animum ſuavitate, atque [unde magis etiam obſtupeſcam] quod tantopere deteſtabar exhorrebamque inſtar mortis, nunc ſacerdotio dulcius nihil putem (5). - - - When I reflect on former times, when I was conſtantly intent on making verſes, and took no delight but in the Muſes and poetical fictions, I am amazed to find ſuch an alteration in my temper, and my mind ſo forcibly turned [if I may ſay ſo] from ſweet and agreeable amuſements to grave and ſevere ſtudies ; and that I, who uſed to be ſo earneſt in celebrating the glorious exploits, and fabulous excellencies of ſo many unknown gods, ſhould now deſcend to inſtruct ſiſters and teach nuns ; that inſtead of an Ovid and Horace, I ſhould now admire an Auguſtin and Jerom, and inſtead of a Virgil whom I looked on as another god upon earth, I ſhould now adore and careſs a David, a more faithful Poet ; and that his pſalms, which formerly ſeemed to me like old womens tales, ſhould now affect my mind with wonderful pleaſure ; and [what ſurprizes me moſt of all] that I ſhould eſteem nothing ſo delightful as the prieſthood, which before I deteſted and abhorred like death.’

[D] I ſhall ſpeak of his books.] Some of them are in proſe, others in verſe, ſome are printed, others not. The Poem for which he is moſt famous is his ſupplement to the Æneid ; he imagined that Virgil had not concluded that work. He reſolved therefore to add a thirteenth book which is uſually printed with the twelfth of that Roman Poet. His performance hath been cenſured (6). His dialogue de Felicitate & Miſeria for ſome time paſſed for a piece of Lucian (7). It was printed with the book de Educatione Puerorum, the Philalethes, and the Diſceptatio inter terram, ſolem, & aurum. All theſe tracts are in proſe. Ghilini falſely believes that the ſeven books de Perſeverantia Religionis ad Sorores, were never printed. They were printed at Paris in the year 1511 (8) with ſome of thoſe pieces whoſe titles I have mentioned. They were inſerted in the great Bibliotheca Patrum. His Poem on the frauds of the peaſants muſt needs be very curious. You will find in Ghilini the titles of a great many pieces of this author, which were never printed. Paul Jovius hath not forgot to praiſe him on account of ſome monuments of the application of his pen to ſacred ſubjects, which he left behind him. ‘ Ne quid ad cumulatam eruditionem vero Chriſtiano deeſſet,

‘ quædam

(1) See the notes on the Naudæana, pag. 194, 195.

(2) Dopò eſſer egli a ſomma perfezione arrivato in ogni genere di lettere humane andò à Pavia. Ghilini, Teatro, Part. ii, pag. 188.

(3) Diedeſi nell' età di ſedici anni appena a ſcrivere. Id. ibid.

(4) Geſner, in Bibl. fol. 491, ſpeaking of Vegius's treatiſe, de Educatione Puerorum, printed at Baſil with other ſuch ſmall books in the year 1541.

(5) Vegius de Perſeverantia Religionis, in Tom. xxvi, Bibl. Max. fol. 689, apud Spizelium, in Literato feliciſſimo, pag. 162.

(6) See Mr Baillet. Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, num. 1222, Tom. iv, pag. 13, 14, Edit. 1725, in 4*to.*

(7) Ghilini, ubi ſupra.

(8) See the catalogue of the Bodleian Library, pag. 224.

I could make a large ſupplement to his article, if I would copy the notes on the Naudæana : but it is ſufficient to refer the reader to them. It is a book eaſy to be had.

‘ quædam etiam in ſacris literis ſynceræ interpretationis gloſſemata reliquit, aureumque præſertim libellum de rebus antiquis memorabilibus Baſilicæ ſancti Petri, in quo donaria, ſepulcraque Pontificum referuntur (9). - - - That nothing might be wanting to perfect the learning of a true Chriſtian, he left ſome pious annotations on the holy ſcriptures, and a very valuable book on the memorable antiquities of St Peter's church, wherein he gives an account of the offerings and ſepulchres of the Popes.’

VELSERUS (MARK) Conſul of Augſburg [A], his native city, was a learned Civilian and a famous author. He was born on the 20th of June 1558, of a very ancient family [B], which had poſſeſſed vaſt riches [C]. He was carefully educated ; and [A] Conſul of Augsburg.] I cannot tell whether theſe words Duumvir Reipublicæ Auguſtanæ, which we read on the print of our Velſerus, can be better rendred. It were to be wiſhed that ſome body would publiſh a Dictionary of modern offices, a taſk very worthy of a learned man. Such a work would be very ſerviceable to tranſlators, and readers ; for inſtance, it would inform us what we ought to underſtand by Duumvir Auguſtanus, a title always given to Marcus Velſerus. Conſul of Augsburg is not a right tranſlation ; for the conſular dignity of the Romans did not reſemble that of thoſe, who are called Duumvirs of Augsburg. On this occaſion I obſerve that one of the moſt conſiderable poſts of Holland, I mean that of Penſionary, is very improperly ſo called. Its name is derived from an accident entirely foreign (1), which gives no manner of idea either of the rights or functions (2) of the perſon, who is poſſeſſed of it. What I have ſaid of the conſulſhip of Velſerus, I ſay alſo of his prætorſhip. I am perſuaded that a prætor of Augſburg doth not at all reſemble the old Roman Prætors ; and yet we can ſcarce avoid giving the Roman names to modern offices, when we either write in Latin, or tranſlate any modern books out of that language. I do not know whether Duumvir and Prætor are not the ſame thing at Augſburg. However there are offices in that city inferior to that of Duumvir, which modern writers expreſs by the word Conſulſhip (3).

